PREFACE

THE Editor's aim has been to provide a complete and independent DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE in a single volume and abreast of present-day scholarship.

1. Complete.—The Dictionary gives an account of all the contents of the Bible, the articles being as numerous as in the largest dictionaries, but written to a different scale. The Index of the Dictionary of the Bible in five volumes by the same Editor has been taken as basis, and such additions made to it as the latest research has suggested. The persons, places, and important events in the Bible are described. There are articles on the Biblical theology and ethics, on the antiquities, and on the languages—English as well as Hebrew and Greek. The books of the Bible are carefully explained in their origin, authorship, and contents; and full account is taken of the results of literary criticism and archæological discovery.

2. Independent.—The Dictionary is not a condensation of the five-volume Dictionary. It is not based upon it or upon any other dictionary. It is a new and independent work. All the signed, and most of the unsigned, articles are written afresh, and (with few exceptions) by different authors from those who treated the same subjects in the larger Dictionary. Even when the wording of the large Dictionary has been retained, as in the case, for example, of proper names of minor importance, every statement has been verified anew. The single-volume Dictionary will thus be found as fresh and full of life as the largest dictionaries are.

3. In a single volume.—This is to bring the contents of the Bible, in accordance with present scholarship, within reach of those who have not the means to buy or the knowledge to use the Dictionary in five volumes. This Dictionary contains no Hebrew or Greek except in transliteration. It is, however, a large volume, and it would have been larger had not the utmost care been taken to prevent overlapping. For the great subjects are not treated with that excessive brevity which makes single-volume dictionaries often so disappointing. The space has been so carefully husbanded that it has been found possible to allow 24 pages to the article on ISRAEL; 23 pages to the article on JESUS CHRIST; and half that number to a further article on the PERSON OF CHRIST. There is another way in which space has been saved. The whole subject of MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY, for example, has been dealt with in a single article. That article includes many sub-topics, each of which is found in its own place, with a cross-reference to this comprehensive article; and when the word occurs in this article it is printed in black type, so that no time may be lost in searching for it.

4. Abreast of present Scholarship.—That is to say, of the average scholarship of its day. There are many reasons why a Dictionary of the Bible should not take up an extreme position on either side. But the reason which has proved to be most conclusive, is the impossibility of getting the whole of the work done satisfactorily by either very advanced or very conservative scholars. They are not numerous enough. And there could be no satisfaction in entrusting work to men who were chosen for any other reason than their knowledge of the subject.

* * The Editor would call attention to the Additional Note on the article ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, which will be found at the end of the volume.

PRONUNCIATION OF PROPER NAMES

It will be generally agreed that some uniformity in the pronunciation of Scripture Proper Names is extremely desirable. One hears in church and elsewhere, not only what are obvious and demonstrable mispronunciations, but such variety in the mode of pronouncing many names as causes irritation and bewilderment. It is impossible to tell whether a speaker or reader is simply blundering along, or whether he is prepared to justify his pronunciation by reference to some authority, or to base it upon some intelligible principle. If after hearing a name pronounced in a way widely different from that to which we have been accustomed, we refer to some accessible authority, it is by no means improbable that it will be found to support the accentuation or enunciation of which we should previously have been inclined to disapprove.

It is less easy to see how the uniformity desiderated is to be brought about. A committee consisting of representative Biblical and English scholars might draw out a list which would be accepted as a standard, on the assumption that individuals were prepared, for the sake of the desired uniformity, to give up their own personal habits or preferences. It is certain that no authority less distinguished would be recognized. It has therefore been, no doubt, a wise decision on the part of the Editor of the present work not to indicate, as was at one time contemplated, the pronunciation of each proper name as it occurred, at any rate when any difficulty was likely to be experienced. This would simply have been to add another to the numerous, and too often discordant, authorities already existing. Instead, it has been thought better to prepare the way, in some degree, for an authoritative list by discussing briefly some of the principles which should govern its construction.

1. Divergence of authorities.—It may be well at the outset to illustrate that divergence of accessible authorities to which allusion has been made. For this purpose we shall select the four following lists:—(1) That of Professor T. K. Cheyne, D.D., of Oxford, originally contributed to the Queen's Printers' Teachers' Bible of 1877 (Eyre & Spottiswoode); (2) that contributed by Professor W. B. Stevenson, B.D., now of Glasgow, to the Supplementary Volume to Dr. Young's Analytical Concordance (George Adam Young & Co.); (3) that contained in the Appendix to Cassell's English Dictionary, edited by John Williams, M.A. (Cassell & Co.); (4) that contained in the Illustrated Bible Treasury, edited by Wm. Wright, D.D. (Nelson & Sons). The following names are thus given:—

Cheyne.	Stevenson.	Williams.*	Wright.*
Abia'saph	Ab'ia'saph	Abi'asaph	Abia'saph
Abina'dab	Ab'ina'dab	Abin'adab	Abina'dab
Ad'ramme'lech	Adram'melech	Adram'melech	Adramme'lech

Tir'hakah	Tirha'kah	Tir'hakah	Tirha'kah
Zeru'iah	Zeru'ah	Zer'uah	Zeru'iah
Zohe'leth	Zo'heleth	Zohel'eth	Zohe'leth

*As it is not stated by whom the lists in Nelson's and Cassell's publications were drawn up, the Editors' names are given as responsible for them.

PRONUNCIATION OF SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES

These examples might be greatly multiplied, particularly in the case of what might be termed more familiar names in regard to which there are two ruling modes of accentuation, as Agabus and Ag'abus, Ahimelech and Ahim'elech, Bahurim and Bah'urim, Bathsheba and Bathshe'ba, Cedron and Ce'dron, Magdalen and Magdale'ne, Peniel and Pen'iel, Rehobam and Rehobo'am, Thaddaeus and Thad'daeus. An examination of the lists will show the very considerable extent of the variation which exists even among those who may be regarded as guides in the matter, and it will show also that a great part of the variation may be accounted for by the degree to which the Editors of the respective lists are disposed to give weight to the forms of the word in the original, or to what may be considered the popular and current pronunciation. This is indeed the crux of the matter.

2. Principles adopted.—In what follows we shall keep in view especially the contributions of Professor Cheyne and Professor Stevenson, each of whom explains in an introduction the principles on which he has sought to solve the problem presented; and perhaps we may be allowed once for all to acknowledge our obligations to these able and scholarly discussions. In reference to the point just referred to, Professor Cheyne says:—

'Strict accuracy is no doubt unattainable. In some cases (e.g. Moses, Aaron, Solomon, Isaac, Samuel, Jeremiah) the forms adopted by the Authorized Version are borrowed from the Septuagint through the medium of the Vulgate. Here the correct pronunciation would require an alteration of familiar names which would be quite intolerable. But even where the current forms are derived from the Hebrew, a strictly accurate pronunciation would offend by introducing a dissonance into the rude but real harmony of our English speech. Besides, that quickness of ear which is necessary for reproducing foreign sounds is conspicuously wanting to most natives of England. Still, the prevalent system of pronouncing Biblical names seems unnecessarily wide of the mark. There is no occasion to offend so gratuitously against the laws of Hebrew sound and composition as we do at present. Not a few of our mispronunciations of Hebrew names impede the comprehension of their meaning, especially in the case of names of religious significance, when the meaning is most fully fraught with instruction. A working compromise between pedantic precision and persistent mispronunciation is surely feasible.'

Professor Stevenson remarks, with reference to his list of Scripture Proper Names, that—

'It does not offer an absolute standard, for no such standard exists. The supreme authority in pronunciation is prevalent usage (among educated people). But the weakness of such an authority is specially clear in the case of Scripture names. Even names not uncommon are variously pronounced, and many are so unfamiliar that there is no "usage" by which to decide. . . . In actual speech unfamiliar words are pronounced as analogy suggests, unconsciously it may be. . . . There is no single court of appeal. In particular, the original pronunciation is not the only, nor perhaps the chief, influence. If it were better understood how impossible it is to pronounce Hebrew names as the ancient Hebrews did, there would be less temptation to lay stress on the original as the best guide. On the other hand, the closer the incorporation of Scripture names into English, the better; and this also is a consideration entitled to influence. . . . The principles here adopted are those which seem to express the English treatment of ancient foreign names which have become common property in the language.'

(1) New Testament.—The case is no doubt widely different with regard to the Old Testament as compared with the New. In the New Testament the Greek form of the name (including the transliteration of Hebrew names) may almost invariably be followed; thus, Aristobulus, Artemas, Diotrephes, Ephesus, Prochorus, Tabitha. The diphthong of the Authorized and Revised Versions justifies Thaddaeus rather than Thad'daeus. Cheyne and Stevenson both spell the name Thaddeus, the former accenting the first, and the latter the second, syllable. It is desirable to follow the Greek sometimes even in the face of fairly common usage, as by making Bethsai-i-da a word of four syllables, and Ja-i-rus a word of three. There are some peculiarities which have to be noticed, e.g. that final e is sounded in Bethphage, Gethsemane, Magdalene, but not in Nazarene, or Urbane. For Phoenice the R.V. reads Phoenix. Sosthenes, again, is a word of three syllables. With some attention to these principles, of which the above are merely examples, the pronunciation of New Testament names should present little difficulty.

(2) Old Testament.—When we turn to the Old Testament we find ourselves in presence of a much more complicated problem. Here it is impossible to conform our pronunciation to that of the original language; yet if we are not to pronounce at haphazard, and follow each his own taste and habit, we must reflect upon the conditions, and frame at least general rules for our guidance. In the absence of a standard list of pronunciations constructed by experts of such authority that we might waive in favour of their dicta our personal predilections, there will, at the best, be considerable room for individual judgment. We do not aim, therefore, at doing more in the following observations than aid such judgment by showing the alternatives before it, and indicating the limits within which it may be profitably exercised.

'The supreme authority in pronunciation,' says Professor Stevenson, 'is prevalent usage (among educated people).' The difficulty in many cases is to determine what is prevalent usage, and how far the education which is presumed to guide it has included the elements which would make it reliable in such a connexion. Prevalent usage itself may be educated and corrected, and the question is where the line shall be drawn between 'pedantic precision' and 'persistent mispronunciation' (to use Professor Cheyne's phrase), how much shall be conceded to a regard for the methods of the ancient Hebrews on the one side, and for those of the modern Britons on the other? This question is the more difficult to answer because the training and environment of even highly educated people differ so widely, and because what is prevalent in one circle is almost or altogether unknown in another.

Professor Cheyne suggests, as a guiding principle, the giving of some attention to the religious significance of proper names, particularly those which 'contain in some form the proper name of God in Hebrew.' With this laudable object, he, as a rule, shifts the accent in such names so as to bring their religious significance prominently before the reader. The practice, however, brings him into conflict with many undoubted cases of established usage. Professor Stevenson holds that the influences 'which must affect the treatment of Scripture names are—(1) The original pronunciation; (2) the characteristic tendencies of purely English speech; (3) the fixed customary pronunciation of certain words resembling others less common.' In applying the second of these principles—the characteristic tendencies of English speech—he appeals chiefly to analogy:—

'People naturally pronounce according to the analogy of other words which are familiar, and the practice supplies a rule of treatment. Doubtful or unfamiliar words should be pronounced in harmony with the general tendencies of the language, or in a way similar to other words which strikingly resemble them. Scripture names are borrowed from the foreign languages Greek and Hebrew. They are, therefore, to be compared specially with words of similar origin, such as the names of classical antiquity.' He admits, however, that 'conflict of analogies cannot be wholly avoided. If one is not in itself stronger than another, the most "desirable" result in each case should be preferred. Ease of pronunciation is one test of desirability. The principle of pronunciation according to sense has also been used by the writer.'

It is needless to say that he carries out these principles with great care and consistency. The weak point of the position is that the analogies founded on by one scholar will not be equally familiar, or commend themselves to the same extent, to another; and it may well appear to many that Professor Stevenson in his list of proper names concedes too much to popular usage, and would in some cases attain a more desirable result by approximating more closely to the form of the original

3. Points for consideration.—We shall now present for the consideration of the reader who desires to achieve as great a degree of correctness as the matter admits of, some of the more important points which he will have to decide for himself, assuming that when he has once adopted a rule he will follow it as consistently as possible, or be able to give a reason for any deviation.

(1) Shall we adopt what may be called the Continental pronunciation of the vowels—a=ah, e=eh, i=ce, u=oo?—In many instances we may be strongly tempted to do so; to one who knows Hebrew it is more natural, and the effect is finer—Mesopotamia is a grander word than Mesopotamia. But it is only in the less familiar words that this could be done. The first syllables of Canaan, Pharaoh, Balaam, must have the a as in fate or fair.

(2) Is the Hebrew J to be pronounced like j in judge, or like y?—It would probably be impossible to follow the latter mode in the large number of names beginning with J, such as Jericho, Joash, &c., and it would be intolerable in the case of Jesus; but there are instances in which it would impart an added dignity—e.g. Jehovah-jireh is far finer if the j be sounded as y, and the i as ee. In the middle of words, especially in words containing the Divine name Jah, the matter has already been settled for us, as it in most cases appears as iah, Ahaziah, Isaiah, Shemaiah. The question here arises whether the i is to be treated as consonant or vowel, and if the latter, whether it should ever be accented. Professor Cheyne, in order to bring out more prominently the Divine name, would treat the iah=jah always as a separate word—Ahaz'iah, Isa'iah, Shema'iah. Except for this consideration the rule would probably be, that where it follows a consonant the i is not only treated as a vowel but also accented—Jeremi'ah; when it follows a vowel it is assimilated with that vowel as in the two examples given above, which also illustrate the way in which one or other vowel may give place, Isaiah (tsä-ah), Shema ah (Shemi-ah), though some would render the former also Isi'ah.

(3) The question often arises in the case of names of three or more syllables, especially when the last two are significant in the original, whether the accent should be placed on the penultimate or thrown farther back in accordance with general English practice. Professor Stevenson says:—'The English stress accent in ancient foreign names is determined, with limitations, by the original length of the vowels, not by the original stress.' But in the case of words in familiar and frequently read passages of Scripture, the 'imitations' are extensive, and must be allowed to override considerations based on length of vowel. Where Cheyne prefers Abime'lech, Antho'pher, Jocheb'ed, Joha'nan, Stevenson gives Abim'elech, Abith'ophel, Joeh'ebed, Jo'hanan. On the other hand, Cheyne gives Am'raphel and A'holiab', where Stevenson accentuates Amra'phel and Anoli'ab. Nor is it an English trait to have too much regard for significant parts of words. We do not say philosophy, biology, Deuteronomy (though this is heard occasionally), but the stress is laid on the connecting syllable. So, if Abim'elech and the class of names ruled by it be allowed, a great deal might be said for Abin'adab, Abi'athar, and similar words being pronounced thus, instead of Abina'dab, Abia'thar, etc., notwithstanding the length of the penultimate in the original. Here, again, views will differ according to the 'educated usage' to which we have access, and the deference we may be inclined to pay to the peculiarities of English speech. With reference to Jochebed and Johanan in the examples quoted above, it should be noted that Stevenson makes an exception to the rule of the penultimate accent in favour of names in which the first element is some form of the Divine name. The accent, he says, rests in such cases on this first element. It may be doubtful if this reason is the one consciously adopted in regard to these names. Jo'hanan seems to us unnatural, and for Jehon'adab we prefer the explanation given in the former part of this paragraph.

(4) Professor Stevenson is doubtless right in saying that the established pronunciation of familiar names determines that of others in the same form that are less familiar. Dan'iel and Is'rael are the key to one class of such names, unless, as he points out, Penu'el be accented on the second syllable, and determine other words in —uel. Phil'ippi (accent on the first) is due to the analogy of Philip, and Ene'as 'to the analogy of Virgil's hero.'

These may serve as examples of the kind of difficulty which surrounds the subject, and the extent to which individual judgment may be exercised. There are general principles which may be adopted and usually observed, though perfect consistency in their application may not be attainable or desirable. Let the reader ascertain in all doubtful cases the form and pronunciation of the name in the original,* and compare it with those suggested by the best authorities within his reach. He will then be able to follow the method which most commends itself to his ear and judgment. Though the student may not always adopt the pronunciation given in Professor Stevenson's list, nothing but good can result from a careful pondering of his explanations. Let us be sure that, though we are told that 'De minimis non curat lex,' it is worth our while to be as careful as we can even about 'little things.'

ALEXANDER STEWART.

* These are given in all cases by Professor Stevenson in Roman letters, according to a system of transliteration which he explains in his introduction. They are thus made accessible to English readers.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

A

AARON.—In examining the Biblical account of Aaron, we must deal separately with the different sources' of the Hexateuch.

1. In J, Aaron plays a very subordinate part. He, Nadab and Abihu, along with 70 elders, accompanied Moses up Mt. Sinai (Ex 19²⁴). In the former passage he is distinguished from the priests, who are forbidden to come up; he would seem, therefore, to have been an elder or sheikh, perhaps somewhat superior to the 70. In 32² Aaron 'let the people loose for a derision among their enemies.' What this refers to is not known; it was not the making of the golden bull, which in the eyes of the surrounding nations would be only an act of piety.

In other passages, which cannot be assigned either to E or P, the mention of Aaron is probably due to a later hand. In 4¹³⁻¹⁶ Moses is allowed to have Aaron as a spokesman. But 'the Levite' (v.¹⁴) is suspicious: for Moses was also of the tribe of Levi, and the description is superfluous. The verses probably belong to a time when 'Levite' had become a technical term for one trained in priestly functions, and when such priestly officials traced their descent from Aaron. In the narratives of the plagues Aaron is a silent figure, merely summoned with Moses four times when Pharaoh entreats for the removal of the plagues (8² 9² 10⁶). In each case Moses alone answers, and in the last three he alone departs. In 10⁸ Moses and Aaron went in to announce the plague, but Moses alone 'turned and went out' (v.⁸). The occurrence of Aaron's name seems to be due, in each case, to later redaction.

2. In E, Aaron is the brother of Miriam (15²⁰). He was sent to meet Moses in the wilderness, and together they performed signs before the people (4²⁷⁻³¹). They demanded release from Pharaoh, and on his refusal the people murmured (5¹ 2⁴ 20¹⁻³). Little of E has survived in the narrative of the plagues, and Aaron is not mentioned. In 17¹⁰ 12 he and Hur held up Moses' hands, in order that the staff might be lifted up, during the fight with Amalek. And while Moses was on the mountain, the same two were left in temporary authority over the people (24^{13f}). Aaron is related to have abused this authority, in making the golden bull (32¹⁻⁶ 21-24). [The narrative is composite, and in its present form must be later than E. It has some connexion with the story of 1 K 12²⁸⁻³⁰, for Jeroboam's words, which are suitable in reference to two bulls, are placed in Aaron's mouth.] In 18¹² Aaron, with the elders, was called to Jethro's sacrifice—an incident which must be placed at the end of the stay at Horeb. In Nu 12 Aaron and Miriam claimed that they, no less than Moses, received Divine revelations: only Miriam, however, was punished. In Jos 24⁵ there is a general reference to the part played by Aaron in the Exodus.

It is noteworthy that there is not a word so far either in J or E, which suggests that Aaron was a priest.

But it is probable that by the time of E the belief had begun to grow up that Aaron was the founder of an hereditary priesthood. Dt 10⁶ occurs in a parenthesis which seriously interrupts the narrative, and which was perhaps derived from E (cf. Jos 24³³).

3. In D, Aaron was probably not mentioned. Dt 10⁶ has been referred to; 32²⁰ is from P; and the only remaining passage (9²⁰) appears to be a later insertion.

4. Outside the Hexateuch, two early passages (1 S 12⁶ 8, Mic 6¹) refer to Aaron merely as taking a leading part in the Exodus.

5. In P, the process by which the tradition grew up that Moses delegated his priesthood to Aaron is not known. But the effect of it was that the great majority of 'Levites,' i.e. trained official priests, at local sanctuaries throughout the country traced their descent to Aaron. The priests of Jerusalem, on the other hand, were descendants of Zadok (1 K 1³⁹ 22⁷); and when local sanctuaries were abolished by Josiah's reforms, and the country priests came up to seek a livelihood at Jerusalem (see Dt 18⁶⁻⁸), the Zadokite priests charged them with image-worship, and allowed them only an inferior position as servants (see 2 K 23⁹, Ezk 44⁷⁻¹⁶). But at the Exile the priests who were in Jerusalem were carried off, leaving room in the city for many country (Aaronite) priests, who would establish themselves firmly in official prestige with the meagre remnant of the population. Thus, when the Zadokite priests returned from Babylon, they would find it advisable to trace their descent from Aaron (see Ezr 2^{61f}). But by their superiority in culture and social standing they regained their ascendancy, and the country priests were once more reduced, under the ancient title of 'Levites,' to an inferior position.

This explains the great importance assigned to Aaron in the priestly portions of the Hexateuch. Reference must be made to other articles for his consecration, his purely priestly functions, and his relation to the Levites (see articles PRIESTS and LEVITES, SACRIFICE, TABERNACLE). But he also plays a considerable part in the narrative of the Exodus and the wanderings. His family relationships are stated in Ex 6²⁰ 22², Lv 10⁴. He became Moses' spokesman, not to the people but to Pharaoh (7¹), in whose presence he changed the staff into a 'reptile' (contrast 'serpent' in 4³ J). P relates the 2nd plague (combined with J), the 3rd and the 6th, in each of which Aaron is conspicuous. Aaron as well as Moses suffered from the murmurings of the people (Ex 16³, Nu 14² 16³ 41 20²); both were consulted by the people (Nu 9⁶ 15³); and to both were addressed many of God's commands (Ex 9⁴⁻¹⁰ 12¹ 42, Lv 11¹ 13¹ 14³ 15¹, Nu 2¹). Aaron stayed a plague by offering incense (Nu 16⁴⁴⁻⁴⁵). [On the combined narratives in chs. 16. 17 see AARON'S ROD, KORAH]. At Meribah-kadesh he, with Moses, sinned against J^r (Nu 20¹⁻¹³), but the nature of the sin is obscure (see Gray, Com. p. 262 f.). He was consequently forbidden to enter Canaan, and died on Mt. Hor, aged 123, Eleazar his son being clothed in the priestly garments (Nu 20²²⁻²⁹ 33^{38f.}, Dt 32⁵⁰).

6. In the NT: Lk 1⁵, Ac 7⁴⁰, He 5⁷ 11⁹⁴.

A. H. M'NEILE.

AARON'S ROD.—In a very complicated section of the Hexateuch (Nu 16–18), dealing with various revolts against the constituted authorities in the wilderness period, the exclusive right of the tribe of Levi to the duties and privileges of the priesthood is miraculously attested by the blossoming and fruit-bearing of Aaron's rod. As representing his tribe, it had been deposited by Divine command before the ark along with 12 other rods representing the 12 secular tribes, in order that the will of J^r in this matter might be visibly made known (see Nu 16¹⁻¹¹ with G. B. Gray's Com.). The rod was thereafter ordered to be laid up in perpetuity 'before the (ark of the) testimony for a token against the rebels' (17¹⁰). Later Jewish tradition, however, transferred it, along with the pot of manna, to a place within the ark (He 9⁴).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AB.—See TIME.

ABACUC.—The form of the name Habakkuk in 2 Es 14¹⁰.

ABADDON.—A word peculiar to the later Heb. (esp. 'Wisdom') and Judaistic literature; sometimes synonymous with Sheol, more particularly, however, signifying that lowest division of Sheol devoted to the punishment of sinners (see SHEOL). Properly, its Gr. equivalent would be apoleia ('destruction'), as found in the LXX. In Rev 9¹¹ Abaddon is personified, and is said to be the equivalent of Apollyon ('destroyer'). Abaddon differs from Gehenna in that it represents the negative element of supreme loss rather than that of positive suffering.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

ABADIAS (1 Es 8³⁵).—An exile who returned with Ezra; called Obadiah, Ezr 8⁹.

ABAGTHA (Est 1¹⁰).—One of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs sent by Ahasuerus (Xerxes) to fetch the queen, Vashti, to his banquet.

ABANAH.—The river of Damascus mentioned by Naaman, 2 K 5¹². It is identified with the Barada, a river rising on the eastern slope of the Anti-Lebanon, which runs first southward, then westward, through the Wady Barada and the plain of Damascus. About 18 miles from Damascus, after dividing fan-wise into a number of branches, it flows into the Meadow Lakes.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABARIM ('the parts beyond').—A term used to describe the whole east-Jordan land as viewed from Western Palestine. From there the land beyond Jordan rises as a great mountain chain to a height of 3000 feet and more from the Jordan valley. Hence Abarim is joined with 'mount' (Nu 27¹², Dt 32⁴⁹) and 'mountains' (Nu 33⁴⁷); also with 'Iyye, 'heaps of' (Nu 21¹¹). See also Jer 22³⁰ and Ezk 39¹¹ (RV; AV 'passages').

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ABBA is the 'emphatic' form of the Aram. word for 'father.' It is found in the Gr. and Eng. text of Mk 14³⁶, Ro 8³⁴, and Gal 4⁶ (in each case Abba, ho patr̄r, 'Abba, Father'). Aram. has no article, and the 'emphatic' affix a is usually the equivalent of the Heb. article. Both can represent the vocative case (for Hebrew see Davidson's Syntax, § 21 f.); and abba occurs in the Pesh. of Lk 22²⁸ 23³⁴ for pater. The 'articular nominative' is found in NT sixty times for the vocative; and so we have ho patr̄r for o pater (Moulton, Gram. of NT Greek, p. 70). Jesus often addressed God as 'Father' or 'my Father.' In both cases He would probably use 'Abba'; for 'abba' may be used for 'Abi' (Targ. on Gn 19²⁴). In Mk 14³⁶, ho patr̄r is perhaps a gloss added by the Evangelist, as in Mk 5¹¹ 7¹¹.³⁴ He adds an explanation of the Aram.: but in Ro 8¹⁵ and Gal 4⁶ the Gentile Christians had learned for importunity to use the Aram. word Abba; as the Jews in prayer borrowed Kyrie mou ('my Lord') from the Greek, and used it along with Heb. words for 'my master,' 'my father' (Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. 252). J. T. MARSHALL.

ABDA ('servant,' sc. of the Lord).—1. Father of Adoniram, master of Solomon's forced levy (1 K 4⁶). 2. A Levite (Neh 11¹⁷); called Obadiah in 1 Ch 9¹⁴.

ABDEEL.—Father of Shelemiah (Jer 36²⁵), one of those ordered by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch.

ABDI.—1. Grandfather of Ethan, 1 Ch 6⁴. 2. Father of Kish, 2 Ch 29¹². 3. A Jew who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10²⁵ = Oabdius, 1 Es 9²⁷.

ABDIAS (2 Es 1²⁰).—Obadiah the prophet.

ABDIEL ('servant of God').—Son of Guni (1 Ch 5¹¹).

ABDON ('servile').—1. The last of the minor judges, Jg 12¹³⁻¹⁵. 2. A family of Benjamites, 1 Ch 8². 3. A Gibeonite family, 1 Ch 8³⁰ 9³⁶. 4. A courtier of Josiah, 2 Ch 34²⁰; in 2 K 22¹² called Achbor. 5. A Levitical city of Asher (Jos 21³⁰, 1 Ch 6⁷⁴), perhaps (v. d. Velde) 'Abdeh E. of Achzib on the hills.

ABEDNEGO.—Dn 17, etc.; probably a corruption of Abed-nebo, i.e. 'servant of Nebo.'

ABEL.—Gn 4²⁻¹⁰. The Heb. form Hebel denotes 'vapour' or 'breath' (cf. Ec 1², EV 'vanity'), which is suggestive as the name of a son of Adam ('man'). But it is perhaps to be connected with the Assy. aplu, 'son.' Abel was a son of Adam and Eve, and brother of Cain. But the narrative presupposes a long period to have elapsed in human history since the primitive condition of the first pair. The difference between pastoral and agricultural life has come to be recognized, for Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground (see CAIN). The account, as we have it, is mutilated: in v. 8 Heb. has 'and Cain said unto Abel his brother' (not as AV and RV). LXX supplies the words 'Let us pass through into the plain,' but this may be a mere gloss, and it cannot be known how much of the story is lost.

Nothing is said in Gn. of Abel's moral character, or of the reason why his offering excelled Cain's in the eyes of J^r; cereal offerings were as fully in accord with Hebrew law and custom as animal offerings. He 11⁴ gives 'faith' as the reason. In He 12²⁴ the 'blood of sprinkling,' 'speaketh something better than the blood of Abel,' in that the latter cried for vengeance (Gn 4¹⁰).

In Mt 23³⁵ || Lk 11⁵¹ Abel is named as the first of the true martyrs whose blood had been shed during the period covered by the OT, the last being Zachariah (wh. see). In Jn 8⁴⁴ it is possible that Jesus was thinking of the story of Abel when He spoke of the devil as 'a murderer from the beginning,' i.e. the instigator of murder as he is of lies.

A. H. M'NEILE.

ABEL.—A word meaning 'meadow,' and entering as an element into several place-names. In 1 S 6¹⁴ a reference in AV to 'Abel' is in the RV corrected to 'great stone.' Elsewhere the name is found only with qualifying epithets.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABEL (OF) BETH-MAACAH.—Where Sheba took refuge from Joab (2 S 20¹⁴⁻¹⁵); it was captured by Ben-hadad (1 K 15²⁰), and by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15²⁹); corresponding to the modern Abil, west of Tell d-Kadi, and north of Lake Huleh.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABEL-CHERAMIM ('meadow of the vineyards').—The limit of Jephthah's defeat of the Midianites (Jg 11²³). Site unknown.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABEL-MAIM ('meadow of waters').—An alternative name for Abel of Beth-maacah, found in 2 Ch 10⁴, which corresponds to 1 K 15²⁰, quoted under that head.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABEL-MEHOLAH ('meadow of the dance or circle').—A place in the Jordan valley, the limit of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Jg 7²²); in the administrative district of Taanach and Megiddo under Solomon (1 K 4¹²); the native place of Adriel, husband of Merab, Saul's daughter (1 S 18¹⁹), and of Elisha (1 K 19¹⁸). The suggested identifications are uncertain. See Moore's Judges, p. 212. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABEL-MIZRAIM ('meadow of the Egyptians').—The scene of the mourning for Jacob (Gn 50¹¹). The only clue to its situation is its being 'beyond Jordan.'

ABEL-SHITTIM ('meadow of the acacias').—In the plains of Moab (Nu 33⁴⁹); otherwise Shittim, the last (Jos 3¹) trans-Jordanic stage where the Israelites encamped. Identified with Ghor es-Seiban, east of the Jordan, opposite Jericho. It was the scene of the offence of Baal-peor (Nu 25¹). Hence Joshua sent his spies (Jos 2¹). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ABI.—The name of a queen-mother of the 8th cent. (2 K 18²), called Abijah in the parallel passage 2 Ch 29¹. The reading in Kings is the more probable.

ABIAH.—See ABIAH.

ABI-ALBON.—See ABIEL.

ABIASAPH (='father has gathered'), Ex 6²⁴ = EBIASAPH (='father has increased'), 1 Ch 6²³, 27 9¹⁸.—The name of a division of the Korahite Levites, mentioned only in the genealogies of P and the Chronicler. According to 1 Ch 9¹⁹ 26¹ (in the latter passage read Ebiasaph for Asaph), a section of the division acted as doorkeepers.

ABIATHAR.—Son of Ahimelech, who was head of the family of priests in charge of the sanctuary at Nob (1 S 21¹). All except Abiathar were massacred by Saul (1 S 22²⁰). When the rest obeyed the king's summons, he may have remained at home to officiate. On hearing of the slaughter he took refuge with David, carrying with him the oracular ephod (1 S 23⁶; see also 1 S 23³⁰). Abiathar and Zadok accompanied the outlaw in his prolonged wanderings. During Absalom's rebellion they and their sons rendered yeoman service to the old king (2 S 15¹⁷). At 2 S 8¹⁷ (so also 1 Ch 18¹⁸) [where, moreover, 'Ahimelech' should be Ahimelech] 24⁶ the names of Abiathar and his father have been transposed. Abiathar's adhesion to Adonijah (1 K 17¹⁹, 25) was of great importance, not only because of his position as priest, but also owing to his long friendship with king David. Solomon, therefore, as soon as he could safely do it, deposed Abiathar from the priesthood, warned him that any future misconduct would entail capital punishment, and relegated him to the seclusion of Anathoth (1 K 2²⁶). His sons (2 S 8¹⁷) lost the priestly office along with their father (1 K 2²⁷; cf. 1 S 22²⁷⁻²⁸). At Mk 2²⁶ the erroneous mention of Abiathar is due to his having been so intimately associated with the king in days subsequent to the one mentioned. J. TAYLOR.

ABIB (the green ear' month, Ex 13⁴ etc.).—See TIME.

ABIDA ('father hath knowledge').—A son of Midian (Gn 25¹, 1 Ch 1³).

ABIDAN ('father is judge').—Representative of the tribe of Benjamin at the census and on certain other occasions, Nu 1¹¹ 22² 76⁰. 6 10²⁴.

ABIEL.—1. Father of Kish and Ner, and grandfather of Saul (1 S 9¹ 14¹). The latter passage should run, 'Kish, the father of Saul, and Ner the father of Abner, were sons of Abiel.' 2. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11³³), from Beth-arabah in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15⁶, 41 18²³). Abi-albon (2 S 23³¹) is a transcriber's error, the eye having fallen on abon below: some codices of the LXX have Abial: possibly the original was Abibaal. J. TAYLOR.

ABIEZER ('father is help').—1. The name occurs also in the abbreviated form Jezer. He is called the son of Hammolecheth, sister of Machir, the son of Manasseh (1 Ch 7¹⁸). His descendants formed one of the smallest clans belonging to the Gileadite branch of the tribe of Manasseh, the best known member of which was Gideon. According to Jg 6³⁴ 8²², the Abiezrites were settled at Ophrah; they were the first to obey the summons of Joshua to fight against the Midianites.—2. An Anathothite, one of David's thirty-seven chief heroes, who had command of the army during the ninth month (2 S 23²⁷, 1 Ch 27¹²). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ABIGAIL, or ABIGAL.—1. Wife of Nabal (1 S 25¹⁴). She dissuaded David from avenging himself on the surly farmer, and soon after the latter's death married David (1 S 25³⁹⁻⁴²), and accompanied him to Gath and Ziklag (1 S 27³ 30⁴, 18). At Hebron she bore him a son, whose name may have been Chileab (2 S 3³), or Daniel (1 Ch 3¹), or Dodiel (the LXX at 2 S 3³ has Daluya). 2. Step-sister of David, mother of Amasa (2 S 17²⁵, 1 Ch 2¹¹). J. TAYLOR.

ABIHAIL ('father is might').—1. As the name of a man it occurs (a) in 1 Ch 5¹⁴ as that of a Gadite who dwelt in the land of Bashan. (b) It was also the name of Esther's father, the uncle of Mordecai (Est 2¹⁴ 9²²).

2. As the name of a woman it occurs three times: (a) 1 Ch 2²², the wife of Abishur, of the tribe of Judah; this is its only occurrence in pre-exilic writings. (b) Nu 3⁸, a daughter of the sons of Merari, of the tribe of Levi, the mother of Zurriel, a 'prince' among the families of Merari. (c) 2 Ch 11¹⁸, the mother of Rehoboam's wife, Mahalath, and daughter of Eliab, David's eldest brother.

It is a woman's name in Minæan (South Arabian) inscriptions, where it occurs in the form lil-hail.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ABIHU ('he is father').—Second son of Aaron (Ex 6²³, Nu 3² 26⁰, 1 Ch 6³ 24¹); accompanied Moses to the top of Sinai (Ex 24¹, 9); admitted to the priest's office (Ex 28¹); slain along with his brother Nadab for offering strange fire (Lv 10¹, 2, Nu 3⁴ 26⁰, 1 Ch 24¹).

ABIHUD ('father is majesty').—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²).

ABIAH.—1. Son and successor of Rehoboam (2 Ch 13¹), also called Abijam (1 K 14¹). The accounts of him in the Books of Kings and Chronicles are discrepant. The difference begins with the name of his mother, which 2 Ch. gives as Micaiah, daughter of Uriel of Gibeah, while 1 K. makes her to have been Maacah, daughter of Abishalom. As the latter is also the name of Asa's mother (1 K 15¹⁰, 2 Ch 15¹⁶), there is probably some confusion in the text. Beyond this, the Book of Kings tells us only that he reigned three years, that he walked in the sins of his father, and that he had war with Jeroboam, king of Israel. 2. Samuel's second son (1 S 8²). The RV retains the spelling Abiah in 1 Ch 6²³. 3. A son of Jeroboam I. who died in childhood (1 K 14¹). 4. One of the 'heads of fathers' houses' of the sons of Eleazar, who gave his name to the 8th of the 24 courses of priests (1 Ch 24³, 10, 2 Ch 8¹⁴). To this course Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, belonged (Lk 1⁸). The name occurs also in the lists of priests who 'went up with Zerubbabel' (Neh 12⁴), and of those who 'sealed unto the covenant' in the time of Nehemiah (10⁷). 5. A son of Becher, son of Benjamin, 1 Ch 7⁸. 6. Wife of Hezron, eldest son of Perez, son of Judah, 1 Ch 2²⁴. RV Abiah. 7. Wife of Ahaz, and mother of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29¹), named Abi in 2 K 18². H. P. SMITH.

ABILENE.—Mentioned in Lk 3¹, and also in several references in Josephus, as a tetrarchy of Lysanias [wh. see]. It was situated in the Anti-Lebanon, and its capital was Abila, a town whose ruins are found to-day on the northern bank of the river Barada, near a village called Suk Wady Barada. It is one of the most picturesque spots on the railroad to Damascus. The ancient name is to-day preserved in a Latin inscription on a deep rock-cutting high up above the railway. By a worthless Moslem tradition, Abel is said to have been buried here. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ABILITY

ABILITY.—In AV 'ability' is either material (Lv 27⁸, Ezr 2⁶⁹, Ac 11²⁰) or personal (Dn 14, Mt 25¹⁵) capacity. The mod. meaning ('mental power') is not found in AV.

ABIMAEI (perhaps='father is God').—One of the Jorktanids or S. Arabians (see art. JOKTAN), Gn 10²⁸ (J), 1 Ch 1²⁸.

ABIMELECH ('father is king' or perhaps 'Melech is father').—1. King of Gerar. According to E (Gn 20) he took Sarah into his harem, but on learning that she was Abraham's wife, restored her uninjured and made ample amends. Subsequently he entered into a covenant with Abraham (21²²). J (12¹⁰: 26¹⁷) gives two variants of the same tradition. The Book of Jubilees, in the section parallel to 12¹⁰, exonerates Abraham from blame, and omits the other two narratives! 2. The son of Gideon. His mother belonged to one of the leading Canaanite families in Shechem, although Jg 8³¹ calls her a concubine, and Jotham (9¹⁸) brands her as a maid-servant. On Gideon's decease, Abimelech, backed by his maternal relatives, gathered a band of mercenaries, murdered his seventy half-brothers 'on one stone', and was accepted as king by the mixed Canaanite and Israelite population of Shechem and the neighbourhood. But Jotham sowed the seeds of dissension between the new ruler and his subjects, and the latter soon took offence because the king did not reside among them. At the end of three years they were ripe for revolt, and found a leader in Gaal, son of Ebed. Abimelech defeated him, took the city, and sowed the site with salt, in token that it should not again be built upon. Thebez, the next town attacked by him, fell into his hands, but he was mortally wounded by a woman whilst assailing the citadel (Jg 9⁵⁰⁻⁵⁴, 2 S 11²¹). His significance in the history of Israel consists in the fact that his short-lived monarchy was the precursor of the durable one founded soon after. 3. 1 Ch 18¹⁶: read Ahimelch. 4. Ps 34 (title): read Achish (cf. 1 S 21¹⁴). J. TAYLOR.

ABINADAB ('father is generous').—1. The second son of Jesse (1 S 16⁸ 17¹³, 1 Ch 2¹³). 2. A son of Saul slain in the battle of Mt. Gilboa (1 S 31²=1 Ch 10²). 3. Owner of the house whither the ark was brought by the men of Kiriath-jearim (1 S 7¹), whence it was subsequently removed by David (2 S 6¹, 1 Ch 13⁷).

ABINOAM ('father is pleasantness').—The father of Barak (Jg 4⁸: 12 5¹²).

ABIRAM ('father is the Exalted One').—1. A Reubenite, who with Dathan conspired against Moses (Nu 16¹ etc., Dt 11⁶, Ps 106¹⁷). See art. KORAH. 2. The firstborn son of Hiel the Bethelite, who died when his father rebuilt Jericho (1 K 16³⁴).

ABISHAG.—A beautiful young Shunammite who attended upon David in his extreme old age (1 K 1²: 16). After David's death, Abishag was asked in marriage by Adonijah; the request cost him his life (1 K 2¹³⁻²⁶).

ABISHAI.—Son of Zeruiah, David's step-sister (2 S 17²⁵, 1 Ch 2¹⁶). His brothers were Joab and Asahel (2 S 2¹⁵). He was a hot-tempered, ruthless soldier. Accompanying David into Saul's camp, he would fain have killed the sleeper (1 S 26⁷). An editorial addition (2 S 3³⁰) associates him with Joab in the blood-revenge taken on Abner. Abishai was second in command of the army (2 S 10. 18), and if we make a slight necessary correction at 2 S 23¹⁸, we find that he was first of the famous thirty. He is credited with the slaughter of three hundred foes, and David once owed his life to Abishai's interposition (2 S 23¹⁸ 21¹⁶). Notwithstanding their relationship and their usefulness, there was a natural antipathy between the king and the two brothers (2 S 3³⁰). J. TAYLOR.

ABISHALOM.—See ABSSALOM.

ABISHUA.—1. Son of Phinehas and father of Bukki (1 Ch 6⁴¹: 40, Ezr 7⁴); called in 1 Es 8² Abisue, and in 2 Es 1¹ Abissei. 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁴; cf. Nu 26³⁸).

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION

ABISHUR ('father is a wall').—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2²⁸: 1).

ABISSEI.—See ABISHUA, No. 1.

ABISUE.—See ABISHUA, No. 1.

ABITAL ('father is dew').—Wife of David and mother of Shephatiah (2 S 3⁴=1 Ch 3³).

ABITUB.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹¹).

ABIUD (i.e. Abihud).—An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1¹²).

ABJECT.—In Ps 35¹⁵ 'abject' occurs as a noun, as in Herbert's Temple—'Servants and abjects flout me.'

ABNER.—Saul's cousin (1 S 9¹ 14¹⁴) and commander-in-chief (1 S 17²⁵ 26⁵). He set Ish-bosheth on his father's throne, and fought long and bravely against David's general, Joab (2 S 2). After a severe defeat, he killed Asahel in self-defence (2 S 2²³). He behaved arrogantly towards the puppet-king, especially in taking possession of one of Saul's concubines (2 S 3⁷). Resenting bitterly the remonstrances of Ish-bosheth, he entered into negotiations with David (2 S 3³⁰⁻³²), and then, on David's behalf, with the elders of Israel (2 S 3³⁷). Dreading the loss of his own position, and thirsting for revenge, Joab murdered him at Hebron (2 S 3³⁰). David gave him a public funeral, dissociated himself from Joab's act (2 S 3³¹⁻³⁷), and afterwards charged Solomon to avenge it (1 K 2⁸). Abner was destitute of all lofty ideas of morality or religion (2 S 3³⁸: 16), but was the only capable person on the side of Saul's family. J. TAYLOR.

ABOMINATION.—Four Hebrew words from three different roots are rendered in EV by 'abomination' and, occasionally, 'abominable thing.' In almost all cases (for exceptions see Gn 43³² 46²⁴) the reference is to objects and practices abhorrent to J^g, and opposed to the moral requirements and ritual of His religion. Among the objects so described are heathen deities such as Ashtoreth (Astarte), Chemosh, Milcom, the 'abominations' of the Zidonians (Phoenicians), Moabites, and Ammonites respectively (2 K 23¹³); images and other paraphernalia of the forbidden cults (Dt 7²⁵ 27¹⁵, and often in Ezk.); and the flesh of animals ritually taboo (see esp. Lv 11¹⁰ etc. and art. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). Some of the practices that are an 'abomination unto J^g' are the worship of heathen deities and of the heavenly bodies (Dt 13¹⁴ 17¹ and often), the practice of witchcraft and kindred arts (Dt 18¹²), gross acts of immorality (Lv 18²² etc.), falsification of weights and measures (Pr 11¹), and 'evil devices' generally (Pr 15²⁶ RV).

One of the four words above referred to (piggal) occurs only as a 'technical term for stale sacrificial flesh, which has not been eaten within the prescribed time' (Driver, who would render 'refuse meat' in Lv 7¹⁸ 19⁷, Ezk 4⁴, Is 65¹). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.—A term found only in Mk 13¹⁴ and its parallel Mt 24¹⁵. It is obviously derived, as St. Matthew indicates, from Dn 12¹¹ 12¹¹, cf. 9²⁷. In these passages the most natural reference is to the desecration of the Temple under Antiochus Epiphanes, when an altar to Olympian Zeus was erected on the altar of burnt sacrifices. As interpreted in the revision by St. Luke (21²⁰), the reference in the Gospel is to the encompassing of Jerusalem by the Roman army. It is very difficult, however, to adjust this interpretation to the expression of Mk. 'standing where he ought not,' and that of Mt. 'standing in the holy place.' Other interpretations would be: (1) the threatened erection of the statue of Caligula in the Temple; or (2) the desecration of the Temple area by the Zealots, who during the siege made it a fortress; or (3) the desecration of the Temple by the presence of Titus after its capture by that general. While it is impossible to reach any final choice between these different interpretations, it seems probable that the reference of Mk 13¹⁴ is prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, because of its insistence that the appearance of the 'abomination of desolation' (or the 'abomination that makes desolate') is to be taken as a warning for those who are in Judaea to flee to the mountains. It would seem to follow, therefore, that the reference is to some event, portending the fall of Jerusalem, which might also be interpreted by the Christians as a premonition of the Parousia (2 Th 2¹⁻²). It would seem natural to see this event in the coming of the Romans (I.k. 21²⁰), or in the seizure of the Temple by the Zealots under John of Giscala, before the city was completely invested by the Romans. A measure of probability is given to the latter conjecture by the tradition (Eusebius, HE III. v. 3) that the Jewish Christians, because of a Divine oracle, fled from Jerusalem during the early course of the siege.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

ABRAHAM.—Abram and Abraham are the two forms in which the name of the first patriarch was handed down in Hebrew tradition. The change of name recorded in Gn 17¹ (P) is a harmonistic theory, which involves an impossible etymology, and cannot be regarded as historical. Of Abraham no better explanation has been suggested than that it is possibly a dialectic or orthographic variation of Abram, which in the fuller forms Abirām and Aburamu is found as a personal name both in Heb. and Babylonian. The history of Abraham (Gn 11²⁷–25¹⁸) consists of a number of legendary narratives, which have been somewhat loosely strung together into a semblance of biographical continuity. These narratives (with the exception of ch. 14, which is assigned to a special source) are apportioned by critics to the three main documents of Genesis, J, E, and P; and the analysis shows that the biographic arrangement is not due solely to the compiler of the Pent., but existed in the separate sources. In them we can recognize, amidst much diversity, the outlines of a fairly solid and consistent tradition, which may be assumed to have taken shape at different centres, such as the sanctuaries of Hebron and Beersheba.

1. The account of J opens with the Divine call to Abraham, in obedience to which he separates himself from his kindred and migrates to Canaan (12¹⁻⁸).

In the proper Jahwistic tradition the starting point of the Exodus was Harran in Mesopotamia, but in 11²⁶ (cf. 15⁷) we find combined with this another view, according to which Abraham came from Ur of the Chaldees in S. Babylonia. In passing we may note the remarkable fact that both traditions alike connect the patriarch with famous centres of Babylonian moon-worship.

Arrived in Canaan, Abraham builds altars at Shechem, where he receives the first promise of the land, and Bethel, where the separation from Lot takes place; after which Abraham resumes his southern journey and takes up his abode at Hebron (ch. 13). This connexion is broken in 12¹⁰⁻²⁰ by the episode of Abraham's sojourn in Egypt, which probably belongs to an older stratum of Jahwistic tradition representing him as leading a nomadic life in the Negeb. To the same cycle we may assign the story of Hagar's flight and the prophecy regarding Ishmael, in ch. 16; here, too, the home of Abraham is apparently located in the Negeb. In ch. 18 we find Abraham at Hebron, where in a theophany he receives the promise of a son to be born to Sarah, and also an intimation of the doom impending over the guilty cities of the Plain. The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the deliverance of Lot, are graphically described in ch. 19, which closes with an account of the shameful origins of Moab and Ammon. Passing over some fragmentary notices in ch. 21, which have been amalgamated with the fuller narrative of E, we come to the last scene of J's record, the mission of Abraham's servant to seek a bride for Isaac, told with such dramatic power in ch. 24. It would seem that the death of Abraham, of which J's account has nowhere been preserved, must have taken place before the servant returned. A note is appended in 25¹⁰, as to the descent of 16 Arabian tribes from Abraham and Keturah.

2. Of E's narrative the first traces appear in ch. 15, a composite and difficult chapter, whose kernel probably belongs rather to this document than to J. In its present form it narrates the renewal to Abraham of the two great promises on which his faith rested—the promise of a seed and of the land of Canaan—and the confirmation of the latter by an impressive ceremony in which God entered into a covenant with the patriarch. The main body of Elohist tradition, however, is found in chs. 20–22. We have here a notice of Abraham's arrival in the Negeb, followed by a sojourn in Gerar, where Sarah's honour is compromised by the deliberate concealment of the fact that she is married (ch. 20)—a variant form of the Jahwistic legend of 12¹⁰⁻²⁰. The expulsion of Hagar, recorded in 21⁹⁻²¹, is an equally obvious parallel to J's account of the flight of Hagar in ch. 16, although in E the incident follows, while in J it precedes, the births of both Ishmael and Isaac. The latter part of ch. 21 is occupied with the narrative of Abraham's adventures in the Negeb—especially his covenant with Abimelech of Gerar—which leads up to the consecration of the sanctuary of Beersheba to the worship of Jahweh. Here the narrative has been supplemented by extracts from a Jahwistic recension of the same tradition. To E, finally, we are indebted for the fascinating story of the sacrifice of Isaac in ch. 22, which may be fairly described as the gem of this collection.

3. In P, the biography of Abraham is mostly reduced to a chronological epitome, based on the narrative of J, and supplying some gaps left by the compiler in the older document. There are just two places where the meagre chronicle expands into elaborately circumstantial description. The first is the account, in ch. 17, of the institution of circumcision as the sign of the covenant between God and Abraham, round which are gathered all the promises which in the earlier documents are connected with various experiences in the patriarch's life. The second incident is the purchase of the cave of Machpelah after the death of Sarah, recorded at great length in ch. 23; this is peculiar to P, and was evidently of importance to that writer as a guarantee of Israel's perpetual tenure of the land of Canaan.

4. Such is, in outline, the history of Abraham as transmitted through the recognized literary channels of the national tradition. We have yet to mention an episode, concerning which there is great diversity of opinion,—the story of Abraham's victory over the four kings, and his interview with Melchizedek, in ch. 14. It is maintained by some that this chapter bears internal marks of authenticity not possessed by the rest of the Abrahamic tradition, and affords a firm foothold for the belief that Abraham is a historic personage of the 3rd millennium B.C., contemporary with Hammurabi (Auraphel?) of Babylon (c. 2300). Others take a diametrically opposite view, holding that it is a late Jewish romance, founded on imperfectly understood data derived from cuneiform sources. The arguments on either side cannot be given here; it must suffice to remark that, even if convincing proof of the historicity of ch. 14 could be produced, it would still be a question whether that judgment could be extended to the very different material of the undisputed Hebrew tradition. It is much more important to inquire what is the historical value of the tradition which lies immediately behind the more popular narratives in which the religious significance of Abraham's character is expressed. That these are history in the strict sense of the word is a proposition to which no competent scholar would assent. They are legends which had circulated orally for an indefinite time, and had assumed varied forms, before they were collected and reduced to writing. The only question of practical moment is whether the legends have clustered round the name of a historic personality, the leader of an immigration of Aramæan tribes into Palestine, and at the same time the recipient of a new revelation of God which prepared the way for the unique religious history and mission of Israel. It cannot be said that this view of Abraham has as yet obtained any direct confirmation from discoveries in Assyriology or archaeology, though it is perhaps true that recent developments of these sciences render the conception more intelligible than it formerly was. And there is nothing, either in the tradition itself or in our knowledge of the background against which it is set, that is inconsistent with the supposition that to the extent just indicated the figure of Abraham is historical. If it be the essence of legend, as distinct from myth, that it originates in the impression made by a commanding personality on his contemporaries, we may well believe that the story of Abraham, bearing as it does the stamp of ethical character and individuality, is a true legend, and therefore has grown up around some nucleus of historic fact.

5. From the religious point of view, the life of Abraham has a surprising inner unity as a record of the progressive trial and strengthening of faith. It is a life of unclouded earthly prosperity, broken by no reverse of fortune; yet it is rooted in fellowship with the unseen. 'He goes through life,' it has been well said, 'listening for the true word, which is not shut up in formal precepts, but revealed from time to time to the conscience; and this leaning upon God's word is declared to be in Jahweh's sight a proof of genuine righteousness.' He is the Father of the faithful, and the Friend of God. And that inward attitude of spirit is reflected in a character of singular loftiness and magnanimity, an unworldly and disinterested disposition which reveals no moral struggle, but is nevertheless the fruit of habitual converse with God. The few narratives which present the patriarch in a less admirable light only throw into bolder relief those ideal features of character in virtue of which Abraham stands in the pages of Scripture as one of the noblest types of Hebrew piety.

J. SKINNER.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.—It was natural for the Jews to represent Abraham as welcoming his righteous descendants to the bliss of heaven. It was, also, not unusual for them to represent the state of the righteous as a feast. In the parable of Lk 16¹⁹. Jesus uses these figures to represent the blessedness of the dead Lazarus. He was reclining at the feast next to Abraham (cf. Mt 8¹¹). A Rabbi of the third century, Adda Bar Ababa, uses precisely this expression as a synonym for entering Paradise. Other Jewish writings occasionally represent Abraham as in a way overseeing the entrance of souls into Paradise. 'Abraham's Bosom,' therefore, may very fairly be said to be a synonym for Paradise, where the righteous dead live in eternal bliss. There is no clear evidence that the Jews of Jesus' day believed in an intermediate state, and it is unsafe to see in the term any reference to such a belief. SHAILER MATHEWS.

ABRECH.—A word of doubtful signification, tr. 'Bow the knee,' in AV and RV (Gn 41⁴ 'then he made him [Joseph] to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee; and he set him over all the land of Egypt'). The word should be either Hebrew or Egyptian. An Assyrian etymology has been proposed, viz. abaraku, the title of one of the highest officials in the Assyrian Empire, but no such borrowings from Assyria are known in Egypt. Hebrew affords no likely explanation. Egyptian hitherto has furnished two that are possible: (1) 'Praise!' but the word is rare and doubtful; (2) abrak, apparently meaning 'Attention!' 'Have a care!' (Spiegelberg). The last seems the least improbable.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ABRONAH.—A station in the journeyings (Nu 33^{4, 25}).

ABSAALOM ('father is peace').—Third son of David, by Maacah, daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur (2 S 3³). His sister Tamar having been wronged by her half-brother Amnon, and David having failed to punish the criminal, Absalom assassinated Amnon and fled to Geshur, where he spent three years (ch. 13). Joab procured his recall, but he was not admitted into his father's presence. In his usual imperious fashion he next compelled Joab to bring about his full restoration (14²⁹). Then he assumed the position of heir-apparent (15¹; cf. 1 S 8¹, 1 K 1⁵), and began undermining the loyalty of the people. Four (not 'forty') years after his return he set up the standard of rebellion at Hebron, a town which was well-affected towards him because it was his birthplace, and aggrieved against David because it was no longer the metropolis. The old king was taken by surprise, and fled to the east of the Jordan. On entering Jerusalem, Absalom publicly appropriated the royal harem, thus proclaiming the supersession of his father. By the insidious counsel of Hushai time was wasted in collecting a large army. But time was on David's side. His veterans rallied round him; his seasoned captains were by his side. When Absalom offered battle, near Mahanaim, the king's only anxiety was lest his son should be slain. This really happened, through Joab's agency. The father's natural, but unseasonable, lamentation was cut short by the soldier's blunt remonstrance (2 S 19²⁷). On the face of the history it is clear that, if Absalom lacked capacity, he possessed charm. His physical beauty contributed to this: 2 S 14²⁵⁻²⁷ is probably a gloss, but certainly rests on a reliable tradition; the polling of the hair was a religious act. According to 2 S 18¹⁸, Absalom had no son: this is more reliable than the statement in 2 S 14²⁷. It is said that later generations, following Pr 10⁷, always avoided the name Absalom, preferring the form Abshalom (which appears in 1 K 15² 10). J. TAYLOR.

ABSALOM (IN APOCR.).—1. The father of Mattathias, one of the captains who stood by Jonathan at Hazer (1 Mac 11²⁰—Jos. Ant. xiii. v. 7). It is perhaps the same Absalom whose son Jonathan was sent by Simon to secure Joppa (1 Mac 13¹¹—Jos. Ant. xiii. vi. 4). 2. An envoy sent by the Jews to Lysias (2 Mac 11¹⁷).

ABUBUS.—Father of Ptolemy the murderer of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16¹¹ 15).

ABYSS.—The Jewish eschatology of the time of Christ conceived of the abode of departed spirits as a great abyss, in the midst of which was a lake of fire, intended primarily as a place of punishment for the angels and giants, and accordingly for sinners. The abyss existed before the creation, and was the home of the various enemies of God, such as the dragon and the beast. In the NT it is used only in Apocalypse (AV 'bottomless pit') and in Ro 10⁷ and Lk 8³¹ (AV 'deep').

SHAILER MATHEWS.

ACACIA.—See SHITTIM TREE.

ACCABA, 1 Es 5³⁰—Hagab, Ezr 2⁴⁶.

ACCEPTANCE denotes the being in favour with any one. In EV the noun is found only in Is 60⁷, but 'accept' and 'acceptable' are used frequently both in OT and NT to express the acceptance of one man with another (Gn 32²⁰, Lk 4²⁴), but above all the acceptance of man with God. In OT the conditions of acceptance with God are sometimes ceremonial (Ex 28³⁵, Ps 20²). But of themselves these are insufficient (Gn 4⁵, 7, Am 5², Jer 6²⁰ 14¹⁰ 12), and only moral uprightness (Pr 21¹, Job 42²) and the sacrifices of a sincere heart (Ps 19¹ 119¹⁰⁸; cf. 40⁶, 51¹⁵) are recognized as truly acceptable with God. In NT the grounds of the Divine acceptance are never ceremonial, but always spiritual (Ro 12¹, Ph 4¹⁸, 1 P 2²). Jesus Christ is the type of perfect acceptance (Mk 1¹¹, He 10¹⁰). In Him as 'the Beloved,' and through Him as the Mediator, men secure their religious standing and fundamental acceptance with God (Eph 1⁵). In serving Him (Ro 14¹⁸), and following His example (1 P 2²⁰ 21), they become morally acceptable in the Father's sight.

J. C. LAMBERT.

ACCESS (Gr. prosgōgē).—The word occurs only in Ro 5², Eph 2¹⁸ 3¹², and the question (regarding which commentators are much divided) is whether it ought to be understood in the trans. sense as 'introduction,' the being brought near by another, or in the intrans. sense as 'access' or personal approach. The trans. sense is most in keeping with the ordinary use of the vb. prosgō in classical Gr. (cf. its use in 1 P 3¹⁸ 'that he might bring us to God')—the idea suggested being that of a formal introduction into a royal presence. 'Access,' moreover, does not so well express the fact that we cannot approach God in our own right, but need Christ to introduce us; cf. 'by [RV 'through'] whom' (Ro 5²), 'through him' (Eph 2¹⁸), 'in whom' (3¹²). The word 'access' does not occur in Hebrews, but the writer has much to say on the subject of our approach to God through Christ, esp. for the purpose of prayer (4¹⁰⁻¹¹) and worship (10¹⁹⁻²⁰). J. C. LAMBERT.

ACCO.—Jg 1². See PTOLEMAIS.

ACCOS (1 Mac 8¹⁷).—Grandfather of one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus in B.C. 161. Accos represents the Heb. Hakkoz, the name of a priestly family (1 Ch 24¹⁰, Ezr 2⁶¹).

ACCURSED.—See BAN.

ACELDAMA.—See AKELDAMA.

ACHAIA.—This name was originally applied to a strip of land on the N. coast of the Peloponnese. On annexing Greece and Macedonia as a province in B.C. 146, the Romans applied the name Achaia to the whole of that country. In B.C. 27 two provinces were formed, Macedonia and Achaia; and the latter included Thessaly, Ætolia, Acarnania, and some part of Epirus, with Eubœa and most of the Cyclades. It was governed in St. Paul's time by a proconsul of the second grade, with headquarters at Corinth (Ac 18¹²). 'Hellas' (Ac 20²) is the native Greek name corresponding to the Roman 'Achaia.' There were Jewish settlements in this province, at Corinth, Athens, etc. (Ac 17¹⁷ 18¹⁻⁷), and the work of St. Paul began amongst them and was carried on by Apollos (1 and 2 Cor. passim, Ac 17¹⁹⁻²¹, 18. 19¹). A. SOUTER.

ACHAÏCUS.—The name of a member of the Church at Corinth. He was with Stephanas and Fortunatus (1 Co 16¹⁷⁻¹⁸) when they visited St. Paul at Ephesus and 'refreshed his spirit.' Nothing more is certainly known of him. As slaves were often named from the country of their birth, it is a probable conjecture that he was a slave, born in Achaia. J. G. TASKER.

ACHAN.—Son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah (Jos 7¹). It is brought home to Joshua (Jos 7⁸⁻¹²) that the defeat at Ai was due to the fact of Jahweh's covenant having been transgressed. An inquiry is instituted, and Achan is singled out as the transgressor. He confesses that after the capture of Jericho he had hidden part of the spoil, the whole of which had been placed under the ban (chêrem), i.e. devoted to Jahweh, and was therefore unlawful for man to touch. According to the usage of the times, both he and his family are stoned, and their dead bodies burned—the latter an even more terrible punishment in the eyes of ancient Israel. The sentence is carried out in the valley of Achor ('troubling'). According to Jos 7²⁶, this valley was so called after Achan, the 'troubler' of Israel. Later his name was changed to Achar to correspond more closely with the name of the valley (1 Ch 2²). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ACHAR.—See ACHAN.

ACHBOR ('mouse' or 'jerboa').—1. An Edomite (Gn 36²⁸). 2. A courtier under Josiah, son of Micaiah (LXK 22¹²⁻¹⁴), and father of Elnathan (Jer 26²² om. LXX, 36¹²). Called Abdon (2 Ch 34²⁰).

ACHTACHARUS, the nephew of Tobit, was governor under Sarchedonus = Esarhaddon (To 1¹ etc.). The nearest Hebrew name is Ahihud (1 Ch 8⁷).

ACHIAS.—An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1²), omitted in Ezr. and 1 Es.

ACHIM (perhaps a shortened form of Jehoiachim), an ancestor of our Lord (Mt 1¹⁴).

ACHIOR ('brother of light').—A general of the Ammonites (Jth 5⁶ etc.), afterwards converted to Judaism (ch. 14).

ACHIPHA (1 Es 5²¹).—His children were among the 'temple servants' or Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel; called Hakupha, Ezr 2⁶¹, Neh 7²³.

ACHISH.—The king of Gath to whom David fled for refuge after the massacre of the priests at Nob (1 S 21¹⁰). In 1 S 27² he is called 'the son of Maach' (possibly = 'son of Maacah,' 1 K 2³⁹). He received David with his band of 600 men, and assigned him the city of Ziklag in the S. of Judah. Despite the wishes of Achish, the other Phil. princes refused to let David take part in the final campaign against Saul. ['Achish' should be read for 'Abimelech' in Ps 34 (title).]

ACHMETHA.—The Ecbatana of the Greeks and Romans, modern Hamadan. It was the capital of Media (in Old Persian Hagmatāna). It is mentioned but once in the canonical books (Ezr 6²), as the place where the archives of the reign of Cyrus were deposited. It is several times mentioned in the Apocrypha (2 Mac 9⁴, To 3⁷ 6⁷ 14¹², Jth 1¹²). J. F. MCCURDY.

ACHOR ('zmeq' 'ākhôr, 'Vale of Grief').—Here Achan (wh. see), with his family, was stoned to death. It lay on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15⁷ etc.). Guthe identifies it with the plain south of Jericho, between the mountains on the west, and Jordan and the Dead Sea on the east. Wady Kelt, a tremendous gorge which breaks down from the mountain W. of Jericho, probably formed the boundary between Judah and Benjamin. In the mouth of this valley, it seems likely, the execution took place. W. EWING.

ACHSAH (1 Ch 2⁹, AV Achsa).—The daughter of Caleb. Her father promised her in marriage to the man who should capture Debir or Kiriath-sepher—a feat accomplished by Othniel, the brother of Caleb. Her dowry of a south land (Negeb) was increased by the grant of 'the upper springs and the nether springs' (Jos 15¹⁶⁻¹⁹, Jg 1⁹⁻¹⁵).

ACHSHAPH.—About 17 miles E. of Tyre, now called Iksaf or Kesaf, on N.E. border of territory assigned to Asher (Jos 19²⁶). Its king joined Jabin's confederacy, which was defeated by Joshua, and the ruler of Achshaph was amongst the slain (Jos 11¹ 12²⁰). J. TAYLOR.

ACHZIB.—1. A town in Asher (Jos 19²⁹), from which the natives could not be dislodged (Jg 1³¹): it lay on the coast between Acre and Tyre. The early geographers called it Ekdippa; now ez-Zib. 2. In the S. of the Shephelah (Jos 15⁴⁴), near Mareshah. Mic 1⁴ predicts that Achzib shall be to the kings of Judah achzab ('deceptive'), a stream whose waters fall when most needed (cf. Jer 15¹⁸). J. TAYLOR.

ACRA.—See JERUSALEM, I. 3, II. 2.

ACRE.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

ACROSTIC.—Acrostic poems, i.e. poems in which initial letters recurring at regular intervals follow some definite arrangement, occur to the number of 14 in the OT; another instance is Sir 51¹³⁻²⁰. All these are of a simple type, and are so planned that the initials recurring at fixed intervals follow the order of the Hebrew alphabet; thus the first section of the poem begins with the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, aleph; the second with the second letter, beth; and so on down to the twenty-second and last letter, taw. The interval between the several letters consists of a regular number of lines. In Pss 111. 112 this interval is one line; in Pss 25. 34. 145, Pr 31¹⁰⁻³¹, Sir 51¹³⁻²⁰, and in the fragment, which does not clearly extend beyond the thirteenth letter, contained in Nah 1, the interval is 2 lines; in La 4 it is

2 longer lines, in chs. 1 and 2 it is 3 longer lines; in Ps 9 and 10 (a single continuous poem), and in Ps 37, it is 4 lines. In La 3, where the interval between each successive letter of the alphabet is 3 long lines, each of each set of three lines begins with the same letter; and similarly in Ps 119, where the interval is 16 lines, each alternate line within each set of 16 begins with the same letter.

Certainly in La 2, 3 and 4, and, according to the order of the verses in the LXX, in Pr 31, probably also in Ps 34 (where the sense seems to require the transposition of v. 16 and v. 15) and in Ps 9, the sixteenth and seventeenth letters of the Hebrew alphabet occupy respectively the seventeenth and sixteenth places in the acrostic scheme. The reason for this is unknown.

Comparatively few of these poems have come down to us intact. They have suffered from accidental errors of textual transmission, and probably also from editorial alterations. In some cases an entire strophe has dropped out of the text; thus the sixth strophe (of 2 lines) has fallen out between v. 6 and v. 7 in Ps 31, and the fourteenth between v. 13 and v. 14 of Ps 145, though in the latter case it still stood in the Hebrew MS from which the Greek version was made. Occasionally lines have been inserted, as, apparently, in more than one place in Ps 37, and in Nah 12. But such corruption of the text is really serious only in Ps 9 f., Nah 1, and Sir 51¹³⁻³⁰.

The earliest of these fifteen poems are probably La 2 and 4, which may have been written in the earlier half of the 6th cent. B.C.; but the custom of writing such poems may have been much more ancient. Perhaps the latest of the poems is Sir 51¹³⁻³⁰ (about A.C. 180), but the Jews continued to compose such poems long after this.

The English reader will find the strophes clearly distinguished, and the initial Hebrew letters with their names in English letters indicated, in the RV of Ps 119. Unfortunately the RV does not give the initials in the other poems; but they will be found, in the case of the Psalms, in (for example) Kirkpatrick's Psalms (Cambridge Bible), Cheyne's Book of Psalms, Driver's Parallel Psalter. For La 2 and 4 see Expositor, 1906 (April) [G. A. Smith]; for Nah 1, Expositor, 1898 (Sept.), pp. 207-220 [G. B. Gray], or Driver, Century Bible, p. 26 f. Common though it is in other literatures and with such mediæval Jewish poets as Ibn Ezra, no decisive instance of the type of acrostic in which the initial letters compose a name, has been found in the OT, though some have detected the name Simeon (or Simon) thus given in Ps 110. Pss 25 and 34 contain each an additional strophe at the close of the alphabetic strophes; in each case the first word of the verse is a part of the Hebrew verb pdādh, 'to redeem,' and it has been suggested that the author or a copyist has thus left us a clue to his name—Pedahel; but interesting as this suggestion is, it is for several reasons doubtful.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.—1. Summary of contents.—The fifth book of our NT gives the history of the Church from the Ascension till c. A.D. 61. It may be divided into two parts, one of which describes the early history ('Acts of Peter' and 'Acts of the Hellenists'), and the other the life of St. Paul ('Acts of Paul') from his conversion to his imprisonment at Rome. The two parts overlap each other; yet a clear division occurs at 13, from which point forwards the Pauline journeys are described by one who for a considerable part of them was a fellow-traveller. The parallelism between Peter and Paul is very striking, corresponding deeds and events being related of each; and this peculiarity was thought by the Tübingen school to betray a fictitious author, who composed his narrative so as to show the equality of Peter and Paul. Though this conclusion is arbitrary, the parallelism shows us that the author, whoever he was, selected his facts with great care and with a set purpose.

2. Unity of authorship.—From 16¹⁰ onwards, the writer, who never names himself, frequently betrays his presence as a fellow-traveller by using the pronoun 'we.' It is generally conceded that these 'we' sections are genuine notes of a companion of St. Paul. But some assert that the author of Acts was a later writer who incorporated in his work extracts from a diary contemporary with the events described. These critics see in the book traces of four strata, and assert that it is a compilation of the same nature as the Pentateuch, the Book of Enoch, and the Apostolic Constitutions. Now no doubt our author used sources, in some parts of his book written sources. But if he were a 2nd cent. compiler, we ought to be able to detect interpolations from differences of style (as we do in Apost. Const.), and often from anachronisms. Moreover, seeing that he was at least a man of great literary ability, it is remarkable that he was so clumsy as to retain the pronoun 'we' if he was a late writer copying a 1st cent. source. His style is the same throughout, and no anachronisms have been really brought home to him; his interests are those of the 1st, not of the 2nd century (§ 8). Further, the Third Gospel is clearly, from identity of style and the express claim in Ac 1¹ (cf. Lk 12), by our author, and yet the Gospel is now generally admitted to have been written by c. A.D. 80. Thus we may, with Harnack, dismiss the compilation theory.

3. The author.—Internal evidence, if the unity of authorship be admitted, shows that the writer was a close companion of St. Paul. Now, if we take the names of the Apostle's companions given in the Epistles, we shall find that all but four must be excluded, whether as having joined him after his arrival at Rome (for the author made the voyage with him, 27¹), or as being mentioned in Acts in a manner inconsistent with authorship (so, e.g., Timothy, Tychicus, Aristarchus, Mark, Prisca, Aquila, Trophimus must be excluded), or as having deserted him, or as being Roman Christians and recent friends. Two of the four (Crescens and Jesus Justus) are insignificant, and had no specially intimate connexion with the Apostle. We have only Titus and Luke left. Neither is mentioned in Acts; both were important persons. But for 2 Ti 4¹⁰ we must have conjectured that these were two names for the same person. We have then to choose between them, and Patristic evidence (§ 4) leads us to choose Luke. But why is Titus not mentioned in Acts? It cannot be (as Lightfoot suggests) that he was unimportant (cf. 2 Co. 12¹¹), but perhaps Luke's silence is due to Titus being his near relation (Ramsay); cf. Exp. T. xviii. [1907] 285, 335, 380.

The author was a Gentile, not a Jew (Col 4¹⁰, 14), a conclusion to which a consideration of his interests would lead us (§ 8; see also Ac 1⁹ 'in their language'). He was a physician (Col 4¹⁴), and had quite probably studied at the University of Athens, where he seems quite at home though not present at the Athenian scenes he describes (Ac 17¹⁶⁻¹⁹). His native country is disputed. A Preface to Luke, thought to be not later than the 3rd cent., says that he was 'by nation a Syrian of Antioch'; and Eusebius (HE iii. 4), using a vague phrase, says that he was, 'according to birth, of those from Antioch'; while later writers like Jerome follow Eusebius. Certainly we should never have guessed this from the cold way in which the Syrian Antioch is mentioned in Acts. Some (Blackham, Rendall) conjecture that Pisidian Antioch is really meant, as the scenes in the neighbourhood of that city are so vivid that the description might well be by an eye-witness. But the 'we' sections had not yet begun, and this seems decisive against the writer having been present. Others (Ramsay, Renan) believe the writer to have been a Macedonian of Philippi, since he took so great an interest in the claims of that colony (16¹²). Indeed, Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 202 ff.) propounds the ingenious conjecture that Luke, having met Paul at Tarsus accidentally (16⁷), it could not have been by appointment, as Paul had not meant to go there, was the 'certain man of Macedonia' who appeared in the vision (16⁹); it must have been some one whom the Apostle knew by sight, for otherwise he could not have told that he was a Macedonian. This is a very tempting conjecture. Luke need not have been a new convert at that time. On the other hand, it must be said that against his having been a native of Philippi are the facts that he had no home there, but went to lodge with Lydia (16¹³), and that he only supposed that there was a Jewish place of prayer at Philippi (16¹³ RV). His interest in Philippi may rather be accounted for by his having been left in charge of the Church there (17¹ 20⁶); in the interval between St. Paul's leaving Philippi and his return there the pronoun 'they' is used). Yet he was quite probably a Macedonian [Ac 27⁵ is not against this], of a Greek family once settled at Antioch; he was a Gentile not without some contempt for the Jews, and certainly not a Roman citizen like St. Paul. His Greek nationality shows itself in his calling the Maltese 'barbarians' (28²), i.e. non-Greek speaking, and in many other ways.

4. Patristic testimony.—There are probable references to Acts in Clement of Rome (c. A.D. 95), who seems to refer to 13²² 20⁶ etc.; and in Ignatius (c. A.D. 110), who apparently refers to 4¹; also in Polycarp (c. 111); almost certainly in the Martyrdom of Polycarp (c. A.D. 155); and full quotations are found at the end of the 2nd cent. in Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Irenaeus, all of whom ascribe the book to Luke. So also the Muratorian Fragment (c. A.D. 200). Moreover, the apocryphal Acts, some of them of the 2nd cent., are built on our canonical Acts and their authors must have known the latter.

5. Style.—The book is not a chronological biography; there are few indications of time (11²⁸ 24²⁷; cf. Lk 3¹), yet the writer often uses vague phrases like 'after some days,' which may indicate intervals of days, months, or years. He seizes critical features, and passes over unessential details. Thus he does not relate the events of the years spent by St. Paul in Tarsus (9³⁰), probably as being years of education in which no striking event occurred. So he tells us practically nothing of the missionary journey through Cyprus (13⁹), though much work must have been done among the Jews then; while great space is given to the epoch-making interview with Sergius Paulus. The writer leaves a good deal to be understood; he states facts, and leaves the reader to deduce the causes or inferences; he reports directions or intentions, and leaves it to be inferred that they were carried into effect, e.g. 13⁸ (no reason given for Elymas' opposition, it is not explicitly said that Paul preached to the proconsul), 13¹³ (the reason for Mark's departure not stated, nor yet for Paul and Barnabas going to Pisidian Antioch), 16³⁰ (no reason given for the Philippi praetors' change of attitude), 17¹⁵ (not said that the injunction was obeyed, but from 1 Th 3¹ we see that Timothy had re-joined Paul at Athens and was sent away again to Macedonia, whence he came in Ac 18⁵ to Corinth), 20⁶ (not stated that they arrived in time for Pentecost, but it must be understood), 27¹³ (it must be inferred that the injunction was obeyed).

6. Crises in the history.—These may be briefly indicated. They include the Day of Pentecost (the birthday of the Church); the appointment of the Seven (among them Nicholas, a 'proselyte of righteousness, i.e. a Gentile who had become a circumcised Jew'); the conversion of St. Paul; the episode of Cornelius (who was only a 'proselyte of the gate,' or 'God-fearing,' one who was brought into relation with the Jews by obeying certain elementary rules, such, probably, as those of 15²⁰, but not circumcised [this is disputed; see NICOLAS]); this means, therefore, a further step towards Pauline Christianity); the first meeting of Paul and Barnabas with a Roman official in the person of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus, the initial step in the great plan of St. Paul to make Christianity the religion of the Roman Empire (see § 7; henceforward the author calls Saul of Tarsus by his Roman name, one which he must have borne all along, for the purposes of his Roman citizenship); the Council of Jerusalem, the vindication of Pauline teaching by the Church; the call to Macedonia, not as being a passing from one continent to another, for the Romans had not this geographical idea, nor yet as a passing over to a strange people, but partly as a step forwards in the great plan, the entering into a new Roman province, and especially the association for the first time with the author (§ 3); the residence at Corinth, the great city on the Roman highway to the East, where Gallio's action paved the way for the appeal to Caesar; and the apprehension at Jerusalem. These are related at length. Another crisis is probably hinted at, the acquittal of St. Paul; for even if the book were written before that took place (§ 9), the release must have become fairly obvious to all towards the end of the two years' sojourn at Rome (cf. Ph 2²⁴).

7. Missionary plan of St. Paul.—(a) The author describes the Apostle as beginning new missionary work by seeking out the Jews first; only when they would not listen he turned to the Gentiles, 13⁸ 14¹⁴ 16¹³ (no synagogue at Philippi, only a 'place of prayer') 17¹¹. (the words 'as his custom was' are decisive) 17¹⁰. 16¹. 18⁴. 5. 19 19¹⁰. 28³¹; we may perhaps understand the same at places where it is not expressly mentioned, 14⁷. 21. 28, or the Jews may have been weak and without a synagogue in those places.—(b) St. Paul utilizes the Roman Empire to spread the gospel along its lines of communication. He was justifiably proud of his Roman citizenship (16³⁷ 22²⁸. etc.; cf. Ph 1²⁷ [RVm] 3²⁰, Eph 2¹⁹). He seems to have formed the great idea of Christianity being the religion of the Roman Empire, though not confined to it. Hence may be understood his zeal for Gentile liberty, and his breaking away from the idea of Jewish exclusiveness. In his missionary journeys he confines himself (if the South Galatian theory be accepted; see art. GALATIANS [EPISTLES TO THE]) to the great roads of traffic in the Empire. He utilizes the Greek language to spread Christian influence, just as the Roman Empire used it to spread its civilization in the far East, where it never attempted to force Latin (for even the Roman colonies in the East spoke Greek, keeping Latin for state occasions). Paul and Barnabas, then, preached in Greek; they clearly did not know Lycaonian (cf. Ac 14¹¹ with 14¹⁴). The Scriptures were not translated into the languages of Asia Minor, which were probably not written languages, nor even into Latin till a later age.

Following the same idea, the author represents the Roman officials in the colonies as more favourable to St. Paul than the magistrates of the ordinary Greek cities. Contrast the account of the conduct of the Greek magistrates at Iconium and Thessalonica who were active against him, or of the Court of the Areopagus at Athens who were contemptuous, with the silence about the action of the Roman magistrates of Pisidian Antioch and Lystra, or the explicit statements about Sergius Paulus, Gallio, Felix, Festus, Claudius Lysias, and Julius the centurion, who were more or less fair or friendly. Even the praetors at Philippi ended by apologizing profusely when they discovered Paul's status.

8. The writer's interests.—It is interesting to observe these, as they will lead us to an approximate date for the work. There is no better test than such an inquiry for the detection of a forgery or of a compilation. The principal interest is obviously St. Paul and his mission. To this the preliminary history of the Twelve and of the beginnings of Christianity leads up. The writer emphasizes especially St. Paul's dealings with Roman officials. Of minor interests we notice medicine, as we should expect from 'the beloved physician'; and the rival science of sorcery; the position and influence of women (11¹⁴ 8³. 12 92 13⁵⁰ 16¹⁴ 17¹². 12. 21⁵. 9 22⁴ etc.; in Asia Minor women had a much more prominent position than in Greece proper); the organization of the Church (21¹². 42¹¹. 61¹². 88¹¹. 152¹¹. 191¹¹. etc.); Divine intervention to overrule human projects (note especially the remarkable way in which St. Paul was led to Troas, 16⁸⁻⁹); and navigation. This last interest cannot but strike the most cursory reader. The voyages and harbours are described minutely and vividly, while the land journeys are only just mentioned. Yet the writer was clearly no professional sailor. He describes the drifting in 27²⁷ as a zigzag course when it must have been straight; he is surprised at their passing Cyprus on a different side when going westward from that on which they had passed it going eastward (27^a 21^b), though that was, and is, the normal course in autumn for sailing vessels (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 317). It has been truly remarked by Ramsay (ib. p. 22) that the writer's interests and views are incompatible with the idea of a 2nd cent. compiler; e.g. the view of the Roman officials, and the optimistic tone, would be impossible after the persecution of Domitian—or even (we may add) after that of Nero.

9. Date.—From the reasoning of §§ 2, 8 (see also § 12) we must reject the idea of a 2nd cent. compiler, and decide between a date at the end of the two years at Rome, 28^{sof}. (Blass, Salmon, Headlam, Rackham), and a later date 70–80 A.D. (Ramsay, Sanday, Harnack, and most of those who ascribe the book to Luke).—(a) For the former date we note that there is no reference to anything after the Roman imprisonment, to the martyrdom of James the Lord's brother in A.D. 62, or to the Neronian persecution in A.D. 64, or to the death of Peter and Paul (contrast the allusion to Peter's death in Jn 21¹⁹), or to the Fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Also there is good reason to believe from the Pastoral Epistles, from Ecclesiastical history, and from a priori reasons, that St. Paul was released soon after the two years; but we should gather that our author did not know for certain the result of the appeal to Caesar. He could hardly have known that the Apostle's expectation that he would not again see the Ephesian elders was falsified, or he would not have left 20²⁸ without remark (but see Paul, 1. 4 (d)). The optimistic tone (§ 8), contrasting so greatly with that of the Apocalypse, points in the same direction; as also does the absence of any reference to the Pauline Epistles, which we should expect if 15 or 20 years had elapsed since they were written; and of any explanation of the apparent contradiction between Galatians and Acts (see art. GALATIANS [EPISTLE TO THE]). On the other hand, it is quite likely that a close companion of St. Paul would be the last to have, as long as he was with him, a copy of his correspondence.—(b) For the later date, A.D. 70–80, it is suggested that Luke contemplated a third volume, and so ended his second abruptly (cf. 1¹, properly 'first treatise,' not 'former'; but in late Greek comparatives and superlatives were frequently confused, cf. 1 Co 13¹⁴ RVm). It is also thought that Lk 21¹⁰ must have been written after the taking of Jerusalem, and that a fortiori Acts must be later; and that the atmosphere of the Flavian period may be detected in it. For an alleged borrowing of Acts from Josephus, and for further remarks on the date, see artt. LUKE [GOSPEL ACC. TO] and THEODAS. To the present writer the earlier date given above seems the more probable.

10. Sources.—The author had exceptional opportunities of getting information. For the last part of the book he was his own informant, or he had access to St. Paul. John Mark would tell him of the deliverance of St. Peter and of the mission to Cyprus (12–13¹²). For the 'Acts of the Hellenists' (chs. 6–8) and for the Cornelius episode he would have Philip the Evangelist as an authority, for he spent two years at Caesarea; and perhaps also Cornelius himself. He had perhaps visited the Syrian Antioch, and could get from the leaders of the Church there (e.g. Manaen) information about the events which happened there. The first five chapters remain. Here he had to depend entirely on others; he may have used written documents similar to those mentioned in Lk 1¹, though he may also have questioned those at Jerusalem who had witnessed the events. Dr. Blass thinks that Luke here used an Aramaic document by Mark; this is pure conjecture, and it is quite uncertain if Luke knew Aramaic.

11. The Bezan codex.—This great Uncial MS (D, now at Cambridge), supported by some MSS of the Old Latin Version, presents a strikingly different text from that of the other great Greek MSS, and has also many additions, especially in Acts. Dr. Blass' theory is that the variations in Acts come from Luke's having made two drafts of the book, though he would admit that some of the readings of D are interpolations. He thinks that the 'Bezan' Acts represents the first draft, the 'Bezan' Luke the second draft. But the Bezan text of Acts is too smooth, and its readings are too often obviously added to ease a rough phrase, for it to be original. It is more probable that it represents a revision made in Asia Minor in the 2nd cent. by one who was very familiar with the localities described. Many scholars, however, think that it preserves a large number of true and authentic readings which have been lost in the other great MSS; but this seems doubtful.—In 11²⁸ this MS (supported by Augustine), by inserting 'we,' makes the writer to have been present at Syrian Antioch when Agabus prophesied.

12. Accuracy of Acts.—This is most important, as it would be almost impossible for a late writer to avoid pitfalls when covering so large a ground. Instances of remarkable accuracy are: (a) the proconsul in Cyprus (13⁷), which had only been under the rule of the Senate for a short time when St. Paul came there, and afterwards ceased to be so governed—otherwise the governor would have been a 'proprator.' An inscription in Cyprus is dated 'in the proconsulship of Paulus.' (b) So the proconsul in Achaia (18¹²); this province had been off and on united to Macedonia. At one time separated and governed by a proprator and then united, a few years before St. Paul's visit it had been again separated and governed by a proconsul. (c) The 'first men' at Pisidian Antioch (13⁴⁰), i.e. the Duumviri and the 'First Ten.' This last title was only given (as here) to a board of magistrates in Greek cities of the East; in Roman colonies in Italy the name was given to those who stood first on the Senate roll. (d) The 'first man' in Malta (28⁷) and (e) the 'politarchs' ('rulers of the city') at Thessalonica (17⁶); probably a local Macedonian title, are both attested by inscriptions. (f) The old Court of the Areopagus at Athens (17¹⁹), which really ruled the city,—though it was a 'free city,'—as the demoi or popular assembly had lost its authority. (g) The 'Asiarchs' at Ephesus (19³¹ RVm), the presidents of the 'Common Council' of the province in cities where there was a temple of Rome and the Emperor; they superintended the worship of the Emperor. Their friendliness to St. Paul is a sure sign of an early date, for the book could only have been written while the Imperial policy was still neutral to Christianity, or at least while the memory of that time was still green. Contrast the enmity between Christianity and this Rome worship depicted in Rev 2¹³ etc. No 2nd cent. author could have written thus. (h) The details of the last voyage, thoroughly tested by Mr. Smith of Jordanhill, who sailed over the whole course.—Against all this it is alleged that there are contradictions between Acts and Galatians (see art. on that Epistle); but these vanish on examination, especially if we accept the 'South Galatian' theory. Instances of minute accuracy such as those given above show that we have in Acts a history of great importance and one that is most trustworthy. The accuracy can only come from the book being a genuine contemporary record.

A. J. MACLEAN.

ACUB (1 Es 5³¹).—His sons were among the 'temple servants' who returned with Zerubbabel. Called Bakbuk, Ezr 2⁶¹, Neh 7⁵⁴.

ACUD (1 Es 5³⁰).—His sons were among the 'temple servants' who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel. Called Akkub, Ezr 2⁶²; omitted in Neh 7.

ADADAH (Jos 15²²).—A city of Judah in the Negeb; perhaps a corrupt reading for Ararah, i.e. Aroer of 1 S 30²⁴.

ADAH.—1. One of the two wives of Lamech, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gn 4¹⁹, 20). The name possibly means 'brightness' (cf. Arab. ghaddi), Lamech's other wife being named 'Zillah'—'shadow,' 'darkness.' 2. Daughter of Elon, a Hittite, and one of the wives of Esau (Gn 36²). In Gn 26⁴ (P) the daughter of Elion the Hittite, whom Esau takes to wife, is named Basemath (wh. see).

ADAH ('Jehovah has adorned').—1. The maternal grandfather of Josiah, 2 K 22¹. 2. A Levite, 1 Ch 6⁴, called Iddo in v. 21. 3. A son of Shimei (in v. 12 Shema) the Benjamite, 1 Ch 8²¹. 4. The son of Jeroham, a priest, and head of a family in Jerusalem, 1 Ch 9¹². 5. The father of Maaseiah, a captain who helped to overthrow the usurpation of Athaliah, 2 Ch 23¹. 6. One of the family of Bani, who took a strange wife during the Exile, Ezr 10²⁹. 7. Another of a different family of Bani, who had committed the same offence, Ezr 10³⁰. 8. A descendant of Judah by Pharez, Neh 11⁵. 9. A Levite of the family of Aaron, Neh 11¹²; probably the same as No. 4.

ADALIA (Est 9⁹).—The fifth of the sons of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ADAM.—The derivation is doubtful. The most plausible is that which connects it with the Assyrian adāmu, 'make', 'produce'; man is thus a 'creature'—one made or produced. Some derive it from a root signifying 'red' (cf. Edom, Gn 25³⁰), men being of a ruddy colour in the district where the word originated. The Biblical writer (Gn 2⁷) explains it, according to his frequent practice, by a play on the word 'ādāmāh, 'ground'; but that is itself derived from the same root 'red'. The word occurs in the Heb. 31 times in Gn 1²–5². In most of these it is not a proper name, and the RV has rightly substituted 'man' or 'the man' in some verses where AV has 'Adam.' But since the name signifies 'mankind,' homo, Mensch, not 'a man,' vir, Mann (see 5²), the narrative appears to be a description, not of particular historical events in the life of an individual, but of the beginnings of human life (ch. 2), human sin (ch. 3), human genealogical descent (4¹–5¹–5²). In a few passages, if the text is sound, the writer slips into the use of Adam as a proper name, but only in 5²–5 does it stand unmistakably for an individual.

1. The creation of man is related twice, 1²–2⁷ (P) and 2⁷ (J). The former passage is the result of philosophical and theological reflexion of a late date, which had taught the writer that man is the climax of creation because his personality partakes of the Divine (and in 5² this prerogative is handed on to his offspring); but the latter is written from the naïve and primitive standpoint of legendary tradition, which dealt only with man's reception of physical life (see next article).

2. Man's primitive condition, 2⁸–3⁷ (J). The story teaches: that man has work to do in life (2¹⁵); that he needs a counterpart, a help who shall be 'meet for him' (vv. 18, 21–24); that man is supreme over the beasts in the intellectual ability, and therefore in the authority, which he possesses to assign to them their several names (vv. 19, 20); that man, in his primitive condition, was far from being morally or socially perfect; he was simply in a state of savagery, but from a moral standpoint innocent, because he had not yet learned the meaning of right and wrong (v. 2); and this blissful ignorance is also portrayed by the pleasures of a luxuriant garden or park (vv. 1–14).

3. The Fall, 2¹⁶–3 (J). But there came a point in human evolution when man became conscious of a command—the earliest germ of a recognition of an 'ought' (2¹⁶–3¹); and this at once caused a stress and strain between his lower animal nature, pictured as a serpent, and his higher aspirations after obedience (3¹–4) [N.B.—The serpent is nowhere, in the OT, identified with the devil; the idea is not found till Wis 2²⁴]; by a deliberate following of the lower nature against which he had begun to strive, man first caused sin to exist (v. 4); with the instant result of a feeling of shame (v. 7), and the world-wide consequence of pain, trouble, and death (vv. 14–19), and the cessation for ever of the former state of innocent ignorance and bliss (vv. 23–24).

On the Babylonian affinities with the story of Adam, see CREATION, EDEN. A. H. M'NEILE.

ADAM IN THE NT.—A. In the Gospels.—1. In Mt 19^{4–6} || Mk 10^{4–8} Jesus refers to Gn 1²⁷. His answer to the Pharisees is intended to show that the provision made for divorce in the Mosaic law (Dt 24¹) was only a concession to the hardness of men's hearts. The truer and deeper view of marriage must be based on a morality which takes its stand upon the primeval nature of man and woman. And with His quotation He couples one from Gn 2²⁴ (see also Eph 5²¹). The same result is reached in Mt., but with a transposition of the two parts of the argument.

2. In Lk 3³⁸ the ancestry of Jesus is traced up to Adam. As a Gentile writing for Gentiles, St. Luke took every opportunity of insisting upon the universal power of the gospel. Jesus is not, as in St. Matthew's Gospel, a descendant of Abraham only, but of the man to whom all mankind trace their origin. But further, the same Evangelist who relates the fact of the Virgin-birth, and records that Christ was, in His own proper Person, 'Son of God' (1³⁵), claims, by the closing words of the genealogy, that the first man, and hence every human being, is 'son of God.' As Jesus is both human and Divine, so the genealogy preserves the truth that all mankind partake of this twofold nature.

B. In the Epistles.—The truth taught by St. Luke is treated in its redemptive aspect by his master St. Paul. 1. 1 Co 15²². The solidarity of mankind in their physical union with Adam, and in their spiritual union with Christ, involves respectively universal death and life as a consequence of Adam's sin and of Christ's work.

2. In Ro 5^{12–21} this is treated more fully.—(a) vv. 12–14. There is a parallelism between Adam and Christ. Both had a universal effect upon mankind—in the case of Adam by a transmission of guilt, and therefore of death; the corresponding statement concerning Christ is postponed till v. 19, because St. Paul intervenes with a parenthesis dealing with those who lived before any specific commands were given in the Mosaic law, and yet who sinned, owing to the transmitted effects of Adam's fall, and therefore died. The Apostle, without attempting fully to reconcile them, places side by side the two aspects of the truth—the hereditary transmission of guilt, and moral responsibility; 'and thus death made its way to all men, because all sinned.'—(b) vv. 15–17. The contrast is far greater than the similarity; in quality (v. 15), in quantity (v. 16), in character and consequences (v. 17).—(c) Summary of the argument (vv. 18–21).

3. 1 Co 15^{44–47}. In the foregoing passages St. Paul deals with the practical moral results of union with Adam and Christ respectively. These verses (a) go behind that, and show that there is a radical difference between the nature of each; (b) look forward, and show that this difference has a vital bearing on the truth of man's resurrection.

(a) vv. 44–46. It is shown, by illustrations from nature, that it is reasonable to believe man to exist in two different states, one far higher than the other. In vv. 46b–48 St. Paul adapts Gn 2⁷ (LXX), and reads into the words the doctrinal significance that the body of the first representative man became the vehicle of a 'psychical' nature, while the body of the Second is the organ of a 'pneumatical' nature. The second half of his statement—'the last Adam became a life-giving spirit'—appears to be based on a reminiscence of Messianic passages which speak of the work of the Divine Spirit, e.g. Is 11^{1–2}, Jl 2^{28–32}.

(b) But as the living soul (psyche) preceded the life-giving spirit (pneuma), so it is with the development of mankind (v. 46). As the first man had a nature in conformity with his origin from clay, while the Second has His origin 'from heaven' (v. 47), so the nature of some men remains earthy, while that of some has become heavenly (v. 48). But further, in his present state man is the exact counterpart of the first man, because of his corporate union with him; but the time is coming when he shall become the exact counterpart of the Second Man (cf. Gn 2nd), because of our spiritual union with Him (v. 49).

4. In Ph 2nd there is an implied contrast between 'Christ Jesus, who . . . deemed it not a thing to be snatched at to be on an equality with God,' and Adam, who took fruit from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, which God said had made him 'as one of us' (Gn 3rd).

5. On 1 Ti 2nd see EVE; and on Jude 14 see ENOCH.

A. H. M'NEILE.

ADAM (city).—A city in the Jordan valley, 'beside Zarethan' (Jos 3rd); usually identified with Jisr ed-Damieh, near the confluence of the Jabbok and the Jordan, where there was once a bridge. Hiram, Solomon's worker in brass, may have had his furnace here (cf. 1 K 7th). G. L. ROBINSON.

ADAMAH.—A fortified city of Naphtali (Jos 19th); identified by Conder with Admah on the plateau north of Bethshean; placed by the Palestine explorers at ed-Damieh, 5 miles S.W. of Tiberias. See ADAMI-NEKEB.

ADAMANT is twice (Ezk 3rd, Zec 7th) used in AV and RV as tr. of shāmīr, which is elsewhere rendered either 'brier' (Is 5th 7th 23rd. 24th 9th 10th 17th 27th 32nd) or 'diamond' (Jer 17th). 'Diamond,' which arose from 'adamant' by a variety of spelling ('adamant,' or 'adimant,' then 'diamant' or 'diamond'), has displaced 'adamant' as the name of the precious stone, 'adamant' being now used rhetorically to express extreme hardness.

ADAMI-NEKEB.—The pass Adami' (Jos 19th), on the border of Naphtali. Neubauer and G. A. Smith identify it with ed-Damieh, 5 miles S.W. of Tiberias. See ADAMAH. G. L. ROBINSON.

ADAR (Ezr 6th, Est 3rd. 12 8th 9th. 15th. 1 Mac 7th 4th. 2 Mac 15th, Est 10th 13th 16th).—The 12th month in the later Jewish Calendar. See TIME.

ADASA.—A town near Bethhoron (1 Mac 7th 4th. Jos. Ant. XII. x. 5), now the ruin Adaseh near Gibeon.

ADBEEL.—The third son of Ishmael (Gn 25th, 1 Ch 1st), eponym of the N. Arab. tribe, which appears in cuneiform inscrip. as Idibai'il or Idibi'al, and which had its settlements S.W. of the Dead Sea.

ADDAN (1 Es 5th).—Some of the inhabitants of this place returned with Zerubbabel, but were unable to prove their true Isr. descent by showing to what clan or family they belonged (Ezr 2nd). The name does not appear in the later lists in Ezr 10, Neh 10. In Neh 7th it appears as ADDON.

ADDAR.—1. A town on the border of Judah south of Beersheba (Jos 15th). The site is unknown. 2. See ARD.

ADDER.—See SERPENT.

ADDI.—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3rd.

ADDO.—The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (1 Es 6th). See IDDO.

ADDON.—Neh 7th. See ADDAN.

ADDUS.—1. His 'sons' returned with Zerub. (1 Es 5th); omitted in the parallel lists in Ezr 2, Neh 7. 2. See JADDUS.

ADIDA.—A town in the Shephelah (Jos. Ant. XIII. vi. 5) fortified by Simon the Hasmonæan (1 Mac 12th 13th). See HADID.

ADIEL ('ornament of God').—1. A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4th 2nd. 2. A priest, 1 Ch 9th 3rd. 3. The father of Azmaveth, David's treasurer, 1 Ch 27th.

ADIN (Ezr 2nd 8th, Neh 7th 10th, 1 Es 5th 4th 8th).—See ADINU.

ADINA.—A Reubenite chief, 1 Ch 11th 4th.

ADINO.—The present Heb. text of 2 S 23rd is corrupt, the true reading being preserved in the parallel passage 1 Ch 11th 'Jashobeam, the son of a Hachmonite, he lifted up his spear.' The last clause, hū 'ōrēr eth-hanithā, was corrupted into hū 'adīnō ha'elsūt, and then taken erroneously as a proper name, being treated as an alternative to the preceding 'Josheb-basshebeth, a Tahchemonite' (see JASHOBEAM).

ADINU (1 Es 5th, called Adin in 8th).—His descendants returned with Zerub. to the number of 454 (1 Es 5th, Ezr 2nd 6th or 655 (Neh 7th). A second party of 51 (Ezr 8th) or 251 (1 Es 8th) accompanied Ezra. They are mentioned among 'the chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10th).

ADITHAIM (Jos 15th).—A town of Judah in the Shephelah. The site is unknown.

ADLAI.—The father of Shaphat, one of David's herdsmen, 1 Ch 27th.

ADMAH (Gn 10th 14th. 8, Dt 20th, Hos 11th).—One of the cities of the Ciccar or 'Round.' It is not noticed as overthrown in the account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19), but is included in their catastrophe in the two later passages.

ADMATHA (Est 1st).—One of the seven wise men or counsellors of Ahasuerus, who were granted admittance to the king's presence (cf. 2 K 25th).

ADMIRATION.—This word in AV means no more than wonder, as Rev 17th 'I wondered with great admiration' (RV 'with a great wonder').

ADNA ('pleasure').—1. A contemporary of Ezra, who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10th). 2. The head of the priestly house of Harim (Neh 12th).

ADNAH.—1. A Manassite officer of Saul who deserted to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12th). 2. An officer in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Ch 17th).

ADONI-BEZEK (perhaps a corrupted form of Adonī-zedek, Jos 10th 27th).—A king of Bezek (a different place from that mentioned in 1 S 11th), who was defeated by Simeon and Judah. The mutilation inflicted upon him—the cutting off of the thumbs and great toes—was in order to render him harmless, while retaining him as a trophy; but he died on reaching Jerusalem. Adoni-bezek boasted of having mutilated seventy kings in a similar manner. The passage (Jg 1st 7) which speaks of Adoni-bezek does not appear to be intact; the original form probably gave more details. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ADONIJAH ('Jah is Lord').—1. The fourth of the six sons of David who were born in Hebron; his mother was Hagith, a name which is possibly of Philistine origin (2 S 3rd). The story of Adonijah (typical of many an Oriental court intrigue) is recorded in 1 K 1. 21-26; as here recounted it permits of more than one interpretation, for that this passage has been subjected to an 'editorial' process can scarcely be doubted, and, in face of the difficulties of interpretation brought about by this, we are forced to reconstruct the course of events to some extent.

After the death of Absalom, Adonijah became the rightful heir to the throne; there was no sort of doubt about his right, it was taken for granted both by himself and by the people at large (1 K 2nd). But Bathsheba, it appears, was anxious to secure the succession for her son, Solomon; with this object in view, she, assisted by the prophet Nathan, heads a party at the court inimical to the claims of Adonijah. It would not have been long before the friends of Adonijah discovered the intrigue that was on foot; and Adonijah, learning the peril he was in of losing his rightful succession, conceals means for counteracting the machinations of his enemies. The old, trusted servants of the kingdom, Joab and Abiathar, rally round him, as one would expect; he gathers his friends together at the stone of Zoheleth, and by the visible act of sacrificing, proclaims his kingship; this last was, however an act of unwisdom, as it gave a handle to his enemies, for king David was still alive. These, naturally on the alert, represent the gathering to David, now very aged, as an attempt to usurp the throne while he is yet alive; Bathsheba reminds David of his promise that Solomon, her son, should succeed him on the throne (1¹⁷) [this may or may not have been the case; there is no reference to it elsewhere, and it certainly does not accord with what we read in 1^a 2³⁵]; David, remembering perhaps the rebellion of Absalom (whom Adonijah seems to have resembled in temperament as well as in outward appearance), is easily prevailed upon to transfer the succession to Solomon (1^{36f}). Even so it is very doubtful whether Bathsheba would have succeeded in her plan had it not been that she was enabled to gain Benaiah to her side; as captain of the king's body-guard (the Cherethites and Pelethites), Benaiah was the man upon whom the issue really depended, for he commanded the only armed troops that were immediately available. In an emergency such as this, everything would depend upon who could strike the first decisive blow. Had the old commander-in-chief Joab had time to assemble his forces, no doubt the issue would have been different; but Bathsheba and her friends had laid their plans too well, and they won the day. Adonijah is 'pardoned' (1³²⁻³³); it would have been dangerous, owing to the attitude of the people (2¹⁶), to put him to death until Solomon was secure on the throne; but as he was rightful heir, the safety of Solomon's throne could never be guaranteed as long as Adonijah was alive. Bathsheba was not the woman to be oblivious of this fact, accordingly she recommences her intrigues, she represents to Solomon that Adonijah is desirous of marrying Abishag the Shunammite, the maiden who was brought to David in his old age (1³⁻⁴), and who, according to Oriental ideas, was regarded as one of the royal wives. Such a desire was naturally interpreted by Solomon as an intention of seeking 'he kingdom' (2²³), and self-preservation compelled him to decree Adonijah's death, a sentence which was carried out by Benaiah (v. 25).

The above is not in entire accord with the Biblical account, which in its present form gives rise to a number of serious difficulties. We shall mention but two of these. The request which Adonijah asks Bathsheba to convey (2¹⁷) was the most grievous insult that could have been offered to the king; Adonijah would have known precisely what the result would be, viz. death to himself, unless supported by an army; but there is no hint that he contemplated an armed rising. Secondly, Bathsheba is quite the last person he would have asked to prefer this request; as mother of the king, and prime mover in the successful conspiracy which had robbed him of his succession, he would know better than to place himself so gratuitously within her power.

Adonijah is one of those men whose cruel fate and tragic death, both undeserved, must call forth deep sympathy and commiseration.

2. Perhaps = Adonikam, one of those that sealed the covenant (Neh 9³⁸ 10¹⁶).

3. One of those sent, in the third year of Jehoshaphat, to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁹⁻¹⁰). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ADONIKAM ('my Lord has arisen'), Ezr 2¹³ 8¹³, Neh 7¹⁸, 1 Es 5¹⁴ 8³⁹. The head of a Jewish family after the Exile; apparently called in Neh 10¹⁶ Adonijah.

ADONIRAM, ADORAM.—The latter name occurs 2 S 20²⁴, 1 K 12¹⁸, and is probably a corruption of Adoniram. Adoniram superintended the levies employed in the public works during the reigns of David, Solomon, and Rehoboam. He was stoned to death by the rebellious Israelites when sent to them by Rehoboam (1 K 12¹⁹).

ADONIS.—The phrase rendered by EV 'pleasant plants', and by RVm 'plantings of Adonis' (Is 17¹⁰), alludes to the miniature gardens whose rapid decline symbolized the death of this god, or rather the spring verdure of which he is a personification. This phase of the myth, which the Greeks obtained from the Semitic Tammuz cult, through the Phœnicians, where the god was worshipped under the title of Adon ('lord'), is used by Isaiah to depict the fading hope of Israel. See TAMMUZ. N. KOENIG.

ADONI-ZEDEK.—King of Jerusalem at the time of the invasion of Canaan by the Israelites under Joshua. After the Gibeonites had succeeded in making a league with Israel, he induced four other kings to unite with him against the invaders. Joshua came unexpectedly upon the allied kings, and utterly routed them. They were discovered in a cave at Makkedah, and brought before Joshua, who ordered them to be slain. Their bodies were hung up until the evening, when they were taken down and flung into the cave where they had hid themselves. The mouth of the cave was filled up with great stones (Jos 10¹⁻²⁷). Some have identified Adoni-zedek with Adoni-bezek of Jg 1⁸.

ADOPTION.—The term 'adoption' is found five times in St. Paul's letters (Ro 8¹⁵, 22⁹, Gal 4⁵, Eph 1⁵), and not elsewhere in the NT. In Ro 9⁴ reference is made to the favoured position of the Jews as the chosen people. To them belonged the adoption, the position of sons (Ex 4²²). In the remaining passages St. Paul uses the word to describe the privileges of the Christian as opposed to the unbeliever. He is trying, as a rule, to bring home to Gentile readers the great change wrought by the coming of Christ. Though W. M. Ramsay has attempted to identify peculiarities of Syro-Greek law in Gal 4, and though it is true that 'no word is more common in Greek inscriptions of Hellenistic times: the idea like the word is native Greek,' yet St. Paul's use of the term seems to be based on Roman law. See Hastings' EKE, s.v.

Adoption in Roman law could be effected by a modified form of the method of sale known as mancipation. 'The Roman Mancipation required the presence, first, of all of the parties, the vendor and the vendee. . . . There were also no less than five witnesses; and an anomalous personage, the libripens, who brought with him a pair of scales to weigh the uncoined copper money of Rome. Certain formal gestures were made and sentences pronounced. The (purchaser) simulated the payment of a price by striking the scales with a piece of money, and the (vendor) ratified what had been done in a set form of words' (Maine, Ancient Law, vi.). The witnesses were necessary, especially in the age before written documents, to vouch for the regularity of the procedure, and to ensure the genuineness of the transaction.

Some of the details of the procedure are said to be reflected in the language of St. Paul. To redeem those under the law' (Gal 4⁵) suggests that God's action in sending His Son to buy out mankind from slavery to the law, may be illustrated by the adopting parent's purchase of a son from his natural father.

Again, Dr. W. F. Ball (Contemp. Rev., 1891) has pointed out that the work of the Spirit (Ro 8¹⁴) is parallel to the place of the five witnesses in the process of adoption. The reality of God's adoption is assured by the Spirit's witness. Dr. Ball brings out the general force of the metaphor thus. Any one who was made a son by adoption, severed all his former ties. Even his debts appear to have been cancelled. 'The adopted person became in the eyes of the law a new creature. He was born again into a new family. By the aid of this figure, the Gentile convert was enabled to realize in a vivid manner the fatherhood of God, brotherhood of the faithful, the obliteration of past penalties, the right to the mystic inheritance.' The figure of adoption describes clearly the effect of God's revelation of Himself as Father.

St. Paul speaks of adoption, as both present (Ro 8¹⁴) and future (v. 23). With Pfeiderer we must distinguish three moments in adoption. It involves here and now, freedom from the Law, and the possession of the spirit of adoption which enables us to address God as our Father. Adoption will be completed by the redemption of our body, the inheritance with Christ in glory. 'Believers have this blessing (adoption) already, but only in an inward relation and as Divine right, with which, however, the objective and real state does not yet correspond' (Meyer on Ro 8²³). With St. Paul's view of adoption now and adoption hereafter compare 1 Jn 3². In Eph 1⁵ adoption seems to mean that conforming to the character of Christ which begins here and is to be perfected in the future.

That the word 'adoption' does not represent believers as children of God by nature, is undeniable. But it would be a mistake to press the term as giving a complete account of St. Paul's views of the relations of God to man. Roman law afforded St. Paul illustrations rather than theories. It is not clear whether in Ro 8¹⁵ he conceives the spirit of sonship which cries 'Abba, Father,' to be received in baptism or at conversion, or on the other hand to be the natural cry of the human heart. But in any case, he has found the love of God in Christ, and the change in his life is such that the complete change produced in a man's condition by adoption is only a pale reflex of the Apostle's experience. See, further, INHERITANCE. H. G. WOOD.

ADORA (1 Mac 13³⁰).—The same as Adoraim.

ADORAIM (2 Ch 11⁹).—A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam on the S.W. of his mountain kingdom; now Dāra, a small village at the edge of the mountains W. of Hebron.

ADORAM.—See ADONIRAM.

ADORATION.—The word is not found in AV or RV, and even for the verb RV substitutes 'worship' in Bel 4; but both the idea and its expression in act are frequent.

Amongst the Hebrews the postures and gestures expressive of adoration underwent slight change in the course of time. Kissing the statue of a god (1 K 19¹⁸, Hos 13⁴; cf. Job 31²⁷) was an early Arab custom, and became a technical meaning of adoratio amongst the Romans; but in this usage the sense is identical with that of worship. Adoration proper was expressed by prostration to the ground, or even by lying prone with the face touching the ground (Gn 17³, Jos 5¹⁴, Job 1²⁰, Ps 95⁶ 99⁸, Dn 3⁶). As elsewhere, this posture was not at first confined to intercourse with God. As an act of special courtesy it was adopted towards kings (2 S 14⁴), towards strangers of mysterious quality (Gn 18²), as an expression of close and respectful attachment (1 S 20⁴¹), or with the design to conciliate (Gn 33³, 1 S 25²³, Est 8⁴, Mt 18²⁸), or to honour (2 K 4³⁷). 'Sat before the Lord' (2 S 7¹⁸) may refer to a special and solemn mode of sitting, as in 1 K 18⁴; the Arabs are said to have sat during a part of their worship in such a way that the head could easily be bent forward and made to touch the ground.

Outside the Christian sphere, prostration continued in the East to be a mark of submission and homage, rendered to such men as were for any reason or even by convention invested in thought with Divine qualities or powers. The NT, by example and less frequently by precept, confines this fullest mode of worship to God, and protests against its use towards men. Jairus' act (Mk 5²², Lk 8⁴¹) was prompted by intense yearning, a father's self-abandonment in the sore sickness of his child, and must not be taken as implying a full recognition of Christ's Divinity. Like Mary's posture at Bethany (Jn 11²⁵), it was a preparation for the attitude of the disciples after their visit to the empty tomb (Mt 28⁹). Whatever Cornelius intended (Ac 10²⁵), Peter found an opportunity to lay down the rule that no man under any circumstances is an appropriate object of adoration; and John repeats that rule twice not far from the end of Scripture (Rev 19¹⁰ 22⁸). The attempt to alienate from God His peculiar honours is a work of Satan (Mt 4⁹); and adoration naturally follows a conviction of the presence of God (1 Co 14¹⁶). R. W. MOSS.

ADRAMMELECH.—1. Adrammelech and Anamme-lech (wh. see), the gods of Sepharvaim to whom the colonists, brought to Samaria from Sepharvaim, burnt their children in the fire (2 K 17³¹). There is no good explanation of the name: it was once supposed to be for Adar-malik, 'Adar the prince.' But Adar is not known to be a Babylonian god, and compound Divine names are practically unknown, nor were human sacrifices offered to Babylonian gods.

2. Adrammelech and Sharezer (wh. see) are given in 2 K 19¹⁷ as the sons of Sennacherib who murdered their father. [The Kethibh of Kings omits 'his sons']. The Babylonian Chronicle says: 'On the 20th of Tebet, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was killed by his son in an insurrection'; and all other native sources agree in ascribing the murder to one son, but do not name him. Adrammelech is impossible as an Assyrian personal name, and probably arises here from some corruption of the text. The sons of Sennacherib known to us are Ashur-nādin-shum, king of Babylon, b.c. 700-694; Esarhaddon, who succeeded his father, b.c. 681; Ardi-Bēlit, Crown Prince, b.c. 694; Ashur-shum-ushabshi, for whom Sennacherib built a palace in Tarbisi; Ashur-ilu-muballitsu, for whom Sennacherib built a palace in Asshur; and Shar-etir-Ashur. Possibly Ardi-Bēlit is intended. C. H. W. JOHNS.

ADRAMYTTEIUM.—A town of Mysia (in the Roman province of Asia) on the Adramyttene Gulf, originally a native State, and only later Hellenized by the Delians, who had been driven away from home by the Athenians (422 b.c.). In Roman times it was a place of considerable importance both politically and intellectually. It possessed a harbour, and a ship belonging to the place carried St. Paul from Cæsarea by Sidon and Cyprus to Myra (Ac 27⁴⁻⁶). A. SOUTER.

ADRIA (more correctly Hadria).—The name was at first confined to the northern part of what we call the Adriatic Sea, or to a stretch of land near that, and was derived from a once important Etruscan city, Atria, situated at the mouth of the Po. The rest of what we call the Adriatic Sea appears to have been at that time included in the term Ionian Sea or Ionian Gulf. It was only later, with the growth of the Syracusan colonies on the coasts of Italy and Illyria, that the name 'Hadria' came to include the whole Adriatic, and even then, at first, it was the practice to call the southernmost part the Ionian Sea. This reduction of the Ionian Sea to a part of Hadria led, when the name 'Ionian Sea' was transferred to the Sicilian Sea in the W. of Greece, to a misuse of the term 'Hadria.' It was extended to include the Tarentine Gulf, the Sicilian Sea, the Corinthian Gulf, and even the waters between Crete and Malta, as in Ac 27⁷. A. SOUTER.

ADRIEL.—Son of Barzillai, the Meholathite. He married Merab, the eldest daughter of Saul, who should have been given to David as the slayer of Goliath (1 S 18¹⁹, 2 S 21⁸ [in the latter 'Michal' is a mistake for 'Merab']]).

ADUEL.—An ancestor of Tobit, To 1¹; a variant form of Adiel, 1 Ch 4²⁶.

ADULLAM.—A city in the Shephelah, assigned to Judah; named between Jarmuth and Socoh (Jos 15³⁶ etc.). It is probably the modern 'Id el-Ma', about 8 miles N.W. of Beit Jibrin. Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 11⁷), and the children of Judah returned to it after the captivity (Neh 11²⁰). The Cave of Adullam, the refuge of David (1 S 22¹ etc.), must have been one of those in the adjoining valley. Adullamite (Gn 38¹ etc.)=an inhabitant of Adullam. W. EWING.

ADULTERY.—See CRIMES, MARRIAGE.

ADUMMIM. THE ASCENT OF (Jos 15⁷ 18¹⁷), is the steep pass in which the road ascends from Jericho to Jerusalem. Its modern name, Tal'at ed-Dumm, 'the ascent of blood' or 'red,' is most probably due to the red marl which is so distinctive a feature of the pass

In this pass, notorious for robberies and murders, is the traditional 'inn' of Lk 10⁴.

ADVENT.—See PAROUSIA.

ADVERTISE.—Ru 4¹ 'I thought to advertise thee,' i.e. inform thee; so Nu 24⁴.

ADVOCATE (Gr. paraklētos).—The word occurs only in the writings of St. John: four times in his Gospel (14¹⁶, 26 15²⁶ 16⁷) of the Holy Spirit, and once in his 1st Epistle (2¹) of Jesus. It is unfortunate that our English Versions have rendered it in the former 'Comforter' (RVm 'or Advocate, or Helper, Gr. Paraclete') and in the latter 'Advocate' (RVm 'or Comforter, or Helper, Gr. Paraclete').

'Comforter,' though a true and beautiful designation of the Holy Spirit, is an impossible rendering. It is true that paraklēin means either 'comfort' (Mt 5⁴, 2 Co 1⁷ 7⁴) or 'call to one's side' (Ac 28²⁰), but paraklētos must be associated with the latter signification. It is a passive form, and denotes not 'one who comforts (paraklētoi)' but 'one who is called in to aid (paraklētai).' It was a forensic term, signifying the counsel for the defence and corresponding exactly to our 'advocate' (Lat. advocatus). Singularly enough, the Greek-speaking Fathers mostly took the word in the impossible sense of 'Comforter,' influenced perhaps by the false analogy of Menahem (Consolator), a Jewish name for the Messiah. Cf. Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. xvi. 20: 'He is called Parakletos because He comforts (paraklētoi) and consoles and helps our infirmity.' Were it understood in its literal sense of 'Strengtheners' (Comfortors), 'Comforter' would be a fair rendering; but as a matter of fact it originated in an error: nor does it suggest the true idea to the English reader. It should be observed that 'comfortless' in Jn 14¹⁸ lends it no support. RV gives 'desolate'; literally, as in the margin of both Versions, 'orphans.'

The substitution of 'Advocate' for 'Comforter' reveals a wealth of meaning in our Lord's address to the Eleven on that night in which He was betrayed. During His earthly ministry He had been God's Advocate with men, pleading God's cause with them and seeking to win them for Him. He was going away, but God would not be left without an Advocate on the earth. 'I will pray the Father, and another Advocate he will give you, that he may be with you for ever—the Spirit of Truth.' Not received, because unrecognized, by the unspiritual world, the Advocate would be recognized and welcomed by believers (Jn 14¹⁸, 17. 26. 26). And He would testify to them about Jesus, the unseen Lord, and they would repeat His testimony to the world (15²⁶, 27). And He would make their testimony effective, 'convicting the world regarding sin, righteousness, and judgment' (16⁸⁻¹¹).

Jesus told the Eleven that it was 'expedient for them that he should go away,' since His departure was the condition of the advent of the Advocate (16⁷); and 1 Jn 2¹ furnishes a profound commentary on this declaration. Jesus in the days of His flesh was God's Advocate on the earth, pleading with men for God. The Holy Spirit has taken His place, and performs this office. But Jesus is still an Advocate. He is the Advocate of sinners up in heaven, pleading their cause with God, and, in the language of St. Paul (Ro 8³⁴), 'making intercession for them.'

And thus it was expedient for us that He should go away, that we might enjoy a double advocacy—the Holy Spirit's here, pleading with us for God; and that of Jesus in the court of heaven, pleading with God for us. There are three dispensations in the history of redemption, each richer and fuller than the last: (1) The OT dispensation, under which men knew only of God in high heaven; (2) that of the Incarnation, under which the Father came near to men in Jesus Christ and by His gracious advocacy appealed to their hearts; (3) that of the Holy Spirit, under which the Holy Spirit is the Father's Advocate here, and Jesus 'our Advocate above, our Friend before the throne of love.'

DAVID SMITH.

AEDIAS (1 Es 9²⁷).—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives. The name is probably a corruption for Elijah of Ezr 10²⁸.

AENEAS.—The name of a paralytic at Lydda who was cured by Peter (Ac 9³³, 34).

ENON.—Jn 3²⁸, meaning 'springs'; a site near Sallim [wh. see].

ESORA (Jth 4⁴).—An unknown Samaritan town, possibly mod. Asirch, N.E. of Shechem.

AGABUS.—A Christian prophet of Jerusalem (Ac 11²⁷, 21¹⁰⁻¹¹), whose prediction of a famine over the (civilized) world occasioned the sending of alms from Antioch to Jerusalem. The famine happened, not simultaneously in all countries, in Claudius' reign (Suetonius, Tacitus). Agabus also foretold St. Paul's imprisonment, by binding his feet and hands with the Apostle's girdle (cf. Jer 13¹²⁻¹³). A. J. MACLEAN.

AGADĒ (formerly but erroneously read Aganē).—A city of Northern Babylonia and the capital of Sargon, the founder of the first Semitic empire (c. B.C. 3800). As was first discovered by George Smith, Agadē was the Semitic Akkadū (see AKKAD). It stood near Sippara or Sepharvaim (wh. see), and may have been in later times a suburb of the latter town. A. H. SAYCE.

AGAG.—1. Nu 24⁷, probably a copyist's error: LXX has Gog. 2. 1 S 15, the king of Amalek, whom Saul defeated and spared; some Gr. MSS name his father Aser (15²³). Whether he met his fate bravely or timidly cannot be determined from the extant text (v. 32). Samuel considered him to be under the ban of extermination, and therefore killed him as a religious act (v. 33). J. TAYLOR.

AGAGITE.—The designation of Haman (Est 3¹, 10 8³, 5 9²⁴). Josephus (Ant. xi. vi. 5) calls him an Amalekite. The epithet in Esther indicates that, as Agag was Saul's adversary, so Haman was the foe of this other Benjamite. The LXX reads Bugaios, 3¹ 8³, omits at 3¹⁰, and at 9²⁴ 16¹⁰ has Macedonian, a word of evil connotation after Antiochus Epiphanes. J. TAYLOR.

AGAIN.—The Eng. word 'again' means in AV either 'a second time,' as Ph 4¹⁸, 'ye sent once and again'; or 'back,' as in Mt 11¹⁴ 'go and show John again those things which ye do hear' (i.e. 'go back and show John').

AGAPE.—See LOVE FEAST.

AGAR.—The sons of Agar are mentioned in Bar 3²²; they are called Hagarenes in Ps 83⁴, and Hagrites in 1 Ch 5¹⁹, 20 27¹. Their country lay east of Gilead.

AGATE.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

AGE, AGED, OLD AGE.—In the OT advancing age is represented by words of different root-meanings. The aged man is zāqen, perhaps 'grey-bearded' (Gn 48¹⁰, 2 S 19²², Job 12²⁰ 32⁹, Ps 71¹⁸, Jer 6¹¹); 'old age' is also śēbhāh, i.e. 'hoary-headedness' (Gn 15¹⁴, 1 K 14⁴; cf. Gn 42³⁸, Ps 71¹⁸). According to the Mishna (Ab. v. 21) the latter word implies a greater age (70) than the former (60). But in Job 15¹⁰ (cf. 29⁹) yāshtsh, i.e. 'very aged,' marks a further advance in years, of which the sign is a withering of strength. Ps 90¹⁰ is the only passage in which a definite period is fixed for human life. The idea that 'hale old age' (keleah) is a blessing is expressed in Job 5²⁶; the contrast is furnished by the gloomy picture (30³) of the 'fathers' whose old age lacks vigour.

The wisdom of the old was proverbial (Job 12¹³ 32⁷), though there were exceptions (Job 32⁹, Ps 119¹⁰⁰). The experience of the older men fitted them for positions of trust and authority; hence by a natural transition of thought 'elders' became an official title Ex 3¹⁶, Ac 11³⁰. Respect is to be shown to the old (Lv 19³², Pr 23²²), and the decay of reverence for age is an evil omen (Dt 28⁵⁰, 1 K 12⁸, Is 47⁸). It was to the grandmother of Coed that the Hebrew women said 'he shall be . . . a nourisher of thine old age' (Ru 4¹⁵); the dutiful affection of children's children illumined the gracious message of Israel's God: 'even to old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs will I carry you' (Is 46⁴).

J. G. TASKER.

AGEE.—The father of Shammah, one of 'the Three' (2 S 23¹¹).

AGGABA (1 Es 5²⁹).—In Ezr 2⁴⁵ Hagabab, Neh 7⁴⁸ Hagaba.

AGGÆUS.—The form used in 1 Es 6¹ 7³ and 2 Es 1⁴⁰ for Haggal (wh. see).

AGIA (1 Es 5²⁴).—In Ezr 2⁵⁷, Neh 7⁵⁰ Hattil.

AGONY (Lk 22⁴⁴) is not a translation but a transliteration of the Greek agōnia, equivalent to St. Matthew's 'sorrowful and sore troubled' (26³⁷) and St. Mark's 'greatly amazed and sore troubled' (14³³). The word does not mean 'agony' in the English sense. Agōn was 'a contest,' and agōnia the trepidation of a combatant about to enter the lists. Christ's Agony in Gethsemane was the horror which overwhelmed Him as He faced the final ordeal. DAVID SMITH.

AGRAPHIA.—See UNWRITTEN SAYINGS.

AGRICULTURE.—Throughout the whole period of their national existence, agriculture was the principal occupation of the Hebrews. According to the priestly theory, the land was the property of J^h; His people enjoyed the usufruct (Lv 25²³). In actual practice, the bulk of the land was owned by the towns and village communities, each free husbandman having his allotted portion of the common lands. The remainder included the Crown lands and the estates of the nobility, at least under the monarchy. Husbandry—the Biblical term for agriculture (2 Ch 26¹⁰)—was highly esteemed, and was regarded as dating from the very earliest times (Gn 4²). It was J^h Himself who taught the husbandman his art (Is 28²⁶).

Of the wide range of topics embraced by agriculture in the wider significance of the term, some of the more important will be treated in separate articles, such as CART, FLAX, FOOD, GARDEN, OLIVE, OX, THORNS, VINE, etc. The present article will deal only with the more restricted field of the cultivation of the principal cereals. These were, in the first rank, wheat and barley; less important were the crops of millet and spelt, and those of the pulse family—lentils, beans, and the like.

1. The agricultural year began in the latter half of October, with the advent of the early rains, which soften the ground baked by the summer heat. Then the husbandman began to prepare his fields for the winter seed by means of the plough. From the details given in post-Biblical literature, it is evident that the Hebrew plough differed but little from its modern Syrian counterpart (see PEFSI, 1891). The essential part or 'body' of the latter, corresponding in position to the modern plough-tail or 'stilt,' consists of a piece of tough wood bent and pointed at the foot to receive an iron sheath or share (1 S 13²⁰), the upper end being furnished with a short cross-piece to serve as a handle. The pole is usually in two parts: one stout and curved, through the lower end of which the 'body' is passed just above the share; at the other end is attached the lighter part of the pole, through the upper end of which a stout pin is passed to serve as attachment for the yoke. The plough was usually drawn by two or more oxen (Am 6¹²), or by asses (Is 30²⁴), but the employment of one of each kind was forbidden (Dt 22¹⁰). The yoke is a short piece of wood—the bar of Lv 26¹³ (RV)—fitted with two pairs of converging pegs, the lower ends connected by thongs, to receive the necks of the draught animals. Two smaller pegs in the middle of the upper side hold in position a ring of willow, rope, or other material, which is passed over the end of the pole and kept in position by the pin above mentioned. As the ploughman required but one hand to guide the plough, the other was free to wield the ox-goad, a light wooden pole shod at one end with an iron spike wherewith to prick the oxen (cf. Ac 9⁵), and having at the other a small spade with which to clean the plough-share. Gardens, vineyards (Is 5⁶ RV), and parts too difficult to plough were worked with the hoe or mattock (Is 7²⁸).

The prevailing mode of sowing was by hand, as in the parable of the Sower, the seed being immediately ploughed in. It was possible, however, to combine both operations by fixing a seed-box to the plough-tail. The seed passed through an aperture at the bottom of the box and was conducted by a pipe along the tail. It thus fell into the drill behind the share and was immediately covered in. The patriarch Abraham was credited by Jewish legend with the invention of this form of seeding-plough (Bk. of Jubilees 11²⁶). This mode of sowing is probably referred to in Is 28²⁶ ('the wheat in rows' RV). There is no evidence that harrows were used for covering in the seed.

2. During the period of growth the crops were exposed to a variety of risks, such as the delay or scanty fall of the spring rains (the 'latter rain' of the OT, Am 4⁹), blasting by the hot sirocco wind, mildew, hail—these three are named together in Hag 2¹⁷; cf. Dt 28²², Am 4⁹—and worst of all a visitation of locusts. The productiveness of the soil naturally varied greatly (cf. Mt 13⁸). Under favourable conditions, as in the Hauran, wheat is said to yield a hundredfold return.

3. Owing to the wide range of climatic conditions in Palestine, the time of the harvest was not uniform, being earliest in the semi-tropical Jordan valley, and latest in the uplands of Galilee. The average harvest period, reckoned by the Hebrew legislation (Lv 23¹⁸, Dt 16²) to cover seven weeks, may be set down as from the middle of April to the beginning of June, the barley ripening about a fortnight sooner than the wheat.

The standing corn was reaped with the sickle (Dt 16⁹ RV), the stalks being cut considerably higher up than with us. The handfuls of ears were gathered into sheaves, and these into heaps (not into shocks) for transportation to the threshing-floor. The corners of the field were left to be reaped, and the fallen ears to be gleaned, by the poor and the stranger (Lv 19⁹, Dt 24¹⁹, Ru 2²⁸).

For small quantities the ears were stripped by beating with a stick (Ru 2¹⁷, Jg 6¹¹ RV), otherwise the threshing was done at the village threshing-floor. This was a large, specially prepared (Jer 51³³ RV) space on an elevated situation. Hither the corn was brought on asses or on a cart (Am 2¹³), and piled in heaps. Enough sheaves were drawn out to form a layer, 6 to 8 ft. wide, all round the heap. Over this layer several oxen, unmuzzled according to law (Dt 25⁴), and harnessed together as represented on the Egyptian monuments, might be driven. More effective work, however, was got from the threshing-drag and the threshing-wagon, both still in use in the East, the former being the favourite in Syria, the latter in Egypt. The former consists of two or three thick wooden planks held together by a couple of cross-pieces, the whole measuring from 5 to 7 ft. in length by 3 to 4 ft. in breadth. The underside of the drag is set with sharp pieces of hardstone (cf. Is 41¹⁶), which strip the ears as the drag, on which the driver sits or stands, is driven over the sheaves, and at the same time cut up the stalks into small lengths. The threshing-wagon is simply a wooden frame containing three or more rollers set with parallel metal discs, and supporting a seat for the driver. The former instrument was used by Araunah the Jebusite (2 S 24²²), while the latter is probably referred to in 'the threshing wheel' of Pr 20²⁶ (RV). Both are mentioned together in the original of Is 28²⁷.

After the threshing came the winnowing. By means of a five- or six-pronged fork, the 'fan' of the OT and NT, the mass of grain, chaff, and chopped straw is tossed into the air in the western evening breeze. The chaff is carried farthest away (Ps 14), the light morsels of straw to a shorter distance, while the heavy grains of wheat or barley fall at the winnow's feet. After being thoroughly sifted with a variety of sieves (Am 9², Is 30²⁵), the grain was stored in jars for immediate use, and in cisterns (Jer 41⁵), or in specially constructed granaries, the 'barns' of Mt 6⁹.

4. Of several important matters, such as irrigation, the terracing of slopes, manuring of the fields, the conditions of lease, etc.—regarding which Vogelstein's treatise Die Landwirtschaft in Palästina is a mine of information for the Roman period—there is little direct evidence in Scripture. Agriculture, as is natural, bulks largely in the legislative codes of the Pentateuch. Some of the provisions have already been cited. To these may be added the solemn injunction against removing a neighbour's 'landmarks,' the upright stones marking the boundaries of his fields (Dt 19¹⁷ 27¹⁷), the humanitarian provision regarding strayed cattle (Ex 23⁴, Dt 22¹⁰), the law that every field must lie fallow for one year in seven (Ex 23¹⁰; see, for later development, SABBATICAL YEAR), the law forbidding the breeding of hybrids and the sowing of a field with two kinds of seed (Lv 19¹⁹ RV), and the far-reaching provision as to the inalienability of the land (Lv 25³⁸).

The fact that no department of human activity has enriched the language of Scripture, and in consequence the language of the spiritual life in all after ages, with so many appropriate figures of speech, is a striking testimony to the place occupied by agriculture in the life and thought of the Hebrew people. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AGRIPPA.—See HEROD, NOS. 6, 7.

AGUE.—See MEDICINE.

AGUR.—Son of Jakoh; author of the whole or part of Pr 30, one of the latest sections of the book. His name may signify 'hurdler' or 'assembler'; cf. Vulg. 'Verba Congregantis plū Vocantis.' Some have thought that massa (AV 'the prophecy,' RV 'the oracle'), which otherwise is out of place, is the name of his country (Gu 25¹⁴). J. TAYLOR.

AHAB.—1. Son of Omri, and the most noted member of his dynasty, king of Israel from about 875 to about 853 B.C. The account of him in our Book of Kings is drawn from two separate sources, one of which views him more favourably than the other. From the secular point of view he was an able and energetic prince; from the religious point of view he was a dangerous innovator, and a patron of foreign gods. His alliance with the Phœnicians was cemented by his marriage with Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre (1 K 16³¹), who was also, if we may trust Josephus, priest of Astarte. At a later date Ahab entered into alliance with Judah, giving his daughter Athaliah in marriage to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat (2 K 8¹⁸). His wealth is indicated by the ivory palace which he built (1 K 21²² 22³⁹).

The reign of Ahab was marked by frequent wars with the Syrian kingdom of Damascus. Benhadad, the king of that country, was so successful that he claimed suzerainty over Israel—a claim which Ahab was at first disposed to admit (1 K 20²⁶). But when Benhadad went so far as to threaten Samaria with indiscriminate plunder, Ahab resisted. In two campaigns he defeated the invaders, even taking their haughty leader prisoner. Contrary to the advice of the prophetic party, he treated his captive magnanimously, and concluded an alliance with him, stipulating only that the cities formerly taken from Israel should be restored. The alliance was one for trade and commerce, each party having bazaars assigned him in the capital of the other (1 K 20³¹). It is not improbable also that common measures of defence were planned against the Assyrians, who were showing hostile intentions in the region of the Lebanon. In the battle of Karkar, which was fought against these invaders in the year 854, Ahab was present with ten thousand troops. This we learn from the Assyrian inscriptions.

The religious innovation for which Ahab is held responsible by the Hebrew writers was the introduction of the Phœnician Baal as one of the gods of Israel. It is clear that Ahab had no idea of displacing Jahweh altogether, for he gave his children names which indicated his devotion to Him. But to please his wife he allowed her to introduce and foster the worship of her own divinities. Her thought was that with the religion of her own country she would introduce its more advanced civilization. The champion of Jahweh's exclusive right to the worship of Israel was Elijah. This prophet, by his bold challenge to the priests of Baal, roused the anger of Jezebel, and was obliged to flee the country (1 K 17–19). Other prophets do not seem to have been disturbed, for we find them at the court of Ahab in the last year of his life (22⁶). These, however, were subservient to the crown, while Elijah was not only a protestant against religious changes, but the champion of the common people, whose rights were so signally violated in the case of Naboth.

Ahab died fighting for his people. The Syrian war had again broken out—apparently because Benhadad had not kept his agreement. Ahab therefore tried to recover Ramoth-gilead, being assisted by Jehoshaphat of Judah. In the first encounter Ahab was slain, his reputation for courage being vindicated by the direction of his adversary to his soldiers—'Fight neither with small nor with great, but only with the king of Israel' (1 K 22³¹).

2. A false prophet 'roasted in the fire' by the king of Babylon (Jer 29²¹). H. P. SMITH.

AHARAH.—See AHIRAM.

AHARHEL.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4⁸).

AHASBAI.—Father of Eliphelet (2 S 23³⁴), and a member of the family of Maacah, settled at Beth-maacah (20¹⁴), or a native of the Syrian kingdom of Maacah (10⁶–8).

AHASUERUS (old Pers. Khsayārshā).—The Persian king (B.C. 485–465) known to Greek history as Xerxes. Complaints against the Jews were addressed to him (Ezr 4⁶). It is he who figures in the Book of Esther; Dn 9¹ erroneously makes him father of Darius the Mede, confusing the latter with Darius Hystaspis, the father of Xerxes. The Ahasuerus of To 14¹⁰ is Cyaxares. J. TAYLOR.

AHAVA was a settlement in Babylonia lying along a stream of the same name, probably a large canal near the Euphrates. None of the conjectures as to the exact locality can be verified. It was here that Ezra mustered his people before their departure for Jerusalem (Ezr 8¹⁶–21–31). Some district north or north-west of Babylon, near the northern boundary of Babylonia, is most probable. J. F. McCURRY.

AHAZ, son and successor of Jotham, king of Judah, came to the throne about B.C. 734. The only notable event of his reign, so far as we know, was the invasion made by his northern neighbours, Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus. These two kings had made an alliance against the Assyrians, and were trying to compel Ahab to join the coalition. His refusal so exasperated them that they planned his deposition and the appointment of a creature of their own to the throne. Ahab did not venture to take the field, but shut himself up in Jerusalem and strengthened its fortifications. It was perhaps at this time of need that he sacrificed his son as a burnt-offering to Jahweh. Isaiah tried to encourage the faint-hearted king, pointing out that his enemies had no prospect of success or even of long existence. But Ahab had more faith in political measures than in the prophetic word. He sent a message to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, submitting himself unreservedly to him. The embassy carried substantial evidence o passage in the shape of all the gold and silver from the palace treasury and from the Temple (2 K 16, 18, 17).

Tiglath-pileser was already on the march, and at once laid siege to Damascus, thus freeing Jerusalem from its enemies. Two years later the Assyrian king entered Damascus, and was visited there by Ahaz. The result of the visit was the construction of a new altar for the Temple at Jerusalem, and apparently the introduction of Assyrian divinities (2 K 16^{10f.}). H. P. SMITH.

AHAZIAH.—Two kings of this name are mentioned in the OT, one in each of the Israelite kingdoms.

1. Ahaziah of Israel was the son of Ahab, and ruled after him only two years or parts of years. He is said to have been a worshipper of Baal, that is, to have continued the religious policy of his father. By a fall from a window of his palace he was seriously injured, and, after lingering awhile, died from the accident. The Moabites, who had been subject to Israel, took this opportunity to revolt. Ahaziah is accused of sending messengers to inquire of the celebrated oracle at Ekron, and is said unexpectedly to have received his answer from Elijah (2 K 1).

2. Ahaziah of Judah was son of Jehoram and grandson of Jehoshaphat. Under the influence of his mother, who was a daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, it is not surprising to read that he walked in the ways of Ahab. All that we know of him is that he continued the league with Israel, and that, going to visit his uncle Jehoram in Jezreel, he was involved in his fate at the revolt of Jehu (2 K 9²⁷). H. P. SMITH.

AHBAN.—A Judahite, son of Abishur (1 Ch 2²⁹).

AHER ('another').—A Benjamite (1 Ch 7¹²).

AHI ('brother').—1. A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹⁵). 2. An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁴). But the reading is in neither case free from doubt.

AHIAH.—See AHIJAH.

AHIAM.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11³⁵).

AHIAN ('fraternal').—A Manassite, described as 'son of Shemida' (1 Ch 7¹⁹); but the name is scarcely that of an individual; note in the context Ablezer and Shechem, and cf. Nu 26^{31f.}

AHIEZER ('brother is help').—1. Son of Ammihaddai, one of the tribal princes who represented Dan at the census and on certain other occasions (Nu 1¹² 2²⁵ 7⁵⁴. 71 10²⁸ (P)). 2. The chief of the Benjamite archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹⁻³).

AHIHUD ('brother is majesty').—1. The prince of the tribe of Asher (Nu 34²⁷ (P)). 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁶ 7).

AHIJAH.—1. 1 S 14³. 18 (AV Ahiiah), a priest, son of Ahitub, who had charge of the oracular ephod and consulted it for Saul [read 'ephod' for 'ark' at v. 18]. Ahijah is probably to be identified with Ahimelech (21¹). 2. 1 K 4², one of Solomon's secretaries, who conducted the king's correspondence and wrote out his decrees. His father Shisha seems to have held the same office under David. 3. 1 K 12^{29f.} 12¹⁵, 2 Ch 10¹⁴, a prophet of Shiloh, who foretold the division of the kingdom and the elevation of Jeroboam. Subsequently he predicted the death of Jeroboam's son (1 K 14²⁸). 4. 1 K 15²⁷. 33, father of Baasha. 5. 1 Ch 2³⁶ has an Ahijah, son of Jerahmeel, but is hopelessly corrupt. The LXX gets rid of the name. 6. 1 Ch 8⁷ (AV Ahiiah), son of Ehud, a Benjamite: at v. 4 Ahoah, but LXX Ahiyah. 7. 1 Ch 11³⁵, one of David's heroes, from Palon, an unknown locality: perhaps Giloh should be read, seeing that Palon has already been mentioned (v. 27). 8. 1 Ch 26²⁰, a Levite, overseer of the Temple treasures. But we ought probably to substitute the words, 'their brethren.' 9. Neh 10³² (RV Ahiiah), a layman who joined Nehemiah in signing the covenant. J. TAYLOR.

AHIKAM.—One of the deputation sent by king Josiah to Huldah the prophetess (2 K 22¹². 14, 2 Ch 34²⁰). Later he used his influence to protect Jeremiah from the violence of the populace during the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer 26²⁴).

AHIUD.—1. Father of Jehoshaphat, the chronicler under David and Solomon (2 S 8¹⁸ 20²⁴, 1 K 4², 1 Ch 18²⁴). 2. Father of Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4¹²).

AHIMAAS.—1. Saul's father-in-law (1 S 14⁴⁰). 2. Son of Zadok. He and Jonathan were stationed outside Jerusalem to learn Absalom's plans; after an adventurous journey they succeeded in warning David (2 S 15²⁷. 30 17¹⁷⁻²¹). Ahimaas was eager to carry the tidings of Absalom's defeat; but Joab preferred to send by an Ethiopian slave the unwelcome news of the prince's death. Obtaining leave to follow, Ahimaas outstripped this man, was recognized by the watchman through the style of his running, but left the Ethiopian to disclose the worst (2 S 18¹⁹⁻³²). It may be the same person who appears later as Solomon's son-in-law and commissioner in Naphtali (1 K 4¹⁸). J. TAYLOR.

AHIMAN.—1. One of the sons of Anak, at Hebron (Nu 13²²): the three clans, of which this was one, were either destroyed by Judah (Jg 1¹⁰), or expelled by the clan Caleb (Jos 15¹⁴). 2. A family of Levites who had charge of that gate of the Temple through which the king entered (1 Ch 9^{17f.}). J. TAYLOR.

AHIMELECH.—1. Son of Ahitub, and grandson of Phinehas. He either succeeded his brother Ahijah in the priesthood, or more probably was the same person under another name (1 S 14³⁻¹⁸). For his fate see Dago. In 2 S 8¹⁷ and 1 Ch 18¹⁶ 24⁴ the names of Aoliathar and Ahimelech have been transposed. 2. A Hittite, who joined David when a fugitive (1 S 26⁵).

AHIMOTH.—A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 6²⁵).

AHINADAB.—Son of Iddo, one of the 12 commissariat officers appointed by Solomon (1 K 4¹⁴).

AHINOAM.—1. Daughter of Ahimaaz and wife of Saul (1 S 14⁵⁰). 2. A Jezreelitess whom David married after Michal had been taken from him. She was the mother of David's firstborn, Amnon (1 S 25⁴³ 27³ 30⁴, 2 S 2² 3², 1 Ch 3¹).

AHIO.—1. Son of Abinadab (No. 3), and brother of Uzzah. He helped to drive the cart on which the ark was placed when removed from Abinadab's house (2 S 6³. 4, 1 Ch 13⁷). 2. A son of Jeiel, and brother of Kish, the father of Saul (1 Ch 8³¹ 9²⁷). 3. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹⁴).

AHIRA.—Prince of Naphtali, named at the census and on certain other occasions (Nu 1¹⁴ 22²⁹ 7⁷⁸. 33 10²⁷ (P)).

AHIRAM.—The eponym of a Benjamite family—the Ahiramites, Nu 26³⁸ (P). The name occurs in the corrupt forms Ehi in Gn 46²¹ (P), and Aharah in 1 Ch 8¹.

AHISAMACH.—A Danite, father of Oholiab (Ex 31³⁵ 38²² (P)).

AHISHAHAR.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 7¹⁰).

AHISHAR.—Superintendent of Solomon's household (1 K 4⁶).

AHITHOPHEL.—David's counsellor (2 S 15¹², 1 Ch 27³³), whose advice was deemed infallible (2 S 16²³). Being Bathsheba's grandfather, he had been alienated by David's criminal conduct (11⁸ 23³⁴), and readily joined Absalom (15¹²). Ahithophel advised the prince to take possession of the royal harem, thus declaring his father's deposition, and begged for a body of men with whom he might at once overtake and destroy the fugitive monarch (17¹⁻³). Hushai thwarted this move (17¹¹). Disgusted at the collapse of his influence, and foreseeing that this lack of enterprise meant the failure of the insurrection, Ahithophel withdrew set his affairs in order, and hanged himself (17²³). J. TAYLOR.

AHITOB (1 Es 8²).—An ancestor of Ezra, son of Amarias and father of Sadduk. See AHITUB, No. 3.

AHITUB.—1. Son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli, the father of Ahimelech or Ahijah, the priest who was put to death by Saul (1 S 14² 22⁹ 30). 2. Acc. to 2 S 8¹⁷ (= 1 Ch 18¹⁶) the father, acc. to 1 Ch 9¹¹, Neh 11¹¹ the grandfather, of Zadok the priest who was contemporary with David and Solomon. It is very doubtful, however, whether the name Ahitub here is not due to a copyist's error. The text of 2 S 8¹⁷ should probably run: 'and Zadok and Abiathar the son of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub.' 3. Even more doubt attaches to another Ahitub, father of another Zadok (1 Ch 6¹¹ 12; 1 S 1 Es 8², 2 Es 1¹). 4. An ancestor of Judith, Jth 8¹.

AHLAB.—A city of Asher (Jg 13¹). The site has been identified with the later Gush Halab or Giscala, now el-Jish in Upper Galilee; but this is, of course, uncertain.

AHLAI.—1. The daughter (?) of Sheshan (1 Ch 2³¹, cf. v. 34). 2. The father of Zabad, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11⁴).

AHOAH.—Son of Bela, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁴). See AHIJAH (6). The patronymic Ahohite occurs in 2 S 23⁹.

AHOLAH, AHOLIAB, AHOLIBAH, AHOLIBAMAH.—The forms in AV of the correct RV Oholah, Oholiab, Oholibah, Oholibamah (wh. see).

AHUMAI.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4²).

AHUZZAM.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4⁹).

AHUZZATH.—'The friend' of Abimelech, the Philistine of Gerar, mentioned on the occasion when the latter made a league with Isaac at Beersheba (Gn 26²⁸). The position of 'king's friend' may possibly have been an official one, and the title a technical one (cf. 1 K 4¹, 1 Ch 27²³). The rendering of the LXX gives a different conception, that of 'pronubus,' or friend of the bridegroom.

AHZAI.—A priest (Neh 11¹³) = Jahzerah (1 Ch 9¹²).

AI.—1. A place between which and Bethel Abraham was stationed before (Gn 12⁹) and after (13³) his sojourn in Egypt. The repulse of the Israelite attempt on the city (Jos 7²⁻⁴) led to the exposure of the crime of Achan; when that was expiated, the city was captured and destroyed (8¹⁻²⁸) by a ruse. It never reappears in history, though it continued to be inhabited: it is the Aiath in Isaiah's description of the march of the Assyrian (10²⁹), and the Aija of Neh 11³¹. In 1 Ch 7²⁸ 'Azzah, enumerated among the cities of Ephraim, is in many MSS 'Ayyah, which is another form of the name. This, however, cannot in any case be the same place, which was within the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁹, where Arvim is possibly a corruption for the name of this city). After the Exile, Ai and Bethel between them supplied a contingent of 223 to the number that returned (Ezr 2²⁹), and the city was once more settled by Benjamites (Neh 11³¹). That the city was insignificant is definitely stated in Jos 7³, and indicated by the fact that in the list of captured cities it is almost the only one of which the situation is specified (Jos 12⁹). Its capture, however, made a deep impression on the Canaanites (Jos 9¹ 10¹). As to its identification, the only indication to guide us is its proximity to Bethel (agreed by all to be Betlin), on the east of that place (as follows from Gn 12⁹). Various sites have been proposed—Turmus 'Aya (which contains an element resembling the name, but the situation is impossible); Khurbet Hayan (which also has a similar name, but the antiquities of the place are not known to be old enough); Deir Diwan (which is in the right place, but also possibly not an old enough site); and el-Tell (a mound whose name has the same meaning as the word Ai 'heap'). Possibly this last is the most likely site.

2. A wholly distinct place, mentioned in a prophecy against the Ammonites, Jer 49³ (perh. a clerical error for Ar).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

AIAH.—1. Son of Zibeon (Gn 36³⁴, 1 Ch 1⁴⁰). 2. Father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 S 3⁷ 21⁸ 10 11).

AIATH, Is 10²⁹; AJA, Neh 11³¹.—See AI, No. 1.

ALJALON.—1. A city allotted to, but not occupied by, Dan (Jos 19⁴, Jg 1³⁶). We find it in the hands of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11¹⁹); later the Philistines took it (2 Ch 28¹⁸). It may be the modern Yalo, 3 miles N.E. of Latrān, 14 miles from Jerusalem. 2. An unknown town in Zebulun (Jg 12¹⁵). W. EWING.

ALJELETH HASH-SHAHAR, Ps 22 (title).—See PSALMS.

AIN.—1. A town in the neighbourhood of Riblah (Nu 34¹¹), probably the modern el-Ain near the source of the Orontes. 2. A town in Judah (Jos 15³²), or Simeon (Jos 19⁷), where Ain and Rimmon should be taken together. It is probably Umm er-Ramdmn, to the N. of Beersheba. W. EWING.

AIN.—The sixteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, and so used to introduce the sixteenth part of Ps. 119.

AKAN.—A descendant of Esau (Gn 36²⁷); called in 1 Ch 1⁴ Jakan.

AKATAN (1 Es 8³⁸).—Father of Joannes, who returned with Ezra; called Hakkatan in Ezr 8¹⁴.

AKELDAMA (AV Aceldama).—The name of the 'potter's field' (Ac 1¹⁹), purchased for the burial of strangers with the blood-money returned by Judas (Mt 27³). The traditional site is at the E. side of the Wady er-Rababi (the so-called 'Valley of Hinnom') on the S. side of the valley. It is still known as Hakk ed-Dumm ('field of blood'), which represents the old name in sound and meaning. The identification has not been traced earlier than the Crusaders, who erected here a charnel-house, the ruins of which still remain—a vault about 70 feet long and 20 feet wide (internal dimensions) erected over and covering the entrance to some of the ancient rock-cut tombs which abound in the valley. The skulls and bones which once thickly strewed the floor of this charnel-house have all been removed to a modern Greek monastery adjacent. There is no evidence recoverable connecting this site with the work of potters. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

AKKAD (ACCAD), AKKADIANS.—Akkad(u) is the Semitic equivalent of the Sumerian Agadē, the capital of the founder of the first Semitic empire. It was probably in consequence of this that it gave its name to Northern Babylonia, the Semitic language of which came to be known as Akkadu or 'Akkadian.' In the early days of cuneiform decipherment 'Akkadian' was the name usually applied to the non-Semitic language of primitive Babylonia, but some cuneiform texts published by Bezold in 1889 (ZA p. 434) showed that this was called by the Babylonians themselves 'the language of Sumer' or Southern Babylonia, while a text recently published by Messerschmidt (Orient. Litig. 1905, p. 268) states that Akkadu was the name of the Semitic 'translation.' When Babylonia became a united monarchy, its rulers took the title of 'kings of Sumer and Akkad' in Semitic, 'Kengi and Uri' in Sumerian, where Uri seems to have signified 'the upper region.' In Gn 10¹⁰ Accad is the city, not the country to which it gave its name. A. H. SAYCE.

AKKOS (AV Accoz), 1 Es 5³⁸.—See HAKKOZ.

AKKUB.—1. A son of Elioenai (1 Ch 3³⁴). 2. A Levite, one of the porters at the E. gate of the Temple; the eponym of a family that returned from the Exile (1 Ch 9¹⁷, Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7⁴ 11¹⁹ 12²⁹); called in 1 Es 5³⁸ Dacubi. 3. The name of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁴); called in 1 Es 5³⁸ Acud. 4. A Levite who helped to expound the Law (Neh 8⁷); called in 1 Es 9⁴ Jacubus.

AKRABATTINE (1 Mac 5⁴).—The region in Idumaea near Akrabbin.

AKRABIM (less correctly Acrabbim Jos 15³ AV, 'Scorpion Pass').—The name given to an ascent on the south side of the Dead Sea, a very barren region.

ALABASTER.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

ALAMOTH, Ps 46 (title), 1 Ch 15⁵⁰.—See PSALMS.

ALBEIT.—Albeit is a contraction for 'all be it,' and means 'although it be.' It occurs in Ezk 137, Philen 19, and in the Apocrypha.

ALCIMUS (the Greek for 'valiant,' suggested by the Hebrew Ellakim, 'God sets up') was son or nephew of Jose ben-Joeser, pupil to Antigonus of Socho (b.c. 190). Antiochus v. (Eupator), king of Syria, appointed him high priest (b.c. 162). Either because he was not of high priestly family (though of the stock of Aaron, 1 Mac 7¹⁴), or, more probably, from his Hellenizing tendencies, his appointment was stoutly opposed by Judas Maccabaeus, and received but scanty recognition at Jerusalem. Demetrius Soter, cousin and successor to Antiochus, in response to Alcimius's solicitations, reinstated him by the means of Nicanor, the Syrian general. He now received, moreover, considerable local support from the Hellenizing party. It was not, however, till the defeat and death of Judas at Elasa that he was in a position to commence his Hellenizing measures, and shortly afterwards he died of paralysis (b.c. 160). A. W. STREANE.

ALCOVE.—RVm (Nu 25⁸) for RV 'pavilion,' AV 'tent.' See PAVILION.

ALEMA (1 Mac 5²⁶).—A city in Gilead; site unknown.

ALEMETH.—1. A son of Becher the Benjamite (1 Ch 7⁸). 2. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁶ 9¹²).

ALEPH.—First letter of Heb. alphabet, and so used to introduce the first part of Ps 119.

ALEXANDER.—1. Son of Simon of Cyrene; like his brother Rufus, evidently a well-known man (Mk 15²¹ only). 2. One of the high-priestly family (Ac 4⁶). 3. The would-be spokesman of the Jews in the riot at Ephesus, which endangered them as well as the Christians (Ac 19³³); not improbably the same as the coppersmith (2 Ti 4¹⁴) who did St. Paul 'much evil,' and who was probably an Ephesian Jew; possibly the same as the Alexander of 1 Ti 1²⁰ (see HYMENÆUS), in which case we may regard him as an apostate Christian who had relapsed into Judaism. A. J. MACLEAN.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.—A Jewish tradition, reported by Josephus and the Talmud, relates that whilst the renowned Macedonian conqueror was besieging Tyre (b.c. 333), rival embassies from the Jews and the Samaritans solicited his protection. At the close of the siege he set out for Jerusalem, and was met outside by the entire population, with the high priest at their head. Recognizing the latter as the person who had appeared to him in a dream and promised him victory, the king prostrated himself. He then entered the city, offered sacrifice, was shown the passages in Daniel relating to himself, granted the people unmolested use of their customs, promised to befriend their eastern settlements, and welcomed Jews to his army (Ant. xi. viii.). The objections to this story are: (1) that although there are references to Alexander and his successors in Daniel (2¹⁰⁶. 77²⁶. 8. 21 113¹), they were not written till the 2nd cent. b.c.; and (2) that the accounts given by Arrian and Curtius do not mention these events. It is also most likely that when Josephus declares that Alexander gave to the Jews in Alexandria equal privileges with the Macedonians (c. Ap. ii. 4), he is anticipating by some years what happened under the Ptolemys.

The deep impression made by Alexander's successes is evinced by the numerous legends connected with his name in later Jewish literature. But his real importance to the Biblical student consists in this—he brought the Jews into contact with Greek literature and life.

ALEXANDER BALAS.—A low-born youth called Balas, living in Smyrna, was put forward by the enemies of Demetrius i. as son of Antiochus iv., king of Syria. In their struggle for the throne the rivals sought to outbid each other for the support of Jonathan Maccabaeus, who elected to side with Alexander, and was appointed high priest by him (b.c. 153). Jonathan defeated Apollonius, one of the generals of Demetrius, and received still further honours (1 Mac 10). But Alexander Balas cared more for sensual pleasures than for kindly duties; his father-in-law Ptolemy turned against him, and Alexander, fleeing to Arabia, was assassinated there (1 Mac 11¹⁷). J. TAYLOR.

ALEXANDRIA was founded (b.c. 332) by Alexander the Great after his conquest of Egypt. Recognizing the inconvenience caused by the want of a harbour for 600 miles along the shore, he selected as the site of a new port the village of Rhacotis, lying on a strip of land between Lake Mareotis and the sea. This he united to the little island of Pharos by a huge mole about a mile long, and thus he formed two splendid havens, which speedily became the commercial meeting-place of Africa, Asia, and Europe. The city was laid out in shape like the outspread cloak of a Macedonian soldier; in circumference about 15 miles; and it was divided into quarters by a magnificent street nearly 5 miles long, and 100 feet wide, running from E. to W., and crossed by another of somewhat lesser dimensions from N. to S. One of these quarters (Soma, 'the body') received the corpse of Alexander, and preserved it embalmed in the Royal Mausoleum. The Ptolemys, who succeeded to the Egyptian portion of Alexander's divided empire, made Alexandria their capital, and by their extensive building operations rendered the city famous for the magnificence and beauty of its public edifices. Besides the Royal Palace, the Royal Mausoleum, the Temple of Neptune, the Great Theatre, the Gymnasium, and the vast Necropolis, Alexandria possessed three other structures for which it was celebrated. (1) The Museum, which was not a place where collections were laid out for instruction, but a spot where the fine arts, science, and literature were studied. The Museum of Alexandria became in course of time practically the centre of the intellectual life of the world. It answered very largely to what we associate with the idea of a great modern university. It had its staff of State-paid professors, its professorial dining-hall, its shaded cloisters, where eager students from all parts of the world walked to and fro, listening to lectures from men like Euclid, Eratosthenes, and Hipparchus. (2) The Library, which was the greatest treasure of the city, was founded by the first Ptolemy. His successors increased the number of volumes till the collection embraced upwards of 700,000 MSS., in which were inscribed the intellectual efforts of Greece, Rome, Asia Minor, Palestine, and even India. The value of this unrivalled collection was immense. The Library was in two portions; and, in the siege of Alexandria by Julius Caesar, the part stored in the Museum was burned; a loss, however, which was largely made up by the presentation to Cleopatra, by Mark Antony, of the Royal Library of Pergamum. The other portion was stored in the Serapeum, which in 1895 was discovered to have been situated where 'Pompey's Pillar' now stands. History is undecided as to whether this celebrated Library was destroyed in A.D. 391 by Bishop Theophilus or by the Caliph Omar in A.D. 641. (3) The third structure which attracted the attention of the world to Alexandria was the Pharos (Lighthouse), erected by Ptol. ii. Philadelphus, on the island which had been joined to the mainland by Alexander. Rising in storeys of decreasing dimensions to a height of 450–490 ft., adorned with white marble columns, balustrades, and statues, it was justly reckoned one of the 'Seven Wonders of the World.' Though it was destroyed by an earthquake in A.D. 1303, it has nevertheless exercised a permanent influence on mankind. The idea of humanity to the mariner which it embodied was accepted by almost every civilized nation, and the thousands of lighthouses throughout the world to-day can all be traced to the gracious thoughtfulness which was displayed in the costly erection of this first Pharos.

In its times of greatest prosperity, Alexandria had a population of between 800,000 and 1,000,000. Trade, amusement, and learning attracted to it inhabitants from every quarter. It was an amalgam of East and West. The alertness and versatility of the Greek were here united with the gravity, conservativeness, and dreaminess of the Oriental. Alexandria became, next to Rome, the largest and most splendid city in the world. Amongst its polyglot community, the Jews formed no inconsiderable portion. Jewish colonists had settled in Egypt in large numbers after the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 42^o), and during the Persian period their numbers greatly increased. The Ptolemys, with one exception, favoured them, and assigned a special quarter of the city to them. More than an eighth of the population of Egypt was Jewish. Their business instincts brought to them the bulk of the trade of the country. They practically controlled the vast export of wheat. Some had great ships with which they traded over all the Mediterranean. St. Paul twice sailed in a ship of Alexandria (Ac 27^o 28^o). The Jews were under their own governor or 'Alabarch,' and observed their own domestic and religious customs. Their great central synagogue was an immense and most imposing structure, where all the trade guilds sat together, and the 70 elders were accommodated in 70 splendidly bejewelled chairs of state.

It was in Alexandria that one of the most important events in the history of religion took place, when the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into the Greek tongue. The legendary tales narrated by Josephus regarding the accomplishment of this task may be dismissed as baseless. But it is undisputed that during the reigns of the earlier Lagidas (somewhere between b.c. 250 and 132) the 'Septuagint' made its appearance. It is certainly not the product of a syndicate of translators working harmoniously, as Jewish tradition asserted. The work is of very unequal merit, the Pentateuch being the best done, while some of the later books are wretchedly translated. The translation was regarded by the Jews with mingled feelings, execrated by one section as the grossest desecration of the holy oracles, extolled by another section as the means by which the beauties of the Law and the Prophets could be appreciated for the first time by the Greek-speaking Gentile world. The LXX became, under God's providence, a most valuable preparation for the truths of Christianity. It familiarized the heathen nations with the God of righteousness as He had been revealed to the Jewish race. It paved the way for the gospel. It formed the Bible of the early Church. In the Eastern Church to-day it is the only orthodox text of the OT.

The wars of the Ptolemys with the Seleucidae at Antioch are described in Dn 11. Ptolemy II. Philadelphus left his mark on Palestine in the cities of Philadelphia (= Rabbath-aminon, Dt 30^o), Ptolemais (Ac 21^o - Acco, Jg 13^o), Philoteria, etc. Under Ptolemy III. Euergetes I. (b.c. 247-222) the famous 'stele of Canopus' was inscribed. With Ptolemy IV. Philopator the dynasty began to decline, and his oppressions of the Jews (largely mythical) are narrated in 3 Maccabees. Under Ptolemy V. Epiphanes the Alexandrian supremacy over Palestine was exchanged for that of Antiochus III. the Great (Dn 11^o 47). In his reign the celebrated 'Rosetta stone' was erected. The ten succeeding Ptolemys were distinguished for almost nothing but their effeminacy, folly, luxury, and cruelty. The city increased in wealth, but sank more and more in political power. Julius Caesar stormed Alexandria in b.c. 47, and after a brief spell of false splendour under Cleopatra, it fell after the battle of Actium into the hands of the Romans, and its fortunes were henceforth merged with those of the Empire.

But while its political power was thus passing away, it was developing an intellectual greatness destined to exercise a profound influence through succeeding centuries. Among its Jewish population there had arisen a new school which sought to amalgamate Hebrew tradition and Greek philosophy, and to make the OT yield up Platonic and Stoic doctrines. This attempted fusion of Hebraism and Hellenism was begun by Aristobulus, and reached its climax in Philo, a contemporary of Jesus Christ. The Jews found in the Gentile writings many beautiful and excellent thoughts. They could logically defend their own proud claim to be the sole depositaries and custodians of Divine truth only by asserting that every rich and luminous Greek expression was borrowed from their Scriptures. Plato and Pythagoras, they declared, were deeply in debt to Moses. The Greeks were merely reproducers of Hebrew ethics and Hebrew religious and moral conceptions. The next step was to re-write their own Scriptures in terms of Greek philosophy, and the most simple way of doing this was by an elaborate system of allegory. Philo carried the allegorizing of the OT to such an extent that he was able to deduce all the spurious philosophy he required from the most matter-of-fact narratives of the patriarchs and their wives. But it was a false issue. It was based on a logical figment, and Philo's voluminous works, gifted and learned though he was, merely reveal that there was no hope either for Greek philosophy or for Hebrew religious development along these lines. The results of the allegorical method of interpretation, however, were seen in Christian Church history. We read of a 'synagogue of the Alexandrians' in Jerusalem, furiously hostile to St. Stephen with his plain declaration of facts (Ac 6^o). Apollos of Alexandria (Ac 18^o 28^o) needed to be 'more accurately instructed' in Christian doctrine, though we have no direct evidence that he was a disciple of Philo. The Ep. to the Hebrews shows traces of Alexandrian influence, and there are evidences that St. Paul was not unfamiliar with Alexandrian hermeneutics and terminology (cf. Gal 4^o 31). But there is no proof that St. Paul ever visited Alexandria. He seems to have refrained from going thither because the gospel had already reached the city (cf. Ro 15^o). Eusebius credits St. Mark with the introduction of Christianity into Egypt. In the 2nd and 3rd cents. Alexandria was the intellectual capital of Christendom. The Alexandrian school of theology was made lustrous by the names of Pantenus, Clement, and especially Origen, who, while continuing the allegorical tradition, strove to show that Christian doctrine enshrined and realized the dreams and yearnings of Greek philosophy. The evil tendencies of the method found expression in the teachings of the Alexandrian heretics, Basilides and Valentinian. Alexandria became more and more the stronghold of the Christian faith. Here Athanasius defended contra mundum the true Divinity of Christ in the Nicene controversy, and the city's influence on Christian theology has been profound. In A.D. 641, Alexandria fell before Amrou; in the 7th cent. it began to decline. The creation of Cairo was another blow, and the discovery in 1497 of the new route to the East via the Cape of Good Hope almost destroyed its trade. At the beginning of the 19th cent. Alexandria was a mere village. To-day it is again a large and flourishing city, with a rapidly increasing population of over 200,000, and its port is one of the busiest on the Mediterranean shore. G. A. FRANK KNIGHT.

ALGUM.—See ALMUG.

ALIAH.—A 'duke' of Edom (1 Ch 1^o); called in Gn 36^o Alvah.

ALIAN.—A descendant of Esau (1 Ch 1^o); called in Gn 36^o Alvan.

ALIEN.—See NATIONS, STRANGER.

ALLAMMELECH.—A town of Asher, probably near Acco (Jos 19^o). Site unidentified.

ALLAR (1 Es 5^o).—One of the leaders of those Jews who could not show their pedigree as Israelites at the return from captivity under Zerubbabel. The name seems to correspond to Immer in Ezr 2⁹, Neh 7⁶¹, one of the places from which these Jews returned. In 1 Es 'Cherub, Addan, and Immer' appear as 'Charaathalan leading them and Allar.'

ALLEGORY.—See PARABLE.

ALLELUIA.—See HALLELUJAH.

ALLEMETH, AV Alemeth, 1 Ch 6⁵⁰; Almon, Jos 21¹⁸.—A Levitical city of Benjamin. It is the present 'Almt' on the hills N. of Anathoth.

ALLIANCE.—In the patriarchal age alliances between the Chosen People and foreign nations were frequent. Many of the agreements between individuals recorded in Genesis implied, or really were, treaties between the tribes or clans represented (Gn 21²⁸, 31⁴⁴). During the period of the Judges confederations between the more or less isolated units of which the nation was composed were often made under the pressure of a common danger (Jg 4¹⁰ 6³⁵). When Israel became consolidated under the monarchy, alliances with foreigners were of a more formal character, e.g. Solomon's treaty with Hiram (1 K 5. 9). His marriage with Pharaoh's daughter probably had a political significance (3¹ 9¹⁶). The policy of alliance between Israel and Phoenicia was continued by Omri and Ahab (16³¹); Am 1⁹ speaks of it as a 'covenant of brethren'; it rested, no doubt, on reciprocal commercial interests (cf. Ac 12²⁰). Asa and Baasha contended for alliance with Benhadad (1 K 15¹⁹), and Judah and Israel themselves are allied during the reigns of Jehoshaphat and Ahab. Such a friendship is denounced in 2 Ch 25. Pekah and Rezin are united against Judah (2 K 16⁵, Is 7). With the appearance of Assyria, relations with foreign nations become important and complicated. The temptation is to stave off the danger from the east by alliance with Damascus or Egypt. Sennacherib assumes that this will be the policy of Hezekiah (2 K 18³¹ *). The prophets from the first set their faces against it (Dt 17¹⁶, Hos 8⁹, Is 20. 30, Jer 2¹⁸ *). It is 'the hiring of lovers' in place of J⁷, leading to sin and idolatry (2 K 16), and is politically unsound, resting 'on a broken reed.' The parties being so unequal, the ally easily becomes the tributary (16⁷). After the Return, Ezra and Nehemiah oppose any alliance with 'the people of the land.' In later times, for a short period only, did the nation gain sufficient independence to make an alliance; in this case it was with Rome (1 Mac 8¹⁷ 15¹⁶).
C. W. EMMET.

ALLON.—1. The head of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (1 Es 5³⁴). He may be the same as Ami (Ezr 2⁵⁷), or Amon (Neh 7⁵⁹). 2. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4²⁷).

ALLON BACUTH ('oak of weeping').—The place where Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried; it was near Bethel (Gn 35⁸).

ALL TO BREAK.—This phrase (Jg 9⁵³) means altogether broke. The 'all' is used for altogether, as in 1 K 14¹⁰ 'till it be all gone'; and the 'to' is not the sign of the infin., but an adverb like Germ. zer, meaning thoroughly. Thus, 'His breast-to-broken with his sadil bowe'—Chaucer, Knight's Tale, 2759. The correct spelling (as in the original ed. of AV) is 'all to brake.'

ALLOW.—To 'allow' generally means in AV 'to approve,' as Ro 7¹⁶ 'that which I do I allow not.' But in Ac 24¹⁶ it has the mod. sense, admit.

ALLOY.—RVm (Is 1²⁵) for EV 'tin.' See MINING AND METALS.

ALMIGHTY is the regular rendering of Shaddai, which occurs altogether 45 times in the OT; 6 times qualifying El (God) and 39 times [31 of these in Job] standing by itself. In the Hexateuch its use is almost confined to P, according to which source it is the name by which God revealed Himself to the patriarchs (Ex 6³, cf. Gn 17¹ 85¹¹). The meaning and derivation are alike obscure. The LXX usually render by Pantokratōr ('Almighty'); 6 times by a fanciful derivation they paraphrase by 'He that is sufficient.' But in Gn. El Shaddai is always represented in the LXX by a pronoun, 'my (or thy) God'; in Ezk 10⁵ it is merely transliterated. Other suggested renderings are 'the Destroyer,' i.e. 'the Storm-God,' 'the Pourer,' i.e. 'the Rain-God,' 'the Mountain' (cf. 'Rock' as a title of God in Dt 32⁴ 18. 30. 31), or 'Lord.' The last two have the most probability on their side, and it is hard to choose between them; but the fact that in Babylonian 'the Great Mountain' (shadu rabu) is a common title of Bel seems to turn the scale in favour of the former of the two meanings proposed: some slight confirmation is perhaps afforded by 1 K 20²³. In composition the word occurs in two personal names: Zurishaddai (Nu 1⁵) and Ammishaddai (Nu 1¹²); perhaps also in Shedeur (Nu 1⁴). The first ('Shaddai is my Rock') is specially interesting if the meaning given above is correct.

In the NT, with the exception of 2 Co 6¹⁸ (a quotation from 2 S 7¹⁴), the name is confined to the Apocalypse. That it renders Shaddai rather than Sabaoth seems proved (in spite of 4⁸ from Is 6³) by the fact that it always either stands alone or qualifies 'God,' never 'Lord.' The writer is fond of piling up the titles or attributes of God, and among them his favourite is that ancient title which carries him back to the patriarchal age, the title El Shaddai. H. C. O. LANCASTER.

AL-MODAD was, according to Gn 10²⁸ (1 Ch 1²⁰), the oldest son of Joktan (wh. see). Joktan is the eponym of the tribes and peoples of eastern and southern Arabia. From the position of Al-modad in the list of 'sons,' it would appear that he is to be located in the south of the peninsula. As yet the name can neither be explained nor identified with any known region.

J. F. McCURDY.

ALMON.—See ALLEMETH.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM.—A station in the journeyings (Nu 33⁴⁶ 47), prob. identical with Beth-diblathaim (Jer 48²²). The meaning of Diblathaim is a double cake of figs; its application to a town may indicate the appearance of the place or neighbourhood.

ALMOND (shāqēd).—The fruit in Gn 43¹¹, Ex 25²³ * 37¹⁹⁻²⁰, Nu 17²³; the tree in Ec 12²⁸, Jer 1¹¹. Luz (Gn 30²⁷), mistranslated 'hazel,' is certainly the almond; it is the name of the almond in modern Arabic. The almond (Amygdalus communis) is in Palestine the earliest harbinger of spring, bursting into beautiful white blossom late in January in Jerusalem, before its leaves appear. Hence its name and symbolism: shāqēd means to waken or watch, and in Jer 1¹¹ * there is a play on the word 'almond' (shāqēd), and 'I will hasten' (shōqēd). Probably the whiteness of the blossom from a little distance—the delicate pink at the bases of the petals being visible only on closer inspection—suggested its comparison to the white hair of age (Ec 12²⁸). The fruit is a great favourite. It is eaten green before the shell hardens, especially by children, and the ripe kernels are eaten by themselves or with nuts and puddings, and are also made into sweetmeats with sugar, both as 'almond icing' and 'burnt almonds.' A present of Palestine almonds would be sure to be appreciated in Egypt (Gn 43¹¹), as they did not grow in the latter country.
E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ALMS, ALMSGIVING.—An alms (Ac 3²) is something freely given, in money or in kind, to the needy, from motives of love and pity for the recipient, and of gratitude to the Giver of all. Hence what is given or paid to the poor under the authority and compulsion of law, as the modern poor rate, is not alms. For such legal provision in OT times see Poor. Much might be said of the humane spirit which pervades the whole of the Hebrew legislation, and in particular the legislation of Dt, of which, in this respect, 15¹ may be taken as the epitome: 'Thou shalt surely open thyne hand unto thy brother, to thy needy and to thy poor'

(RV). The writings of the prophets, also, are full of generous advocacy of the rights of the poor. In the later pre-Christian centuries almsgiving became one of the most prominent of religious duties (Ps 112⁹, Pr 14²¹ 19¹⁷ 31¹⁰, Job 29¹²). The sentiment of the 2nd cent. a.c.—by which time it is significant that the Hebrew word for 'righteousness' had acquired the special sense of almsgiving as in the true text of Mt 6¹ (see RV)—is fully reflected in the Books of Sirach (7¹⁰ 17² 29¹¹) and Tobit (see esp. 4⁷⁻¹¹). From this time onwards, indeed, almsgiving was considered to possess an atoning or redemptive efficacy (Sir 3³⁰ 'alms [RV 'almsgiving'] maketh an atonement for sins.' To 4¹⁰ 12⁹ 'alms delivereth from death,' cf. Dn 4²⁷). After the cessation of sacrifice, almsgiving appears to have ranked among the Jews as the first of religious duties, more meritorious even than prayer and fasting. Arrangements were made by the Jewish authorities for the systematic collection and distribution of the alms of the people. An offertory for the poor also formed a recognized part of the synagogue service.

Almsgiving occupies a prominent place in the teaching of our Lord, who rebukes the ostentatious charity of His day (Mt 6¹⁻⁴), emphasizes the blessedness of giving (Ac 20³⁵), its opportunities (Mt 25³⁴⁻⁴⁰), and its highest motive, 'in my name' (Mk 9⁴¹). In the early Christian community of Jerusalem the needs of the poor were effectively supplied, for its members 'had all things common, neither was there among them any that lacked' (Ac 4³²⁻³⁴). The need for careful distribution of the Church's alms led to the institution of the diaconate (Ac 6¹⁻⁶). The provision of a poor's fund for the behoof of the mother Church was much in the thoughts of the Apostle of the Gentiles (1 Co 16¹⁻², 2 Co 9¹⁻⁵), and until a period within living memory the care of God's poor continued to be the almost exclusive privilege of the Christian Church. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ALMUG, or ALGUM (1 K 10¹¹⁻¹², 2 Ch 2⁸ 9¹⁰, 11; the two names are probably variants of the same word, caused by transposition of letters, as is common in Heb. and Arabic).—This tree was imported by Solomon from Ophir (1 K 10¹¹⁻¹²) and from Lebanon (2 Ch 2⁸) for staircases, balustrades, and musical instruments. There is nothing certain known of the nature of this wood, but as Jewish tradition states that it was a red wood, red sandal wood (Pterocarpus santalinus)—now used chiefly for its colouring properties—has been very generally accepted. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ALOES ('ahdim, Pr 17⁷, Nu 24⁶ ['lign aloes']; 'ahdloth, Ps 45⁴, Ca 4¹⁴; also aldē, Jn 19³⁹).—This is the modern eagle-wood (a name derived from the Skr. aguru): it has nothing to do with the familiar bitter aloes of medicine, or with the American aloes, now much cultivated in gardens in Palestine, but a recent importation. This eagle-wood is obtained from plants of the order Aquilariaceæ, but the fragrant parts are those which are diseased: the odoriferous qualities are due to the infiltration with resin, and the best kinds sink when placed in water. The development of this change in the wood is hastened by burying it in the ground. A trade in this wood has gone on from early times; it comes from India, the Malay Peninsula, etc., and has long been a favourite with the Arabs, who call it el 'ud.

The use of the word (translated 'lign aloes,' Nu 24⁶) by Balaam creates a difficulty. Either he must have referred to the tree from mere hearsay, or some other plant of the same name may at that time have grown in the Jordan valley, or, as seems most probable, the Heb. word has been wrongly transcribed. Both 'palms' and 'terebinths' have been suggested as suitable alternatives. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.—A title of God in Rev 1⁸ 21⁶, of Jesus in 22¹³ [its presence in 1¹¹ AV is not justified by the MSS]. Alpha was the first, and Omega the last letter of the Greek, as Aleph and Taw were the first and the last of the Hebrew alphabet. In the Talmud, 'From Aleph to Taw' meant 'From first to last,' including all between. Cf. Shabb. 51. 1 (on Ezk 9⁶): 'Do not read "My Sanctuary," but "My saints," who are the sons of men who have kept the whole Law from Aleph to Taw.'

This explains the title. In each instance St. John defines it. Rev 1⁸ 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty' (AV 'the beginning and the ending' is an interpolation from 21⁶ 22¹³), i.e. the Eternal, the Contemporary of every generation. Rev 21⁶ 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end'; 22¹³ 'I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last (cf. Is 44⁶ 45¹²), the beginning and the end,' i.e. He who comprehends and embraces all things, from whom all come and to whom all return, the font et clausula, the starting-point and the goal of history (cf. Col 1¹⁷). The ascription of this title to Jesus as well as to God in a writing so early as the Apocalypse strikingly attests the view of our Lord's Person which prevailed in the primitive Church.

Aurelius Prudentius makes fine use of the title in his hymn on The Lord's Nativity ('Corde natus ex parentis'), thus rendered by Neale:

'Of the Father's love begotten
Ere the worlds began to be,
He is Alpha and Omega,
He the source, the ending He,
Of the things that are, that have been,
And that future years shall see,
Evermore and evermore,

ALPHABET.—See WRITING.

ALPHAËUS.—1. The father of James the Apostle (Mt 10³ = Mk 3¹⁸ = Lk 6¹⁵ = Ac 1¹³), commonly identified with James the Little, son of Mary and brother of Josias or Joseph (Mk 15⁴⁰ = Mt 27⁵⁶). The identification is confirmed by Jn 19²⁵, if it be allowed that Clopas is the same name as Alphaeus. And this is most likely. Both names probably represent the Aramaic Chalphai (cf. 1 Mac 11⁷⁰). St. John's 'Clopas' is almost a transliteration, while 'Alphaeus' is the name in a Greek dress, the disguise being more apparent if it be written, with WH, 'Halpheus.'

2. The father of Levi the tax-gatherer (Mk 2¹⁴), afterwards Matthew the Apostle and Evangelist (Mt 9¹⁰ 10³). It is remarkable that in Mk 2¹⁴ Codex Bezae and some cursives read James for Levi, and there is a tradition (Chrysost. in Math. xxxiii.) that the Apostles Matthew and James had both been tax-gatherers. It is perhaps possible that Alphaeus the father of James was identical with Alphaeus the father of Levi, and that the two tax-gatherer Apostles were brothers. Nothing is recorded of Alphaeus; yet, if these identifications be allowed, great was his glory. He was evidently himself a believer; his son Josias, though undistinguished, was evidently a believer also; his son James was an Apostle; his son Matthew was an Apostle and an Evangelist; and his wife Mary was one of the faithful women who stood by the Cross and visited the Sepulchre (Mk 16¹).

DAVID SMITH.

ALTAR.—1. The original purpose of an altar was to serve as a means by which the blood of an animal offered in sacrifice might be brought into contact with, or otherwise transferred to, the deity of the worshipper. For this purpose in the earliest period a single stone sufficed. Either the blood was poured over this stone, which was regarded as the temporary abode of the deity, or the stone was anointed with part, and the rest poured out at its base. The introduction of fire to consume the flesh in whole or in part belongs to a later stage in the history of sacrifice (wh. see). But even when this stage had long been reached, necessity might compel a temporary reversion to the earlier modus operandi, as we learn from Saul's procedure in 1 S 14²¹. From the altar of a single 'great stone'

(1 S 6¹⁴) the transition was easy to an altar built of unhewn stones (Ex 20²⁴, Dt 27¹¹, RV), which continued to be the normal type of Hebrew altar to the end (see 1 Mac 4¹¹; Jos. BJ V. v. 6).

2. Another type of pre-historic altar, to which much less attention has been paid, had its origin in the primitive conception of sacrifice as the food of the gods. As such it was appropriately presented on a table. Now the nearest analogy to the disc of leather spread on the ground, which was and is the table of the Semitic nomad, was the smooth face of the native rock, such as that on which Manoah spread his offering (Jg 13^{19f}, cf. 6^{20f}). The well-known rock-surfaces, in Palestine and elsewhere, with their mysterious cup-marks—typical specimens are illustrated PEFSI, 1900, 32 ff., 249—to receive the sacrificial blood, can scarcely be other than pre-historic table-altars. The similarly marked table-stones of Syrian dolmens also belong here. A further stage in the evolution of the table altar is seen in the elaborate structures recently discovered within the West-Semitic area. In these the rock is cut away so as to leave the altar standing free, to which rock-cut steps lead up, an arrangement forbidden, from motives of decency, by the earliest legislation (Ex 20²⁶, with which cf. 28^{22f}, and parall. from a later date). The uppermost step served as a platform for the officiating priest. Some show cup-hollows for libations of blood (see illust. in Moore's 'Judges' in SBOT p. 83), while that first discovered at Petra has a depression for the altar-hearth (PEFSI, 1900, 350 ff. with sketch; see also ARNOLD). Its dimensions are 9 ft. by 6, with a height above the platform of 3 ft. The altars of the more important sanctuaries under the Hebrew monarchy, such as Bethel, were probably of a similar nature. A description of 'the altar of burnt-offering' of the Tabernacle will be given under TABERNACLE; for the corresponding altars of the Temple of Solomon and its successors, and of Ezekiel's sketch, see TEMPLE.

3. A third variety of primitive altar is the mound of earth (Ex 20²⁴), a copy in miniature of the hill-tops which were at all times favourite places of worship (see HIGH PLACE).

4. All the types of altar above described were intended for the ordinary open-air sacrificial service, details of which will be found under SACRIFICE. There is no clear reference earlier than Jeremiah to the use of incense, and no reference at all to any altar of incense in the legitimate worship before the Exile, for 1 K 7¹⁸ in its present form is admittedly late, and the altar of 1 K 6²⁰ must be the table of shewbread (see TEMPLE, SHEWBREAD).

5. From what has already been said, it is evident that an altar was the indispensable requisite of every place of worship. It was not until the 7th cent. B.C. that Josiah succeeded in abolishing 'the high places' and destroying or desecrating their altars (2 K 23^{26f}), in accordance with the fundamental demand of the Deuteronomic law-code (Dt 12^{16f}). In the older historical and prophetic writings, however, and even in the earliest legislation (see Ex 20²⁴ RV), the legitimacy of the local altars is never called in question. On the contrary, religious leaders such as Samuel and Elijah show their zeal for the worship of J^h by the erection and repair of altars.

6. As altars to which a special interest attaches may be mentioned that erected by David on the threshing floor of Araunah (2 S 24^{18f}), the site of which is marked by the present mosque of 'the Dome of the Rock'; the altar erected by Ahaz after the model of one seen by him at Damascus (2 K 16^{10f}); the sacrificial and incense altars to the host of heaven in the courts and probably even on the roof of the Temple (2 K 23¹², Jer 19¹³); and finally, the altar to Olympian Zeus placed by Antiochus Epiphanes on the top of the altar of burnt-offering (1 Mac 1¹⁴).

7. Reference must also be made to altars as places of refuge for certain classes of criminals, attested both by legislation (Ex 21^{13f}) and history (1 K 1³¹ 2²⁸; see more fully, REFUGE [CRIMES OF]). The origin and precise significance of the horns of the altar, of which the refuge laid hold (1 K 1³¹, etc.), and which played an important part in the ritual (Ex 29²⁷, Lv 4¹⁰), have not yet received a satisfactory explanation. A small limestone altar, showing the horns in the form of rounded knobs at the four corners, has just been discovered at Gezer (PEFSI, 1907, p. 196, with illust.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AL-TASHHETH.—Pss 57. 58. 59. 65. (titles). See PSALMS.

ALUSH.—A station in the journeyings (Nu 33¹³, 14).

ALVAN.—Son of Shobal, a Horite (Gn 36²³); called in 1 Ch 1³⁰ Alian, in Gn 36²⁴ Alvah, 1 Ch 1³¹ Aliah, one of the 'dukes' of Edom.

AMAD (Jos 19²⁸ only).—A city of Asher. The site is doubtful; there are several ruins called 'Amud' in this region.

AMADATHUS (Est 1²⁶ 16¹⁰, 17).—See HAMMEDATHA.

AMAL.—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7³⁰).

AMALEK, AMALEKITES.—A tribe which roamed, from the days of the Exodus till the time of king Saul, over the region from the southern boundary of Judah to the Egyptian frontier and the peninsula of Sinai. They are not counted among the kindred of the Israelites, and probably were among the inhabitants of the region whom the Hebrew and Aramaean immigrants found already in the land. With this agrees the statement of a poem quoted in Nu 24⁷⁰ 'Amalek was the first of the nations.'

Israel first met with the Amalekites in the region near Sinai, when Amalek naturally tried to prevent the entrance of a new tribe into the region (cf. Ex 17⁸⁻¹⁶). The battle which ensued produced such a profound impression, that one of the few things which the Pentateuch claims that Moses wrote is the ban of Jahweh upon Amalek (Ex 17¹⁴). It appears from Dt 25¹⁷⁻¹⁹ that Amalek made other attacks upon Israel, harassing her rear. On the southern border of Palestine the Amalekites also helped at a later time to prevent Israel's entrance from Kadesh (Nu 13²⁹ 14²⁰).

During the period of the Judges, Amalekites aided the Moabites in raiding Israel (Jg 3¹³), and at a later time they helped the Midianites to do the same thing (6³, 33 7¹²). This kept alive the old enmity. King Saul attempted to shatter their force, and captured their king, whom Samuel afterwards slew (1 S 15). Although Saul is said to have taken much spoil, the Amalekites were still there for David to raid during that part of Saul's reign when David was an outlaw (1 S 27⁸). The boundaries of the habitat of the Amalekites at this time are said to have been from Telem, one of the southern cities of Judah (Jos 15²¹), to Shur on the way to Egypt (1 S 15⁷). Most modern critics also read Telem for Havilah in 1 S 15⁷, and for 'of old' in 1 S 27⁸.

It was formerly supposed, on the basis of Jg 5¹¹ and 12¹⁵, that there was at one time a settlement of Amalekites farther north, in the hill country of Ephraim. That is, however, improbable, for in both passages the text seems to be corrupt. In 5¹¹ 'Amalek' is corrupted from the Hebrew for 'valley,' and in 12¹⁵ from the proper name 'Shalim.' Individual Amalekites, nevertheless, sojourned in Israel (2 S 1⁸ 13).

In 1 Ch 4^{22f} there is a remarkable statement that a remnant of the Amalekites had escaped and dwelt in Edom, and that 500 Simeonites attacked and smote them. Perhaps this accounts for the priestly genealogies which make Amalek a descendant of Esau and a subordinate Edomite tribe (cf. Gn 36¹² 16 and 1 Ch 1³⁶). Perhaps here we learn how the powerful Amalek of the earlier time faded away. Ps 83⁷—a late composition—refers to the Amalekites as still aiding Israel's enemies; but this is probably a poetical imitation of ancient conditions.

On their close kindred, the Kenites, see KENITES.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

AMAM (Jos 15²⁸ only).—An unknown city of Judah, in the desert south of Beersheba.

AMAN.—1. The persecutor of Achiacharus (To 14¹⁰). 2. Est 12³ 16¹⁰. 17. See HAMAN.

AMANA (Ca 4⁸).—Probably the mountains near the river Abana or Amanah, being connected with Hermon and Lebanon; or else Mount Amanus in the north of Syria.

AMARIAH ('J' said' or 'promised').—1. Zeph 1¹, great-grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah, and son of a Hezekiah who may be the king. This is the only instance of the name that is certainly pre-exilic. 2. 1 Ch 6⁷ 8², grandfather of Zadok the priest. 3. 1 Ch 23¹⁹ 24²³, a Levite in David's time. 4. 1 Ch 6¹, Ezr 7³ (Amarias, 1 Es 8², 2 Es 1²), son of Azariah, who is said to have ministered in Solomon's temple. The lists in which 2 and 4 occur are very uncertain, and the name may refer to the same person in both. 5. 2 Ch 19¹¹, a high priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat. 6. 2 Ch 31¹⁵, a Levite, a gate-porter, in Hezekiah's time. 7. Neh 12³ 13¹⁰, a priestly clan which returned to Jerusalem, and sealed the covenant under Nehemiah (probably the same as Immer, 1 Ch 24¹⁴, Ezr 23⁷ 10²⁰, Neh 7¹⁹ (Meruth, 1 Es 5²¹)). 8. Ezr 10¹², a Judahite, one of the sons of Bani (v. 24, cf. 1 Ch 9¹) who had taken strange wives. 9. Neh 11⁴, a Judahite who offered to dwell in Jerusalem. 10. Neh 12¹², where Meraiah is probably a corruption of Amariah (which is found in Syr. and Luc.). A. H. McNEILE.

AMARIAS (1 Es 8²).—An ancestor of Ezra, called Amariah in Ezr 7².

AMASA.—1. The son of Ithra an Ishmaelite, and of Abigail the sister of king David. He commanded the army of the rebel Absalom (2 S 17²⁵); but was completely routed by Joab in the forest of Ephraim (18⁶⁻⁸). David not only pardoned him, but gave him the command of the army in place of Joab (19¹³). He was treacherously slain by Joab at 'the great stone of Gibeon' (2 S 20⁹⁻¹²). 2. An Ephraimite who opposed the bringing into Samaria of the Jewish prisoners, whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken in his campaign against Ahaz (2 Ch 28¹²).

AMASAI.—1. A Kohathite (1 Ch 6³⁵ 36); the eponym of a family (2 Ch 29¹²). 2. One of the priests who blew trumpets on the occasion of David's bringing the ark to Jerus. (1 Ch 15²⁴). 3. One of David's officers at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹⁵), possibly to be identified with Amasa, No. 1.

AMASHSAI (Neh 11¹³).—A priest of the family of Immer.

AMASIAH.—One of Jehoshaphat's commanders (2 Ch 17¹⁵).

AMAZIAH.—1. Son of Jehoshaf of Judah. He came to the throne after the assassination of his father. It is recorded in his favour (2 K 4⁹) that although he put the murderers of his father to death he spared their children—something unheard of up to that time, we infer. Our sources know of a successful campaign of his against Edom, and an unsuccessful one against Israel. In this he seems to have been the aggressor; and after refusing to hear the advice of Jehoash, whom he had challenged to a trial of strength, he had the mortification of seeing his own capital plundered. The conspiracy by which he perished may have been prompted by his conduct in this war. In the matter of religion he receives qualified praise from the author of Kings (2 K 14³¹), while the Chronicler accuses him of gross apostasy (2 Ch 25¹⁴⁻¹⁵). 2. The priest at Bethel who opposed the prophet Amos (Am 7¹⁰⁻¹¹). 3. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4³⁴). 4. A Merarite (1 Ch 6⁴⁴). H. P. SMITH.

AMBASSADOR, AMBASSAGE.—As diplomatic agents of sovereigns or other persons in high authority, ambassadors are frequently mentioned in OT and Apocrypha from the days of Moses (see below) to those of the Maccabees (1 Mac 9⁷⁰ 11⁹ 14²¹ 15¹⁷). Insult to their persons was a sufficient casus belli (2 S 10⁴). In several passages (e.g. Nu 20¹⁴ 21²¹, Dt 2²⁸, Jg 11¹² 13, 2 S 5¹¹, 2 K 19²) the 'messengers' of EV are practically 'ambassadors,' as the Heb. word is elsewhere rendered (2 Ch 35²¹, Is 30⁴, Jz 17¹⁵). Jos 9⁴, however, should be read as in RVin. The ambassador of Jer 49⁴ (= Ob¹) is probably an angel. In NT the word is used only metaphorically (2 Co 5²⁰, Eph 6²⁰).

'Ambassage,' the mission of an ambassador (2 Mac 4¹¹ RV), is used also as a collective for ambassadors themselves (Lk 14³² 19¹⁴ RV). In 1 Mac 14²² read with RV 'the copy of their words.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AMBER (chashmal, Ezk 14⁶ 27⁸²).—The translation 'amber' is much questioned, a metallic substance being generally considered more probable. Prof. Ridgway (Encyc. Bibl., s.v.) has, however, shown that amber may well have been known to Ezekiel. The amber commonly seen is the opaque yellow variety from the Baltic, a resinous substance changed by long submersion in the sea. It is a favourite ornament, in necklaces and bracelets, in the Orient, especially among Jewesses, and is credited with medicinal virtues. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

AMBUSH.—See WAR.

AMEN.—A Hebrew form of affirmation usually translated in the LXX by an equivalent Greek expression (Nu 5²², Dt 27¹⁶ 'so be it,' Jer 28⁶ (36⁸) 'truly'), but sometimes transliterated (1 Ch 16³⁶) as in English. It is an indication of solemn assent, chiefly in prayer, to the words of another, on the part either of an individual (Nu 5²²) or of an assembly (Dt 27¹⁵); sometimes reduplicated (Ps 41¹³), sometimes accompanied by a rubrical direction (Ps 106⁴⁸). From the synagogue it passed into the liturgical use of Christian congregations, and is so referred to in 1 Co 14¹⁶—'the (customary) Amen at thy giving of thanks' (?Eucharist). The use peculiar to the NT is that ascribed to our Lord in the Gospels, where the word—'verily' followed by 'I say'—introduces statements which He desires to invest with special authority (Mt 5¹⁸, Mk 3²⁸, Lk 4⁴ etc.) as worthy of unquestioning trust. The Fourth Gospel reduplicates—a form which, though Christ may Himself have varied the phrase in this manner, is nevertheless stereotyped by this Evangelist (Jn 1⁵¹ and 24 other places), and marks the peculiar solemnity of the utterances it introduces. The impression created by this idiom may have influenced the title of 'the Amen' given to the Lord in the Epistle to Laodicea (Rev 3¹⁴). A strikingly similar phrase is used by St. Paul in 2 Co 1²⁰—'through him (i.e. Jesus Christ as preached) is the Amen'—the seal of God's promises. Its use in dogmatics is frequent. J. G. SIMPSON.

AMETHYST.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

AMI.—The head of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2⁵⁷); called in Neh 7⁵⁹ Amon.

AMITTAI ('true').—Father of the prophet Jonah (2 K 14²⁵, Jon 1¹).

AMMAH (2 S 2²⁴ only).—A hill near Giah, in the wilderness of Gibeon. Site unknown.

AMMI ('my people').—The name to be applied to Israel in the time of restoration. It is to take the place of Lo-ammi (= 'not my people'), the name given in the first instance by Hosea to Gomer's third child, but in the prophetic fragment, Hos 1⁹⁻¹¹ [in Heb 2¹⁻³], referred to the people of Israel.

AMMIDIOL.—One of the families that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5²⁰); omitted in the parallel lists (Ezr 2= Neh 7).

AMMIEL ('kinsman is God').—1. Son of Gemalli, and spy of the tribe of Dan (Nu 13¹² (P)). 2. Father of Machir (2 S 9⁴¹, 17²). 3. The sixth son of Obed-edom, who with his family constituted one of the courses of doorkeepers in the time of David; to them was allotted charge of the S. gate (of the Temple) and the storehouse (1 Ch 26, esp. vv. 5-15). 4. See ELIAM, 1.

AMMIHUD ('kinsman is majesty').—1. An Ephraimite, father of Elishama (Nu 1¹⁰ 2¹⁸ 7¹⁸. 33 10²² (P)). 2. A Simeonite, father of Shemuel (Nu 34²⁰ (P)). 3. A Naphtalite, father of Pedahel (Nu 34²⁸ (P)). 4. According to the Qerē of 2 S 13³⁷ and the AV, the name of the father of the Geshurite king Talmi (Kethibh and RV Ammihur). 5. Son of Omri, father of Uthai (1 Ch 9⁴).

AMMIHUR.—See AMMIHUD, No. 4.

AMMINADAB.—1. Son of Ram and father of Nahshon (Ru 4^{19f}. = 1 Ch 2¹⁰, Mt 1⁴; Nu 17 2³ 7¹² 10¹⁴); father-in-law of Aaron (Ex 6²³). 2. Son of Kohath and father of Korah (1 Ch 6²²). 3. A chief of a Levitical house (1 Ch 15^{10f}).

AMMINADAB occurs in AV and RVm of a very obscure passage, Ca 6¹², 'my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadib.' RV and AVm do not regard the term as a proper name, but render 'my soul set me on (RV 'among') the chariots of my willing (RV 'princely') people.'

AMMISHADDAI.—A Danite, father of Ahiezer (Nu 1¹³ 2²⁸ 7¹⁸. 71 10²⁸ (P)).

AMMIZABAD.—Son of Benaiah (1 Ch 27⁴).

AMMON, AMMONITES.—A people inhabiting the territory between the tribe of Gad and the Arabian desert, from the Israelitish conquest of Palestine to the 4th cent. B.C., and perhaps till the 1st cent. A.D.

In Gn 19³⁸ the Ammonites are said to have descended from a certain Ben-Ammi, but in the Assyrian inscriptions Shalmaneser II., Tiglath-pileser III., and Sennacherib call them Beth-Ammon, placing the determinative for 'man' before Ammon. Except in Ps 83⁷, which is late, the people are never called 'Ammon' in the Hebrew OT, but the 'children of Ammon,' or 'Ammonites.'

The really important feature of the story of Gn 19 is that it reveals a consciousness that the Israelites regarded the Ammonites as their kindred. The proper names of individual Ammonites, so far as they are known to us, confirm this view. Probably, therefore, the Ammonites formed a part of that wave of Aramaean migration which brought the Hebrews into Palestine. Perhaps, like the Hebrews, they adopted the language of the people in whose land they settled, thus later speaking a Canaanite dialect. The genealogy which traces their descent from Lot probably signifies that they settled in the land of Lot, or Lotan, called by the Egyptians Ruten, which lay to the east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan.

In Dt 2²⁰ the Ammonites are said to have displaced the Zamzummin, a semi-mythical people, of whom we know nothing. Jg 11¹²⁻²⁹ represents Ammon as having conquered all the land between the Jabbok and the Arnon, and a king of Ammon is said to have reproved Israel for taking it from them. The statement is late, and of doubtful authority. Israel found the Amorites in this territory at the time of the conquest, and we have no good reason to suppose that the Ammonites ever possessed it. Their habitat was in the north-eastern portion of this region, around the sources of the Jabbok. Rabbah (modern 'Amman') was its capital and centre.

At the time of the conquest the Gadite Israelites did not disturb the Ammonites (Nu 21²⁴, Dt 2²⁷), or attempt to conquer their territory. During the period of the Judges the Ammonites assisted Eglon of Moab in his invasion of Israel (Jg 3¹³), and attempted to conquer Gilead, but were driven back by Jephthah the judge (11⁴⁻⁹. 30-32 12¹⁻³). Later, Nahash, their king, oppressed the town of Jabesh in Gilead, and it was the victory which delivered this city from the Ammonites that made Saul Israel's king (1 S 11). Saul and Nahash thus became enemies. Consequently, later, Nahash befriended David, apparently to weaken the growing power of Israel. When David succeeded Saul in power, Hanun, the son of Nahash, provoked him to war, with the result that Rabbah, the Ammonite capital, was stormed and taken, the Ammonites were reduced to vassalage, and terrible vengeance was wreaked upon them (2 S 10-12). Afterwards, during Absalom's rebellion, a son of Nahash rendered David assistance at Mahanaim (2 S 17²⁷). Zelek, an Ammonite, was among David's heroes (2 S 23³⁷). These friendly relations continued through the reign of Solomon, who took as one of his wives the Ammonite princess Naamah, who became the mother of Rehoboam, the next king (1 K 11¹⁴. 21). After the reign of Solomon the Ammonites appear to have gained their independence.

In the reign of Ahab, Ba'sa, son of Rehob, the Ammonite, was a member of the confederacy which opposed the progress of Shalmaneser into the West (cf. KAT³ 42). According to 2 Ch 20¹, the Ammonites joined with Moab and Edom in invading Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat. Before the reign of Jeroboam II. the Ammonites had made another attempt to get possession of Gilead, and their barbarities in warfare excited the indignation of the prophet Amos (Am 1¹³⁻¹⁵). Chronicles represents them as beaten a little later by Jotham of Judah, and as paying tribute to Uzziah (2 Ch 26⁸ 27³). When next we hear of the Ammonites, Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon is employing them to harass the refractory Judæan king Jehoiakim (2 K 24²). Perhaps it was at this period that the Ammonites occupied the territory of Gad (Jer 49^{18f}). Later, the domination of the Babylonian compelled Ammon and Israel to become friends, for Ammon conspired with King Zedekiah against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 27³), and during the sieges of Jerusalem many Judæans had migrated to Ammon (Jer 40¹¹). The Babylonian king regarded both Ammon and Judah as rebels, for Ezekiel represents him as casting lots to see whether he should first attack Rabbah or Jerusalem (Ezk 21^{20ff}. cf. Zeph 2⁸. 9).

Perhaps there was a settlement of Ammonites in Israelitish territory, for Dt 23²⁰ recognizes the danger of mixture with Ammonites, while Jos 18²⁴ seems to indicate that there was in post-exilic times a village in Benjamin called 'the village of the Ammonites.'

After the destruction of Jerusalem, Baalis, king of Ammon, sent a man to assassinate Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made governor of Judah (Jer 40¹⁴). Again, 140 years later, the Ammonites did everything in their power to prevent the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh 2¹⁰. 19 4³ 7). Nehemiah and Ezra fomented this enmity by making illegal the marriages of Ammonitish women with Israelitish peasantry who had remained in Judah (Neh 13²³).

Between the time of Nehemiah and Alexander the Great the country east of the Jordan was overrun by the Nabataeans. Perhaps the Ammonites lost their identity at this time: for, though their name appears later, many scholars think it is used of these Arabs. Thus in 1 Mac 5^{6f}. Judas Maccabæus is said to have defeated the Ammonites; Ps 83⁷ reckons them among Israel's enemies; while Justin Martyr (Dial. Tryph. 19) says the Ammonites were numerous in his day. As Josephus (Ant. i. xi. 5) uses the same language of the Moabites and Ammonites, though elsewhere (xiv. i. 4) he seems to call them Arabians, it is possible that the Ammonites had lost their identity at the time of the Nabataean invasion. Their capital, Rabbah, was rebuilt in the Greek style by Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt in the 3rd cent. B.C. and named Philadelphia. Its ruins amid the modern town of 'Amman are impressive. The god of the Ammonites is called in the OT Milcom, a variation of Melek, 'king.' When the Jews, just before the Exile, to avert national disaster, performed child-sacrifice to Jaweh as Melek or 'king,' the prophets stamped this ritual as of foreign or Ammonite origin on account of the similarity of the name, though perhaps it was introduced from Phœnicia (cf. G. F.

Moore in Encyc. Bibl. III, 3188 ff.). The Ammonites appear to have been a ruthless, semi-savage people. Such a rite may have been practised by them too; if so, it is all that we know of their civilization.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

AMNON.—1. Eldest son of David by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. He dishonoured his half-sister Tamar, and was, on that account, slain by her brother Absalom (2 S 3^d 13th). 2. Son of Shimon (1 Ch 4th).

AMOK.—A priestly family in the time of Zerubbabel and of Joiakim (Neh 12th. 20).

AMOMUM.—Rev 18th RVm. See SPICE.

AMON.—1. Son and successor of Manasseh king of Judah. He reigned two years or parts of years. Our Biblical books know only that he carried on the religious practices of his father. He was put to death by a palace conspiracy, but the assassins were punished by the populace, who placed Josiah on the throne (2 K 21st). It has been suggested that his name is that of the Egyptian sun-god (see next art.). 2. A governor of Samaria (1 K 22nd). 3. See AMI. H. P. SMITH.

AMON (Gr. Ammon, Egyp. Amūn).—An Egyptian divinity, who, primarily worshipped as the god of fertility, and later as Amen-ra-setn-nteru ('Amon, the sun-god, the king of the gods'), was the local deity of Thebes. With the subjugation of the petty princes of lower Egypt by Aahmes I. of Thebes (c. b.c. 1700), he became the Egyptian national god. His supremacy, recognized for 1100 years by all Egyptian rulers with the exception of Amenophis IV. (c. b.c. 1450), came to an end with Esarhaddon's invasion of Egypt (b.c. 670; cf. Jer 46th); and the destruction of Thebes by Ashurbanipal (c. b.c. 662; cf. Nah 3rd). After these events he was relegated to the ranks of the local gods. See NO, NO-AMON. N. KOENIG.

AMORITES.—An ancient people whose presence can be traced in Palestine and Syria and also in Babylonia. From Dt 3rd it appears that their language differed only dialectically from Canaanite, which was Hebrew. This view is confirmed by many proper names from the monuments. They were accordingly of the same race as the Canaanites. Contract tablets of the time of Hammurabi (b.c. 2250) show that Amorites were in Babylonia at that time (cf. Meissner, Altbab. Privatrecht, No. 42). At this period their country was designated by the ideogram MAR-TU. It has long been known that this ideogram stood for Palestine and Syria. At that time, then, the Amorites were already in the West.

Because of the identity of their proper names, it is believed that the Amorites were identical in race with that Semitic wave of immigration into Babylonia which produced the first dynasty of Babylon, the dynasty of Hammurabi (cf. Paton, Syria and Palestine, 25-29). Paton holds that an Amoritic wave of migration overran Babylonia and the Mediterranean coast about b.c. 2500, but Johns (Expos., April, 1906, p. 341) holds it probable, also on the basis of proper names, that the Amorites were in both Babylonia and the West before the time of Sargon, b.c. 3800.

About b.c. 1400 we learn from the el-Amarna tablets that the great valley between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges, which was afterwards called Coele-Syria, was inhabited by Amorites, whose prince was Aziru (cf. KIB, v. Nos. 42, 44, and 50). At some time they seem to have overrun Palestine also, for in the E document they are regarded as the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of the mountain-land of Palestine, whom the Hebrews conquered (cf. Nu 13th, Jos 24th. 13). This was also the view of the prophet Amos (2nd. 10), and, in part, of Ezekiel (16th. 45). The J document, on the other hand, regards the Canaanites (wh. see) as the original inhabitants of the country. As the J document originated in the southern kingdom and the E document in the northern, some have inferred that the Amorites were especially strong in Northern Palestine; but even the J document (Jg 1st. 31) recognizes that the Amorites were strong in the Valley of Ajlalon. In Jg 1st 'Amorites' is probably a corruption of 'Edomites.' (So G. F. Moore in SBOT.) Both J (Nu 32nd) and E (Nu 21st) represent the trans-Jordanic kingdom of king Shon, the capital of which was at Heshbon, and which extended from the Arnon to the Jabboq, as Amoritic, and several later Biblical writers reflect this view. This kingdom was overcome by the Israelites when they invaded Canaan. After the Israelitish conquest the Amorites disappear from our view.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

AMOS.—1. The man.—Amos, the earliest of the prophets whose writings have come down to us, and the initiator of one of the greatest movements in spiritual history, was a herdsman, or small sheep-farmer, in Tekoa, a small town lying on the uplands some six miles south of Bethlehem. He combined two occupations. The sheep he reared produced a particularly fine kind of wool, the sale of which doubtless took him from one market to another. But he was also a 'pincher of sycamores.' The fruit of this tree was hastened in its ripening process by being bruised or pinched; and as the sycamore does not grow at so great a height as Tekoa, this subsidiary occupation would bring Amos into touch with other political and religious circles. The simple life of the uplands, the isolation from the dissipation of a wealthier civilization, the aloofness from all priestly or prophetic guilds, had doubtless much to do with the directness of his vision and speech, and with the spiritual independence which found in him so noble an utterance. While he was thus a native of the kingdom of Judah, his prophetic activity awoke in the kingdom of Israel. Of this awakening he gives a most vivid picture in the account of his interview with Amaziah, the priest of Bethel (7th-17). He had gone to Bethel to some great religious feast, which was also a business market. The direct call from God to testify against the unrighteousness of both kingdoms had probably come to him not long before; and amidst the throng at Bethel he proclaimed his vision of Jehovah standing with a plumb-line to measure the defection of Israel, and prepared to punish the iniquity of the house of Jeroboam II. The northern kingdom had no pleasant memories of another prophet who had declared the judgment of God upon sin (2 K 9th); and Amaziah, the priest, thinking that Amos was one of a prophetic and official guild, contemptuously bade him begone to Judah, where he could prophesy for hire (7th). The answer came flashing back. Amos disclaimed all connexion with the hiring prophets whose 'word' was dictated by the immediate political and personal interest. He was something better and more honest—no prophet, neither a prophet's son, but a herdsman and a dresser of sycamores, called by God to prophesy to Israel. Herein lies much of his distinctiveness. The earlier prophetic impulse which had been embodied in the prophetic guilds had become professional and insincere. Amos brought prophecy back again into the line of direct inspiration.

2. The time in which he lived.—Am 1st may not be part of the original prophecy, but there is no reason to doubt its essential accuracy. Amos was prophesying in those years in which Uzziah and Jeroboam II. were reigning contemporaneously, b.c. 775-750. This date is of great importance, because few prophetic writings are so interpenetrated by the historical situation as those of Amos. For nearly 100 years prior to his time Israel had suffered severely from the attacks of Syria. She had lost the whole of her territory east of Jordan (2 K 10th); she had been made like 'dust in threshing' (13th). But now Syria had more than enough to do to defend herself from the southward pressure of Assyria; and the result was that Israel once more began to be prosperous and to regain her lost territories. Under Jeroboam II. this prosperity reached its climax. The people revelled in it, giving no thought to any further danger. Even Assyria was not feared, because she was busy with the settlement of internal affairs, rebellion and pestilence. Amos, however, knew that the relaxation of pressure could be but temporary. He saw that the Assyrian would eventually push past Damascus down into Palestine, and bring in the day of account; and although he nowhere names Assyria as the agent of God's anger, the references are unmistakable (52⁷ 67. 14 71⁷).

It is this careless prosperity with its accompanying unrighteousness and forgetfulness of God that is never out of the prophet's thoughts. The book is short, but the picture of a time of moral anarchy is complete. The outward religious observances are kept up, and the temples are thronged with worshippers (5⁸ 9¹); tithes and voluntary offerings are duly paid (4⁴ 5²²). But religion has divorced itself from morality, the stated worship of God from reverence for the character of God (2⁹). The rich have their winter houses and their summer houses (3¹⁴), houses built of hewn stone (5¹¹), and panelled with ivory (3¹⁶). They drink wine by the bowlful (6⁶), and the fines unjustly extorted from the defenceless are spent in the purchase of wine for the so-called religious feast (2⁸). Lazy, pampered women, 'kine of Bashan,' are foremost in this unholy oppression (4¹). There is no such thing as justice; the very semblance of it is the oppression of the weak by the strong. The righteous are sold for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes (2⁶); the houses of the great are stored with the spoils of robbery (3¹⁰); bribery and corruption, the besetting sins of the East, are rampant (5¹²). Commerce shares in the prevailing evil; weights are falsified and food is adulterated (8⁵ 6). Immorality is open and shameless (2⁷). Small wonder that the prophet declares as the word of the Lord, 'I hate, I despise your feasts, and I will take no delight in your solemn assemblies' (5²¹). While the observances of religion are maintained, the soul of religion has fled. Those who are responsible for the evil condition of things 'are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph' (6⁶).

3. Contents of the book.—The book is framed upon a definite plan, which is clearer in the opening section than in those which follow.

(i) 12-21⁶ treats of the judgment upon the nations for their sins. Damascus, Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab, Judah, and Israel are all passed under review. The assumption is that each people is subject to the dominion of Jehovah. Punishment will be visited upon each for the violation of some broad and universally recognized principle of humanity.

(ii) Chs. 3, 4, 5, three threatening discourses, each introduced by 'Hear ye this word.'

(iii) 7-9¹⁰, a series of five visions, interrupted in 7¹⁰⁻¹⁷ by the account of Amaziah's attempt to intimidate Amos. The visions are (a) the devouring locusts (7¹⁻³); (b) the consuming fire (7⁴⁻⁶); (c) the plumb-line (7⁷⁻⁹); (d) the basket of summer fruit (8¹⁻³); (e) the smitten sanctuary, and destruction of the worshippers (9¹⁻¹⁰).

9¹¹⁻¹⁶ is in striking contrast to the tone of the rest of the book. Instead of threatenings there are now promises. The line of David will be restored to its former splendour; the waste cities shall be built up; the settled agricultural life shall be resumed. This Epilogue is generally acknowledged to be a late addition to the prophecy. It contains no moral feature, no repentance, no new righteousness. It tells only of a people satisfied with vineyards and gardens. 'These are legitimate hopes; but they are hopes of a generation of other conditions and of other deserts than the generation of Amos' (G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, i. 195).

4. Theology of Amos.—In his religious outlook Amos had many successors, but he had no forerunner. His originality is complete.

(i) His view of Jehovah.—Hitherto Jehovah had been thought of as a Deity whose power over His own people was absolute, but who ceased to have influence when removed from certain geographical surroundings (1 K 20²³). The existence of other gods had not been questioned even by the most pious of the Israelites; they denied only that these other gods had any claim over the life of the people of Jehovah. But Amos will not hear of the existence of other gods. Jehovah is the God of the whole earth. His supreme claim is righteousness, and where that is not conceded He will punish. He rules over Syria and Caphtor, Moab and Ammon, just as truly as over Israel or Judah (1. 2. 6¹⁴ 9⁷). Nature too is under His rule. Every natural calamity and scourge are traced to the direct exercise of His will. Amos therefore lays down a great philosophy of history. God is all-righteous. All events and all peoples are in His hands. Political and natural catastrophes have religious significance (6¹⁴).

(ii) The relationship of Jehovah to Israel.—Amos, in common with his countrymen, considered the relation of Jehovah to Israel to be a special one. But while they had regarded it as an indissoluble relationship of privilege, a bond that could not be broken provided the stated sacrifices were maintained, Amos declared not only that it could be broken, but that the very existence of such a bond would lay Israel under heavier moral responsibilities than if she had been one of the Gentile nations (3²). As her opportunities had been greater, so too would her punishment for wasting them be proportionately severe. Jehovah's first demands were morality and justice and kindness, and any sacrificial system that removed the emphasis from these things and placed it on the observance of ritual was an abomination (5²¹⁻²⁶).

(iii) The inevitable judgment.—It is his certainty of the moral character of God that makes Amos so sure of the coming catastrophe. For the first time in Hebrew literature he uses the expression 'the day of the Lord'—a phrase that may already have been current in a more genial and privileged sense to indicate the day that will utterly destroy the nations (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 3¹²⁻¹⁶ 4² 5. 13). With this broad view of history, a view from which the idea of special privilege is excluded, he sees in the northern power the instrument of Jehovah's anger (5²⁷ 6¹⁴); a power that even in its self-aggrandisement is working out Jehovah's purpose.

5. Style.—It was the custom for many a century to accept the verdict of Jerome, that the prophet was rustic and unskilled in speech. That, however, is anything but the case. The arrangement of the book is clear; the Hebrew is pure; and the knowledge of the outside world is remarkable. The survey of the nations with which the prophecy opens is full of precise detail. Amos knows, too, that the Aramaeans migrated from Kir, and the Philistines from Caphtor (9⁷); he has heard of the swellings of the Nile (8⁸ 9⁶), and regards the fact with a curious dread. He has been a close observer of the social conditions in Israel. Much of his imagery is drawn from nature:—earthquakes and the eclipse of the sun, the cedars and the oaks, the roaring of the lion, the snaring of birds, the bite of the viper; once only does he draw a comparison from shepherd life (3²).

6. Religious significance.—Amos' true significance in religious history is that with him prophecy breaks away on its true line, individual, direct, responsible to none save God. The word of the Lord had come to Amos and he could not but speak (3⁸). Such a cause produced an inevitable effect. In that direct vision of Jehovah, Amos learned the truths which he was the first to proclaim to the world:—that Jehovah was the God of the whole earth; that the nations were in His keeping; that justice and righteousness were His great demands; that privilege, if it meant opportunity, meant likewise responsibility and liability to the doom of those who have seen and have not believed.

R. BRUCE TAYLOR.

AMAZ ('Amōs).—Father of the prophet Isaiah (2 K 19², Is 1¹ etc.), to be carefully distinguished from Amos ('Amōs) the prophet.

AMPHIPOLIS.—A town in a part of Macedonia formerly reckoned to Thrace, on the river Strymon, about 3 miles from its mouth, where the harbour Elon was situated. It was a place of great strategic and mercantile importance. It underwent various vicissitudes, but retained its importance based on its abundant supplies of excellent wine, figs, oil, and wood, its silver and gold mines, its woollen fabrics. The Romans raised it to the rank of a free town and the chief town of the first district of the province Macedonia; through it the Via Egnatia passed. The verb in the Greek (Ac 17¹) seems to indicate that St. Paul passed through it without preaching there. A. SOUTER.

AMPLIATUS (AV Amplias).—Greeted by St. Paul (Ro 16⁹), perhaps of the imperial household (Lightfoot on Ph 4²²), and a prominent Christian (Sanday-Headlam). The name, a common slave designation, is found inscribed in the catacombs. A. J. MACLEAN.

AMRAM.—1. A Levite, son of Kohath and grandson of Levi (Nu 3¹⁷⁻¹⁹, 1 Ch 6^{2-3, 18}). He married Jochebed his father's sister, by whom he begat Aaron and Moses (Ex 6¹⁸⁻²⁰) and Miriam (Nu 26⁵⁹, 1 Ch 6³). The Amramites are mentioned in Nu 3⁷, 1 Ch 26²³. 2. A son of Bani who had contracted a foreign marriage (Ezr 10³⁴).

AMRAPHEL.—The king of Shinar (Gn 14¹). He has been identified (by Schrader and usually) with Hammurabi, king of Babylonia, but apart from the difficulties due to differences of spelling, there is no evidence that Hammurabi was ever allied with a king of Elam and a king of Larsa to invade the West. Boscawen suggests AMAR-PAL, the ideographic writing of Sinmuballit, the father of Hammurabi, for whom such an alliance is more likely. See CHEDORLAOMER. C. H. W. JOHNS.

AMULETS AND CHARMS.—1. The custom of wearing amulets (amuletum from Arab. root = 'to carry') as charms to protect the wearer against the malign influence of evil spirits, and in particular against 'the evil eye', is almost as wide-spread as the human race itself. Children and domestic animals are supposed to be specially subject to such influence, and to-day 'in the Arabic border lands there is hardly a child, or almost an animal, which is not defended from the evil eye by a charm' (Doughty). The Jews were in this respect like the rest of the world, and in the Talmud it is said that ninety-nine deaths occur from the evil eye to one from natural causes (see MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORcery).

2. RV has substituted 'amulets' for AV 'ear-rings' in Is 3³⁶, the Heb. word being elsewhere associated with serpent-charming. There is nothing to indicate their precise nature or shape. Our knowledge of early Palestinian amulets has been greatly increased by the recent excavations at Gezer, Taanach, and Megiddo. These have brought to light hundreds of amulets, bewildering in their variety of substance and form—beads of various colours (the blue variety is the favourite amulet at the present day), pendants of slate, pieces of coral, bronze bells (cf. Ex 28³³ 39²⁵), a tiny ebony fish from the Maccabean period, a yellow glass pendant with 'good luck to the wearer' in reversed Greek letters (PEFSI, 1904, illust. p. 354), a small round silver box with blue enamel (ib. 1903, illust. p. 303), etc. The influence of Egypt, where amulets were worn by men and gods, by the living and the dead, is shown by the great number of scarabs and 'Horus eyes' unearthed at Gezer and Taanach.

3. The 'consecrated tokens' (2 Mac 12⁴⁰ RV) found by Judas Maccabeus on the bodies of his soldiers were heathen charms against death in battle, the peculiar Gr. word being a tr. of the Aram. word for 'amulet.' The Mishna (c. A.D. 200) shows that in NT times a favourite charm (gemta), whence our 'cameo' consisted of a piece of parchment inscribed with sacred or cabalistic writing, and suspended from the neck in a leather capsule. In this connexion it may be noted that 'phylactery' signifies an amulet, and like the mezuzah or door-post symbol, was often so regarded.

4. In antiquity jewels were worn quite as much for protective as for decorative purposes, being supposed to draw the attention of the spirit from the wearer. A popular form of jewel-amulet was the moon-shaped crescent in gold and silver, like those worn by the Jerusalem ladies (Is 3¹⁸ RV), and the 'crescents and pendants' worn by the Midianite chiefs and hung from the necks of their camels (Jg 8^{21, 28} RV). The ear-rings of Gn 35⁴, also, were evidently more than mere ornaments, so that AV and RV may both be right in their renderings—'ear-rings,' 'amulets'—of Is 3³⁶.

For the amulets worn by the heathen Arabs see Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heidenthums (1887), 143 ff., and for modern Jewish amulets the art. 'Amulet' in Hastings' DB. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AMUSEMENTS.—See GAMES.

AMZI.—1. A Merarite (1 Ch 6⁴⁶). 2. A priest in the second Temple (Neh 11¹²).

ANAB.—A city of Judah in the Negeb hills (Jos 11²¹ 15⁵⁰), inhabited first by the Anakim. Now the ruin 'Anab near Debir.

ANAEL.—Brother of Tobit and father of Achiacharus (To 12¹).

ANAH.—1. A daughter of Zibeon, and mother of Oholibamah, one of Esau's wives (Gn 36^{2-14, 18, 28} (R)). Some ancient authorities (including LXX. Sam. Pesh.) read son instead of daughter, which would identify this Anah with—2. A son of Zibeon (Gn 36²⁴ (R)), 1 Ch 1^{40, 41}). 3. A Horite 'duke,' brother of Zibeon (Gn 36^{29, 29} (R)), 1 Ch 1³⁸). If we take Anah as an eponym rather than a personal name, and think of relationships between clans rather than individuals, it is quite possible to reduce the above three references to one. In regard to No. 2 the note is appended, 'This is Anah who found the hot springs (AV wrongly 'the mules') in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father' (Gn 36²⁴).

ANAHARATH (Jos 19¹⁹), mentioned with Shion and Rabbith on the east side of the Plain of Esdraelon in Issachar. It is perhaps the modern en-Na'urah in the Valley of Jezreel.

ANANIAH ('J' hath answered').—1. A Levite (Neh 8⁴), called Ananias in 1 Es 9¹². 2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁹).

ANAK, ANAKIM.—Early inhabitants of the high levels of Judah, whom tradition credited with colossal height. The word Anak is properly a race-name, and, being often used with the article, it is really an appellative, probably meaning 'the long-necked (people)'. In the genealogizing narrative of Jos 15^{13, 14} there were three sons or clans of Anak; Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi. These were all driven out by Caleb (cf. Jg 1²⁰). Jos 11²¹ gives them a wider habitat, as scattered over the hill-country of Palestine generally, whence they were exterminated by Joshua. In Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod some remnants were to be found after Joshua's time (11²²). See also ARBA. J. F. McCURDY.

ANAMIM.—A people, not yet identified, named in Gn 10¹³ (1 Ch 1⁴) among the descendants of Mizraim, and therefore to be found somewhere in Egypt.

J. F. McCURDY.

ANAMMELECH.—A god worshipped by captives transplanted from Sepharvaim to Samaria by the Assyrians (2 K 17²⁸). As human sacrifice (v.³¹) was the most prominent rite connected with the god's worship, the name, which might be interpreted as meaning 'Anu is prince,' in all probability owes its origin to a scribal endeavour to identify the god with Molech, in whose cult a similar practice existed. See also ADAMMELECH. N. KOENIG.

ANAN.—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁸). 2. 1 Es 5³⁰—Hanan, Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7⁴.

ANANI.—A son of Elioenai (1 Ch 3²⁴).

ANANIAH.—1. Neh 3²², the father of Maaseiah, and grandfather of Azariah, who took part in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. 2. A town inhabited by Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh 11²²). Possibly the modern Beit Hanina, a village 2 miles N. of Jerusalem.

ANANIAS.—This name occurs several times in the Apocrypha: in 1 Es 9²¹⁻²², 43, 44 (representing 'Hanani' and 'Hananiah' of Ezr 10²⁰⁻²², 'Anaiiah' and 'Hanan' of Neh 8⁴⁻⁷) and in To 5¹², Jth 8⁴. It is the name of three persons in NT. 1. The husband of Sapphira, who in the voluntary communism of the early Church sold 'a possession' and kept part of the price for himself, pretending that he had given the whole (Ac 5¹²). The sudden death of husband and wife, predicted by St. Peter, was the signal proof of God's anger on this Judas-like hypocrisy. 2. A 'devout man according to the law' at Damascus, a disciple who instructed and baptized Saul of Tarsus after his conversion, restoring to him his sight by imposition of hands; he had been warned by the Lord in a vision (Ac 9¹⁰⁻¹², 22¹²). 3. The high priest at the time when St. Paul was arrested at Jerusalem (Ac 23²), a Sadducee, son of Nedebeus, and a rapacious oppressor. He had been in trouble at Rome, but was acquitted, and was now at the height of his power. He pressed the prosecution against St. Paul at Caesarea (Ac 24¹). In the Jewish war he was murdered by his countrymen in Jerusalem, out of revenge for his pro-Roman tendencies. A. J. MACLEAN.

ANANIEL.—One of the ancestors of Tobit (To 1¹).

ANATH.—The father of Shamgar (Jg 3³¹ 5⁶). 'Anât is the name of a goddess worshipped in Pal. (cf. Jg 1³, Jos 15⁴⁹, Is 10³⁰); it is found on Egyptian monuments from the 18th dynasty.

ANATHEMA.—See BAN.

ANATHOTH.—1. A town in Benjamin given to the Levites (Jos 21¹⁸); the modern 'Andia, 2½ miles N. of Jerusalem, an insignificant village with considerable ruins. It was the home of Abiathar (1 K 2²⁶) and of Jeremiah (Jer 1¹); re-occupied after the exile (Neh 7²⁷ 10¹⁹). 2. A Benjamite, son of Becher (1 Ch 7⁴). W. EWING.

ANCESTOR-WORSHIP.—Every people whose religious beliefs have been investigated appears to have passed through the stage of Animism, the stage in which it was believed that the spirits of those recently dead were potent to hurt those they had left behind on earth. The rites observed to-day at an Irish wake have their origin in this fear that the spirit of the dead may injure the living. There are several traces of a similar belief in the OT. When a death took place in a tent or house, every vessel which happened to be open at the time was counted unclean (Nu 19¹³). It remained clean only if it had a covering tied over it. The idea was that the spirit of the dead person, escaping from the body, might take up its abode in some open vessel instead of entering the gloomy realms of Sheol. Many mourning customs find their explanation in this same dread of the spirit but lately set free from its human home. The shaving of the head and beard, the cutting of the face and breast, the tearing of the garments—apparently a survival of the time when the mourner stripped off all his clothes—are due to the effort of the survivor to make himself unrecognizable by the spirit.

But to admit that the OT contains traces of Animism is not the same as to declare that at one stage the Israelites practised Ancestor-worship. Scholars are divided into two groups on the subject. Some (Stade, GVI i. 451; Smend, Alttest. Relig. 112 f.) affirm that Ancestor-worship was of the very substance of the primitive religion of Israel. Others do not at all admit this position (Kautzsch, in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. 614; W. P. Paterson, ib. ii. 445^b). The evidence adduced for Ancestor-worship as a stage in the religious development of Israel proceeds on these lines:

(a) Sacrifices were offered at Hebron to Abraham, and at Shechem to Joseph, long before these places were associated with the worship of Jehovah. When a purer faith took possession of men's hearts, the old sacred spots retained their sanctity, but new associations were attached to them. A theophany was now declared to be the fact underlying the sacredness; and the connexion with the famous dead was thus broken. In the same way sacred trees and stones, associated with the old Canaanitish worship, had their evil associations removed by being linked with some great event in the history of Israel. But this existence of sacred places connected with the burial of a great tribal or national hero does not at all prove Ancestor-worship. It is possible to keep fresh a great man's memory without believing that he can either help or hinder the life of those on earth.

(b) Evidence from mourning customs. It is held that the cutting and wounding (Jer 16⁴ 41⁴), the covering of the head (Ezk 24¹⁷, Jer 14³), the rending of the garments (2 S 1¹¹ 31¹), the wearing of sackcloth (2 S 21¹⁰, Is 15³), are to be explained as a personal dedication to the spirit of the dead. But all this, as we have seen, can be explained as the effort so to alter the familiar appearance that the spirit, on returning to work harm, will not recognize the objects of its spite. Then the customs that had to do with food, the fasting for the dead (1 S 31¹³, 2 S 3³⁵)—the breaking of the fast by a funeral feast after sundown (Hos 9⁴, 2 S 3³⁵, Jer 16⁷), the placing of food upon the grave (Dt 26¹⁴)—do not prove that Ancestor-worship was a custom of the Hebrews. They only show that the attempt was made to appease the spirit of the dead, and that this was done by a sacrifice, which, like all primitive sacrifices, was afterwards eaten by the worshippers themselves. When these funeral rites were forbidden, it was because they were heathenish and unfitting for a people that worshipped the true God.

(c) The teraphim, it is said, were some form of household god, shaped in human form (1 S 19¹³⁻¹⁶), carried about as one of the most precious possessions of the home (Gn 31), consulted in divination (Ezk 21²¹), presumably as representing the forefathers of the family. But nothing is known with certainty regarding the teraphim. That they were of human form is a very bold inference from the evidence afforded by 1 S 19¹³⁻¹⁶. The variety of derivations given by the Jews of the word teraphim shows that there was complete ignorance as to their origin and appearance.

(d) In 1 S 28¹³ the spirit of Samuel, called up by the witch of Endor, is called elohim. But it is very precarious to build on an obscure passage of this kind, especially as the use of the word elohim is so wide (applied to God, angels, and possibly even judges or kings) that no inference can be drawn from this passage.

(e) It is argued that the object of the levirate marriage (Dt 25⁵⁻⁶) was to prevent any deceased person being left in Sheol without some one on earth to offer him worship. But the motive stated in v. 8, 'that his name be not put out in Israel,' is so sufficient that the connexion of the levirate marriage with Ancestor-worship seems forced.

The case for the existence of Ancestor-worship among the Hebrews has not been made out. As a branch of the Semitic stock, the Hebrews were, of course, heirs of the common Semitic tradition. And while that tradition did contain much that was superstitious with regard to the power of the dead to work evil on the living, it does not appear that the worship of ancestors, which in other races was so often associated with the stage of Animism, had a place in Hebrew religion. ANCIENT OF DAYS occurs 3 times in Daniel (7⁹, 8¹³, 10⁵) as a title of God in His capacity as Judge of the world. In the Vision of the Great Assizes He is depicted as: a very old and majestic figure, with white hair and white raiment, seated on a fiery throne, and having the books of the records of man opened before Him. The picture is no doubt suggested by the contrast between the Eternal God (Ps 55¹⁹) and the new-fangled deities which were from time to time introduced (Jg 5⁸, Dt 32¹⁷), rather than, as Hippolytus (quoted by Behrmann, Das Buch Daniel, p. 46) suggests, by the idea of God as making the ages old without turning old Himself. In the troublous times which are represented by the Book of Daniel, it was at once a comfort and a warning to remember that above the fleeting phases of life there sat One who remained eternally the same (Ps 90¹⁻³ 102²⁴⁻²⁷). At the same time it is worth remembering that the phrase in itself has no mystical significance, but, by an idiom common in Hebrew as in other languages, is merely a paraphrase for 'an old man.'

H. C. O. LANCHESTER.

ANDREW.—One of the twelve Apostles, Simon Peter's brother (Jn 1⁴⁰). He belonged to Bethsaida of Galilee (v.⁴⁴), the harbour-town of Capernaum (see BETHSAIDA), and was a fisherman on the lake in company with Simon (Mt 4¹⁸ = Mk 1¹⁶), whose home he also shared (Mk 1²⁹). Ere he knew Jesus he had been influenced by the preaching of John the Baptist, and became his disciple, and it was on hearing the Baptist's testimony that he attached himself to Jesus (Jn 1³⁵⁻⁴⁰). He brought his brother Simon to the newly found Messiah (v.⁴¹), thus earning the distinction of being the first missionary of the Kingdom of heaven; and it seems that, like the favoured three, he enjoyed a special intimacy with the Master (Mk 13³). Tradition adds that he was crucified at Patrae in Achaia, and hung alive on the cross for two days, exhorting the spectators all the while.

DAVID SMITH.

ANDRONICUS.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul (Ro 16⁷) as a 'kinsman,' i.e. as a fellow-countryman (cf. Ro 9¹³ 16¹¹⁻²¹), who had been imprisoned for Christ; distinguished as an Apostle (in the largest sense of the name), and a believer from early days, having perhaps come to Rome after the persecution of Ac 11¹⁹).

A. J. MACLEAN.

ANEM (1 Ch 6⁷³ only).—A town of Issachar, noticed with Ramoth. It appears to answer to En-gannim (wh. see) in the parallel list (Jos 21²⁹).

ANER.—1. One of the three Amorite chieftains, the other two being Mamre and Eshcol, who were in covenant with Abraham (Gn 14¹³⁻²⁴). As Mamre is an old name for Hebron (Gn 23²), and Eshcol is the name of a valley not far from Hebron (Nu 13²²), it is natural to suppose that Aner also was the name of a locality which gave its name to a clan. 2. (1 Ch 6⁷⁰ only).—A town of Manasseh, west of Jordan. The site is doubtful.

ANGEL.—1. Old Testament.—That in the OT the existence of angels is taken for granted, and that therefore no account of their origin is given, is to be explained by the fact that belief in them is based upon an earlier Animism,* such as is common to all races in the pre-polytheistic stage of culture. The whole material for the development of Israelite angelology was at hand ready to be used. It must therefore not cause surprise if we find that in its earlier stages the differentiation between Jahweh and angels should be one of degree rather than of kind (see ANGEL OF THE LORD). This is clearly brought out in the earliest of the Biblical documents (J), e.g. in Gn 18; here Jahweh is one of three who are represented as companions, Jahweh taking the leading position, though equal honour is shown to all; that the two men with Jahweh are angels is directly asserted in 19¹, where we are told that they went to Sodom, after it had been said in 18² that Jahweh 'went his way.' Moreover, Jahweh's original identity with an angel, according to the early Hebrew conception, is distinctly seen by comparing, for example, such a passage as Ex 3² with v.⁴; in the former it is the 'angel of the Lord' who appears in the burning bush, in the latter it is God; there is, furthermore, direct identification in Gn 16⁷⁻⁹ 21¹⁷. In the earliest document in which angels are mentioned (J) they appear only by twos or threes, in the later document (E) they appear in greater numbers (Gn 28¹² 32¹⁻²); this is just what is to be expected, for J, the earlier document, represents Jahweh in a less exalted form, who Himself comes down to earth, and personally carries out His purposes; by degrees, however, more exalted conceptions of Him obtain, especially as the conception of His characteristic of holiness becomes realized, so that His presence among men comes to appear incongruous and unfitting, and His activity is delegated to His messengers or angels (see ANGEL OF THE LORD).

(a) The English word 'angel' is too specific for the Hebrew (mal'akh) for which it is the usual equivalent; for in the Hebrew it is used in reference to men (e.g. Gn 32¹, Dt 2², Jg 6², Is 33⁷, Mal 1¹), as well as to superhuman beings. Besides the word mal'akh there are several other expressions used for what would come under the category of angels, viz.: 'sons of God' (bene 'elohim),* Gn 6²⁻⁴; 'sons of the mighty' (bene 'elim), Ps 89⁷ (6) 29¹; 'mighty ones' (gibborim), Jl 4¹¹ (31¹ EV); 'the holy ones' (qedoshim), Zec 14⁵; 'keepers' (shomerim), Is 62⁶; 'watchers' ('irim), Dn 4¹⁴ (17). There are also the three expressions: 'the host of Jahweh' (zeba' Jahweh), Jos 5¹⁴; 'the host of the height' (zeba' marmom), Is 24²¹; 'the host of heaven' (zeba' shamaim), Dt 17² (see also CHERUBIM, SERAPHIM).

(b) Angels are represented as appearing in human form, and as having many human characteristics: they speak like men (1 K 19³); they eat (Gn 18⁸); they fight (Gn 32², Jl 4¹¹ (31¹), cf. 2 S 5²⁴); they possess wisdom, with which that of men is compared (2 S 14¹⁷⁻²⁰); they have imperfections (Job 4⁸). On the other hand, they can become invisible (2 K 6¹⁷, Ps 104⁴), and they can fly, if, as appears to be the case, seraphim are to be included under the category of angels (Is 6²).

(c) The functions of angels may be briefly summarized thus: they guide men, e.g. an angel guides the children of Israel on their way to the promised land (Ex 23²⁰⁻²¹, see below), and it is by the guidance of an angel that Abraham's servant goes in quest of a wife for Isaac (Gn 24⁷⁻⁴⁰); in Job 33²³ an angel guides a man in what is right;† they are more especially the guides of the prophets (1 K 13¹⁸ 19²⁶, 2 K 1³⁻¹⁵, Zec 1⁹); they bring evil and destruction upon men (2 S 24¹⁶⁻¹⁷, 2 K 19³⁵, Ps 35⁶ 78⁴⁹, Job 33²²; in Pr 18¹⁴ the wrath of a king is likened to angels of death); on the other hand, they are the protectors of men (Ps 34⁸ (7) 91¹¹), and save them from destruction (Gn 19¹⁵⁻²²); their power is superhuman (2 K 6¹⁷, cf. Zec 12⁸); they report to God what is going on upon the earth (Job 1⁸ 2¹), for which purpose they are represented as riding on horseback (Zec 1⁸⁻¹⁰, cf. Ps 18¹¹ (10), Is 19¹ 5); their chief duty above is that of praising God (Gn 28¹², Ps 103²⁰). Angelic beings seem to be referred to as 'watchmen' in Is 62⁶ and Dn 4¹⁴ (17). An early mythological element regarding angels is perhaps re-echoed in such passages as Jg 5²⁰. Is 40²⁶⁻²⁸, and elsewhere.

(d) In Ezekiel, angels, under this designation, are never mentioned, though the angelology of this book * Cf. the analogous expression 'sons of the prophets' (bene nebi'im).

† The word used in this passage is not the usual one for angel, though its sense of 'messenger' (mal'it) is the same as that of mal'akh.

‡ Though not specifically stated, angels are obviously referred to here.

shows considerable development; other names are given to them, but their main function, viz. messengers of God, is the same as in the earlier books; for example, in 2^d it is a 'spirit,' instead of an 'angel,' who acts as an intermediary being, see, too, 3^{12d}. 11^{5d}.; in 8^{1d}. 40¹ a vision is attributed to 'the hand of the Lord'; in 40^{5d}. it is a 'man' of a supernatural kind who instructs the prophet; and again, in 9^{5d}. 'men,' though clearly not of human kind (see v. 11), destroy the wicked in Jerusalem. In Ezk., as well as in Zec., angels take up a very definite position of intermediate beings between God and man, one of their chief functions being that of interpreting visions which Divine action creates in the mind of men; in both these books angels are called 'men,' and in both the earlier idea of the 'Angel of the Lord' has its counterpart in the prominent position taken up by some particular angel who is the interpreter of visions. In Zec. different orders of angels are for the first time mentioned (2³. 4 31⁴ 41). In Daniel there is a further development; the angels are termed 'watchers' (4¹³. 17), and 'princes' (10¹³) (10¹³); they have names, e.g. Michael (10¹³ 12¹), Gabriel (8¹⁶), and there are special angels ('princes') who fight for special nations (10²⁰. 21). As in Zec. so in Daniel there are different orders among the angels, but in the latter book the different categories are more fully developed.

In the attitude taken up in these later books we may see the link between the earlier belief and its development in post-Biblical Jewish literature. The main factors which contributed to this development were, firstly, Babylon; during the Captivity, Babylonian influence upon the Jews asserted itself in this as well as in other respects; according to Jewish tradition the names of the angels came from Babylon. Secondly, Persian influence was of a marked character in post-exilic times; the Zoroastrian belief that Ormuzd had a host of pure angels of light who surrounded him and fulfilled his commands, was a ready-made development of the Jewish belief, handed down from much earlier times, that angels were the messengers of Jahweh. Later still, a certain amount of Greek influence was also exercised upon Jewish angelology.

2. The Apocrypha.—Some of the characteristics of angels here are identical with some of those found in the OT, viz.: they appear in human form (2 Es 1¹⁰), they speak like men (To 5^{5d}.), they guide men (v. 2¹), they bring destruction upon men (1 Mac 7⁴¹. 42); on the other hand, they heal men (To 3¹⁷), their power is superhuman (12¹⁶, Bel 3^{5d}. Three 2⁶), and they praise God (2 Es 8³⁴, Three 3⁷). The angelology of the Apocrypha is, however, far more closely allied to that of Ezk., Zec., and Daniel than the angelology of these to that of the rest of the OT; this will be clearly seen by enumerating briefly the main characteristics of angels as portrayed in the Apocrypha.

In 2 Esdras an angel frequently appears as an instructor of heavenly things; thus in 10²⁸ an angel causes Esdras to fall into a trance in order to receive instruction in spiritual matters; in 2², after an angel has instructed Esdras, the latter is commanded to tell others what he had learned; sometimes an angel is identified with God, e.g. in 5¹⁰. 41 7³, but usually there is very distinct differentiation; sometimes the angel seems almost to be the alter ego of Esdras, arguing with himself (cf. 5²¹. 22 12^{5d}.). In To 12^{5d}.-15 there are some important details,—here an angel instructs in manner of life, but more striking is the teaching that he brings to remembrance before God the prayers of the faithful, and that he superintends the burial of the dead;* he has a name, Raphael,† and is one of the seven holy angels ('archangels') who present the prayers of the saints, and who go constantly in and out before the presence of God; that there are ranks among the angels is thus taught here more categorically than in the later Biblical books. Further, the idea of guardian-angels is characteristic of the Apocrypha; that individuals have their guardian-angels is clearly implied in To 5²⁴, that armies have such is taught in 2 Mac 11⁵ 15²³, while in 2 Mac 3^{5d}. occurs a Jewish counterpart of the Roman legend of Castor and Pollux; there is possibly, in Sir 17¹⁷, an indication that nations also have their guardian-angels;* if so, it would be the lineal descendant of the early Israelite belief in national gods. The dealings of angels with men are of a very varied character, for besides the details already enumerated, we have these further points: in Bar 6^{3d}. an angel is to be the means whereby the Israelites in Babylon shall be helped to withstand the temptation to worship the false gods of the land; in To 6⁷. 16. 17 an angel describes a method whereby an evil spirit may be driven away; in v. 8 an angel gives a remedy for healing blindness; in Bel 3^{5d}. an angel takes the prophet Habakkuk by the hair and carries him from Judah to Babylon, in order that he may share his dinner with Daniel in the lion's den; and, once more, in Three 2⁶. 27 an angel smites the flame of the furnace into which the three heroes had been cast, and makes a cool wind to blow in its place (cf. Dn 3^{25d}.).

* Cf., in Egyptian belief, the similar functions of Isis and Nephthys.

It will thus be seen that the activities of angels are, according to the Apocrypha, of a very varied character. One further important fact remains to be noted: they are almost invariably the benefactors of man, their power far transcends that of man, sometimes an angel is identified with God, yet in spite of this, with one possible exception, 2 Mac 4¹⁰-13, no worship is ever offered to them; this is true also of the OT, excepting when an angel is identified with Jahweh; in the NT there is at least one case of the worship of an angel, Rev 22⁸. 9, cf. Col 2¹⁸. The angelology of the Apocrypha is expanded to an almost unlimited extent in later Jewish writings, more especially in the Book of Enoch, in the Targums, and in the Talmud; but with these we are not concerned here.

3. New Testament.—(a) In the Gospels it is necessary to differentiate between what is said by Christ Himself on the subject and what is narrated by the Evangelists. Christ's teaching regarding angels may be summed up thus: their dwelling-place is in heaven (Mt 18¹⁰, Lk 12⁸. 9, Jn 1⁹); they are superior to men, but in the world to come the righteous shall be on an equality with them (Lk 20³⁶); they carry away the souls of the righteous to a place of rest (Lk 16²²); they are (as seems to be implied) of neither sex (Mt 22³⁰); they are very numerous (Mt 26⁵³); they will appear with Christ at His second coming [it is in connexion with this that most of Christ's references to angels are made Mt: 13³⁹ 16²⁷ 24³¹ 25³¹, Mk 8³⁸, Lk 9²⁶, cf. Jn 1⁹]; there are bad as well as good angels (Mt 25⁴¹), though it is usually of the latter that mention is made; they are limited in knowledge (Mt 24³⁶); there are guardian-angels of children (Mt 18¹⁰); they rejoice at the triumph of good (Lk 15¹⁰). Turning to the Evangelists, we find that the main function of angels is to deliver God's messages to men (e.g. Mt 1²⁰ 2¹⁰ 28⁵, Lk 1²⁸ 24²²). On only one occasion are angels brought into direct contact with Christ (Mt 4¹, with the parallel passage Mk 1¹³), and it is noteworthy that in the corresponding verse in the Third Gospel (Lk 4¹³) there is no mention of angels. Thus the main differences between Christ's teaching on angels and that which went before are that they are not active among men, their abode and their work are rather in the realms above; they are not the intermediaries between God and men, for it is either Christ Himself, or the Holy Spirit, who speaks directly to men; much emphasis is laid on their presence with Christ at His second coming. On the other hand

* Cf. this idea in the case of the Angel of the Lord (which see) the earlier belief is reflected in the Gospel angelophanies, which are a marked characteristic of the Nativity and Resurrection narratives; though here, too, a distinct and significant difference is found in that the angel is always clearly differentiated from God.

(b) In the Acts there seems to be a return to the earlier beliefs, angelic appearances to men being frequently mentioned (5¹⁹ 7³⁰ 11¹³ 12⁹ etc.); their activity in the affairs of men is in somewhat startling contrast with the silence of Christ on the subject. It is possible that most of the references in the Acts will permit of an explanation in the direction of the angelical appearances being subjective visions (e.g. 8²⁶ 10³ 27²³ 24); but such occurrences as are recorded in 5¹⁹ 20 12⁷ (both belonging to the Petrine ministry) would require a different explanation; while that mentioned in 12²³ would seem to be the popular explanation of an event which could easily be accounted for now in other ways. The mention, in 12¹⁶, of what is called St. Peter's 'angel' gives some insight into the current popular views concerning angels; it seems clear that a distinction was made between an angel and a spirit (Ac 23⁸ 9).

(c) In the Pauline Epistles the origin of angels is stated to be their creation by Christ (Col 1¹⁶); as in the Acts, they are concerned with the affairs of men (1 Co 4⁹ 11¹⁰, Ro 8³⁸, 1 Ti 5²¹); at the same time St. Paul emphasizes the teaching of Christ that God speaks to men directly, and not through the intermediacy of angels (Gal 1², cf. Ac 9⁵); in Col 2¹⁸ a warning against the worshipping of angels is uttered, with which compare the worshipping of demons in 1 Co 10²¹; in accordance with Christ's teaching St. Paul speaks of the presence of angels at the Second Coming (2 Th 1⁷).

(d) In the Ep. to the Hebrews the standpoint, as would be expected, is that of the OT, while in the Apocalypse the angelology is that common to other apocalyptic literature (cf. also the archangel of Jude 9).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ANGEL OF THE LORD (JAHWEH), called also the 'Angel of God.'—He occupies a special and unique position; he is not merely one among the angels, albeit a great one, but one sui generis, in a special way Jahweh's representative among men. He may be regarded as in some sense the guardian-angel of the nation of Israel, in that he appears to be the nation's representative at important crises (e.g. Gn 22¹¹, 15¹⁷, Ex 3² 14¹⁸ 23², Nu 22²², Jg 6¹¹, 2 K 1³, Zec 1⁹).

He appears in human form, and most of the characteristics of angels generally are his. The main difficulty with regard to him is that while in some passages he is identified with Jahweh Himself (e.g. Gn 48¹⁶, 16, Jg 6¹¹⁻²⁴), in others there is a distinct differentiation, (e.g. Gn 16¹¹ 21¹⁷ 24⁷; in this last he is spoken of as having been sent from Jahweh); this differentiation becomes more and more marked in the later books (e.g. Zec 1⁹). The contradiction here presented can be adequately explained only on the supposition that the evolution of thought on the subject must have run somewhat on the following lines. From the earliest angelology of the Hebrews, itself the offspring of still earlier Animistic conceptions (see ANGEL), there emerged the figure of Jahweh; originally, i.e. long before the time of Moses, Jahweh must, in the popular mind, have been regarded as belonging to the angelic host, and by degrees He assumed a more and more exalted position; as subjective revelation increased, the more fully did the personality of Jahweh become realized, and His superiority to the angels recognized, though in the process it was inevitable that the differentiation should not always be complete. When ultimately, under the Mosaic dispensation, the holy character and the real nature of Jahweh began to be apprehended, the belief that He personally appeared among men necessarily became more and more untenable; hence, while Jahweh Himself receded further from men, His messenger, or angel, appeared in His stead, and became

His representative in all His dealings with men. What must have been such a revolution in the time-honoured faith would meet with many retrograde movements before it finally triumphed, as is shown by such passages as Jg 6¹⁹⁻²¹. Some such process must be predicated in order to understand the otherwise unaccountable contradiction referred to above.

The angel of the Lord spoken of in the NT (e.g. Mt 1²⁰ Lk 2⁹) must not be confounded with the OT 'Angel of Jahweh'; an OT parallel is to be found rather in such a passage as Zec 3¹⁻⁷, where the angel is one of a kind, not the only one of his kind.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ANGELS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES (Rev 1²⁰ 2. 3).

—1. According to one set of opinions, these angels were men, and the majority of writers have held them to be (1) the presiding presbyters or bishops of their respective churches. But while this view is attractive and popular, the reasons against it are strong. Human officials could hardly be made responsible for their churches as these angels are. A bishop might be called an angel, i.e. a messenger, of God or of Christ (cf. Hag 1¹³, Mal 2⁷, 2 Co 5²⁰), but would he be called 'the angel of the church'? Above all, it is certain that at the early date to which the Apocalypse is now generally assigned a settled episcopate was unknown. (2) Others have supposed that the angels were congregational representatives, church messengers or deputies (which would be in harmony with the proper meaning of the word 'angel'), or even the person who acted as 'Reader' to the assembled church (notice 'he that readeth' in v. 3). But if the responsibility put upon the angels is too great for bishops, it is much too great for any lesser functionaries. Besides, the glory and dignity assigned to them as the stars of the churches (1²⁰) is inconsistent with a position like that of a mere Reader or deputy.

2. A good many have held that 'angels' is to be understood in its ordinary Scriptural application, not to men, but to celestial beings. In support of this are—(1) the fact that throughout the rest of the book the Gr. word, which is of very frequent occurrence, is invariably used in this sense; (2) our Lord's utterance in Mt 18¹⁰, which suggests a doctrine of angelic guardianship; (3) the fact that in Daniel, to which the Apocalypse is so closely related, the guardianship of angels is extended to nations (12¹). The objections, however, are serious. No definite Scriptural teaching can be adduced in favour of the idea that churches have their guardian-angels. Messages intended for churches would hardly be addressed to celestial beings. Moreover, it is scarcely conceivable that such beings would be identified with particular churches in all their infidelities and shortcomings and transgressions, as these angels are (see, e.g., 3¹, 15¹⁷).

3. The most probable view, accordingly, is that the angels are personifications of their churches—not actual persons either on earth or in heaven, but ideal representatives. It is the church, of course, that receives the letter, the 'Thou' of address having manifestly a collective force, and it is to the church itself that the letter is sent (cf. 1¹¹, where there is no mention of the angels). The idea of angels was suggested, no doubt, by the later Jewish beliefs on the subject, but it is used in a figurative manner which suits the whole figurative treatment, where the glorified Jesus walks among the golden candlesticks, and sends to the churches messages that are couched in highly metaphorical language. It might seem to be against this ideal view that the seven churches, as candlesticks, are definitely distinguished from the seven angels, as stars (1¹², 16, 20). But it is quite in keeping with the inevitable distinction between an actual and an ideal church that they should be thus contrasted as a lamp and a star. J. C. LAMBERT.

ANGER.—In OT 'anger' represents about a dozen Heb. roots, which occur as nouns, vbs. (once 'angered' used transitively, Ps 106²²), and adjs. By far the most frequent words are anaph (lit. 'to snort') and its deriv. noun aph, which is used of the anger both of men (Gn 27⁴ 30², Ex 11⁸ 32¹⁸ etc.) and God (Ex 4¹⁴ 32²², Ps 61⁷ etc.). In NT 'anger' is of much less frequent occurrence, and represents only 2 roots: (1) the noun orge (wh., however, is usually tr. 'wrath'), the vb. orgizomai, the adj. orgilos (only in Tit 1⁷), and the trans. vb. parorgizo (Ro 10¹⁹, the only case of a trans. use of 'anger' in NT); (2) the vb. choloō (lit. 'to be full of bile,' fr. cholē, 'bile'), used only in Jn 7²² to express the bitter anger of 'the Jews' against Jesus. With regard to the distinction between orge and the synon. thumos, it is to be noted that while orge is very often tr. 'wrath,' thumos is never tr. 'anger,' and when the two words occur together, thumos in each case is 'wrath' (Ro 2⁸, Eph 4³¹, Col 3⁸) and orge 'anger' (Eph 4³¹, Col 3⁸) or 'indignation' (Ro 2⁸). Thumos is the more violent word, denoting anger as a strong passion or emotion, while orge points rather to a settled moral indignation. Thus orge is used of the sorrowful anger of Jesus (Mk 3⁵); thumos of the rage of His enemies (Lk 4²⁸; cf. Ac 19²⁸). And, outside of the Apocalypse, thumos is applied almost exclusively to the wrath of men (the only exception being Ro 2⁸), while orge in the great majority of cases (Mt 3⁷, Jn 3³⁶, Ro 1¹⁸ etc.) denotes the righteous indignation of God.

J. C. LAMBERT.

ANGER (WRATH) OF GOD.—It might seem that the idea of the Divine anger, manifesting itself in judgments of destruction, belongs to an early and anthropomorphic stage of religion. Yet, on the whole, the Biblical conception will be found consistent and profoundly ethical. God is holy—a term which seems to unite all the unapproachable perfections of Deity, especially His majesty and awful purity. He is the 'Holy One of Israel,' in covenant relation with a nation to whom He has revealed Himself as holy, and whom He will fashion with slow redemptive purpose into 'an holy people.' Moreover, God is righteous, a moral governor and lawgiver, demanding obedience and punishing transgression of His commands. The Divine holiness is not an element in an abstract conception of Deity: it is not a passive perfection, but an active attribute of a self-revealing and redeeming God. It follows that one side of this activity is necessarily a reaction against, a repudiation of, what is unholy and unrighteous in His creatures. This disposition towards sin is the anger or wrath of God. In the history of Israel it appears as a terrible factor in the discipline of the nation to righteousness: the ungrateful, the rebellious, and especially the idolatrous, are destroyed by fire and sword, pestilence and famine (Ps 78, Dt 32¹⁸⁻⁴²). So 'jealous' is God for His holiness, that even accidental profanation of its symbol, the Ark, is visited by extreme penalty (1 S 6¹⁹⁻²⁰, 2 S 6⁷). But the anger of the Lord, though fierce, is also just: it is 'provoked' by moral causes and for moral ends, and is averted by penitence and moral acquiescence in the righteousness of His judgments (Ex 32, Lv 10², Nu 25¹¹, Dt 13⁷). Psalmist and Prophet dwell upon the subordination of the Divine anger to the Divine mercy. God is 'slow to anger' (Ps 103⁹ 145⁸, Jl 2¹³, Jon 4¹, Nah 1³), and His anger passes away (Ps 30⁴, Is 12¹, Jer 31², Mic 7¹⁸).

Yet the wrath of God remains an essential element of His revelation through the prophets, a real Divine attribute, complementary, not antithetic to the Divine mercy (Is 1¹⁸⁻²⁰ 5²⁵ 42²⁵ 54⁸). In the NT, although the stress has shifted to the love of God revealed to the world in Jesus Christ, the anger of God still holds place. The teaching of Jesus, while refusing to see in all physical ills the Divine displeasure against sin (Lk 13¹⁻⁵, Jn 9¹), contains impressive warning of the terrible reality of God's judgments (Lk 13³⁻⁵, Mt 25³⁰⁻⁴¹, Lk 12⁵). In St. Paul's writings this conception of judgment, held in reserve against unrepentant sin, is expressed in the phrase 'the wrath of God,' or, more simply, 'the wrath' (Ro 1¹⁸, Eph 5⁶, Col 3⁶, Ro 2⁵ 5⁹). There is a coming 'day of wrath' (Ro 2⁵, cf. Mt 3⁷); sinful man unredeemed by Christ is necessarily a 'vessel of wrath,' a 'child of wrath' (Ro 9²², Eph 2³).

It is true that the NT references to God's anger are mainly eschatological and contain figurative elements (see esp. Rev 6¹⁶ 'the wrath of the Lamb,' 11¹⁸ 14¹⁰ 16¹⁹ 19¹⁵). But for the significance of the Divine wrath as an ethical necessity in God, though His fundamental attribute is love, it may be noted that (1) the writer through whom the revelation of the Divine love attains its culminating expression ('God is love,' 1 Jn 4⁸) declares also of him that obeys not the Son, 'the wrath of God abideth on him' (Jn 3³⁶). (2) The Epistle which shows how in Christ the aloofness and terror of Israel's worship are done away in favour of full and free access to a 'throne of grace,' has, as the climax to its glowing description of Christian privilege, the solemn warning 'our God is a consuming fire' (He 12¹⁸⁻²⁹).

ANGLE.—Is 19⁸, Hab 1¹⁵. The same Heb. word is translated 'hook' in Job 41¹.

ANIAM.—A man of Manasseh (1 Ch 7¹⁹).

ANIM (Jos 15³⁰ only).—A town of Judah, in the mountains near Eshtemoth. It seems probable that it is the present double ruin of Ghuwein, west of Eshtemoth.

ANISE (RV 'dill,' Mt 23²³) is the familiar plant Anethum graveolens, one of the Umbelliferae. It is indigenous in Palestine, and is extensively used both in cooking and in the form of 'dill water' as a domestic remedy for flatulence. It is expressly stated in Jewish writers that the dill was subject to tithe.

ANNA (the Greek form of Heb. Hannah, which means 'grace').—The name of an aged prophetess (Lk 2³⁶⁻³⁸), one of the godly remnant in Israel who in the dark days which preceded the Messiah's advent were looking for the dayspring from on high and waiting for the consolation of Israel. She was the daughter of Phanuel, and belonged to the ancient tribe of Asher, whose women were celebrated for their beauty, which fitted them for wedding with high priests and kings. She had attained a great age, upwards of a hundred years, since she had been a wife for seven years and a widow for eighty-four (see RV). She had given herself to a life of devotion, frequenting the Temple and 'worshipping with fastings and supplications night and day' (cf. 1 Ti 5⁸). At the Presentation of the Infant Messiah (Lk 2³⁶⁻³⁸) she entered the sacred court, and, hearing Simeon's benediction and prophecy, took up the refrain of praise and talked about the Holy Child to her godly intimates, quickening their hope and preparing a welcome for the Saviour when He should by and by be manifested unto Israel.

DAVID SMITH.

ANNAS.—1. High priest from A.D. 6 to 15, an astute and powerful ecclesiastical statesman. At the time of our Lord's trial he was merely high priest emeritus, and his son-in-law Caiaphas, the acting high priest, presided ex officio over the meeting of the Sanhedrin (Jn 18²⁴, Mt 26⁵⁷). Nevertheless, since the high priest emeritus retained not only his title (cf. Jn 18¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 19²², Ac 4⁶), but all his obligations and many of his prerogatives, it is not surprising that the masterful Annas took an active and independent part in the proceedings. After Jesus' arrest at dead of night, 'they led him to Annas first' (Jn 18¹³). The Sanhedrin might not meet until daybreak, and the interval seemed well employed in a preliminary examination of the prisoner by the skillful veteran (Jn 18¹²⁻¹⁹⁻²²). Subsequently he took part also in the trial of Peter and John (Ac 4⁶). 2. 1 Es 9²²—Ezr 10⁴ Harim.

DAVID SMITH.

ANNIS.—The eponym of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5¹⁰). Omitted in Ezr. and Neh.

ANNUS.—A Levite (1 Es 9¹⁸—Neh 8⁷ Bani).

ANNUUS (1 Es 8¹⁸).—The name does not occur in Ezr 8¹⁹.

ANOINTING, ANOINTED.—1. The Hebrews distinguished between anointing with oil in the sense of its application to the body in ordinary life (suk), and anointing by pouring sacred oil on the head as a rite of consecration (māshach). As regards the former, olive oil, alone or mixed with perfumes, was largely used in the everyday toilet of the Hebrews, although among the poor its use would be reserved for special occasions (Ru 3³). To abstain from anointing in this sense was one of the tokens of mourning (2 S 14²), its resumption a sign that mourning was at an end (12²⁰). Honour was shown to a guest by anointing his head with oil (Ps 23⁵, Lk 7⁴⁶), and still more by anointing his feet (Lk 7³⁹). For medicinal anointing see OIL.

2. Anointing as a religious rite was applied to both persons and things. Kings in particular were consecrated for their high office by having oil poured upon their heads, a practice which seems to have originated in Egypt. Though first met with in OT in the case of Saul (1 S 10¹, cf. David, 2 S 2¹ 5³, Solomon, 1 K 1³⁹ etc.), the rite was practised in Canaan long before the Hebrew conquest. By the pouring of the consecrated oil upon the head (see 2 K 9³), there was effected a transference to the person anointed of part of the essential holiness and virtue of the deity in whose name and by whose representative the rite was performed. By the Hebrews the rite was also believed to impart a special endowment of the spirit of J^w (1 S 16¹³, cf. Is 61¹). Hence the sacrosanct character of the king as 'the Lord's anointed' (Heb. meshiach [Jahweh], which became in Greek messias or, translated, christos—both 'Messiah' and 'Christ,' therefore, signifying 'the anointed'). The application of this honorific title to kings alone in the oldest literature makes it probable that the similar consecration of the priesthood (Ex 29⁷ 40¹³⁻¹⁵, Lv 8¹⁻¹²) was a later extension of the rite. Only one exceptional instance is recorded of the anointing of a prophet (1 K 19¹⁶—Is 61¹ is metaphorical).

In the case of inanimate objects, we find early mention of the primitive and wide-spread custom of anointing sacred stones (Gn 28¹⁰ etc., see PILLAR), and in the Priests' Code the tabernacle and its furniture were similarly consecrated (Ex 30^{25ff.} 40⁹). For 2 S 1²¹ see WAR. See also MARY, No. 2. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ANON.—A contraction for 'in one (moment),' 'anon' means at once, as Mt 13²⁰ 'he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon (RV 'straightway') with joy receiveth it.'

ANOS.—1 Es 9³⁴=Vaniah, Ezr 10³⁶.

ANSWER.—An answer is (1) an apology or defence, as 2 Ti 4¹⁶ 'at my first answer no man stood by me'; so perhaps 1 P 3¹ 'the answer of a good conscience'; (2) oracle, Divine response, as Ro 11⁴ 'what saith the answer of God?'

ANT (nemālah, Arab. namlah).—Ants are exceedingly abundant all over Palestine, where, through their vast numbers, they perform a most important rôle, by continually changing the surface soil in the way earthworms do in northern countries. No more apt illustration of diligence (Pr 6⁸⁻⁹) could be found than these little insects, which, in all but the wettest weather, can be seen scurrying backwards and forwards on the long tracks they have made. Some common varieties of Palestine ants (Aphanogaster barbara, A. structor and Pheidole megacephala) store up great quantities of various kinds of seeds, which they are able, in some unknown way, to prevent germinating and make use of as food (Pr 30²⁵). Whole troops of these little insects may be seen carrying seeds, often many times their own size and weight, from a distant garden or corn-field. The writer has even seen a procession of ants carrying their harvest under the thickness of a broad mud wall which bounded the corn-field, and then across a wide and frequented road. The stores of seeds so collected have been found so great that the Mishna laid down rules in regard to their ownership. If they were discovered in the field before reaping, they belonged to the owner, but if afterwards, they were all or in part for the poor. The sagacity of the ant in this and other respects is widely recognized both in Oriental lore—as in Pr 30²⁴.²⁵—and even more forcibly by the modern naturalist.

ANTHOTHIAH.—A man of Benjamin (1 Ch 8³⁴).

ANTICHRIST.—The great opponent and counterpart of Christ, by whom he is finally to be conquered. The word appears only in the NT (1 Jn 2¹⁸⁻²² 4³, 2 Jn⁷), but the idea was present in Judaism and developed with the growth of the Messianic hope.

1. The origin of the conception.—While the precise term 'Antichrist' is lacking in Jewish literature, the idea of an opponent who persecutes God's people and is ultimately to be conquered by the Messiah, is an integral part of that general hope, born in Prophecy, which developed into Messianism in the NT period. As in the case of so many elements of Messianism, the beginning of the 'opponent' idea may fairly be said to have been Dn 11³⁶ (cf. also Zec 12-14), where the reference is to Antiochus iv.; but it would be a mistake to see in the Antichrist conception of the Johannine literature an unprecedented description of distinct personalities. There seems to have been rather a gradually developing anti-Messianic scheme, which at many points duplicated the developing Messianic hope. This general conception, which played an important rôle in early Christianity, was probably due to the synthesis of at least five factors, each independent in origin.

(a) The historical opponents of the Jews, such as Antiochus iv., Pompey, and the Roman Empire in general (cf. the position of Gog in Prophetic thought). These naturally aroused the most intense hatred on the part of the Jews, particularly those under the influence of Pharisaism. Their hostility was regarded as extending not only to the Jews as a nation, but as heathen, to Jehovah himself, and particularly to His plans for the Jewish people. This political hatred of the Pharisees entered into the Antichrist expectation, just as their political hope went into the Messianic programme. Both alike tended to grow transcendental.

(b) The dualism of Babylonia and Persia, especially as it was expressed by the dragon, between whom and the agents of righteousness there was to be a fight to the death. This dragon conception may with much probability be seen not only in the identification of the serpent of the Temptation with the devil, but also in the beast of the Johannine Apocalypse, the great opponent of the Christ, and in the sea monster of Rabbinism.

(c) The Beliar (or Belial) myth, which underlies the NT thought (cf. 2 Co 6¹⁵), as well as Jewish fears. The first reference to Beliar seems to have been in Jubilees 1²⁰, but the myth is not unlike that of the Babylonian Tiamat, queen of the abyss, who was conquered by Marduk. Subsequently he was identified with Satan, who was also identified with the dragon (cf. Ascens. Is 4³⁻⁴, Rev 12³). This identification was the first step towards the fully developed expectation of the Talmud, of a conflict between God and the devil.

(d) Belief in the return from death of the persecuting Emperor Nero.—This expectation seems to have been widely diffused throughout the Roman Empire in the latter part of the first Christian century (Sib. Or. iv. 119-150, v. 363 ff.), and lies behind the figures of Rev 13.

16. and 17. He is apparently to return with the kings of Parthia, but he is also, in Rev 17⁸⁻¹¹, identified with the beast of the abyss (cf. Sib. Or. v. 28-34).

(c) The myth of Simon Magus, or that of the false prophet.—This myth seems to have been common in Christian circles, and Simon Magus (wh. see) became the typical (Jewish) prophet and magician who opposed Christianity.

2. Synthesis of the elements.—These various elements possess so much in common that it was inevitable that they should be combined in the figure of the Satanic opponent whom the Christ would utterly destroy as a pre-condition of establishing His Kingdom of God. A study of the Book of Revelation, as well as of other NT writings (e.g. 2 Th 2¹⁻¹², 2 Co 6¹⁵, 1 Jn 2¹⁸⁻²² 4³, 2 Jn 7, Rev 11⁴⁻¹² 13¹⁻¹⁸ 17, 19¹¹⁻²¹, Mk 13¹⁴⁻²⁰), will show that there was always present in the minds of the writers of the NT a superhuman figure, Satanic in power and character, who was to be the head of opposition both to the people of Christ and to the Christ Himself. This person is represented in Assumption of Moses (ch. 8), Ascension of Isaiah (ch. 4), as well as in other Jewish writings, as one who possessed the Satanic supremacy over the army of devils. He was not a general tendency, but a definite personality. As such it was easy to see his counterpart or incarnation in historical characters. Indeed, the entire anti-Messianic programme was employed to characterize historical situations. We must think similarly of the use of 'the man of lawlessness' of St. Paul (2 Th 2³; see MAN OF SIN) and the various opponents of Christ in the Apocalypse. Transcendental pictures and current eschatology set forth the Christian's fear on the one hand of the Roman Emperor or Empire as a persecuting power, and on the other of Jewish fanaticism. Just which historical persons were in the mind of the writers it is now impossible to say with accuracy, but Nero and Domitian are not unlikely.

In the Patristic period the eschatological aspects of the anti-Messianic hope were developed, but again as a mystical picture of historical conditions either existing or expected. In Ephraem Syrus we have the fall of the Roman Empire attributed to Antichrist. He is also by the early Church writers sometimes identified with the false Jewish Messiah, who was to work miracles, rebuild the Temple, and establish a great empire with demons as his agents. Under the inspiration of the two Witnesses (Elijah and Enoch) the Messianic revolt against the Antichrist was to begin, the Book of Revelation being interpreted literally at this point. The saints were to be exposed to the miseries that the book describes, but the Messiah was to slay Antichrist with the breath of His mouth, and establish the Judgment and the conditions of eternity.

Thus in Christian literature that fusion of the elements of the Antichrist idea which were present in Judaism and later Christianity is completed by the addition of the traits of the false prophet, and extended under the influence of the current polemic against Jewish Messianism. The figure of Antichrist, Satanic, Neronic, falsely prophetic, the enemy of God and His Kingdom, moves out into theological history, to be identified by successive ages with nearly every great opponent of the Church and its doctrines, whether persecutor or heretic.

ANTIMONY.—Is 54¹¹ RVm. See EYE.

ANTIOCH (Syrian).—By the issue of the battle of Ipsus, Seleucus Nikator (b.c. 312-280) secured the rule over most of Alexander the Great's Asiatic empire, which stretched from the Hellespont and the Mediterranean on the one side to the Jaxartes and Indus on the other. The Seleucid dynasty, which he founded, lasted for 247 years. Possessed with a mania for building cities and calling them after himself or his relatives, he founded no fewer than 37, of which 4 are mentioned in the NT—

(1) Antioch of Syria (Ac 11¹⁹), (2) Seleucia (Ac 13⁹), (3) Antioch of Pisidia (Ac 13¹⁴ 14²¹, 2 Ti 3¹¹), and (4) Laodicea (Col 4¹³⁻¹⁶, Rev 1¹¹ 3¹⁴). The most famous of the 16 Antiochs, which he built and named after his father Antiochus, was Antioch on the Orontes in Syria. The spot was carefully chosen, and religious sanction given to it by the invention of a story that sacred birds had revealed the site while he watched their flight from a neighbouring eminence. It was politically of advantage that the seat of empire should be removed from the Euphrates valley to a locality nearer the Mediterranean. The new city lay in the deep bend of the Levant, about 300 miles N. of Jerusalem. Though 14 miles from the sea, the navigable river Orontes, on whose left bank it was built, united it with Seleucia and its splendid harbour. Connected thus by the main caravan roads with the commerce of Babylon, Persia, and India, and with a seaport keeping it in touch with the great world to the W., Antioch speedily fell heir to that vast trade which had once been the monopoly of Tyre. Its seaport Seleucia was a great fortress, like Gibraltar or Sebastopol. Seleucus attracted to his new capital thousands of Jews, by offering them equal rights of citizenship with all the other inhabitants. The citizens were divided into 18 wards, and each commune attended to its own municipal affairs.

His successor, Antiochus I., Soter (b.c. 280-261), introduced an abundant water supply into the city, so that every private house had its own pipe, and every public spot its graceful fountain. He further strove to render Antioch the intellectual rival of Alexandria, by inviting to his court scholars, such as Aratus the astronomer, and by superintending the translation into Greek of learned works in foreign tongues. In this way the invaluable history of Babylon by Berosus, the Chaldean priest, has been rescued from oblivion.

The succession of wars which now broke out between the Seleucids and the Ptolemy is described in Dn 11. The fortunes of the war varied greatly. Under the next king but one, Seleucus II., Kallinikus (b.c. 246-226), Ptolemy Euergetes captured Seleucia, installed an Egyptian garrison in it, and harried the Seleucid empire as far as Susiana and Bactria, carrying off to Egypt an immense spoil. Worst of all, Kallinikus devoted himself to the embellishment of his royal city. As founded by S. Nikator, Antioch had consisted of a single quarter. Antiochus I., Soter, had added a second, but Kallinikus now included a third, by annexing to the city the island in the river and connecting it to the mainland by five bridges. In this new area the streets were all at right angles, and at the intersection of the two principal roads the way was spanned by a tetrapylon, a covered colonnade with four gates. The city was further adorned with costly temples, porticoes, and statues. But the most remarkable engineering feat begun in this reign was the excavation of the great dock at Seleucia, the building of the protecting moles, and the cutting of a canal inland through high masses of solid rock. The canal is successively a cutting and a tunnel, the parts open to the sky aggregating in all 1869 ft., in some places cut to the depth of 120 ft., while the portions excavated as tunnels (usually 24 ft. high) amount in all to 395 ft.

With Antiochus III., the Great (b.c. 223-187), the fortunes of the city revived. He drove out the Egyptian garrison from Seleucia, ended the Ptolemaic sovereignty over Judæa, reduced all Palestine and nearly all Asia Minor to his sway, until his might was finally shattered by the Romans in the irretrievable defeat of Magnesia (b.c. 190). After the assassination of his son Seleucus IV., Philopator (b.c. 187-175), who was occupied mostly in repairing the financial losses his kingdom had sustained, the brilliant but wholly unprincipled youth Antiochus IV., Epiphanes (b.c. 175-164), succeeded to the throne. With the buffoonery of a Caligula and the vice of a Nero, he united the genius for architecture and Greek culture which he inherited from his race. In his dreams Antioch was to be a metropolis, second to none for beauty, and Greek art and Greek religion were to be the uniform rule throughout all his dominions. To the three quarters already existing he added a fourth, which earned for Antioch the title 'Tetrapolis.' Here he erected a Senate House, a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus on one of the eminences of Mt. Silpius, and a strong citadel on another spur of the mountains that surround the city. From E. to W. of Antioch he laid out a splendid corso with double colonnades, which ran for 5 miles in a straight line. In wet weather the populace could walk from end to end under cover. Trees, flowers, and fountains adorned the promenade; and poets sang of the beauty of the statue of Apollo and of the Nymphæum which he erected near the river. To avert the anger of the gods during a season of pestilence, he ordered the sculptor Leios to hew Mt. Silpius into one vast statue of Charon, the infernal ferryman. It frowned over the city, and was named the Charonion. Epiphane's policy of Hellenizing Palestine evoked the determined opposition of the Maccabees, and in the wars which ensued his forces suffered many defeats, though the injuries and atrocities he committed in Jerusalem were unspeakable. With Antiochus Epiphane died the grandeur of the Syrian throne.

Succeeding princes exercised only a very moderate influence over the fortunes of Palestine, and the palmy days of Antioch as a centre of political power were gone for ever. The city was the scene of many a bloody conflict in the years of the later Seleucidæ, as usurper after usurper tried to wade through blood to the throne, and was shortly after overcome by some rival. In several of these struggles the Jews took part, and as the power of Antioch waned, the strength and practical independence of the Jewish Hasmonæan princes increased. In A.D. 83 all Syria passed into the hands of Tigranes, king of Armenia, who remained master of Antioch for 14 years. When Tigranes was overwhelmed by the Romans, Pompey put an end to the Seleucid dynasty, and the line of Antiochene monarchs expired in B.C. 65. The strong Pax Romana gave new vigour to the city. Antioch was made a free city, and became the seat of the prefect and the capital of the Roman province of Syria. Mark Antony ordered the release of all the Jews in it enslaved during the recent disturbances, and the restoration of their property. As a reward for Antioch's fidelity to him, Julius Cæsar built a splendid basilica, the Cæsareum, and gave, besides, a new aqueduct, theatre, and public baths. Augustus, Agrippa, Herod the Great, Tiberius, and, later, Antoninus Pius, all greatly embellished the city, contributing many new and striking architectural features. The ancient walls were rebuilt to the height of 50-60 ft., with a thickness at the top of 8 ft., and surmounted by gigantic towers. The vast rampart was carried across ravines up the mountain slope to the very summit of the hills which overlook the city. Antioch seemed thus to be defended by a mountainous bulwark, 7 miles in circuit. Earthquakes have in later ages demolished these walls, though some of the Roman castles are still standing.

When Christianity reached Antioch, it was a great city of over 500,000 inhabitants, called the 'Queen of the East,' the 'Third Metropolis of the Roman Empire.' In 'Antioch the Beautiful' there was to be found everything which Italian wealth, Greek æstheticism, and Oriental luxury could produce. The ancient writers, however, are unanimous in describing the city as one of the foulest and most depraved in the world. Cosmopolitan in disposition, the citizens acted as if they were emancipated from every law, human or Divine. Licentiousness, superstition, quackery, indecency, every fierce and base passion, were displayed by the populace; their skill in coining scurrilous verses was notorious, their sordid, fickle, turbulent, and insolent ways rendered the name of Antioch a byword for all that was wicked. Their brilliance and energy, so praised by Cicero, were balanced by an incurable levity and shameless disregard for the first principles of morality. So infamous was the grove of Daphne, five miles out of the city, filled with shrines to Apollo, Venus, Isis, etc., and crowded with theatres, baths, taverns, and dancing saloons, that soldiers detected there were punished and dismissed the Imperial service. 'Daphnic morals' became a proverb. Juvenal could find no more forcible way of describing the pollutions of Rome than by saying, 'The Orontes has flowed into the Tiber.' In this Vanity Fair the Jews were resident in large numbers, yet they exerted little or no influence on the morals of the city. We hear, however, of one Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Ac 6⁸), and there may have been more. But after the death of St. Stephen, Christian fugitives from persecution fled as far north as Antioch, began to preach to the Greeks there (Ac 11¹⁹), and a great number believed. So great was the work that the Jerus. Church sent Barnabas to assist, who, finding that more help was needed, sought out and fetched Saul from Tarsus. There they continued a year, and built up a strong Church. Antioch had the honour of being the birthplace of (1) the name 'Christian' (Ac 11²⁶), and (2) of foreign missions. From this city Paul and Barnabas started on their first missionary journey (Ac 13¹⁻⁴), and to Antioch they returned at the end of the tour (Ac 14²⁸). The second journey was begun from and ended at Antioch (Ac 15³⁸⁻⁴¹ 18²²); and the city was again the starting-point of the third tour (Ac 18²³). The Antiochene Church contributed liberally to the poor saints in Jerus. during the famine (Ac 11²⁷⁻³⁰). Here also the dispute regarding the circumcision of Gentile converts broke out (Ac 15¹⁻²⁹), and here Paul withstood Peter for his inconsistency (Gal 2¹¹⁻²¹). After the fall of Jerusalem, Antioch became the true centre of Christianity. A gate still bears the name of 'St. Paul's Gate.' It was from Antioch that Ignatius set out on his march to martyrdom at Rome. The city claimed as its natives John Chrysostom, Ammianus Marcellinus, Evagrius, and Libanius. From A.D. 252-380 Antioch was the scene of ten Church Councils. The Patriarch of Antioch took precedence of those of Rome, Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Alexandria. Antioch was captured in A.D. 260 by Sapor of Persia; in A.D. 538 it was burned by Chosroes; rebuilt by Justinian, it again fell before the Saracens in A.D. 635. Nicephorus Phocas recovered it in A.D. 969, but in A.D. 1084 it fell to the Seljuk Turks. The first Crusaders retook it in 1098 after a celebrated siege, signalized by the 'invention of the Holy Lance'; but in 1268 it passed finally into the hands of the Turks. Earthquakes have added to the ruining hand of man. Those of B.C. 184, A.D. 37, 115, 457, and esp. 526 (when 200,000 persons perished), 528, 1170, and 1872 have been the most disastrous. The once vast city has shrunk into a small, ignoble, and dirty town of 6,000 inhabitants, still, however, bearing the name of Antaki (Turkish) or Antakiyah (Arabic). It is again the centre of a Christian mission, and the Church of Antioch, as of old, is seeking to enlighten the surrounding darkness.

G. A. FRANK KNIGHT.

ANTIOCH (Pisidian).—The expression 'Antioch of Pisidia' or 'Antioch in Pisidia' is incorrect, as the town was not in Pisidia. Its official title was 'Antioch near Pisidia,' and as it existed for the sake of Pisidia, the adjective 'Pisidian' was sometimes loosely attached to it. It was actually in the ethnic district of Phrygia, and in the Roman province of Galatia (that region of it called Phrygia Galatica). Founded by the inhabitants of Magnesia, it was made a free town by the Romans, and a colonia was established there by the emperor Augustus to keep the barbarians of the neighbourhood in check. The municipal government became Roman, and the official language Latin. St. Paul visited it four times (Ac 13¹⁴ 14²¹ 16⁸ 18²²), and it is one of the churches addressed in the Epistle to the Galatians.

ANTIOCHIANS

ANTIOCHIANS (2 Mac 4⁹, 1⁹).—The efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes to spread Gr. culture and Gr. customs throughout his dominions were diligently furthered by a section of the Jews. The leader of this Hellenizing party, Jason, brother of the high priest Onias III., offered a large sum of money to Antiochus to induce the king to allow the inhabitants of Jerusalem 'to be enrolled as Antiochians.' Antiochus acceded to the proposal, and shortly afterwards a party of 'Antiochians' from Jerusalem was sent by him with a contribution of money for the festival of Heracles at Tyre.

ANTIOCHIS (2 Mac 4³⁰).—A concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who assigned to her the revenues of the two Cilician cities, Tarsus and Mallus.

ANTIOCHUS (1 Mac 12¹⁴ 14²²; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 8).—The father of Numenius, who was one of the envoys sent (c. B.C. 144) by Jonathan the Maccabee to renew the covenant made by Judas with the Romans, and to enter into friendly relations with the Spartans.

ANTIOCHUS.—A name borne by a number of the kings of Syria subsequent to the period of Alexander the Great.

1. Antiochus I. (B.C. 280–261) was the son of Seleucus Nikator, the chiliarch under Perdiccas who was regent immediately after the death of Alexander. On the murder of his father he came into possession of practically the entire region of Asia Minor as far east as the provinces beyond Mesopotamia. The most important fact of his reign was his defeat of the Celts, who, after devastating Macedonia and Thrace, swarmed into Asia Minor and established a kingdom which was subsequently known as Galatia. The date and place of the victory are unknown, but it won him the name of Soter ('Saviour'). His capital was Antioch in Syria, but he was never able to bring his vast empire into complete subjection. He was a friend of literature and art, and it is possible that under him the beginning was made for the Greek translation of the Pentateuch.

2. Antiochus II., Theos (B.C. 261–246).—Son of the foregoing, essentially a warrior, carrying on interminable struggles both with the free Greek cities of his own territory, to which he finally gave something like democratic rights, and with Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt. Under him, however, the Jews of Asia Minor gained many civic rights.

3. Antiochus III., the Great.—He ascended the throne when only 15 years of age, and he reigned from B.C. 223 to 187. Along with Antiochus I. and Antiochus II. he may be referred to in the early portions of Dn 11. His reign, like that of most of his contemporaries, was one of constant war, particularly with Egypt. In the course of these wars he gained possession of Palestine through the battle of Baniyas (B.C. 198), and established the Syrian administration over Judæa, although for a time he ruled the province jointly with Ptolemy Epiphanes of Egypt. Like Antiochus I., he was a great colonizer, and induced 2000 Jewish families to go from Mesopotamia into Lydia and Phrygia, thus laying the foundation for the influential Jewish Dispersion in those regions. So warlike a monarch could not fail to come into conflict sooner or later with Rome. He was defeated in the battle of Magnesia in B.C. 190, and three years later was killed, according to some authorities, while plundering a temple at Elymais.

4. Antiochus IV., Epiphanes ('the Illustrious'; also nicknamed Epimanes, 'the Madman').—The son of the preceding, who had been sent as a hostage to Rome. In B.C. 175 he seized the Syrian throne, and began a series of conquests which bade fair to rival his father's. While in Egypt, however, he was ordered by the Romans to leave that country, and thus found himself forced to limit his energies to Syria. In the course of his conflict with Egypt he had become suspicious of Judæa, and determined to force that country into complete subjection to his will. His motives were probably more political than religious, but as a part of his programme he undertook to compel the Jews to worship heathen gods as well as, if not in place of, Jehovah. His plans were first put into active operation probably towards the end of B.C. 170, when he returned from Egypt, although the chronology at this point is very obscure and it may have been a couple of years later. He plundered the Temple of some of its treasures, including the seven-branch candlestick, the altar of incense, and the table of shewbread. He also placed a garrison in the citadel of Jerusalem, and set about the complete Hellenizing of Judæa. Circumcision and the observance of the Sabbath were forbidden under penalty of death. Pagan sacrifices were ordered in every town in Judæa, and every month a search was made to discover whether any Jew possessed a copy of the Law or had circumcised his children. In December 168 B.C. a pagan altar, probably to Olympian Zeus, was erected on the altar of burnt-offering, and the entire Jewish worship seemed threatened with extinction. This probability was increased by the apostasy of the high priest.

This excess of zeal on the part of Antiochus led to the reaction, which, under the Chasidim and Mattathias, the founder of the Maccabæan house, ultimately brought about the release of Judæa from Syrian control. The events of this period of persecution are related in detail, though with a large element of legend,—in 2 Maccabees, and reference is to be found to them also in Dn 11^{21–24}. Antiochus finally died on an expedition against the Parthians in B.C. 164. (For an account of the struggle of Mattathias and Judas against Antiochus, see MACCABEES).

5. Antiochus V., Eupator.—Son of the preceding; began to reign at the death of his father, when a mere boy of 9 (or 12) years. He was left by his father under the control of Lysias, his chief representative in Palestine, and with him was present at the victory of Beth-zacharias, B.C. 163, when Judas Maccabæus was defeated (1 Mac 6^{2–47}). The complete conquest of Judæa was prevented by the rise of the pretender Philip, who, however, was conquered. In the midst of their success, both young Antiochus and Lysias were assassinated by Demetrius I. (B.C. 162). Their death reacted favourably on the circumstances surrounding the rising Maccabæan house.

6. Antiochus VI.,—Son of Alexander Balas. Trypho, one of the generals of Alexander Balas, at first championed the cause of this boy after his father had been killed in Arabia. After a few months, however, he caused the assassination of Antiochus by the physicians of the court, and reigned in his stead (1 Mac 13²¹).

7. Antiochus VII., Sidetes (B.C. 138–128), the last of the energetic Syrian monarchs, came to the throne during the imprisonment of Demetrius II. After defeating Trypho, he undertook to establish his sovereignty over the Jews. Simon partially won his favour by presents and by furnishing auxiliary troops, but at last refused to meet his excessive demands for permitting such independence as Judæa had come to enjoy under the weak predecessor of Antiochus. Thereupon Antiochus sent his generals into Judæa, but they were defeated by the sons of Simon (1 Mac 15. 16). He himself came during the first year of John Hyrcanus (135–134), and after devastating Judæa shut up Hyrcanus in Jerusalem. He was about to capture the city through starvation when he unexpectedly made terms with Hyrcanus, probably because of the interference of the Romans. These terms laid very heavy demands upon the Jews, and included the destruction of the fortifications of the city. Until B.C. 129–128 Judæa was again subject to the Syrian State, but at the end of that year Antiochus was killed in a campaign against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus was enabled to reassert his independence. See MACCABEES.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

ANTIPAS.—1. See HEROD, No. 3.—2. A martyr of the church of Pergamum, mentioned only in Rev 2¹³, unless some credit is to be given to the late accounts of his martyrdom. According to these, he was roasted to death in a brazen bowl in the days of Domitian. Cures of toothache were believed to be accomplished at his tomb. SHAILER MATHEWS.

ANTIPATER.—Son of Jason, one of two ambassadors sent by Jonathan to the Romans and to the Spartans to renew 'the friendship and the confederacy' (1 Mac 12¹⁶ 14²).

ANTIPATRIS.—Hither St. Paul was conducted by night on the way from Jerusalem to Caesarea (Ac 23³¹). It was founded by Herod the Great, and probably stood at the head of the river 'Aujeh' (now Rās el-Ain). Here are the remains of a large castle of the Crusaders, probably to be identified with Mirabel.

ANTONIA.—See JERUSALEM.

ANUB.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4⁸).

ANVIL.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 2.

APACE in AV means 'at a quick pace,' as Ps 68⁴ 'kings of armies did flee apace.'

APAME.—Daughter of Bartacus, and concubine of Darius I. (1 Es 4²⁹).

APE.—Apes were imported along with peacocks from Ophir by Solomon (1 K 10²², 2 Ch 9²¹). In importing monkeys, Solomon here imitated the custom of the Assyrian and Egyptian monarchs, as we now know by the monuments. No kind of monkey is indigenous in Palestine. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

APELLES.—The name of a Christian who is greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹⁰, and who is described as the 'approved in Christ.' It was the name borne by a distinguished tragic actor, and by members of the household.

APHEREMA (1 Mac 11³⁴).—A district taken from Samaria and added to Judaea by Demetrius Soter (Ant. XIII. iv. 9). See EPHRAIM, No. 1.

APHARSACHITES.—See next article.

APHARSACHITES (probably the same as the Apharsachites, Ezr 5⁹ 6⁶).—A colony of the Assyrians in Samaria; an eastern people subject to the Assyrians.

APHARSITES (Ezr 4⁹).—One of the nations transported to Samaria by the Assyrians. Otherwise unknown. The text is doubtful.

APHEK.—1. An unidentified city in the plain of Sharon (Jos 12¹⁸). It may be the same as Aphek of 1 S 4¹, and of Jos BJ II. xix. 1. 2. A city which Asher failed to take (Jos 13⁴ 19³⁰, Jg 1³¹). It may be Affa, on Nahr Ibrahim. 3. Some authorities identify this (1 S 29¹) with No. 1, and make the Philistines advance upon Jezreel from the S.W. But if they approached from Shunem (28⁹), Aphek must have been in Esdraelon in the neighbourhood of el-Fāleh. 4. The place where Ahab defeated Benhadad (1 K 20²⁶ 30), in the Mishôr, probably the modern Fiq, or Afiq, on the brow of the plateau, overlooking the Sea of Galilee. Possibly Joash smote the Syrians here (2 K 13¹⁷). W. EWING.

APHEKAH (Jos 15²²).—Probably same as Aphek, 1.

APHERRA (1 Es 5²⁴).—His descendants were among the 'sons of Solomon's servants' who returned with Zerubbabel; omitted in the parallel lists (Ezr. and Neh.).

APHIAH.—One of Saul's ancestors (1 S 9¹).

APHIK.—A city of Asher (Jg 13¹), the same as Aphek, 2.

APOCALYPSE.—See REVELATION [BOOK OF].

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.—The apocalypse as a literary form of Jewish literature first appears during the Hellenistic period. Its origin is to a considerable degree in dispute, but is involved in the general development of the period. Among the Hebrews its forerunner was the description of the Day of Jehovah. On that day, the prophets taught, Jehovah was to punish the enemies of Israel and to establish His people as a world power. In the course of time this conception was supplemented by the further expectation of a judgment for Jews as well as for heathen (Am 2⁹⁻¹³ 3⁹⁻¹⁵ 5¹⁰⁻¹³ Zec 12¹⁻¹⁵ 2⁴⁻¹⁵, Jl 2¹⁸⁻²², Ezk 30²¹). The first approach to the apocalyptic method is probably to be seen in Zec 9-14. It was in the same period that the tendencies towards the æsthetic conceptions which had been inherited from the Babylonian exile were beginning to be realized under the influence of Hellenistic culture. Because of their religion, literature was the only form of æsthetic expression (except music) which was open to the art impulses of the Jews. In the apocalypse we thus can see a union of the symbolism and myths of Babylonia with the religious faith of the Jews, under the influence of Hellenistic culture. By its very origin it was the literary means of setting forth by the use of symbols the certainty of Divine judgment and the equal certainty of Divine deliverance. The symbols are usually animals of various sorts, but frequently composite creatures whose various parts represented certain qualities of the animals from which they were derived.

Apocalyptic is akin to prophecy. Its purpose was fundamentally to encourage faith in Jehovah on the part of those who were in distress, by 'revealing' the future. Between genuine prophetism and apocalyptic there existed, however, certain differences not always easy to formulate, but appreciable to students of the two types of religious instruction. (a) The prophet, taking a stand in the present, so interprets current history as to disclose Divine forces at work therein, and the inevitable outcome of a certain course of conduct. The writers of the apocalypses, however, seem to have had little spiritual insight into the providential ordering of existing conditions, and could see only present misery and miraculous deliverance. (b) Assuming the name of some hero or seer of Hebrew history, the apocalypticist re-wrote the past in terms of prophecy in the name of some hero or seer of Hebrew history. On the strength of the fulfilment of this alleged prophecy, he forecast, though in very general terms, the future. (c) Prophecy made use of symbol in literature as a means of enforcing or making intelligible its Divinely inspired message. The apocalypticists employed allegorically an elaborate machinery of symbol, chief among which were sheep, bulls, birds, as well as mythological beings like Beliar and the Antichrist.

The parent of apocalyptic is the book of Daniel, which, by the almost unanimous consensus of scholars, appeared in the Maccabæan period (see DANIEL [BK. OF]). From the time of this book until the end of the 1st cent. A.D., and indeed even later, we find a continuous stream of apocalypses, each marked by a strange combination of pessimism as to the present and hope as to the future yet to be miraculously established. These works are the output of one phase of Pharisæism, which, while elevating both Torah and the Oral Law, was not content with bald legalism, but dared trust in the realization of its religious hopes. The authors of the various works are utterly unknown. In this, as in other respects, the apocalypses constitute a unique national literature. Chief among apocalyptic literature are the following:—

1. The Enoch Literature.—The Enoch literature has reached us in two forms: (a) The Ethiopic Enoch; (b) The Slavonic Book of the Secrets of Enoch. The two books are independent, and indicate the wide-spread tendency to utilize the story of the patriarch in apocalyptic discourse.

(a) The Ethiopic Book of Enoch is a collection of apocalypses and other material written during the last two centuries before Christ. It was probably written in Hebrew or Aramaic, and then translated into Greek, and from that into Ethiopic and Latin. As it now exists, the collection is a survival of a wide-spread Enoch literature, and its constituent sections have been to a considerable extent edited by both Jews and Christians. Critics, while varying as to details, are fairly well agreed as to the main component sources, each probably representing a different author or school.

(i.) The original ground-work of the present book is to be found in chs. 1-36 and 72-104, in the midst of which are, however, numerous interpolations (see iv. below). These chapters were probably written before B.C. 100. Chs. 1-36 deal chiefly with the portrayal of the punishment to be awarded the enemies of the Jews and sinners generally on the Day of Judgment. The eschatology of these chapters is somewhat sensuous as regards both the resurrection and rewards and punishments. In them we have probably the oldest piece of Jewish literature touching the general resurrection of Israel and representing Gehenna as a place of final punishment (see GEHENNA).

The dream visions (chs. 83-90) were probably written in the time of Judas Maccabæus or John Hyrcanus. By the use of symbolic animals—sheep, rams, wild beasts—Hebrew history is traced to the days of the Hasmonean revolt. The years of misery are represented by a flock under seventy shepherds, who, in the new age about to dawn, are to be cast with the evil men and angels into an abyss of fire. The Messiah is then to appear, although his function is not definitely described. In ch. 91 the future is somewhat more transcendently described.

In the later chapters of this oldest section the new eschatology is more apparent. In them are to be found representations of the sleep of the righteous, the resurrection of the spirit of the Messiah, though human, as God's Son (105), the Day of Judgment, and the punishment of the wicked in hell.

(ii.) Whether or not these second group of chapters (37-71), or the Similitudes, is post- or pre-Christian has been thoroughly discussed. The general consensus of recent critics, however, is that the Similitudes were probably written somewhere between B.C. 94 and 64: at all events, before the time of Herod. The most remarkable characteristic of these Similitudes is the use of the term 'Son of Man' for the Messiah. But it is not possible to see in the use of this term any reference to the historical Jesus. More likely it marks a stage in the development of the term from the general symbolic usage of Dn 7¹³ to the strictly Messianic content of the NT. In the Similitudes we find described the judgment of all men, both alive and dead, as well as of angels. Yet the future is still to some extent sensuous, although transcendental influences are very evident in the section. The Messiah pre-exists and is more than a man. The share which he has in the reorganization of the world is more prominent than in the older sections.

(iii.) Interspersed throughout the book are sections which Charles calls 'the book of celestial physics.' These sections are one of the curiosities of scientific literature, and may be taken as a fair representative of the astronomical and meteorological beliefs of the Palestinian Jews about the time of Christ.

(iv.) Interpolations from the so-called Book of Noah, which are very largely the work of the last part of the pre-Christian era, although it is not possible to state accurately the date of their composition.

The importance of Enoch is great for the understanding of the eschatology of the NT and the methods of apocalyptic.

(b) The (Slavonic) Secrets of Enoch probably had a pre-Christian original, and further, presupposes the existence of the Ethiopic Enoch. It could not, therefore, have been written much prior to the time of Herod, and, as the Temple is still standing, must have been written before A.D. 70. The author (or authors) was probably a Hellenistic Jew living in the first half of the 1st cent. A.D. The book is particularly interesting in that in it is to be found the first reference to the millennium (xxxii. 2-xxxiii. 2), which is derived from a combination of the seven creative days and Ps 90⁴. At the close of the six thousand years, the new day, or Sabbath of the thousand years, was to begin. The Secrets of Enoch is a highly developed picture of the coming age and of the structure of the heaven, which, it holds, is seven-fold. Here, too, are the Judgment, though of individuals rather than of nations, the two æons, the complete renovation or destruction of the earth. There is no mention of a resurrection, and the righteous are upon death to go immediately to Paradise.

2. The Book of Jubilees is a Haggadist commentary on Genesis, and was probably written in the Maccabæan period, although its date is exceedingly uncertain, and may possibly be placed in the latter half of the last cent. B.C. In this writing angelology and demonology are well developed. While there is no mention of the Messiah, the members of the Messianic age are to live a thousand years, and are to be free from the influence or control of Satan. The book contains no doctrine of the resurrection; but spirits are immortal. While there is punishment of the wicked, and particularly of evil spirits and the enemies of Israel, the Judgment is not thoroughly correlated with a general eschatological scheme. The chief object of the book is to incite the Jews to a greater devotion to the Law, and the book is legalistic—rather than idealistic.

The 'new age' was to be inaugurated by wide-spread study of the Law, to which the Jews would be forced by terrible suffering. Certain passages would seem to imply a resurrection of the dead and a renewing of all creation along with the endless punishment of the wicked.

3. The Psalms of Solomon—a group of noble songs, written by a Pharisee (or Pharisees) probably between B.C. 70 and 40, the dates being fixed by reference to the Roman conquest of Jerusalem and the death of Pompey (Ps-Sol ii. 30, 31). The collection is primarily a justification of the downfall of the Maccabæan house because of its sins. Its author (or authors) was opposed to monarchy as such, and looked forward to the time when the Messiah would really be king of Judæa. The picture of this king as set forth in Psalms xvii-xviii is one of the noblest in Jewish literature. He is to be neither sufferer nor teacher, pre-existent nor miraculously born. He is not to be a priest, or warrior. He is to be sinless, strong through the Holy Spirit, gaining his wisdom from God, conquering the entire heathen world without war, 'by the word of his mouth,' and to establish the capital of the world at Jerusalem. All the members of the new kingdom, which, like the Messiah, is miraculous, are to be 'sons of God.' These two Psalms are not of a kin with the ordinary apocalyptic literature like the Enoch literature, and probably represent a tendency more religious than apocalyptic. At the same time, the influence of the apocalyptic is not wanting in them.

4. The Assumption of Moses was probably written in the opening years of the 1st cent. A.D., and narrates in terms of prophecy the history of the world from the time of Moses until the time of its composition, ending in an eschatological picture of the future. As it now stands, the writing is hardly more than a fragment of a much larger work, and exists only in an old Latin translation. The most striking characteristic is the importance given to Satan as the opponent of God, as well as the rather elaborate portrayal of the end of the age it narrates. The Judgment is to be extended to the Gentiles, but no Messiah is mentioned, the Messianic kingdom rather than He being central. Further, the writer, evidently in fear of revolutionary tendencies among his people, says distinctly that God alone is to be judge of the Gentiles.

5. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs is a composite work purporting to preserve the last words of the twelve sons of Jacob. It was probably written during the first two centuries of the Christian era, although some of its material may be earlier. As it now stands, it is full of Christian interpolations, and it has little apocalyptic material, being rather of the nature of homilies illustrated with much legendary matter, including eschatological pictures and references to demons and their king Beliar. The new age is not distinctly described, but apparently involves only earthly relationships. God's judgment on wicked men and demons is, however, elaborately pictured, sometimes in terms hard to reconcile with the less transcendental accounts of the blessings assured to the Jewish nation. Each of the patriarchs is represented as dealing with that particular virtue or vice with which the Biblical account associates him, and also as foretelling appropriate blessings or curses. The work is preserved in Greek and Armenian translations.

6. The Ascension of Isaiah is a composite book which circulated largely among the Christian heretics of the 3rd century. At its basis lies a group of legends of uncertain origin, dealing with the Antichrist and Beliar. These in turn are identified with the expectation that Nero would return after death. The book, therefore, in its present shape is probably of Christian origin, and is not older than the 2nd cent., or possibly the latter part of the 1st. The Isaiah literature, however, was common in the 1st cent., and the book is a valuable monument of the eschatological tendencies and beliefs of at least certain groups of the early Christians. Particularly important is it as throwing light upon the development of the Antichrist doctrines. It exists to-day in four recensions—Greek, Ethiopic, Latin, and Slavonic.

7. The Apocalypse of Ezra (Second Esdras), written about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. It is the most complete expression of Pharisaic pessimism. Written in the midst of national misery, it is not able to see any relief except in the creation of a new world. The age was coming to an end, and the new age which was to belong to Israel would presently come. The judgment of Israel's enemies was presently to be established, but not until the number of the righteous was complete. The book is no doubt closely related to the Apocalypse of Baruch, and both apparently reproduce the same originally Jewish material. It has been considerably affected by Christian hopes. Both for this reason and because of its emphasis on generic human misery and sin, with the consequent need of something more than a merely national deliverance, it gives a prominent position to the Messiah, who is represented as dying. As Second Esdras the book has become part of the Apocrypha of the OT, and has had considerable influence in the formation of Christian eschatology. In vii. 30-98 is an elaborate account of the general Resurrection, Judgment, and the condition of souls after death; and it is this material quite as much as the Messianic prediction of chs. xii-xiv that make it of particular interest to the student. It is possessed, however, of no complete unity in point of view, and passes repeatedly from the national to the ethical (individual) need and deliverance. The separation of these two views is, however, more than a critical matter. As in Mk 13, the two illustrate each other.

8. The Apocalypse of Baruch is a composite work which embodies in itself a ground-work which is distinctly Jewish, and certain sections of which were probably written before the destruction of Jerusalem. Criticism, however, has not arrived at any complete consensus of opinion as regards its composition, but there can be little doubt that it represents the same apocalyptic tendencies and much of the material which are to be seen in Second Esdras. Just what are the relations between the two writings, however, has not yet been clearly shown. The probability is that the Apocalypse of Baruch, as it now stands, was written in the second half of the 1st cent. A.D., and has come under the influence of Christianity (see esp. chs. xlix-li). Like Second Esdras, it is marked by a despair of the existing age, and looks forward to a transcendental reign of the Messiah, in which the Jews are to be supremely fortunate. It exists to-day in Greek and Syriac versions, with a strong probability that both are derived from original Hebrew writing. This apocalypse, both from its probable origin and general characteristics, is of particular value as a document for understanding the NT literature. In both the Apocalypse of Baruch and Second Esdras we have the most systematized eschatological picture that has come down to us from Pharisaism.

9. The Sibylline Oracles are the most important illustration of the extra-Palestinian-Hellenistic apocalyptic hope. As the work now exists, it is a collection of various writings dealing with the historical and future conditions of the Jewish people. The most important apocalyptic section is in Book iii. 97-828, written in Maccabean times. In it the punishment of the enemies of the Jews is elaborately foretold, as are also the future and the Messianic Judgment. This third book was probably edited in the middle of the 2nd century by a Christian. In general, however, this Sibylline literature, although of great extent, gives us no such distinct pictures of the future as those to be found in the Ezra-Baruch apocalypses.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

APOCRYPHA.—The term 'Apocrypha' is applied to a body of literature that has come down to us in close connexion with the canonical books of the Bible, and yet is not of them. This term (Gr. apokryphos, 'hidden') seems to have been used to specify certain documents or writings that were purposely hidden from general public contact, either because of their supposed sacredness, or to retain within the precincts of a certain sect their secret wisdom and knowledge. The name was given either by those who hid the books or by those from whom they were hidden.

All such books bore, as their alleged authors, the names of notable men in Hebrew history. These names were not sufficient of themselves to carry the books over into the canonical collection of the Bible. The term applied to them as 'apocryphal,' that is, withheld from public gaze and use, was at first rather complimentary to their character. But their rejection by the Jewish Palestinian body of worshippers, as well as by the larger proportion of the early Church, gradually stamped the name 'apocryphal' as a term of reproach, indicating inferiority in content and a spurious authorship. Henceforth such books lost their early sacredness, and became embodied in a collection that remained entirely outside the Hebrew Bible, though in general found in the Septuagint and the Vulgate.

The word 'Apocrypha,' as used by Protestant Christians, signifies the books found in the Latin Vulgate as over and above those of the Hebrew OT. Jerome incorporated in his revision and translation, in the main as he found them in the Old Latin Version, certain books not found in the Hebrew canonical writings. These books had been carried over into the Old Latin from the Septuagint.

The real external differences, then, between the Protestant and Rom. Cath. Bibles to-day are to be traced to the different ideas of the Canon on the part of the Jews of Palestine, where the Hebrew Bible was on its native soil, and on the part of the Jews of Alexandria who translated that same Hebrew Bible into Greek. With this translation, and other books later called the Apocrypha, they constructed a Greek Bible now called the Septuagint (the Seventy).

In the transfer of the works from the Septuagint to the Old Latin and to the Vulgate, there is some confusion both as to their names and their order.

These so-called Apocryphal books may be roughly classified as follows:—

1. Historical: First and Second Maccabees, and First Esdras [Third Esdras in Vulgate].
2. Legendary: Additions to Esther, History of Susanna, Song of the Three Holy Children, Bel and the Dragon, Tobit, Judith.
3. Prophetical: Baruch (ch. 6 being the 'Epistle of Jeremy'), Prayer of Manasses.

4. Apocryphal: Second Esdras [Fourth Esdras in Vulgate].

5. Didactic: Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon.

In some classifications Third and Fourth Maccabees are included.

Most of these books are found in their original form in Greek, with the exceptions noted below, and not in the Hebrew; therefore the Jewish religious leaders did not regard them as inspired. Furthermore, some of their writers (1 Mac 4th 9th, 2 Mac 2nd) disclaim inspiration as the Jews understood it. The NT writers do not quote these books, nor do they definitely refer to them. Their existence in the Greek Bible of the times of Christ does not seem to have given them any prestige for the Jewish authorities of that day. The Church Fathers made some use of them, by quotation and allusion, but were not so emphatic in their favour as to secure their incorporation in the regular canonical books of the Bible.

Jerome, in his revision of the Old Latin Bible, found the Apocryphal books therein, as carried over from the Septuagint; but in his translation of the OT he was careful not to include in the OT proper any books not found in the Hebrew Canon. In fact, he regarded his time as too valuable to be spent in revising or translating these uninspired books.

It was not until the Council of Trent, April 15, 1546, that the Roman Catholic Church publicly set its seal of authority on eleven of the fourteen or sixteen (including 3 and 4 Mac.) Apocryphal books. This Council names as canonical the following books and parts of books: First and Second Maccabees, Additions to Esther, History of Susanna, Song of the Three Holy Children, Bel and the Dragon, Tobit, Judith, Baruch, Sirach, and Wisdom of Solomon; omitting from the above list the Prayer of Manasses, First and Second Esdras [Vulgate Third and Fourth Esdras].

The Council of Trent settled the Canon of Scripture for the Roman Catholic Church, and decreed an anathema against any one who did not agree with its statement. Even before the meeting of that famous Council, Coverdale, in 1535, had introduced the Apocrypha into the English Bible edited by himself. It was published in the first edition of the AV in 1611, but began to be left out as early as 1629. It was inserted between the OT and NT. As a result of a controversy in 1826, it was excluded from all the Bibles published by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

In our discussion of the character and contents of these books, we must keep in mind the fact that the word 'Apocrypha' is used in the Protestant sense as inclusive of the fourteen books given in the RV of 1895, eleven of which are regarded as canonical by the Roman Catholic Church.

The general character and the contents of these books are as follows:—

1. First Maccabees.—This is a historical work of rare value on the Jewish war of independence against the encroachments and invasions of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 168–164). Its author is unknown, though thought to have been a Jew of Palestine, who wrote between B.C. 105 and 64. The book is known in a Greek original, though it was translated, according to Jerome, from a Hebrew original that was current in his day (end of 4th cent.).

2. Second Maccabees is an abridgment of a five-volume work by Jason of Cyrene (2nd). It is prefaced by two letters said to have been sent from the Jews of Jerusalem to the Jews of Egypt. This book deals with the history of the Jews from the reign of Seleucus IV. (B.C. 175) to the death of Nicanor (B.C. 161). The multiplication of the marvellous and miraculous in the narrative discounts the value of the material as a source of historical data. The book was written somewhere between B.C. 125 and the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. It is extant in Greek.

3. First Esdras (Third in the Vulgate) is the canonical book of Ezra in Greek, which in reconstructed form tells the story of the decline and fall of the kingdom of Judah from the time of Josiah. It recites the overthrow of Jerusalem, the Babylonian exile, the return under Zerubbabel, and Ezra's part in the reorganization of the Jewish State. Josephus refers to the legend regarding the three courtiers contained in this book. Its author is unknown. The Council of Trent placed it in an appendix to the NT as Third Esdras, and not among their regular canonical books.

4. Additions to Esther.—The canonical Esther concludes with 10th; this chapter is filled out by the addition of seven verses, and the book concludes with six additional chapters (11–16). The regular text of the book is occasionally interpolated and amplified by some writer or writers, to give the story a fuller narrative and make the telling of it more effective. These additions sometimes contradict the Hebrew, and add nothing new of any value. This editorial work is thought to have been done by an Egyptian Jew somewhere in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (B.C. 181–145).

5. The History of Susanna is an account of Daniel's discovery of a malicious slander against the good woman Susanna. The story is prefixed to the book of Daniel. It is found in the Greek, and was prepared by an unknown author at an unknown date.

6. The Song of the Three Holy Children is found inserted between v. 23 and v. 24 of Dn 3. Its author and date are unknown.

7. The Story of Bel and the Dragon follows Dn 12. It is a proof by Daniel that the priests of Bel and their families ate the food set before the idol. Daniel slays the dragon, and is a second time thrown into the lions' den. The origin of this story is unknown, though it is by some attributed to Habakkuk. The three preceding stories are found in the Septuagint of Daniel, and a MS of No. 6 has recently been found.

8. Tobit is a romantic story of the time of Israel's captivity. Tobit is a pious son of Naphtali who becomes blind. He sends his son Tobias to Rages in Media to collect a debt. An angel leads him to Ecbatana, where he romantically marries a widow who was still a virgin though she had had seven husbands. Each of the seven had been slain on their wedding-day by Asmodeus, the evil spirit. On the inspiration of the angel, Tobias marries the widow, and, by burning the inner parts of a fish, puts the spirit to flight by the offensive smoke. The blindness of Tobit is healed by using the gall of the fish, the burning of whose entrails had saved the life of Tobias. The book is found in an Aramaic version, three Greek, and three Old Latin versions, and also in two Hebrew texts. Its date is uncertain, though it doubtless appeared before the 1st cent. B.C.

9. Judith is a thrilling tale of how Judith, a Jewish widow, secured the confidence of Holofernes, an Assyrian commander who was besieging Bethulia. Stealthily in the night time she approached him in his tent, already overcome with heavy drinking, took his own scimitar and cut off his head, and fled with it to the besieged city. This valorous act saved the distressed Israelites. The story bristles with absurdities in names, dates, and geographical material. It seems to have imitated in one respect Jael's murder of Sisera (Jg 4th 21–22). It may have been written some time about B.C. 100, so long after the life of Nebuchadnezzar as to have made him king of Nineveh, instead of Babylon. The original text is Greek.

10. Baruch.—This is a pseudographical book attributed to Baruch, the scribe of Jeremiah. Its purpose seems to have been (1) to quiet the souls of the Jews in exile by telling them that they would soon return to their native land; and (2) to admonish them to flee the idolatry that was everywhere prevalent in Babylonia. Bar 6 is called the 'Epistle of Jeremy,' and is nominally a letter of that prophet, warning the exiles against worshipping idols. This book is thought to have originated sometime about B.C. 320. Its original language is Greek, though there is reason for believing that 1-3^a was first written in Hebrew.

11. Prayer of Manasses, king of Judah, when he was a captive of Ashurbanipal in the city of Babylon (2 Ch 33¹¹⁻¹³). It probably originated in some of the legends current regarding this notable king, and may have been intended for insertion in the narrative of 2 Ch 33¹¹. Its original is Greek. It is not a part of the Vulgate adopted at the Council of Trent, but is in the appendix thereof.

12. Second Esdras [Vulg. Fourth Esdras. If First Esdras is the reconstructed Ezra, and the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah are taken as one book, then this is Third Esdras (as in the Septuagint). If Ezra and Nehemiah are left out of account, this book is Second Esdras (as in the Apocrypha of RV). If, as in the Vulgate, Ezra is reckoned as First Esdras, and Nehemiah as Second Esdras, and the reconstructed Ezra as Third Esdras, then this book is Fourth Esdras. This work is a peculiar combination of matter. It is not history at all, but rather a religious document imitative of the Hebrew prophets, and apocalyptic in character. Its Greek original, if it had one, has been lost, and the work is extant in Latin, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Armenian. It is attributed to at least two different dates, the 2nd and 3rd cents. A.D. The character of the matter shows that some Christian interpolated the original to give it a Christian colouring. This matter does not appear, however, in the Arabic and Ethiopic texts. It stands in the appendix to the NT of the Vulgate.

13. Ecclesiasticus, or, The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach.—This is one of the most valuable of the Apocryphal books. It resembles the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job in its ethical characteristics. It was written by a Jew called Jesus, son of Sirach, probably early in the 3rd cent., though the Greek translation was issued about B.C. 132. The book was originally written in Hebrew, and in this language about one half of it has recently been discovered in Egypt and published. It is one of the works that give us a vivid idea of the Wisdom literature produced in the centuries preceding the Christian era.

14. Wisdom of Solomon lauds wisdom and a righteous life, but condemns idolatry and wickedness. The author employs, in the main, illustrations from the Pentateuch. He purports to be Solomon, and makes just such claims as one would imagine Solomon would have done if he had been the author. He is thought to have lived anywhere between B.C. 150 and B.C. 50, and to have been a Jew of Alexandria. The book possesses some valuable literary features, though in its present form it seems to be incomplete. Its original text was Greek.

If we should include Third and Fourth Maccabees in this list, as is done by some writers (but not by the Vulgate), we find these peculiarities:

15. Third Maccabees describes an attempt to massacre the Jews in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (B.C. 222-205), and a notable deliverance from death. The work is extant in Greek (in LXX), but not in the Vulgate.

16. Fourth Maccabees is a discussion of the conquest of matter by the mind illustratively, by the use of the story of the martyrdom of the seven Maccabees, their mother and Eleazar. The work is found in the Alexandrian MS of the Septuagint, and in Syriac.

In addition to these Apocryphal books, but not included either in the Septuagint, the Vulgate, or the RV, there is an ever-increasing list of works that scholars have chosen to call pseudepigrapha. These were written at various periods, but mainly just before, during, and just after the times of Christ. Many of them deal with the doctrinal discussions of their day, and present revelations to the author under strange and even weird conditions. These writers attached to their books as a rule the name of some famous personage, not by way of deception, but to court favour for the views set forth. It would carry us too far afield to take up these works one by one. Merely the titles of some of them can be mentioned. As a piece of lyrical work the Psalms of Solomon is the best example in this group. Of apocalyptic and prophetic works, there are the Book of Enoch, quoted in Jude, the Assumption of Moses, the Apocalypse of Baruch, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. Legendary works are the Book of Jubilees and the Ascension of Isaiah. One of the curious cases of mixed material is that of the Sibylline Oracles. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

To these might be added scores of lesser lights that appeared in that period of theological and doctrinal unrest, many of which are now published, and others are being discovered in some out-of-the-way place almost yearly. Their value lies in the revelations that they give us of the methods adopted and the doctrines promulgated in the early centuries of the Christian era, by means of such works. IRA MAURICE PRICE.

APOLLONIA (Ac 17¹).—Paul and Silas passed through this town on the way from Amphipolis to Thessalonica. It is known that it was on the important Egnatian road which ran between Dyrrachium (mod. Durazzo) and Thessalonica, but its exact site has not yet been discovered. It was about half-way between Amphipolis and Thessalonica, and lay between the rivers Axios and Strymon.

APOLLONIUS.—1. A governor of Coele-Syria and Phœnicia under Seleucus IV. (2 Mac 4¹), who suggested the abortive attempt of Heliodorus on the Temple-treasury. To this he probably owes the title mysarches (2 Mac 5²¹), which the Vulg. renders odiosum principem, AV 'detestable ringleader,' RV 'lord of pollutions.' In B.C. 168-167 he was sent to Hellenize Jerusalem, and he initiated the great persecution with a cruel massacre on the Sabbath (2 Mac 5²¹⁻²⁵). Judas Maccabæus defeated and slew him, wearing his sword ever after (1 Mac 3^{10ff}; Jos. Ant. xii. vii. 7). 2. An envoy sent to Egypt by Antiochus IV., B.C. 173 (2 Mac 4²¹). 3. An official under Antiochus V. who molested the Jews (2 Mac 12²). 4. A governor of Coele-Syria who fought against the Jews (B.C. 147) on the side of Demetrius (1 Mac 10⁶⁹⁻⁸⁵; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 3 f. is in error). From Jamnia he sent a pompous defiance to Jonathan Maccabæus, who, however, captured Joppa and defeated Apollonius. J. TAYLOR.

APOLLOPHANES (2 Mac 10²⁷).—A Syrian killed at the taking of Gazara by Judas Maccabæus.

APOLLOS (a pet name, abbreviated from Apollonius, which appears in D text of Ac 18²⁶).—Apart from a doubtful reference in Tit 3¹³, we derive our knowledge of Apollos from 1 Cor. and Ac 18²⁴⁻²⁸. In Acts he is described as an Alexandrian Jew, an eloquent man, with an effective knowledge of the OT. He came to Ephesus before St. Paul sojourned there, and, having been instructed in the way of the Lord, he zealously proclaimed his views in the synagogue, where Priscilla and Aquila heard him. What exactly his views were, it is not easy to decide. Ac 18²⁸ suggests that he was a Christian in some sense, that he knew the story of Jesus, believed in Him as Messiah, but did not know of the coming of the Holy Ghost. The disciples mentioned in Ac 19^{1ff}, who are clearly in a parallel position, do not seem to know even so much as this; and 'instructed in the way of the Lord' need not mean Christianity, while even the phrase 'the things concerning Jesus' may refer simply to the Messianic prophecies (cf. Lk 24²⁷, and see art. 'Apollos' by J. H. A. Hart in JThS, Oct. 1905). In Ephesus, Apollos may have preached only John's baptism of repentance. But Priscilla and Aquila made him a full Christian.

Later on Apollos worked in Corinth, with great success. His eloquence and Philonic culture won him a name for wisdom, and made his preaching attractive, so that many declared themselves his special followers (1 Co 11¹). Apollos' teaching in Corinth may have been marked by allegorical interpretation, insistence on Divine knowledge, and on the need of living according to nature (see St. Paul's sarcastic reference to 'nature' in 1 Co 11⁴). But the party-strife at Corinth was not of his intending. Apollos and Paul were agreed in their gospel (1 Co 3⁸)—a fact the Corinthians overlooked. Apollos refused the request of the Corinthians for a speedy second visit (1 Co 16¹²). St. Paul apparently speaks of Apollos as an Apostle (1 Co 4²). We have no certain records of Apollos' teaching, but it has been suggested that he wrote the Wisdom of Solomon before, and the letter to the Hebrews after, his conversion.

APOLLYON ('the Destroyer').—The Greek equivalent in Rev 9¹¹ of Abaddon, the angel of the bottomless pit, who was also the king of the locusts (see ABADDON). The word does not appear in its Greek form in later Rabbinic writings, and only here in the NT. As an angel Apollyon seems to have been regarded as equivalent to Asmodeus, king of demons, in Judaistic mythology; but our data are too few to warrant precise statements.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

APOPLEXY.—See MEDICINE.

APOSTASY.—A defection from the tenets of some religious community. In Ac 21²¹ it describes the charge brought against St. Paul by the Jews, viz., that he taught that the Jews should abandon Mosaism. In 2 Th 2³ it describes the defection of Christians which was to accompany the 'man of lawlessness'; i.e. the Antichrist. This expectation is an illustration of what seems to have been a common belief—that the return of the Christ to establish His Kingdom would be preceded by exceptional activity on the part of His superhuman opponent, and that this would result in an abandonment of Christian faith on the part of many of those nominally Christian.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

APOSTLES.—Apostle, 'one commissioned,' represents a Heb. word which signified not merely a messenger but a delegate, bearing a commission, and, so far as his commission extended, wielding his commissioner's authority. 'The Apostle of any one,' says the Talmud, 'is even as the man himself by whom he is deputed.' The term was applied by Jesus to the twelve disciples whom He attached to Himself to aid Him in His ministry and to be trained by the discipline of His example and precept for carrying it on after His departure (Lk 6¹³, Mt 10²). Cf. Jn 17¹⁸: 'Even as thou didst commission me unto the world, I also commissioned them unto the world' (where 'commission' is the verb cognate to 'Apostle').

Jesus appointed twelve Apostles corresponding to the twelve tribes, thus intimating that their mission was meanwhile to Israel (cf. Mt 10⁶: 4); but by and by, when He was setting out on His last journey to Jerusalem, He 'appointed other seventy and commissioned them' (Lk 10¹), thus intimating the universality of His gospel, inasmuch as, according to Jewish reckoning, mankind was composed of seventy nations.

After the Lord's departure the Twelve were the Apostles par excellence (cf. Ac 6²: 4). They were the men who had been with Jesus, and their peculiar function was to testify of Him, and especially of His Resurrection (Ac 1²¹: 22; cf. v. 8 and Lk 24⁴⁸). But they were not the only Apostles. The title was given to Barnabas (Ac 14¹⁴: 14, 1 Co 9⁶: 6) and Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16⁷). It may be that it was extended to men of Apostolic character, but then why was it withheld from one like Timothy (2 Co 1¹, Col 1¹)? If

APPLE

Barnabas, as tradition declares, and Andronicus and Junias, as Origen suggests, belonged to the order of the Seventy, it may well be that those others besides the Twelve who were styled 'Apostles' were the Seventy. It is true the title is given to James the Lord's brother (Gal 1⁹, 1 Co 15⁷) and to Paul, who belonged neither to the Twelve nor to the Seventy. But theirs were exceptional cases. It was natural that James, who was recognized as the head of the Church at Jerusalem, should be accorded the dignity of Apostleship, as well for his extreme sanctity as for his relationship to Jesus. And as for Paul, his Apostolic title was bitterly contested; and he triumphantly defended it on the double ground that, though he had not companied with Jesus in the days of His flesh, he had seen Him after His glorification on the road to Damascus (1 Co 9¹), and though he was not one of the original Apostles, his Apostleship had the Lord's own sanction (1 Co 9², 2 Co 12¹²). Perhaps it was his example that emboldened others outside the ranks of the Twelve and the Seventy to claim Apostleship on the score of Apostolic gifts, real or supposed (2 Co 11¹², Rev 2²). See also DISCIPLES.

DAVID SMITH.

APOTHECARY.—In all the 8 occurrences of this word in OT and Apocr. we should render 'perfumer,' as does RV in half of these (Ex 30²³: 37²³, Ec 10⁴); elsewhere the former is retained (2 Ch 16¹⁴, Neh 3¹ (cf. marg.), Sir 38⁴ 49¹). See PERFUMER.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

APPAIM.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 2³⁰: 31).

APPAREL.—See DRESS.

APPARITION.—In RV of Mt 14²⁶ and Mk 6⁴⁹ for AV 'spirit.' The Gr. word (phantasma) differs from the usual word for 'spirit' (pneuma). It occurs only in these passages.

APPEAL.—See JUSTICE.

APPHIA.—A Christian lady of Colossæ, a member of the household of Philemon, probably his wife (Philem 3).

APPHUS (1 Mac 2⁵).—The surname of Jonathan the Maccabee. The name is usually thought to mean 'dissembler'; and some suppose that it was given to Jonathan for his stratagem against the tribe of the Jambri, who had killed his brother John (1 Mac 9⁷⁻¹¹).

APPI FORUM.—Ac 28¹⁵ AV; RV 'The Market of Appius.' See next article.

APPIUS, MARKET OF.—A market-town (without city rights) on the Appian Way, 10 Roman miles from Tres Tabernæ (Three Taverns), near the modern railway station, Foro Appio. As the Appian Way was the main road from Rome to the south and east of the Roman Empire, it was traversed by nearly all travellers from or to those parts (Ac 28¹⁵).

A SOUTER.

APPLE.—That the apple (tappuah) of the OT is the fruit known by that name to-day is extremely doubtful. It is true that the tree in size and foliage would answer to the reference in Ca 8⁹, Jl 1¹²; the fruit too in its sweetness (Ca 2⁹) and its smell (Ca 7⁸) is very appropriate. It is also suggestive that Heb. tappuah closely resembles the Arabic for 'apple,' tuffah. On the other hand, it is a substantial difficulty that the apple does not grow well in Palestine proper, as distinguished from the Lebanon. The native fruit is small and wanting in sweetness; almost all eatable apples are imported from the North. In consequence of this, several fruits which to-day are found in Palestine have been suggested. The citron, a favourite with the Jews on account of its smell and golden colour, is certainly a more recent introduction. The apricot, suggested by Tristram, which flourishes in parts of Palestine in greater profusion than any other fruit, would seem to answer to the references well. It is deliciously sweet, with a pleasant smell, and, when ripe, of a brilliant golden colour. The tree is one of the most beautiful in the land, and when loaded with its golden fruit might well suggest the expression 'apples of gold in pictures of silver' (Pr 25¹¹). Unfortunately there is considerable doubt whether this tree, a native of China, was known in Palestine much before the Christian era. A fourth fruit has been suggested, namely, the quince. This is certainly a native of the land, and is common all over Palestine. The fruit, when ripe, though smelling pleasantly, is not 'sweet' according to our ideas, but even to-day is much appreciated. It is a great favourite when cooked, and is extensively used for making a delicious confection. The quince, along with the true apple, was sacred to Aphrodite, the goddess of love.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

APPLE OF THE EYE (lit. 'child or daughter of the eye,' i.e. that which is most precious [the organ of sight], and most carefully guarded [by the projecting bone, protecting it as far as possible from injury]).—A figure of God's care of His people (Dt 32¹⁰, Ps 17⁸, Zec 2⁹), and of the preciousness of the Divine law (Pr 7³). In La 2¹⁸ it is the source of tears. C. W. EMMET.

APRON.—See DRESS.

AQUILA AND PRISCILLA.—The names of a married couple first mentioned by St. Paul in 1 Co 16¹⁹, and by St. Luke in Ac 18². Only in these passages do the names occur in this order; in later references the order is always 'Priscilla and Aquila' (Ac 18¹⁸, 26, Ro 16³, 2 Ti 4¹⁹). A natural inference from this fact is that Priscilla was a more active worker in the Christian Church than her husband. In favour of this view is the statement of Chrysostom (i. 306 D, 177 A, iii. 176 B, C) that it was Priscilla's careful expositions of 'the way of God' (Ac 18²⁶) that proved so helpful to Apollos. On this testimony Harnack bases his ingenious but doubtful theory that Priscilla was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. From the prominence given in Roman inscriptions and legends to the name PRISCA (St. Paul) or its diminutive PRISCILLA (St. Luke), Hort concludes that she belonged to a distinguished Roman family (Rom. and Eph. p. 12 ff.). Aquila was a Jew of Eastern origin—'a man of Pontus by race' (Ac 18²).

From Rome, Aquila and Priscilla were driven by the edict of Claudius (A.D. 52). As the unrest among the Jews, which led to their expulsion, arose 'through the instigation of Chrestus,' it is not improbable that Aquila and Priscilla were at least sympathizers with Christianity before they met St. Paul. On this supposition their ready welcome of the Apostle to their home at Corinth is most easily explained. Their hospitality had a rich reward; both in private and in public they were privileged to listen to St. Paul's persuasive reasonings (Ac 18⁴). Nor was the advantage all on one side; from these 'fellow-workers in Christ Jesus' (Ro 16³) it is probable, as Ramsay suggests (Hastings' DB i. p. 482), that the Apostle of the Gentiles learnt 'the central importance of Rome in the development of the Church. . . . We may fairly associate with this friendship the maturing of St. Paul's plan for evangelizing Rome and the West, which we find already fully arranged a little later (Ac 19²¹, Ro 15²⁴).'

At the close of St. Paul's eighteen months' residence in Corinth, Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him to Ephesus. At their house Christians assembled for worship, and, according to an early gloss (DG al) on 1 Co 16¹⁹, the Apostle again lodged with them. At Ephesus they remained whilst St. Paul visited Jerusalem; there Apollos, the eloquent Alexandrian, profited greatly from their ripe Christian experience, and learnt, from one or both of them, the secret of power in ministering the gospel of grace (Ac 18²⁶); there also it is probable that they made 'the churches of the Gentiles' their debtors by risking their lives in defence of St. Paul. The allusion to this courageous deed is in Ro 16³, and from this passage we learn that Aquila and Priscilla sojourned for a while in Rome, where once more their hospitable home became a rendezvous for Christians.

This statement affords no ground for disputing the integrity of the Epistle. Their former connexion with Rome, their interest in the Church of Christ in the imperial city, and their migratory habits, rather furnish presumptive evidence in favour of such a visit. From these trusted friends St. Paul may have received the encouraging tidings which made him 'long to see' his fellow-believers in Rome (Ro 1¹¹). The last NT reference to this devoted pair shows that they returned to Ephesus (2 Ti 4¹⁹); their fellowship with Timothy would, doubtless, tend to his strengthening 'in the grace that is in Christ Jesus' (2¹). J. G. TASKER.

AQUILA'S VERSION.—See GREEK VERSIONS.

AR.—A city on the Arnon, the border between Moab and the Amorites (Nu 21¹⁵, Dt 2⁹), now Wādī Mōjīb. It is called Ar Moab (Nu 21²⁸, Is 15¹), 'I Moab (Nu 22²⁶), and 'the city that is in the valley' (Dt 2²⁶ etc.). It is possibly the ruin seen by Burckhardt in the valley below the junction of the Lejjān and the Mōjīb.

W. EWING.

ARA.—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7³⁸).

ARAB (Jos 15³²).—A city of Judah in the mountains near Dumah. Perhaps the ruin er-Rabiyah near Domeh.

ARABAH.—The name given by the Hebrews to the whole of the great depression from the Sea of Galilee to the Gulf of Akabah. (For the part N. of the Dead Sea, see JORDAN.) The name is now applied only to the southern part, extending from a line of white cliffs that cross the valley a few miles S. of the Dead Sea. The floor of the valley, about 10 miles broad at the N. end, gradually rises towards the S., and grows narrower, until, at a height of 2000 feet above the Dead Sea, nearly opposite Mt. Hor, the width is only about ½ mile. The average width thence to Akabah is about 5 miles. The surface is formed of loose gravel, stones, sand, with patches of mud. Up to the level of the Red Sea everything indicates that we are traversing an old seabottom. Apart from stunted desert shrub and an occasional acacia, the only greenery to be seen is around the springs on the edges of the valley, and in the wadis which carry the water from the adjoining mountains into the Wādī el-Jaib, down which it flows to the Dead Sea. The great limestone plateau, et-Tih, the Wilderness of Paran, forms the western boundary, and the naked crags of Edom the eastern. Israel traversed the Arabah when they went to Kadesh-barnea, and again when they returned to the south to avoid passing through the land of Edom (Nu 20²¹ 21⁴, Dt 2⁸).

W. EWING.

ARABIA, ARABS.—In the present article we have to do not with the part played by the Arabs in history, or with the geography of the Arabian peninsula, but only with the emergence of the Arab name and people in Bible times.

'Arāb (for which we should have expected rather 'arāb') is scarcely at first a proper name, but stands merely for 'waste,' 'desolation.' So in Is 15¹³ (which may really belong to Isaiah himself, but should perhaps be ascribed to a later hand): 'Bivouac in the copse [made up of thorn-bushes, something like an Italian macchia], in the waste, ye caravans of Dedan.' In this passage the title massābā' arāb, which in any case is late and wanting in the ancient Gr. version, incorrectly takes 'arāb as a proper name [we need not stop to notice the false interpretation of this word adopted by the LXX here and in other passages]. More commonly the word used for 'waste' is the fem. form 'arābāh (e.g. Is 35¹, Job 24³ 39⁹ etc.), which, preceded by the art. (hā-Arābāh), stands for the deep gorge which, commencing to the north of the Dead Sea and including the latter, stretches to the Red Sea (Dt 2⁸ etc.). Whether 'arāb' in Is 13²⁰ and Jer 3² means simply an inhabitant of the desert, or should be taken as a proper name, is uncertain; but at bottom this distinction has no importance, for the two notions of 'Bedouin' (Badawī, which also = 'inhabitant of the desert') and 'Arab' were pretty much identical in the mind of civilized peoples. It may be noted that here the Massoretes appear to assume the appellative sense, since they point 'arabī, whereas for 'Arab' they use the form more akin to Aramaic than Hebrew, 'arbi (Neh 2¹⁸ 6¹⁶). The plural 'arbitm in Neh 21¹⁸ 22¹ and 2 Ch 28⁷ Qere, from 'arbi'im (Kethibh of the last passage) may also be justified from the standpoint of Hebrew usage. The form in 2 Ch 17¹¹ can hardly be original; it is due to attraction from the following mebi'im. 'Arab is certainly a gentile name in we'eth kol malkē 'Arab of Jer 25²⁴ [the following words we'eth kol malkē hā-'ereb, which are wanting in the LXX, are of course a pure dittography; for, although the Massoretes, for the sake of distinction, point in the second instance hā-'ereb, this has no value] and in Ezk 27¹¹. In these passages 'Arab can hardly be taken as the name of a single clan quite distinct from Dedan and the rest. The prophetic authors do not speak with the exactness of a prose narrator, and in point of fact were perhaps not very well informed about the various branches of the Bedouins, of whose territory the Israelite peasant and townsman thought only with a shudder. It is possible, indeed, that the rise of the name 'Arab' among the Hebrews (c. B.C. 700) is connected with the circumstance that the ancient clans of Ishmael, Midian, Amalek, etc., had by that time disappeared or at least lost all significance. In the desert there goes on a constant, if for the most part a slow, interchange in the rise and fall of tribes and tribal names. A brave tribe may be weakened by famine or defeat; it may be compelled to migrate or to adopt a settled mode of life, and thus its name becomes lost among a peasant population; or it may become otherwise broken up and its fragments attached to other tribes, so that small clans by assimilating foreign elements become great tribes. So it was millenniums ago; so it is still.

The Assyrian sources name the Arabs as early as the 9th cent. B.C. (see the Ages cited by Bezold in his Catalogue, vol. v. 19²⁴). King Darius I., in his inscriptions, enumerates Arabāya among the countries subject to him. The name always follows Babylonia, Assyria (which as a province included Mesopotamia proper and also probably N. Syria), and precedes Egypt. We shall have to understand by this name the great desert region not only of Syria, but also of Mesopotamia as well as the peninsula of Sinai. About this same time at the latest the name of the Arabs became known also to the Greeks. Æschylus (Persæ, 316) names an Arab as fighting in the battle of Salamis, and his contemporary, from whom Herodotus borrowed his description of the host of Xerxes, enumerated Arab archers as forming part of the latter (Herod. vii. 69). But while Æschylus (Prom. 422) has quite fabulous notions about the dwelling-places of the Arabs, Herodotus is well acquainted with them. His account of the situation of the Arabian peninsula is approximately correct, but he has specially in view those Arabs who inhabit the region lying between Syria and Egypt, i.e. the desert lands with whose inhabitants the ancient Israelites had frequent relations, peaceful or warlike. Xenophon appears to use the term 'Arabia' in essentially the same sense as King Darius. He too gives this name to the desert to the east of the Euphrates, the desert which separates Babylonia from Mesopotamia proper (Anab. vii. viii. 25),—the same region which was still called 'Arab by the later Syrians. This tract of country, so far as we can learn, has always been peopled by Arab tribes.

In the 5th cent. B.C. we find, in the above-cited passages from the Memoirs of Nehemiah, repeated mention of an Arabian—Geshem or Gashmu, whose real name may have been Gushanū—who gave Nehemiah no little trouble. About this time, perhaps, the Arab tribe of Nabatæans had already pressed their way from the south and driven the Edomites from their ancient seats. Towards the end of the 4th cent. they were firmly established at least in the ancient Edomite capital, Petra; and they gradually extended their dominion widely. The First Book of Maccabees clearly distinguishes the Nabatæans from other Arabs, whereas the Second Book simply calls them 'Arabs' (2 Mac 5⁹), as do also other Greek and Latin writers. The Nabatean kingdom counted, indeed, for so much with Westerns that they could regard it as 'the Arabs' par excellence. The Apostle Paul (Gal 4¹⁰), like profane writers, reckons the Sinaitic peninsula, which was part of the Nabatean kingdom, as belonging to Arabia. Again, the part of Arabia to which he withdrew after his conversion (Gal 1¹⁷) must have been a desert region not far from Damascus, which then also was under the sway of the king of the Nabatæans. By the 'Arabians' mentioned in Ac 2¹¹, in connexion with the miracle of Pentecost, the author probably meant Jews from the same kingdom, which, it is true, had in his time (?) become the Roman province of Arabia (A.D. 105).

We do not know whether the name 'Arab' originated with the Arabs themselves or was first applied to them by outsiders. In any case, it first extended itself gradually over the northern regions and the great peninsula. Uncivilized and much divided peoples recognize their national unity only with difficulty, whereas this is more readily perceived by their neighbours. In the first case a man knows only his own tribe, and regards even the neighbouring tribe, which speaks the same language, as strange. But the wide wanderings of the Arab nomads, due to the nature of their country, brought them readily into contact with peoples of other language and other customs, and this could awaken in them the consciousness of their own nationality. Perhaps the recognition of Arab unity was favoured also by the trading journeys of the civilized Arabs of the south and of other parts of Arabia. But be that as it may, the ancient Arab epitaph of Namāra to the S.E. of Damascus, dating from the year A.D. 328, concerns Maralqais, 'king of all Arabs.' And from the oldest documents of classical Arabic that have come down to us it is a sure inference that at that time (i.e. in the 6th cent. A.D.) 'Arab had been for an inconceivably long period known as their national designation. But the close connexion between this common name and the meaning 'desert' still reveals itself in the circumstance that the plural form 'Arab (later more freq. 'Urbān) stands especially for the Bedouins as opposed to Arabs who live in towns, and that afterwards in common speech, as had been the case even in the Sabæan inscriptions, 'Arab is often used simply for 'Bedouin,' 'inhabitant of the desert.'

TH. NÜLDEKE.

ARAD.—1. A city in the Negeb, the king of which provoked Israel (Nu 21¹) and was slain by Joshua (Jos 12¹⁴). In its vicinity the Kenites settled (Jg 1¹⁶). It is probably Tell 'Arād, 16 miles S. of Hebron. 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹⁵).

W. EWING.

ARADUS (1 Mac 15²³).—See ARVAD.

ARAH.—1. In the genealogy of Asher (1 Ch 7¹⁹). 2. His family returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁶, Neh 6¹⁸ 7¹⁰, 1 Es 5¹⁰mg.).

ARAM.—1. A grandson of Nahor (Gn 22²¹). 2. An Asherite (1 Ch 7⁴). 3. AV of Mt 1¹, Lk 3²¹. See ARNI, RAM.

ARAM, ARAMÆANS (often in AV and RV 'Syrians').—A number of scattered but kindred tribes which made their appearance in the Euphrates valley about B.C. 1300 and rapidly pushed westward. Their chief habitat stretched from Harran, east of the Euphrates, south-westward to the Hauran. The north-eastern part of this region was called 'Aram of the rivers' (Aram-naharaim, Ps 60, title). The Aramæans are first mentioned by Shalmaneser I. of Assyria about B.C. 1300 (WAI iii. 4, No. 1). About the same time their name occurs in an inscription of Rameses II. (cf. Müller, Asien und Europa, 222, 234). Tiglath-pileser I. (c. B.C. 1110) mentions Aramæans (KIB i. 33) as dwelling east of the Euphrates, and in this same region they were later (885-824) conquered by Ashurnazipal and Shalmaneser II. Many of them continued to live in the Euphrates valley, where their language spread to such an extent that, in the reign of Sennacherib, Aramaic glosses begin to make their appearance on Babylonian contracts. In Nippur many similar documents from the Persian period have been found. They indicate that the use of Aramaic was spreading among the common people of Babylonia. It probably came into general use here, as the Babylonian Talmud is written in it.

The Aramæans pushed into the West in large numbers shortly after B.C. 1300. In course of time they occupied Damascus and a part of the country to the south as far as the Hauran, some of them mingling with tribes still farther to the south and becoming the Ammonites, Moabites, and Israelites. A part of the Aramæans also displaced the Hittites in Hamath. Damascus became the leading Aramæan State (cf. Am I⁵ and Is 7⁸), but other independent Aramæan kingdoms were Aram-Geshur, and Aram-Maacah in the Hauran to the north of Bashan; Aram-Zobah, farther north towards Damascus; and Aram-Rehob, near the town of Dan (Nu 13²¹, Jg 18²⁸), conjecturally identified with Banias (Moore, Com. on Judges, 399).

King David married a daughter of the king of Geshur, and she became the mother of Absalom (2 S 3³), who afterwards fled thither (13³⁸). Damascus was conquered by David (8⁶), who also made Zobah, Rehob, and Maacah tributary (ch. 10). Zobah is mentioned by Ashurbanipal three centuries later as Subiti.

After the death of David, Damascus regained its independence. In the reigns of Baasha and Asa it was an ally now of Israel and now of Judah (1 K 15¹⁸). During the century from Ahab to Jehoash of Israel, Damascus and Israel were frequently at war, and Damascus held much of Israel's trans-Jordanic territory. After this the Aramæan kingdom became weaker, but in the reign of Ahaz it made an attempt on Judah (Is 7). It was finally subdued by Tiglath-pileser III. of Assyria in B.C. 732.

The Aramæans continued to form the basis of population in the region from Aleppo to the Euphrates and beyond. Early in the Christian era this region became Christian, and in that Aramaic dialect called Syriac a large Christian literature exists.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

ARAMITESS.—A feminine form which occurs in both AV and RV of 1 Ch 7¹⁴, for the elsewhere frequent term Syrian.

ARAM-GESHUR, ARAM-MAACAH, ARAM-NAHARAIM, ARAM-REHOB, ARAM-ZOBABH.—See ARAM.

ARAN.—Son of Dishan the Horite (Gn 36²⁸, 1 Ch 1⁴²), a descendant of Esau. The name denotes 'a wild goat,' and Dishan 'an antelope' or 'gazelle'; while Seir the ancestor is 'the he-goat.'

ARARAT (Gn 8⁴, 2 K 19³⁷ [Isa 37³⁸], Jer 51²⁷) is the Hebrew form of the Assyrian Uratu, which on the monuments from the 9th cent. downwards designates a kingdom in the N. of the later Armenia. The extension of the name naturally varied with the political limits of this State; but properly it seems to have denoted a small district on the middle Araxes, of which the native name Ayrarat is thought to be preserved in the Alarodiot of Herodotus (iii. 94, vii. 79). Jerome describes it as 'a level region of Armenia, through which the Araxes flows, of incredible fertility, at the foot of the Taurus range, which extends thus far.' The Araxes (or Aras), on its way to the Caspian Sea, forms a great elbow to the S.;

and at the upper part of this, on the right (or S.W.) bank of the river, the lofty snowclad summit of Massis (called by the Persians the 'mountain of Noah') rises to a height of nearly 17,000 ft. above sea-level. This is the traditional landing-place of the ark; and, through a misunderstanding of Gn 8¹ ('in [one of] the mountains of Ararat'), the name was transferred from the surrounding district to the two peaks of this mountain, Great Ararat and Little Ararat,—the latter about 7 m. distant and 4000 ft. lower.

Whether this is the site contemplated by the writer in Genesis (P) is not quite certain. The Syrian and Mohammedan tradition places it at Jebel Jûdî, a striking mountain considerably S. of Lake Van, commanding a wide view over the Mesopotamian plain. It is just possible that this might be included among the 'mountains of Ararat' in the wider sense of the term. This seems the view of Josephus (Ant. i. iii. 5, 6), who is unconscious of any discrepancy between 'Armenia' and the 'Kordyæan' mountain of Berosus. His statement about relics of the ark being shown in his time appears to be borrowed from Berosus, and applies to whatever mountain that writer had in mind—possibly Jebel Jûdî. The Targums and Peshitâ, however, which are influenced by this tradition, read Kardû (Kurdistan), in verbal agreement with Berosus. The cuneiform Flood-legend puts it much farther S., at the 'mountain of Nisir,' probably in one of the ranges E. of the Tigris and S. of the Lesser Zab. This, of course, is quite beyond any imaginable extension of the name Ararat. Assuming, therefore, that the Biblical and Babylonian narratives have a common origin, the landing-place of the ark would seem to have been pushed gradually northward, the natural tendency of such a tradition being to attach itself to the highest mountain known at the time. On this principle the ultimate selection of the imposing Mount Massis would be almost inevitable; and it is probable that this is the view of Gn 8¹, although the alternative hypothesis that Jebel Jûdî is meant has still some claim to be considered. The suggestion of Nöldeke, that Ararat is a late substitution for Kardû in the original text of Genesis, has nothing to recommend it. J. SKINNER.

ARARITE (2 S 23³⁵ RV).—See HARARITE, No. 2.

ARATHES, formerly called Mithridates, was king of Cappadocia B.C. 163-130. In B.C. 139 the Romans wrote letters to Arathes and certain other eastern sovereigns in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15²⁷).

ARAUNAH (2 S 24¹⁸; called in 1 Ch 21¹⁵, 2 Ch 3¹ Ornan).—A Jebusite who owned a threshing-floor on Mount Moriah. This spot was indicated by the prophet Gad as the place where an altar should be erected to J', because the plague, which followed David's numbering of the people, had been stayed. David bought the threshing-floor and oxen for 50 shekels of silver. The price paid is given in 1 Ch 21¹⁸ as 600 shekels of gold—a characteristic deviation from the earlier account.

ARBA is named 'the father of the Anak' in Jos 14¹⁵ (so read also 21¹¹, cf. 15¹³). This means simply that he was the founder of the city which bore his name; that is Kiriath-arba, later Hebron (wh. see), where was a chief seat of the Anakim. J. F. McCurdy.

ARBATHITE (2 S 23³¹).—'A native of Beth-arabah,' a town in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15⁹, 18²⁵).

ARBATTA (AV Arbattis), 1 Mac 5².—A district in Palestine. The situation is doubtful. It may be a corruption for Akkrabattis—the toparchy of Samaria near 'Akrabeh E. of Shechem.

ARBELA.—The discrepancy between 1 Mac 9 and Jos. Ant. xii. xi. 1, our only authorities, makes uncertain the route of Bacchides in his march on Jerusalem. Josephus makes him pitch his camp at Arbela in Galilee; 1 Mac. brings him 'by the way that leadeth to Gilgal,' to 'Mesaloth which is in Arbela.' His course thence points to Jûlîlia as Gilgal, about 5 miles N. of Btr ez-Zeit, where the battle was fought with Judas. Mesaloth might then be sought in Mesetieh, about 3 miles S.E. of Dothan. But no name resembling Arbela, either of town or district, is found in the neighbourhood; although Eusebius (Onomasticon) seems to have known an Arbela not far from Lejjun. On the other hand, Arbela in Galilee survives in the modern Irbū or Irbid, a ruin on the S. lip of the gorge, Wady Hamām, which breaks westward from Gennesaret. There is, however, no trace of a Mesaloth here, unless indeed Robinson's ingenious suggestion is right, that it may be the Heb. mesūlith, referring to the famous caverned cliffs in the gorge, whence Bacchides extirpated the refugees.

ARBITE

W. EWING.

ARBITE.—The LXX (2 S 23³⁵) apparently reads 'the Archite,' cf. Jos 16² and 'Hushai the Archite,' 2 S 15³²; but a place 'Arab,' in the S. of Judah, is mentioned Jos 15⁶². In the parallel passage 1 Ch 11³⁷ we find 'the son of Ezbai,' a reading which is supported by several MSS of the LXX in 2 Sam. i.e., and is probably correct.

ARBONAI (Jth 2²⁴).—A torrent apparently near Cilicia. It cannot be represented by the modern Nahr Ibrahm, since the ancient name of that river was the Adonis.

ARCH.—It is usually stated that the Hebrews were unacquainted with the architectural principle of the arch, but in view of the extreme antiquity of the arch in Babylonian mason work, as e.g. at Nippur, of the discovery of early arches by recent explorers, and of the vaulted roofs of later Jewish tombs, this view is now seen to be erroneous, although the arch is not mentioned in Scripture. The word 'arch' does, indeed, occur in the EV of Ezk 40^{16a}, but this is a mistake for 'porch,' 'porches.' See TEMPLE. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ARCHANGEL.—See ANGEL.

ARCHELAUS.—Mt 2². See HEROD, No. 2.

ARCHER.—See ARMOUR, ARMY.

ARCHEVITES.—'The people of Erech' (wh. see). Some of the inhabitants of Erech were deported as colonists to Samaria by king Ashurbanipal (668-626). Their name is mentioned in Ezr 4⁹ along with dwellers in Babylon; and the deportation of Archevites most probably indicates that Erech sided with Babylon in the revolt of Samas-sum-ukin against the Assy. king.

ARCHIPPUS (Philem 2, Col 4¹⁷) was evidently a member of the household of Philemon of Colossæ, probably his son. He shared his spirit, since St. Paul, referring doubtless to his aid in missionary operations in those parts, styles him 'our fellow-soldier.' He had been entrusted with some important office in the Church, whether at Colossæ, or, as Lightfoot, in view of the preceding context, more probably supposes, at the neighbouring town of Laodicea; and, considering the spiritual atmosphere of the place (Rev 3¹⁴⁻¹⁹), one is not surprised that the Apostle should have thought it needful to exhort him to zeal in his ministry.

DAVID SMITH.

ARCHITE.—The native of a town [in Jos 16² read 'the Archites,' not 'Archi' as in AV] situated on the north border of Benjamin, possibly the modern 'Ain 'Arik, west of Bethel. Hushai, David's friend (2 S 15³²), belonged to this town.

ARCHITECTURE.—The Hebrews never developed a native style of architecture. The genius of the people lay elsewhere. Alike in civil, religious, and funerary architecture, they were content to follow alien models. David's palace in his new capital was probably the first building since the conquest which gave scope for architectural display, and in this case workmen, plans, and decorative materials were all Phœnician (2 S 5¹¹). The palace and temple of Solomon were likewise the work of Phœnician architects, and the former doubtless supplied the model for the more ambitious private buildings under the monarchy. Late Egyptian influence has been traced in the tombs of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, but the prevailing influence from the beginning of the 3rd cent. onwards was undoubtedly Greek (cf. 1 Mac 1¹⁴, 2 Mac 4¹⁹). The many magnificent buildings of Herod, for example, including the colonnades and gates of the Temple, were entirely built in the prevailing Græco-Roman style. When the excavations at Gezer,—where

ARETAS

Mr. Macalister claims to have discovered, with much else of architectural interest, the palace of Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac 13¹⁸).—Taanach, and Megiddo are finished and the results published in final form, and still more when other historical sites, such as Samaria (cf. Am 3¹⁴, 1 K 22²⁹), shall have been similarly laid bare, it may be possible to write a history of Palestinian, including pre-Israelite or Amorite architecture, but that day is not yet. See, further, FORTIFICATION, PALACE, TEMPLE, TOMB. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ARCHIVES.—The 'house of the archives' (Ezr 6¹ RV; AV 'rolls') was a part of the 'treasure house' (5¹⁷) of the Persian kings at Babylon, in which important State documents were preserved.

ARCTURUS.—See STARS.

ARD.—Benjamin's son in Gn 46²¹, but his grandson in Nu 26⁴⁰ = 1 Ch 8³ (Addar). Patronymic Ardites (Nu 26⁴⁰).

ARDAT (2 Es 9²⁸ AV Ardath).—'A field' in an unknown situation.

ARDITES.—Nu 26⁴⁰. See ARD.

ARDON.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2¹⁸).

ARELI.—A son of Gad (Gn 46¹⁶, Nu 26¹⁷). Patronymic Arelites (Nu 26¹⁷).

AREOPAGUS.—This is a compound name, which means 'Hill of Ares,' that is, Hill sacred to (or connected with) Ares, the Greek god of war, who corresponded to the Latin Mars. The hill referred to is a bare, shapeless mass of rock in Athens, about 380 feet high. It is due west of the Acropolis, and separated from it only by a ridge. From the earliest times known to us this hill was associated with murder trials, and a court known as the 'Council from the Areopagus' met on or near it to try such cases. In the account in Acts (17¹⁹⁻²²) it is not the hill, but the 'Council' itself that is referred to, the name of the hill being often used for the Council which met there. In Roman times the Council had power to appoint lecturers at Athens, and St. Paul appears before them to have his aptitude tested. The proceedings were audible to the surrounding crowd. St. Paul's claim was rejected, and only one member of the Council, Dionysius 'the Areopagite' (17³⁴), was convinced by his teaching. A. SOUTER.

ARES (1 Es 5¹⁰).—756 of his descendants returned with Zerub.; they correspond to the 775 (Ezr 2⁵) or 652 (Neh 7¹⁶) children of Arah.

ARETAS.—This is the dynastic name (Aram. Charethath) of several kings of the Nabatæan Arabs whose capital was Petra (Sela), and whose language for purposes of writing and commerce was an Aramaic dialect, as is seen from the existing inscriptions (Cooke, N. Semitic Inscr. p. 214 ff.). The first of the line is mentioned in 2 Mac 5⁸; the fourth (whose personal name was Æneas) in 2 Co 11³², where his 'ethnarch' is said to have 'guarded the city of the Damascenes in order to take' St. Paul; but the Apostle escaped. This was within three years after his conversion (Gal 1¹⁷, Ac 9²⁵). There is a difficulty here, for Damascus was ordinarily in the Roman province of Syria. Aretas III. had held it in B.C. 85; the Roman coins of Damascus end A.D. 34 and begin again A.D. 62-3. It has been supposed that the Nabatæans held the city during this interval. Yet before the death of Tiberius (A.D. 37) there could hardly have been any regular occupancy by them, as Vitellius, proprætor of Syria, was sent by that emperor to punish Aretas IV. for the vengeance that the latter had taken on Herod Antipas for divorcing his sister in favour of Herodias. It has therefore been thought that A.D. 37 is the earliest possible date for St. Paul's escape; and this will somewhat modify our view of Pauline chronology (see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, § 4). Yet the allusion in 2 Co 11³² does not necessarily imply anything like a permanent tenure of Damascus.

by Aretas' ethnarch. A temporary occupancy may well have taken place in Aretas' war against Herod Antipas or afterwards; and it would be unsafe to build any chronological theory on this passage. The reign of Aretas IV. lasted from B.C. 9 to A.D. 40; inscriptions (at d-Hejra) and coins are dated in his 48th year (Cooke, l.c.).

A. J. MACLEAN.

ARGOB.—1. Argob and Arieah were guards of Pekahiah (2 K 15²³), who fell by the hands of Pekah along with their master. 2. A district in the kingdom of Og, abounding in strong cities and unwallied towns. It was subdued by 'Jair son of Manasseh,' and became the possession of his tribe (Dt 3^{3, 13}, 1 K 4¹⁸ etc.). It is called 'the Argob' (Dt 3¹³). This, together with the fact that chebel, 'measured area,' always precedes the name, seems to indicate a definitely marked district. This would apply admirably to the great lava field of d-Lejā, N.W. of Jebel Haurān. Within this forbidding tract the present writer collected the names of 71 ruined sites. Had Gesenius rightly translated 'a heap of stones,' the identification would be almost certain. But the name seems to mean 'arable land' (reyeb = 'clod,' Job 21³² 38³³). Argob must therefore be sought elsewhere. The W. slopes of the mountain (now Jebel ed-Druze) would always form a clearly defined district. They abound in ruins of antiquity; while the rich soil, now turned to good account by the Druzes, would amply justify the name of Argob. W. EWING.

ARIDAI (Est 9⁹).—The ninth of Haman's sons, put to death by the Jews.

ARIDATHA (Est 9⁸).—The sixth son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ARIEH ('the lion').—Mentioned with Argob in a very obscure passage (2 K 15²³).

ARIEL.—1. One of Ezra's chief men (Ezr 8¹⁶). 2. The name of a Moabite (according to RV of 2 S 23²⁰, 1 Ch 11²²) whose two sons were slain by Benaiah. 3. A name of uncertain meaning, perhaps = 'God's altar-hearth,' given to Jerusalem by Isaiah (29¹⁶). It has recently been proposed to read Uri-d ('city of God') as a paronomasia or play of words on Uru-salim, the earliest recorded form of the name 'Jerusalem.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ARIMATHEA (Mt 27³⁷, Mk 15⁴², Lk 23⁵⁴, Jn 19³⁸).—A place known only in connexion with Joseph. It was probably near Lydda.

ARIOCH.—1. The king of Ellasar (Gn 14¹). It has been suggested by Schrader that Arioch is the transcription of Eri-a-ki, the Sumerian writing of the name Rim-Sin of the king of Larsa, son of Kudur-Mabug, an Elamite, who ruled Southern Babylonia till conquered by Hammurabi. See CHEDORLAOMER. 2. The captain of the king's guard in the time of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 2¹⁴). 3. King of the Elymeans (Jth 1⁶).

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ARISAI (Est 9⁹).—The eighth son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ARISTARCHUS.—The name of one of St. Paul's companions in travel. He was 'a Macedonian of Thessalonica' (Ac 19²⁹ 27²), and a convert from Judaism (Col 4¹⁰). From Troas, Aristarchus accompanied St. Paul on his departure for Jerusalem at the close of the third missionary journey (Ac 20⁴); he also embarked with the Apostle on his voyage to Rome (27²). In Col 4¹⁰ he is called St. Paul's 'fellow-prisoner' (cf. Philem 23, where Epaphras, not Aristarchus, is styled 'my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus'). The expression probably refers not to a spiritual captivity, but either to a short imprisonment arising out of the turmoil described in Ac 19²⁹, or to a voluntary sharing of the Apostle's captivity by Aristarchus and Epaphras.

J. G. TANKER.

ARISTOBULUS.—1. The name of a son and of a grandson of Herod the Great. The grandson lived as a private individual at Rome, and was a friend of the Emperor Claudius; those greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹¹ were probably some of his slaves. If he was then dead, they might have become members of the Imperial household, but would still retain Aristobulus' name. 2. The teacher of Ptolemy (2 Mac 1¹⁰). A. J. MACLEAN.

ARIUS (1 Mac 12^{7, 20}).—A king of Sparta, grandson and successor of Cleomenes II. His reign lasted from B.C. 309 to B.C. 265, and he was contemporary with the high priest Onias I., the successor of Jaddua. Friendly letters were interchanged between Arius and Onias (probably about B.C. 300); and Jonathan Maccabaeus refers to these communications in a letter which he sent by his ambassadors to Sparta (c. B.C. 144), 1 Mac 12^{7, 19}. AV Darius in v. 7 is due to corrupt text.

ARK.—This word, from Lat. arca, 'a chest,' is the rendering of two Hebrew words, of which one (ābhāh, probably a loan-word) is applied both to the basket of bulrushes in which the infant Moses was exposed, and to the ark built by Noah (see DELUGE). The other (āron, the native word for box or chest, 2 K 12¹⁰), is used for a mummy-case or coffin (Gn 50²⁶), and in particular for the sacred ark of the Hebrews.

Ark of the Covenant.—1. Names of the ark.—Apart from the simple designation 'the ark' found in all periods of Heb. literature, the names of the ark, more than twenty in number, fall into three groups, which are characteristic (a) of the oldest literary sources, viz. Samuel and the prophetic narratives of the Hexateuch; (b) of Deuteronomy and the writers influenced by Dt.; and (c) of the Priests' Code and subsequent writings. In (a) we find chiefly 'the ark of J', doubtless the oldest name of all, and 'the ark of God'; in (b) the characteristic title is 'the ark of the covenant'—alone or with the additions 'of J', 'of God,' etc.—a contraction for 'the ark or chest containing the tables of the covenant' (Dt 9⁹), and therefore practically 'the ark of the Decalogue'; in (c) the same conception of the ark prevails (see below), but as the Decalogue is by P termed 'the testimony,' the ark becomes 'the ark of the testimony.' All other designations are expansions of one or other of the above.

2. History of the ark.—The oldest Pentateuch sources (J, E) are now silent as to the origin of the ark, but since the author of Dt 10¹⁻⁶ had one or both of these before him, it may be assumed that its construction was there also assigned to Moses in obedience to a Divine command. It certainly played an important part in the wanderings (Nu 10^{33, 144}), and in the conquest of Canaan (Jos 3^{3, 6}), and finally found a resting-place in the temple of Shiloh under the care of a priestly family claiming descent from Moses (1 S 3³). After its capture by the Philistines and subsequent restoration, it remained at Kiriath-jearim (1 S 4¹⁻⁷), until removed by David, first to the house of Obed-edom, and thereafter to a specially erected tent in his new capital (2 S 6¹⁰). Its final home was the inner sanctuary of the Temple of Solomon (1 K 8¹). Strangely enough, there is no further mention of the ark in the historical books. Whether it was among 'the treasures of the house of the Lord' carried off by Shishak (c. B.C. 930), or whether it was still in its place in the days of Jeremiah (31⁶) and was ultimately destroyed by the soldiers of Nebuchadnezzar (587 B.C.), it is impossible to say. There was no ark in the Temples of Zerubbabel and Herod.

3. The significance of the ark.—In attempting a solution of this difficult problem, we must, as in the foregoing section, leave out of account the late theoretical conception of the ark to be found in the Priests' Code (see TABERNACLE), and confine our attention to the oldest sources. In these the ark—a simple chest of acacia wood, according to Dt 10¹—is associated chiefly with the operations of war, in which it is the representative of J', the God of the armies of Israel. Its presence on the field of battle is the warrant of victory (1 S 4²², cf. 2 S 11¹¹), as its absence is the explanation of defeat (Nu 14⁴⁴). Its issue to and return from battle are those of J' Himself (Nu 10³⁴). So closely, indeed, is the ark identified with the personal presence of J' in the oldest narratives (see, besides the above, 1 S 6²⁰, 2 S 6¹⁷, 14), that one is tempted to identify it with that mysterious 'presence' of J' which, as a fuller manifestation of the Deity than even the 'angel of J', was Israel's supreme guide in the wilderness wanderings (Ex 32³⁴ 33¹ compared with v. 14¹, Dt 4²⁷, and Is 63⁹, where read 'neither a messenger nor an angel, but his presence delivered them'). The ark was thus a substitute for that still more complete Presence (EV 'face') which no man can see and live.

Under the prophetic teaching Israel gradually outgrew this naive and primitive, not to say fetish-like, conception, and in the 7th cent. we first find the ark spoken of as the receptacle for the tables of the Decalogue (Dt 10²⁴). Apart from other difficulties attending this tradition, it is quite inadequate to explain the extreme reverence and, to us, superstitious dread with which the ark is regarded in the narratives of Samuel. Hence many modern scholars are of opinion that the stone tables of the Deuteronomic tradition have taken the place of actual fetish stones, a view which it is impossible to reconcile with the lofty teaching of the founder of Israel's religion.

ARKITE is used (Gn 10¹⁷, 1 Ch 1¹⁵) for the people of Arka, a town and district of Phoenicia about 12 miles north of Tripolis. It was taken by Tiglath-pileser III. in a.c. 738. As the birthplace of the Emperor Alexander Severus, it was later called Caesarea Libani. It is probably mentioned, under the form Irkata, in the Amarna Letters.

ARM.—Part of the insignia of royalty amongst Oriental peoples was a bracelet worn on the arm (2 S 1¹⁰; cf. W. R. Smith's reading of 2 K 11¹² where, agreeing with Wellhausen, he would substitute 'bracelet' for 'testimony' [OTJC² 311 n.]). The importance attached to the functions discharged by this organ are incidentally referred to by Job in his solemn repudiation of conscious wrong-doing ('Let my shoulder fall from the shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone' 31²²). The heart was said to be situated 'between the arms', and, therefore, in the murder of Joram, the deadly aim of Jehu resulted in the instantaneous death of the former (2 K 9²⁴). It is interesting to recall here the means by which Jeremiah escaped the vengeance of his political enemies, especially as the narrative reveals the affection inspired by the prophet amongst some of the courtiers (Jer 38¹²). A note of vividness is introduced into the narratives telling of St. Paul's method of bespeaking attention from a crowd which he was anxious to address (Ac 13¹⁶ 21¹⁰, cf. 12¹⁷). There is in the Gospels no more beautiful picture than the two presented by St. Mark, in which the tenderness of Jesus to little children is emphasized. In each of them is pointed out the startling method by which His teaching was often enforced objectively on His hearers' attention (Mk 9³⁸ 10¹³, cf. Lk 22³).

Besides this literal use, there is also an extensive employment of the word in a metaphorical or a spiritual sense. Sometimes we find it used to denote the strength of the ungodly and their power to commit acts of cruel tyranny on God's people (cf. Ps 10¹⁴, Job 38¹³, Ezk 30²¹; cf. 'arm of flesh,' 2 Ch 32⁷, Jer 17⁵). Sometimes the word expresses the might of God's ceaseless activity either on behalf of His chosen (Dt 33⁷, Ps 44³, Is 33⁶³, Ac 13¹⁷), or in breaking the power of His enemies (Ex 6⁸, Dt 5¹⁵, Ezk 21³²), or again in upholding the movements and harmony of His creation, ruling in justice with unswerving sternness (Ezk 20²¹, Job 40⁹, Is 40¹⁰ 51¹, Jer 27³ 32¹⁷). The doom pronounced on the house of Eli contains this word to express the removal of that latent vitality which shows itself in prolonged hereditary strength and activity (1 S 2²¹, cf. Zec 11¹⁷).

The cognate verb is also used not only literally, to furnish arms for the purposes of war (Gn 14¹⁴, Nu 31²), but also in a spiritual sense, to procure and make use of those graces and helps which are meant as weapons, offensive and defensive, of the soul against sin (1 P 4¹, cf. Eph 6¹³).

ARMAGEDDON.—See HAR-MAGEDON.

ARMENIA.—See ARARAT.

ARMLET.—See ORNAMENTS, § 4.

ARMONI.—Son of Saul by Rizpah (2 S 21⁹).

ARMOUR, ARMS.—The soldier's arms, offensive and defensive, are never so termed in our EV; 'armour', 'whole armour' (Eph 6¹¹ [Gr. panoptia], the 'harness' of 2 Mac 15²⁸, RV 'full armour'), and more frequently 'weapons of war' are the terms employed. In RV 'harness' in this sense has in most cases given place to 'armour.'

1. Offensive arms.—In a familiar representation from an Egyptian tomb of date c. B.C. 1895, a band of Semitic nomads are depicted with the primitive arms of their race—the short spear, the bow, and the throw-stick—the last perhaps the handstaves of Ezk 39⁹. In OT the principal arms of attack are the sword, the spear, the javelin, the bow, and the sling. (a) The spear claims precedence as an older weapon than the sword. The normal Hebrew form, the chanith, had a stout wooden shaft with a flint, bronze, or iron (1 S 13¹⁹) head, according to the period. Like the spear of the modern Bedouin sheikh, it figures as a symbol of leadership in the case of Saul (1 S 22²⁶, cf. 18¹⁰). RV. The römach appears to have been a lighter form of spear, a lance, and to have largely supplanted the heavier spear or pike in later times (Neh 4¹³, 16, Jl 3¹⁰). Both are rendered 'spear' in EV. (b) The kîdôn was shorter and lighter than either of the above, and was used as a missile, and may be rendered javelin (Job 8¹⁸, 20 RV, Job 41²⁰ RV 'the rushing of the javelin') or dart. The latter term is used as the rendering of several missile weapons, of which the precise nature is uncertain.

(c) The sword had a comparatively short, straight blade of iron (1 S 13²¹, Is 2²), and was occasionally two-edged (Ps 149⁶, He 4¹²). Ehud's weapon, only 18 inches long, was rather a dagger (Jg 3¹⁶ AV, RV 'sword'). The sword was worn on the left side in a leather or metal sheath (1 S 17³¹), attached to a waist-belt or girdle (1 S 17³¹ 25¹², 2 S 20⁸ RV). It occurs frequently in symbol and metaphor in both OT and NT. It is appropriately the symbol of war, as the plough-share is of peace (Is 2⁴, Mic 4³, Jl 3¹⁰). In NT the word of God is described as a two-edged sword (He 4¹²), and by St. Paul as the 'sword of the Spirit' (Eph 6¹⁷).

(d) The bow is common to civil (Gn 21²⁰) and military life, and vies in antiquity with the spear. It was made of tough, elastic wood, sometimes mounted with bronze (Ps 18³⁴ RV, Job 20²⁴). Horn also was used for bows in ancient times, and those with the double curve seem to have been modelled on the horns of oxen. The bow-string was usually of ox-gut, the arrows of reed or light wood tipped with flint, bronze, or iron. The battle bows (Zec 9¹⁰ 10⁴), at least, must have been of considerable size—the Egyptian bow measured about 5 ft.—since they were strung by pressing the foot on the lower end, while the upper end was bent down to receive the string into a notch. Hence the Heb. expressions 'to tread (=string) the bow,' and 'bow-treaders' for archers (Jer 50¹⁴, 29). The arrows, 'the sons of the quiver' (La 3¹³, RV shafts), were carried in the quiver, which was either placed on the back or slung on the left side by a belt over the right shoulder.

(e) The sling was the shepherd's defence against wild beasts (1 S 17⁴⁰), as well as a military weapon (2 K 3³⁸ and often). The Hebrew sling, like those of the Egyptians and Assyrians, doubtless consisted of a long narrow strip of leather, widening in the middle to receive the stone, and tapering to both ends. At one end was a loop by which the sling was held as the slinger swung it round his head, while the other end was released as the stone was thrown. The Benjamites were specially noted for the accuracy of their aim (Jg 20¹⁶).

(f) The battle axe (Jer 51²⁰, RVm maul; cf. Pr 25¹⁸), lit. 'shatterer' (no doubt identical with the 'weapon of his shattering,' Ezk 9² [RVm 'battle axe']), was probably, as the etymology suggests, a club or mace of hard wood, studded with iron spikes, such as was carried by the Assyrians in the army of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 63). See Rich, Dict. of Ant., s.v. 'Clava.'

2. Defensive arms.—(a) First among the arms of defence must be placed the shield, of which two main varieties are common to all periods, the small shield or buckler (māḡēn), and the large shield (zinnah), the target of 1 K 10¹⁰. The distinction between these is rarely preserved in our EV (e.g. Jer 47²—in Ps 35², Ezk 23³⁴ they are reversed), but the relative sizes of the two kinds may be seen in the passage of 1 Kings just cited, where the targets or large shields each required four times as much gold as the smaller buckler. These, however, were only for state processions and the like (14²⁸, but cf. 1 Mac 6³⁹). The māḡēn was the ordinary light round shield of the ancient world, the Roman clipeus; the zinnah was the scutum or large oblong shield which more effectively protected its bearer against the risks of battle. The normal type of both was most probably made of layers of leather stretched on a frame of wood or wickerwork, since 'both the shields and the bucklers' might be burned (Ezk 39⁹). The shield, as a figure of God's protecting care, is a favourite with the religious poets of Israel (Psalms, passim). St. Paul also in his great military allegory introduces the large Græco-Roman shield (Eph 6¹⁶).

(b) Of the shapes of the Hebrew helmets we have no information. Kings and other notables wore helmets of bronze (1 S 17³⁸, 39), but those prepared by Uzziah for 'all the host' (2 Ch 26¹⁴ RV) were more probably of leather, such as the monuments show to have been worn by the rank and file of other armies until supplanted in the Greek age by bronze, for the élite of the infantry at least (1 Mac 6³⁸).

(c) The same difference of material—bronze for the leaders, leather for the common soldier—holds good for the cuirass or coat of mail (1 S 17³⁸, 39). The latter term takes the place in RV of the antiquated habergeon (2 Ch 26¹⁴, Neh 4¹⁶), and brigandine (Jer 46⁵¹). The cuirass, which protected both back and front, is also intended by the breastplate of Is 59¹⁷ (RVm 'coat of mail'), 1 Mac 3³, 1 Th 5⁸, Eph 6¹⁴. Goliath's coat of mail was composed of scales of bronze, and probably resembled the Egyptian style of cuirass described and illustrated by Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt. [1878] i. 219 ff.). This detail is not given for Saul's cuirass (1 S 17³⁸). Ahab's 'harness' consisted of a cuirass which ended in 'tassels' or flaps, the 'lower armour' of 1 K 22³⁴ RVm. The Syrian war-elephants were protected by breastplates (1 Mac 6³³), and probably also the horses of the Egyptian cavalry (Jer 46⁴).

(d) Greaves of bronze to protect the legs are mentioned only in connexion with Goliath (1 S 17⁶). The military boot is perhaps referred to in Is 9⁶ (RVm).

The armourbearer is met with as early as the time of Abimelech (Jg 9¹⁴), and later in connexion with Jonathan, Saul, and Goliath, and with Joab, who had several (2 S 18¹⁶). This office was held by a young man, like the squire of mediæval knighthood, who carried the shield (1 S 17¹⁷), cuirass, the reserve of darts (2 S 18¹⁴), and other weapons of his chief, and gave the coup de grâce to those whom the latter had struck down (1 S 14¹³).

An armoury for the storage of material of war is mentioned by Nehemiah (3¹⁴), but that this was built by David can scarcely be inferred from the difficult text of Ca 4¹. Solomon's armoury was 'the house of the forest of Lebanon' (1 K 10¹⁷, Is 22⁸). The Temple also seems to have been used for this purpose (2 K 11¹⁰). See further the articles ARMY, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, WAR. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ARMOURBEARER, ARMOURY.—See ARMOUR.

ARMY.—1. In default of a strong central authority, an army in the sense of a permanently organized and disciplined body of troops was an impossibility among the Hebrews before the establishment of the monarchy. The bands that followed a Gideon or a Jephthah were hastily improvised levies from his own and neighbouring clans, whose members returned with their share of the spoil to their ordinary occupations when the fray was at an end. The first step towards a more permanent arrangement was taken by Saul in his operations against the Philistines (1 S 13², cf. 14²²). David, however, was the first to establish the nucleus of a standing army, by retaining as a permanent bodyguard 600 'mighty men' (their official title) who had gathered round him in his exile (1 S 23¹³ 30⁹, 2 S 10⁷ 16¹). To these were added the mercenary corps of the Cherethites and Pelethites (wh. see), and a company of 600 Gittites (2 S 15¹⁸). Apart from these, David's armies were raised by levy as before, but now from the whole nation, hence the technical use of 'the people' in the sense of 'the army' (2 S 20¹³ and often). Solomon's organization of his kingdom into administrative districts (1 K 4⁷) doubtless included matters of army administration (cf. v. 3⁹ 9¹³ 10³⁵).

2. The organization of the Hebrew army was by units of thousands, originally associated with the civil divisions of the same name, with subdivisions of hundreds, fifties, and tens (1 S 8¹² 17¹⁸ 22⁷, 2 K 1²⁴ 11⁴), an arrangement which continued into the Maccabæan period (1 Mac 3³⁵). Each of these divisions had its special 'captain.' The whole was under the supreme command of the 'captain of the host.' The relative positions and duties of the shōṭerīm (AV 'officers') and other military officials are quite uncertain. The former appear to have been charged with keeping and checking the lists of the quotas to be furnished by the various districts (Dt 20²⁸).

3. The army was composed in early times entirely, and at all times chiefly, of infantry, the bulk of whom were armed with the spear or pike and the large shield or target (see ARMOUR). The archers carried a sword and buckler (1 Ch 5¹⁸), and with the slingers (2 Ch 26¹⁴) made up the light infantry. Chariots, although long before a vital part of the forces of the surrounding nations, were first introduced into the Hebrew army by Solomon (1 K 4³³ 9²² 10²⁶; see CHARIOT, HORSE).

4. The period during which a citizen was liable for military service extended from his twentieth (Nu 1³, 2 Ch 25⁶) to his fiftieth year (Jos. Ant. iii. xii. 4). Exemption was granted in the cases specified in Dt 20⁶, at least under the Maccabees (1 Mac 3³⁶), and to the members of the priestly caste (Nu 23³).

5. As regards maintenance, each city and district had doubtless to supply its own quota with provisions, in so far as these were not drawn from the enemy's country. The soldier's recompense consisted in his share of the loot, the division of which was regulated by the precedent of 1 S 30²⁴. The first mention of regular pay is in connexion with the army of Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac 14²³). Foreign mercenaries figure largely in the armies of the later Maccabæan princes and of Herod. No reference has been made to the numbers of the Hebrew armies, since these have in so many cases been greatly corrupted in transmission.

ARNA.—One of the ancestors of Ezra (2 Es 1³), corresponding apparently to Zerariah of Ezr 7⁴ and Zariaias of 1 Es 8².

ARNAN.—A descendant of David (1 Ch 3²¹).

ARNI (AV Aram).—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³²), called in Mt 1³ 'Ram' (RV). Cf. Ru 4¹⁰, 1 Ch 2³ 10.

ARNON.—A valley with a stream in its bed, now called Wady el-Mojib, which gathers the waters from many tributary vales—the 'wadys' [AV 'brooks,' RV 'valleys'] of Arnon (Nu 21¹⁴)—as it flows westward to the Dead Sea. It was the N. border of Moab, cutting it off from the land of the Amorites in old time (Nu 21¹⁸ etc.), and later, from that of the Eastern tribes (Jos 12¹⁴ etc.). It is named in Is 16² ('the fords of Arnon') and Jer 48²⁰ (where the reference may be to the inhabitants of the valley, or to a city of that name now unknown). Mesha made the 'high way in Arnon,' and built (possibly 'fortified') Aroer (Moabite Stone). This 'high way' probably followed the line of the Roman road, traces of which still remain, with indications of a bridge, some distance W. of Aroer—the modern 'Ar'dir, or 'Ar'ar, which stands on the N. bank. W. EWING.

AROD.—A son of Gad (Nu 26¹⁷)=Arodi Gn 46¹⁶. Patronymic Arodites (Nu 26¹⁷).

AROER.—Three distinct places. 1. 'Aroer which is by the brink of the river Arnon' (Dt 2²⁶) is probably the ruin 'Ar'dir, on the north bank of the Wady Mojib (Arnon). In such a position it necessarily became a frontier town, and as such is mentioned (cf. Dt 2²⁶, 2 K 10³³ etc.). It was captured by Sihon, king of the Amorites (Dt 2²⁶ 4⁴⁸, Jos 12² and 13⁹, Jg 11²⁰); when conquered by Israel it was assigned to Reuben (Dt 3¹²); it was taken by Hazael, king of Syria (2 K 10³³), and apparently later on by Moab (Jer 48¹⁴). 2. A city of Judah (1 S 30²⁸), perhaps the ruin 'Ar'dra, 12 miles east of Beersheba. 3. A city of Gad near Rabbah, i.e. 'Amman (Jos 13², Jg 11³²). The site is unknown.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

AROM (1 Es 5¹⁸).—His descendants are mentioned among those who returned with Zerubbabel. The name has no parallel in the lists of Ezr. and Neh., unless it represents Hashum in Ezr 2¹⁹.

ARPACHSHAD was, according to Gn 10²², the third son of Shem, and, according to 11¹⁹, he was the second in the line of descent from Shem to Abraham. Gn 10²² is an enumeration of peoples (or countries) descended from Shem, from which Babylonia or Chaldaea is absent in the present text. The latter portion of the word furnishes Chesed (cf. Gn 22²²), which is the singular form of Chasdim (Chaldees). Probably two words in the original of 10²² were combined into one, the latter being Chesed and the former Arpach, which is a region south-west of Assyria, possibly the same as the Arpachitis of Ptolemy. The mistaken reading in 10²² was then taken as the basis of 11¹⁹. J. F. MCCURDY.

ARPAD.—A city of Syria north-west of Aleppo (2 K 18³⁴ 19¹³, Is 10⁹ 36¹⁹ 37¹³, Jer 49²²). Now the ruin Tell Ertud.

ARPAHAD.—1. A king of the Medes (Jth 1¹⁵). He reigned at Ecbatana, which he strongly fortified. Nebuchadrezzar, king of Assyria, made war upon him, defeated him, and put him to death. 2. The spelling of Arpachshad in AV, and at Lk 3³² by RV also. See ARPACHSHAD.

ARROW.—See ARMOUR, and MAGIC DIVINATION, etc.

ARROWSAKE (Is 34¹⁵ RV).—See OWL, SERPENT.

ARSACES.—A king of Parthia (known also as Mithridates I.). When opposed by Demetrius Nikator, who thought the people would rise in his favour and afterwards assist him against Tryphon, he deceived Demetrius by a pretence of negotiations, and in b.c. 138 took him prisoner (1 Mac 14¹⁻³; Justin, xxxvi. 1). In 1 Mac 15²² Arsaces is mentioned among the kings to whom was sent an edict (Jos. Ant. xiv. viii. 5) from Rome forbidding the persecution of the Jews.

ARSIPHURITH (AV Asephurith), 1 Es 5¹⁶.—112 of his sons returned with Zerubbabel. The corresponding name in Ezr 2¹⁸ is Jorah; and in Neh 7²⁴ Hariph.

ART.—Among the Hebrews the fine arts, with the possible exception of music, were not seriously cultivated (cf. ARCHITECTURE). The law of Ex 20⁴ constituted an effective bar to the development of the plastic art in particular. As to the nature and workmanship of the early ephods (Jg 8²⁷ 17⁶) and teraphim (Gn 31¹⁹, Jg 17⁵, 1 S 19¹³ RV), as of the 'graven images' and the later 'molten images,' we can only speculate. SCULPTURE in wood, but of Phœnician workmanship, both in relief (1 K 6¹⁸ 2³²) and in the round (v. 28²⁵), found a place in the Temple of Solomon. The only specimens yet discovered of 'genuine Israelite' sculpture (according to the discoverer, Professor Sellin) are the beardless human heads (cherubim?), foreparts of lions and other motifs that adorn the unique altar of incense from Taanach (illust. PEFS, 1904, 390).

Of PAINTING there is no trace in OT. The coloured representations which Ezekiel saw with abhorrence on the Temple walls were not true paintings, but, as the original implies, figures chiselled in outline, with the contours filled in with vermillion (Ezk 23¹⁴, cf. 8¹⁰). The decorative work on pure Hebrew pottery was practically confined to geometrical designs. Of the minor arts, gem-engraving must have attained considerable development (Ex 28¹¹). The finest product of modern excavation in Palestine in the domain of art is probably the Hebrew seal with the lion marchant found at Megiddo (see SEALS). Mention may also be made of the filigree and other gold work implied in such passages as Ex 28¹¹. The products of the Hebrew looms must also have shown considerable artistic merit (Ex 26¹). See, further, JEWELS, MUSIC, SEALS, TEMPLE, SPINNING AND WEAVING.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ARTAXERXES is the Greek form of the Old Persian Artakhshatra, the Hebrew being Artakhshast (2). The Artaxerxes of the Bible is Artax. Longimanus (b.c. 465–424), son of Xerxes (Bibl. Alasuerus). By him Ezra was permitted to go to Jerusalem from Babylon and restore the affairs of the Jewish community (Ezr 7¹⁶ 8¹). He also favoured the similar mission of his cup-bearer Nehemiah thirteen years later (Neh 2¹ 5¹⁴ 13⁶). The events narrated in Ezr 4⁷ and said to have occurred in the time of Artaxerxes must have taken place during an earlier reign, probably that of Cambyses, unless, indeed, they are to be regarded as unhistorical. His régime was more important for Israel than that of any other king of Persia except Cyrus the Liberator.

J. F. MCCURDY.

ARTEMAS.—A trusted companion of St. Paul, in the later part of his life (Tit 3¹²). There is no evidence for the statements of Dorotheus (Bibl. Maxima, Lugd. 1677, iii. p. 429) that he had been one of the 70 disciples, and was afterwards bishop of Lystra.

ARTEMIS.—Ac 19²⁴. 27 RVm. See DIANA.

ARTIFICEER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS.

ARTILLERY.—1 S 20⁴⁰ AV (in obsol. sense of Jonathan's bow and arrows; RV 'weapons'); 1 Mac 6³¹. (see FORTIFICATION, § 7).

ARTS AND CRAFTS.—One of the most characteristic distinctions between the Hebraic and the Hellenic views of life is found in the attitude of the two races to manual labour. By the Greek it was regarded as unworthy of a free citizen; by the Jew it was held in the highest esteem, as many Talmudic aphorisms bear witness. The general term in OT for craftsman (2 K 24¹⁴, Jer 24¹ RV), artificer (1 Ch 29²), or skilled artisan is chardash, from a root meaning 'to cut.' Most frequently however, it is qualified by the name of the material. This suggests the following divisions. [In RV 'craft' has been displaced by the more modern 'trade'].

1. Workers in wood.—The productions of the 'worker in timber' (1 Ch 22¹⁵), elsewhere in OT carpenter (also Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³), probably surpassed in variety those of any other craftsman, for they comprised not only those of the modern carpenter and cabinetmaker, but also of the ploughwright, woodcarver, and other specialized arts and crafts of to-day. His tools cannot have differed much from the tools of his Egyptian contemporaries described and illustrated by Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt., see Index). Various axes are named in OT. For one variety the text distinguishes between the iron head and the wooden helve (Dt 19⁵). Another is from the context probably an adze (Jer 10³), while a third appears as a hatchet in Ps 74⁵ RV. The carpenter's hammer (Jer 10⁴) was rather a wooden mallet (cf. Jg 4²¹); his saw (Is 10¹⁶), to judge from analogy and from the excavations, was single-handed, and of bronze in the earlier period at least. Holes were bored with a drill worked as in the present day by a bow and string. In Is 44¹³ are further named the measuring line (AV 'rule'), the sharp metal pencil (AV 'line') or stylus for outlining the work, the planes, which were more probably chisels, and the compasses (RV).

2. Workers in metal.—The principal metals of OT times are enumerated in Nu 31²². The 'brass' of OT, however, is probably always bronze, i.e. copper with an alloy of tin, except where pure copper is intended, as Dt 8⁹. The excavations have shown that iron makes its appearance in Palestine about the beginning of the monarchy (c. B.C. 1000), although bronze continued in use for several centuries, and was 'not fully conquered till the period of the captivity' (PEFSI, 1904, 122). The coppersmith (2 Ti 4¹¹), 'artificer in brass' (Gn 42²² AV), 'worker in brass' (1 K 7¹⁴), as he is variously termed, was thus the chief metal worker of the earlier period. For the more artistic handling of copper the Hebrews were at first dependent on Phœnician craftsmen (1 K 7¹²). Later, as we have seen, the ironsmith (1 S 13¹⁹), or 'worker in iron' (2 Ch 24¹²), supplanted the coppersmith. The tools of both were the hammer (Is 44¹²) and the anvil (Is 41⁷, Sir 38²⁹)—the latter probably then as now 'a boot-shaped piece of metal inserted in a section of an oak or walnut log'—the tongs (Is 44¹²) and the bellows (Jer 6²⁹). For the goldsmith and the silversmith see MINING AND METALS, s.v. 'Gold' and 'Silver'. The smiths carried away by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 24¹, Jer 24¹) were probably those specially skilled in the manufacture of weapons of war.

3. Workers in stone.—From the far-off palæolithic days man has been a 'worker in stone,' a term confined in OT to those who cut and dressed stone for building purposes (1 Ch 22¹⁵). The more usual rendering is masons (2 S 5¹¹, 1 Ch 14¹). References are given to various processes, such as the 'hewing out' (1 K 5¹⁷ RV) of the stones in the quarry (6⁷ RV), the 'hewing' of wine-vats (Is 5² RV) and tombs (22¹⁶) in the solid rock, the cutting and dressing of 'hewn stones' for various constructions (Ex 20²⁵, 1 K 5¹⁷, 2 K 12¹², Am 5¹¹). The stone-squarers of 1 K 5¹⁴ (AV) were rather men from the Phœnician city of Gebal (RV 'Gebalites'), experts in this branch of industry. The builders (Ps 118²²) worked from a prepared plan or model (Ex 25⁹, 1 Ch 28¹¹, EV pattern), using the measuring-rod (Ezk 40³) and the plumbline (Am 7⁷) or plummet (2 K 21¹³, Zec 4¹⁰). The large hammer used in quarrying (Jer 23²⁹) is different from the smaller hammer of the stone-cutter (1 K 6⁷). The axe of the last passage is rather the pick for stone-dressing, and was the tool used in cutting in the Siloam tunnel as the workmen tell us in their famous inscription. For the 'engraver in stone' of Ex 28¹¹ see SEALS.

4. Workers in clay.—Clay, not stone, was the ordinary building material among the Hebrews (see HOUSE). Brickmaking, however, was too simple an operation to attain the dignity of a special craft in OT times, as was also 'plastering' with clay (Lv 14⁴²) or lime (Dn 5⁴, cf. Mt 23²⁷ and Ac 23³ 'whited wall'). It was otherwise with the potter and his work, perhaps the oldest of all crafts, for which see POTTERY.

5. Workers in leather.—First among these is the tanner (Ac 9⁴), who prepared the leather from the skins of domestic and other animals, including the marine dugong (Ex 25⁵, RV 'seal,' AV 'badger'). The hair was removed by means of lime, or the acrid juices of plants, applied to the skins after they had been soaked for some time in water. Owing to their uncleanly accompaniments, the tanner and his trade were regarded by the Jews with much disfavour. Like the fuller, he was forbidden to carry on his work within the city, which explains the situation of Simon's tannery 'by the sea side' (Ac 10²). In early times the tanner not only supplied the material but probably actually manufactured the leather shields and helmets required by soldiers, while the making of shoes, girdles, and other articles of leather (Lv 13³⁸), and the preparation of skins for water, wine, and milk (see BOTTLER) were long matters of purely domestic economy.

6. Trades connected with dress.—The closing words of the preceding paragraph apply equally to the making of the ordinary dress of the Hebrews (cf. 1 S 2¹⁹). The tailor first appears in the Mishna. Certain of the processes, however, gradually developed into separate crafts, such as that of the weaver (Ex 35¹⁰, 1 S 17¹; see SPINNING AND WEAVING), the embroiderer (Ex l.c.), whose designs were sewed upon the finished fabric, the dyer and the fuller. From the Mishna it is evident that in NT times the dyers were a numerous body in Jerusalem. The wool was usually dyed before or after being spun (Ex 35²). Both animal and vegetable dyes were employed (see COLOURS). The work of the fuller (Is 7³, Mal 3⁶, Mk 9³) was of two kinds, according as he dealt with the web fresh from the loom, or with soiled garments that had already been worn. The latter he cleaned by steeping and treading in water mixed with an alkaline substance (rendered soap in Mal 3²) and fuller's earth. The new web—the 'undressed cloth' of Mt 9¹⁶, Mk 2¹ RV—on the other hand, after being thoroughly steeped in a similar mixture, was stamped and felted, then bleached with fumes of sulphur, and finally pressed in the fuller's press. Fulling, like tanning, was carried on outside the towns, but the precise situation of the 'fuller's field' of Isaiah's day (Is 7³) is still uncertain. Here may be mentioned the barber (Ezk 5¹) and the perfumer (AV 'apothecary,' 'confectionary'), for whom see HAIR and PERFUMER respectively.

7. Employments connected with food.—Cooks, as a special class, were to be found only in the houses of the wealthy (see FOOD). The Hebrew name shows that they killed as well as cooked the animals. The shambles of 1 Co 10²⁵, however, are not, as in modern English, the slaughter-house, but the provision-market of Corinth, where meat and other provisions were sold. The bakers were numerous enough to give their name to a street of the capital in Jeremiah's day (Jr 37²¹); for their work see BREAD. Public mills employing millers appear late, but are implied in the rendering 'great millstone' of Mt 18⁶ RV (cf. marg. and see MILL). The well-known Tyropæon or Cheesemakers' valley in Jerusalem received its name from the industry carried on there (Jos BJ v. iv. 1).

8. Employments connected with the land.—Most of these are noticed in other connexions; see AGRICULTURE, SHEEP, VINE, etc. The prophet Amos describes himself as 'a dresser of sycamore trees' (Am 7¹⁴ RV), for which see AMOS, ad init.

9. Miscellaneous employments.—If to the above there be added the tentmaker, representing the craft (RV 'trade') of St. Paul and his friends Aquila and Priscilla (Ac 18³, see TENT), and the fisherman (see NETS), no trade or manual employment of importance will, it is hoped, have been overlooked. Most of the remaining employments will be found under their own (e.g. RECORDER, SCRIBE) or kindred titles, as 'merchant' under TRADE, 'physician' under MEDICINE, etc.

10. Two general characteristics.—This article may fitly close with a brief reference to two characteristics of all the more important handicrafts and employments. The first is still a feature of Eastern cities, namely, the grouping of the members of the same craft in one street or quarter of the city, to which they gave their name. Thus we find in Jerusalem, as has been noted, 'the bakers' street,' 'the fullers' field,' and 'the cheese-makers' valley,' to which should perhaps be added 'the valley of craftsmen' (Neh 11³⁴). Josephus mentions a smiths' bazaar, a wool-market, and a clothes-market in the Jerusalem of his day (BJ v. viii. 1).

The second point to be noted is the evidence that the members of the various crafts had already formed themselves into associations or guilds. Thus we read in Nehemiah of a 'son of the apothecaries,' i.e. a member of the guild of perfumers (3⁹), and of a 'son of the goldsmiths' (3³¹). Cf. Ezr 2⁴³ 'the sons of the porters' and the familiar 'sons of the prophets.' In 1 Ch 4²¹ there is mention of similar associations of linenweavers and potters, for which see Macalister, 'The Craftsmen's Guild,' etc. PEFSI, 1905, 243 ff. The expression 'sons of' to denote membership of an association goes back to the days when trades were hereditary in particular families. A guild of silversmiths is attested for Ephesus (Ac 19³). For the probable earnings of artisans among the Jews see WAGES.

ARUBBOTH.—An unknown district, probably in S.W. Palestine (1 K 4¹⁰).

ARUMAH.—The place of refuge of Abimelech (Jg 9⁴¹), perhaps el-'Ormeh, 6 miles S.E. of Nāblus (Shechem).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ARVAD (modern Ruṣṣūd) was the most important of the northerly cities of Phœnicia. It was built on an island 70 miles north of Beyrout—a sort of second Tyre, with another town on the mainland opposite. In Ezk 27¹¹ it is named as furnishing oarsmen for the galleys of Tyre and warriors for its defence. In the ethnological list of Gn 10¹⁴ (1 Ch 1¹⁴) it is mentioned among the chief settlements of the Canaanites or Phœnicians. Throughout antiquity it was a place of renown for trade and general enterprise, ranking next to Tyre and Sidon. It is the Aradus of 1 Mac 12⁵³.

J. F. McCURDY.

ARZA.—Prefect of the palace at Tirzah, in whose house King Elah was assassinated by Zimri at a carouse (1 K 16⁷).

ARZARETH (2 Es 13⁴).—A region beyond the river from which the ten tribes are to return. It became the subject of many later Jewish legends concerning the Sabbatic River beyond which the lost tribes were to be found—variously identified with the Oxus and the Ganges.

ASA.—1. The third king of Judah after the disruption, succeeding Abijah. Since his mother's name is given as the same with that of Abijah's mother, some have supposed the two kings to have been brothers. But there may be some mistake in the text. Asa is praised by the Biblical writer for his religious zeal, which led him to reform the worship, and even to depose his mother from her place of influence at court because of her idolatrous practices. Politically he took a mistaken course when he submitted to Benhadad of Damascus to secure his aid against Baasha of Israel, who had captured Ramah. The Temple treasures were sent to Benhadad, who thereupon invaded Israel, and Baasha was compelled to evacuate the threatening fortress (1 K 15²⁷). The Chronicler (2 Ch 14²⁷) credits Asa with a victory over an enormous force of Ethiopians. 2. A Levite (1 Ch 9⁴).

H. F. SMITH.

ASADIAS ('J' is kind,' cf. 1 Ch 3³⁰).—An ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1¹).

ASAHIEL.—1. The youngest son of Zeruliah, David's sister, and the brother of Joab and Abishai. He was famous for his swiftness of foot, a much valued gift in ancient times. He was one of David's thirty heroes, probably the third of the second three (2 S 23³⁴). He was also commander of a division in David's army (1 Ch 27⁷). He was slain by Abner (2 S 21¹⁷⁻²²). 2. A Levite, who taught the people in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17⁸). 3. A subordinate collector of offerings and tithes in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹²). 4. Father of Jonathan, who opposed Ezra's action in connexion with the divorce of foreign wives (Ezr 10¹⁴).

ASATAH ('J' hath made').—1. One of the deputation sent by Josiah to consult Huldah the prophetess, 2 K 22¹². 14 (AV Asahiah), 2 Ch 34²⁰. 2. One of the Simeonite princes who attacked the shepherds of Gedor, 1 Ch 4²⁸. 3. A Merarite who took part in bringing the ark to Jerusalem, 1 Ch 6³⁰ 15¹¹. 4. The first-born of the Shilonites, 1 Ch 9⁴; called in Neh 11¹ Maaseiah.

ASANA (1 Es 5¹).—His descendants were among the 'temple servants' or Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel; called Asnah in Ezr 2⁴⁰ [Neh. omits].

ASAPH ('gatherer').—1. The father of Joah, the 'recorder' or chronicler at the court of Hezekiah (2 K 18¹⁸. 37 etc.). 2. The 'keeper of the king's forest,' to whom king Artaxerxes addressed a letter directing him to supply Nehemiah with timber (Neh 2⁸). 3. A Korahite (1 Ch 26¹), same as Abiasaph (wh. see). 4. The eponym of one of the three guilds which conducted the musical services of the Temple in the time of the Chronicler (1 Ch 15¹⁶ etc.). The latter traces this arrangement to the appointment of David, in whose reign Asaph, who is called 'the seer' (2 Ch 29³⁰), is supposed to have lived. At first the Asaphites alone seemed to have formed the Temple choir, and in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (wherever we have the memoirs of the latter in their original form) they are not yet reckoned among the Levites. At a later period they share the musical service with the 'sons of Korah' (see KORAHITES). Pss 50 and 73-83 have the superscription le-Asaph, which means in all probability that they once belonged to the hymn-book of the Asaphite choir (see PSALMS).

ASARA (1 Es 5¹).—His sons were among the Temple servants or Nethinim who returned under Zerubbabel; omitted in the parallel lists in Ezr. and Neh.

ASARAMEL (AV Saramel).—A name whose meaning is quite uncertain (1 Mac 14²⁰). See RVM.

ASAREL (AV Asareel).—A son of Jehallelel (1 Ch 4¹⁰).

ASBASARETH (1 Es 5²).—A king of Assyria, probably a corrupt form of the name Esarhaddon, which is found in the parallel passage Ezr 4². The AV form Azbazareth comes from the Vulgate.

ASCALON.—See ASHKELON.

ASCENSION.—The fact of our Lord's Ascension is treated very scantily in the Synoptic Gospels. From Mt. it is entirely omitted. In the appendix to Mk. the words in which it is stated are rather the formula of a creed than the narrative of an event (Mk 16¹⁹). Lk. is somewhat more circumstantial, and, though the chronology is uncertain, mentions the journey to the neighbourhood of Bethany and the disappearance of Christ in the act of blessing, together with the return of the disciples to Jerusalem (Lk 24⁴⁰⁻⁴³). The narrative, meagre as it is, is not inconsistent with, and may even presuppose, the events recorded at greater length in Acts (1¹⁻¹²). Here we learn that the scene was more precisely the Mount of Olives (v. 13); that the final conversation, to which allusion is possibly made in Mk 16¹⁹, concerned the promise of the Holy Spirit (vv. 1-2); and that the Ascension, so far as it was an event and therefore a subject of testimony, took the form of the uplifting of the bodily form of Jesus from the earth till it disappeared in a cloud (vv.⁹⁻¹⁰). Whether this experience involved more than the separation of Christ from immediate contact with the earth, and included His gradual recession into the upper air, there is nothing directly to show. The general form of the narrative recalls the Transfiguration (Lk 9²⁸⁻³⁶). The words of the 'two men in white apparel' (v.¹⁰) suggest that the final impression was that of disappearance above the heads of the onlookers (v.¹¹). It will be noticed that, while the Markan appendix and Luke, unless the latter narrative is interpolated, blend fact and figure (Mk 16¹⁹ 'received up [fact] into heaven [partly fact, partly figure], and sat down at the right hand of God [figure]'; Lk 24⁵¹ 'he parted from them [fact], and was carried up into heaven [partly fact, partly figure; but see RVm].' as must necessarily be the case where the doctrine of the Ascension is concerned; Acts, on the other hand, which purports to describe an event, rigidly keeps within the limits of testimony.

There are certain anticipations of the Ascension in the Gospels which must be regarded as part of their witness to it. Thus Lk. introduces the account of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem with the words 'when the days were being fulfilled that he should be received up' (Lk 9⁵¹ RVm). It is probable that the Ascension is here delicately blended with the Crucifixion, as apparently by Christ Himself in Jn 12³⁵. Again, the word exodos in Luke's account of the Transfiguration, rendered in the text of RV 'decease,' but marg. 'departure,' seems to have the same double reference (Lk 9³¹). Our Lord's predictions of the Second Coming 'on the clouds' (Mt 24³⁰ 26⁶⁴; cf. 1 Th 4¹⁶, Rev 17) almost necessarily imply the Ascension. The Fourth Gospel, while in its accustomed manner omitting the story of the Ascension, probably regarded as known, introduces definite references to it on the part of Christ both before and after the Resurrection (Jn 6⁶² 7³³ 14¹² 28 16²⁸ 20¹⁷ etc.). And if we compare statements in the Epistles (Eph 4⁸, He 1³ 4¹⁴) with the Ascension narrative, it is scarcely possible to doubt that the writers accepted the historic fact as the basis of their teaching. To this must be added all those passages which speak of Jesus as exalted to the right hand or throne of God (Ro 8³⁴, Eph 1²⁰, He 10¹³ etc.), and as returning to earth in the glory of the Father (Mt 25³¹, Mk 8³⁸, Ph 3²⁰ etc.). In connexion with the Session, St. Peter, after mentioning the Resurrection, uses the expression 'having gone his way into heaven' (1 P 3²², cf. Jn 14¹²). Nor can we omit such considerations as arise out of the fact of the Resurrection itself, which are satisfied only by an event that puts a definite period to the earthly manifestation of the incarnate Christ.

From what has been said it will appear that the Ascension stands on a somewhat different level from the Resurrection as an attested fact. Like the Virgin-birth, it did not form a part of the primitive preaching, nor does it belong to the evidences of Christianity. The fragment of what is thought to be a primitive hymn quoted in 1 Ti 3¹⁶ somewhat curiously places 'preached among the nations' before 'received up in glory.' But it is nevertheless a fact which came within the experience of the Apostles, and can therefore claim a measure of historical testimony. The Resurrection is itself the strongest witness to the reality of the Ascension, as of the Virgin-birth, nor would either in the nature of the case have been capable of winning its way to acceptance apart from the central faith that Jesus actually rose from the dead. But neither the fact itself nor its importance to the Christian believer depends upon the production of evidence for its occurrence. It will not be seriously disputed by those who accept the Apostolic gospel. On the other hand, the fact that the Ascension was accepted in the primitive Church as the event which put a term to the earthly manifestation of Christ brings out the Resurrection in striking relief as in the full sense of the word a fact of history. It is the Ascension represented as it is in Scripture not only historically but mystically, and not the Resurrection, which might be viewed as an apotheosis or idealization of Jesus. That 'Jesus is now living at the right hand of God' (Harnack) is not a sufficient account of the Christian belief in the Resurrection in view of the Ascension narrative, which, even if Kelm and others are right in regarding it as a materialization of the doctrine of the eternal Session as set forth in the Epistles, becomes necessary only when the Resurrection is accepted in the most literal sense.

The Ascension is the point of contact between the man Jesus Christ of the Gospels and the mystical Christ of the Epistles, preserving the historical character of the former and the universality of the latter in true continuity. It enabled the disciples to identify the gift of Pentecost with the promise of the Holy Spirit, which had been specially connected with the withdrawal of Jesus from bodily sight and His return to the Father (Jn 16⁷, cf. 7³⁹). An eternal character is thus given to the sacrifice of the death of Christ, which becomes efficacious through the exaltation of His crucified and risen manhood (He 10¹¹⁻¹⁴ 19-22). J. G. SIMPSON.

ASCENSION OF ISAIAH. See Apoc. Lit., p. 41.

ASCENT OF BLOOD (Jos 15⁷, RV 'ascent of Adummim').—The steep road from Jericho to Jerusalem, so called, according to Jerome, from the deeds of the brigands who infested it (cf. Lk 10³⁰); but see ADUMMIM. DAVID SMITH.

ASEAS (1 Es 9²²).—One of the sons of Annas who agreed to put away his 'strange' wife; called Issihjah, Ezr 10³¹.

ASEBERIAS (AV Asebebia).—A Levite who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (1 Es 8⁴⁷).

ASEBIAS (AV Asebia).—A Levite who returned with Ezra (1 Es 8⁴⁸).

ASENATH.—Daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On, wife of Joseph and mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gn 41⁴⁵ 50 43²⁰). The name, like the other Egyptian names in the story of Joseph, is of a well-known late type, prevalent from about b.c. 950; it should probably be vocalized Asneit or Enneit, meaning 'belonging to Neit.' Neit was the goddess of Sais, and her name was especially popular in names from the 26th (Saite) Dyn., c. b.c. 664, and onwards for some two centuries. Asenath is the heroine of a remarkable Jewish and Christian romance, in which she renounces her false gods before her marriage with Joseph; it can be traced back to the 5th cent. A.D., and is probably a good deal earlier. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ASH.—See FIR.

ASHAN (Jos 15⁴ 19⁷, 1 Ch 4³² 6⁴⁹).—Perhaps the same as Oor-ashan (wh. see). It was a town of Judah, near Libnah and Rimmon, belonging to Simeon, and not far from Debir. The site is doubtful.

ASHARELAH (AV Asarelah).—An Asaphite (1 Ch 25²), called in v.¹⁴ Jesharelah.

ASHBEA occurs in an obscure passage (1 Ch 4²¹ 'house of A.') where it is uncertain whether it is the name of a place or of a man.

ASHBEL ('man of Baal').—The second son of Benjamin (1 Ch 8¹; cf. Gn. 46²¹, Nu 26²⁸). In Nu 26²⁸ Ashbelite, inhabitant of Ashbel, occurs.

ASHDOD ('fortress'; Greek Azotus).—A city in the Philistine Pentapolis; not captured by Joshua (Jos 13³), and a refuge for the unslaughtered Anakim (Jos 11²²); theoretically assigned to the tribe of Judah (Jos 15⁴⁷). Hither the Philistines brought the ark, and sent it thence to Gath, on account of an outbreak probably of bubonic plague (1 S 5¹⁻⁸). Uzziah attacked the city, destroyed its walls, and established settlements near it (2 Ch 26⁶). The Ashdodites joined with Sanballat in opposing Nehemiah's restoration of Jerusalem (Neh 47), yet some of the Jews of the period married wives from Ashdod, and their children spoke in its dialect (Neh 13²²⁻²⁴). It was captured by Sargon's commander-in-chief (Is 20¹). Jeremiah, Amos, Zephaniah, and Zechariah speak denunciations against it. It was again captured by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 5⁶³), and again by Jonathan (10³⁴). The solitary reference to it in the NT is the record of Philip's departure thither after the baptism of the Ethiopian (Ac 8⁴⁰). It is identified with the modern Esdu, a village about two-thirds of the way from Jaffa to 'Askalan, and some 3 miles from the sea. It is on the slope of a hill, and at its entrance are the remains of a large mediæval khan. There are fragments of ancient buildings to be found here and there in the modern walls.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ASHER.—1. A town on the S. border of Manasseh (Jos 17⁷). Site unknown. 2. To 1²=HAZOR, No. 1.

ASHER.—The eighth son of Jacob, by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid. Leah, joyful over his birth, named him 'Happy' (Gn 30¹²). This 'popular etymology' dominates J's thought in the 'Blessing of Jacob' (Gn 49²⁰) and in the 'Blessing of Moses' (Dt 33²⁴). Asher's territory was especially fertile and fitted to promote prosperity. Whether this fact operated in its naming, or whether the name was originally that of a divinity of a militant Canaanite clan mentioned frequently in the Tell el-Amarna letters as the Mart abd-Ashirti ('Sons of the servant of Asherah'), or whether the Canaanite tribe 'Asaru, known from the inscriptions of the Egyptian king Seti I. (14th cent.), gave the name to the tribe, it is impossible to say. The two last theories imply an amalgamation of original inhabitants with a Hebrew clan or tribe, which, probably prior to the entrance of the southern tribes, had found its way into the North. A predominance of the Gentile element thus introduced would account, in a measure at least, for the non-participation of the Asherites in the war against Sisera, although they are said to have sent a contingent to the support of Gideon in his war with the Midianites (Jg 6³⁵⁻⁷²), and, according to the Chronicler, went 40,000 strong to Hebron to aid David in his struggle for the kingship (1 Ch 12³⁶). According to the earliest writing extant in the OT, viz., the Song of Deborah, the other northern tribes, Zebulun to the south and Naphtali to the east of it, flung themselves with fierce abandon against the army of Sisera, while 'Asher sat still at the haven of the sea' (Jg 5¹⁷⁻¹⁸). According to P's census, there were 41,500 males 'twenty years old and upward' at Sinai, and when they arrived in the plains of Moab they had increased to 53,400 (Nu 14²⁶⁻⁴⁷).

P gives also the territorial boundaries, including the names of 22 cities and their dependent villages, the majority of which are unidentified (Jos 19²⁴⁻³⁰; cf. Jg 1³¹⁻³², and Jos 17¹¹ J). Asher's territory was gained by settlement, not by conquest (Jg 1³¹⁻³²). The tribe played an unimportant rôle in Israel. It is not mentioned in 1 Ch 27¹⁸⁻¹⁹, where the tribes are enumerated together with their respective leaders under David. For the genealogies see Gn 46¹⁷, Nu 26⁴, 1 Ch 7³⁰⁻³¹. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL. JAMES A. CRAIG.

ASHERAH.—In RV Asherah (plur. Asherim, more rarely Asheroth) appears as the tr. of a Hebrew substantive which AV, following the LXX and Vulgate, had mistakenly rendered grove. By OT writers the word is used in three distinct applications.

1. The goddess Asherah.—In several places Asherah must be recognized as the name of a Canaanite deity. Thus in 1 K 18¹⁹ we read of the prophets of Baal and of Asherah, in 15¹³ (= 2 K 15¹⁴) of 'an abominable image,' and in 2 K 21⁷ of 'a graven image' of Asherah, also of the sacrificial vessels used in her worship (23⁴), while Jg 3⁷ speaks of the Baalim and the Asheroth. These references, it must be allowed, are not all of equal value for the critical historian and some of our foremost authorities have hitherto declined to admit the existence of a Canaanite goddess Asherah, regarding the name as a mere literary personification of the asherah or sacred pole (see § 3), or as due to a confusion with Astarte (cf. Jg 3⁷ with 21³).

In the last few years, however, a variety of monumental evidence has come to light (see Lagrange, Études sur les religions sémitiques 2 (1905), 119 ff.)—the latest from the soil of Palestine itself in a cuneiform tablet found at Taanach—showing that a goddess Ashirat or Asherah was worshipped from a remote antiquity by the Western Semites. There need be no hesitation, therefore, in accepting the above passages as evidence of her worship in OT times, even within the Temple itself.

The relation, as to name, history, and attributes, of this early Canaanite goddess to the powerful Semitic deity named Ishtar by the Babylonians, and Ashtart (OT 'Ashtoreth') by the Phœnicians, is still obscure (see KAT 2, Index; Lagrange, op. cit.). The latter in any case gradually displaced the former in Canaan.

2. An image of Asherah.—The graven image of Asherah set up by Manasseh in the Temple (2 K 21⁷), when destroyed by Josiah, is simply termed the asherah (2 K 23⁶). Like the idols described by the prophet of the Exile (Is 41⁷ 44¹²⁻²⁰), it evidently consisted of a core of wood overlaid with precious metal, since it could be at once burned and 'stamped to powder' (cf. 2 Ch 15¹⁴ for the corresponding image of Maachah), and was periodically decorated with woven hangings (Luc. 'tunics') by the women votaries of Asherah (2 K 23⁷). There is therefore good warrant for seeing in the asherah which Ahab set up in the temple of Baal at Samaria (cf. 1 K 16³³ with 2 K 10²⁶)—according to the emended text of the latter passage it was burned by Jehu but was soon restored (13⁶)—something of greater consequence than a mere post or pole. It must have been a celebrated image of the goddess.

3. A symbol of Asherah.—In the remaining passages of OT the asherah is the name of a prominent, if not indispensable, object associated with the altar and the mazzēbah (see PILLAR) in the worship of the Canaanite high places. It was made of wood (Jg 6²⁵), and could be planted in the ground (Dt 16²¹), plucked up or cut down (Mic 5¹⁴, Ex 34¹³), and burned with fire (Dt 12³). Accordingly the asherah is now held to have been a wooden post or pole having symbolical significance in the Canaanite cults. How far it resembled the similar emblems figured in representations of Babylonian and Phœnician rites can only be conjectured.

When the Hebrews occupied Canaan, the local sanctuaries became seats of the worship of J^h, at which the adjuncts of sacred pole and pillar continued as before. The disastrous results of this incorporation of heathen elements led to the denunciation of the asherahs by the prophetic exponents of Israel's religion (Ex 34¹³, Jer 17², Mic 5¹³⁻¹⁴, and esp. Dt 7⁵ 12²⁻³, 16²¹), and to their ultimate abolition (2 K 18¹⁸ 23¹⁴).

4. Significance of the asherah.—The theory at present most in favour among OT scholars finds in the asherahs or sacred poles the substitutes of the sacred trees universally revered by the early Semites. This theory, however, is not only improbable in view of the fact that the asherahs are found beside or under such sacred trees (Jer 17², 1 K 14²³, 2 K 17¹⁰), but has been discredited by the proved existence of the goddess Asherah. In the earliest period of the Semitic occupation of Canaan (c. b.c. 2500-2000), this deity probably shared with Baal (cf. Jg 3⁷ 6²⁵ etc.) the chief worship of the immigrants, particularly as the goddess of fertility, in which aspect her place was later usurped by Astarte. In this early aniconic age, the wooden post was her symbol as the stone pillar was of Baal. Bearing her name, it passed by gradual stages into the complete eikōn or anthropomorphic image of the deity as in Samaria and Jerusalem. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ASHES.—Ashes on the head formed one of the ordinary tokens of mourning for the dead (see MOUING CUSTOMS as of private (2 S 13¹⁹) and national humiliation (Neh 9¹, 1 Mac 3⁴⁷). The penitent and the afflicted might also sit (Job 2⁹, Jon 3⁶) or even wallow in ashes (Jer 6²⁶, Ezk 7²⁰). In 1 K 20³⁸, 'we must, with RV, read 'headband' (wh. see) for 'ashes.'

In a figurative sense the term 'ashes' is often used to signify evanescence, worthlessness, insignificance (Gn 18²⁷, Job 30¹⁰). 'Proverbs of ashes' (13¹² RV) is Job's equivalent for the modern 'rot.' For the use of ashes in the priestly ritual see RED HEIFER.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

ASHHUR (AV Ashur).—The 'father' of Tekoa (1 Ch 2²⁴ 4⁵).

ASHMA.—A god whose form of worship is unknown, and who has been identified with the Phœnician Eshmun and the Babylonian Tashmîtu. As Hamath, the god's seat of worship (2 K 17³⁰), was occupied by the Hittites, the deity was probably non-Semitic. N. KOENIG.

ASHKELON (Greek Ascalon).—A city of the Philistine Pentapolis. It is mentioned several times in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. According to Jos 13³, it was left unconquered; but the interpolated passage, Jg 1¹⁸, enumerates it among the places captured by Israel. It is doubtful whether Samson took the spoil with which he paid his wages (Jg 14¹⁹) from this city, which is two days' journey from Timnath, or from a similarly styled village, much nearer at hand, now possibly represented in name by Khurbet 'Askalan, near Tell Zakariya. It is referred to in the story of the return of the ark (1 S 6¹⁷), and in David's lament (2 S 1²⁰), and with the other Philistine cities is made an object of denunciation by various prophets. Here Jonathan Maccabæus was honourably received (1 Mac 10³⁸ 11⁶⁰), and it was the birthplace of Herod the Great. It was captured by the Crusaders, but recaptured by the Muslims after the battle of Hattin. Extensive remains of ancient buildings still exist on the site, which retains the name of 'Askalan': numerous fragments of statues etc., are found by the natives from time to time.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ASHKENAZ in Gn 10³ (1 Ch 1¹⁵) appears as a son of Gomer (wh. see), which means apparently that the name represents a people akin to the Cimmerians, an Indo-European people who made trouble for the Assyrians in and about Armenia in the later days of their empire, in the 7th cent. B.C. In Jer 51²⁷ Ashkenaz is coupled with Ararat and Minni. The view now generally accepted by scholars is that Ashkenaz in the Hebrew text is a slight misreading for Ashkûz, an important tribe akin to the Cimmerians who had to do with Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, the last great kings of Assyria, the name appearing in the inscriptions as Ashgûz. Further, it is probable that the Skythot, 'Scythians', represent the same people and word.

ASHNAH.—Two unknown sites of towns in Judah (Jos 15³² and 15⁴³).

ASHPENAZ.—The chief of Nebuchadrezzar's eunuchs (Dn 1³).

ASHTORETH.—This city (pl. of Ashtoreth [wh. see]), originally held by Og, king of Bashan (Dt 1⁴, Jos 9¹⁰ 12¹³ 13²¹), later captured by the Israelites and by them awarded to the Gershonites (Jos 21²⁷ Be-eshterah, 'dwelling [or temple] of Ashtoreth': cf. || 1 Ch. 6²⁶, which reads Ashtarah), might, without contradicting Biblical records, be identified with Ashteroth-karnaim (wh. see). However, a statement found in Eusebius' Onomasticon favours the view that the names designate two localities. Eusebius relates that there were at his time two villages of the same name, separated by a distance of 9 miles, lying between Adara (Edrei) and Abila; viz., (1) Ashtaroth, the ancient city of Og, 6 miles from Abila, and (2) Karnaim Ashtaroth, a village in the corner of Bashan, where Job's village is shown (cf. Book of Jubilees 29¹⁰). Eusebius' Karnaim Ashtaroth evidently lay in the corner or angle formed by the rivers Nahr er-Rukkad and Shari'at el-Manadireh, in which vicinity tradition places Uz, Job's fatherland. At long 36° E., lat. 32° 50' N., on the Bashan plateau, stands Tell ('hill') 'Ashtard', whose strategical value, as shown by the ruins, was recognized in the Middle Ages. Its base is watered by the Moya en-Nebi Ayyûb ('stream of the prophet Job'). Following this rivulet's course for 2½ miles N.N.E., passing through the Hammam Ayyûb ('Job's bath'), is found its source, a spring said to have welled forth when Job in his impatience stamped upon the ground. In the immediate vicinity towards the S., Job's grave is shown. Furthermore, upon the hill at whose base these two places are situated lies the village of Sa'diyeh or Sheikh Sa'd, whose mosque contains the Sakhret Ayyûb, a large basalt boulder against which Job is said to have leant while receiving his friends. Indeed, ½ of a mile S. of Sa'diyeh at el-Merkez, another grave (modern) of Job is shown, and a Der ('monastery') Ayyûb, according to tradition built by the Ghassanide Amr I., is known to have existed. Eusebius' Ashtaroth must then have been in the proximity of Muzerib, 9½ miles S. of Sa'diyeh, and 8 miles N.W. of Adara, almost the distance of the Onomasticon. Even Tell Ash'art, 4½ miles S. of Tell 'Ashtard, protected on the one side by the Yarmuk, on the second by a chasm, and showing evidences of having been fortified by a triple wall on the third, is admirably situated for a royal stronghold.

None of these modern place-names, with the exception of Tell 'Ashtard, is linguistically related to the 'Ashtaroth and 'Ashteroth-karnaim of the Bible and the Onomasticon. The description of 'Ashteroth-karnaim (2 Mac 12²¹, cf. 1 Mac 5¹³) as a place hard to besiege and difficult of access because of numerous passes leading to it, in whose territory a temple was situated, is applicable to Sa'diyeh or to Tell 'Ashtard or even to Tell Ash'art, whose double peak at the S. summit is partly responsible for the translation of the name 'Ashtaroth of (near) the double peak' (see ASHTORETH). The similarity of name between Tell 'Ashtard and 'Ashteroth-karnaim, even though Tell 'Ashtard does not lie directly between Adara and Abila, and lacks, with the other places, narrow passes, would favour the identification of 'Ashteroth-karnaim with Tell 'Ashtard, and hence, according to the distances of Eusebius, the location of 'Ashtaroth near Muzerib. However, until the ancient name of Muzerib is known, and the various sites excavated, a definite determination of the location of these cities, and even of the difference between them, must remain impossible. N. KOENIG.

ASHTEROth-KARNAIM.—The scene of Chedorlaomer's defeat of the Rephaim (Gn 14⁵). It is perhaps mentioned in Am 6¹³ (EV 'Have we not taken to us horns (Karnaim) by our own strength?'). It is identical with Carnion or Oarnain, after whose capture, in B.C. 164, Judas Maccabæus destroyed the temple of Atargatis (wh. see), whither the inhabitants had fled for refuge (2 Mac 12²¹, cf. 1 Mac 5¹³). For interpretation of name see ASHTORETH, and for location, ASHTAROTH. N. KOENIG.

ASHTORETH.—This deity, especially known as the Sidonian goddess for whom Solomon erected a shrine, later destroyed by Josiah (1 K 11¹⁵, 2 K 23¹⁵), was worshipped by all Semitic nations. In her temple at Ashkelon, the Philistines hung the armour of Saul (1 S 31¹⁰). In Bashan, the cities Ashtaroth or Be-eshterah and Ashteroth-karnaim presumably 'erived their names from the fact that various Ashtoreth-cults were located there. At Ashteroth-karnaim ('horned Ashtaroth') one might even be justified in supposing from the name that 'Ashtoreth was represented with the horns of a cow or a ram. Meshah, king of Moab, dedicated his prisoners to a composite goddess 'Ashtar-Chemosh. Indeed, her existence in S. Arabia is evidenced by the probably equivalent male god 'Athtar. In Abyssinia, she was called Astar; in Assyria and Babylonia, Ishtar (used also in the pl. ishtartiti to denote 'goddesses,' cf. 'Ashtaroth, Jg 2¹ 10⁴, 1 S 7¹ 12¹⁰); in Syria, 'Athar, and in Phœnicia, 'Astart, whence the Hebrew 'Ashtoreth, with the vowels of bōsheth ('shameful thing') substituted for the original. See MOLECH, BAAL.

The character of this goddess, concerning which the OT makes no direct statement, is most clearly depicted in the Assyro-Babylonian literature. Here she appears as the goddess of fertility, productiveness, and love on the one hand, and of war, death, and decay on the other, a personification of the earth as it passes through the summer and winter seasons. To her the sixth month, Elul, the height of the summer, is sacred. In this month, through her powers, the ripening of vegetable life takes place, represented by Tammuz, whose coming is heralded by Ishtar's festival in Ab, the fifth month. From this period of the year, the crops and verdure gradually decay, and finally disappear in the winter. Thus, since Ishtar has failed to sustain the life which her powers had created, popular belief made her the cause of death and decay. She therefore became a destructive goddess, who visited with disease those who disobeyed her commands, and even a goddess of war (cf. 1 S 31¹⁰). However, filled with remorse, because she had destroyed the vegetable life (= Tammuz, the consort of her youth), she sets out to the lower world in search of healing waters to revive Tammuz. During this quest (winter) the propagation of all life ceases. Successful in her search, she brings forth the new verdure, and once more assumes the rôle of a merciful goddess, to whom all life is due.

At a later period, when all gods had obtained a fixed position to each other and the necessity of assigning an abode to them was felt, the gods were identified with the heavenly bodies. Thus Ishtar was given the planet Venus, whose appearance at certain seasons as morning-star and at other times as evening-star paralleled the growth and decay of nature. Hence, in accordance with one theological school of the Babylonians, which considered Sin (moon) the ruler of the luminaries of the night, Ishtar was also known as the 'daughter of Sin.' By others she was designated as 'daughter of Anu (lord of heaven),' and even as the 'sister of Shamash (sun),' since, as the evening-star Venus disappears in the west, and reappears in the east to be called the morning-star.

The cults of this goddess were extant at various localities of Babylonia and Assyria. At some of these, both phases of her character were worshipped, side by side, with equality; at others, more importance was attached to one of her aspects. Thus at Uruk (Erech) in her temple E-Anna ('house of heaven') she was both a goddess of fertility and a martial deity in whose service were Kizreti, Ukhati, and Kharimati, the priestesses of Ishtar. At Agade, Calah, and Babylon greater stress seems to have been laid upon the milder aspect, and it is doubtless with the worship of this side of Ishtar's nature that the religious prostitution mentioned by Greek writers was connected (Hdt. i. 199; Strab. xvi. i. 20; Ep. Jerem. 41¹; Luc. de Dea Syr. 61.). Among the Assyrians, three Ishtars, viz., Ishtar of Nineveh, Ishtar of Kidmuru (temple at Nineveh), and Ishtar of Arbela, were especially worshipped. This warrior-nation naturally dwelt upon the martial aspect of the deity almost to the exclusion of her milder side as a mother-goddess, and accorded to her a position next to Ashur, their national god. Indeed, Ishtar was even designated as his wife, and since he ruled over the Ipti (spirits of heaven), so she was said to be 'mighty over the Anunnaki (spirits of the earth).

Thus Ishtar is the goddess whom Ashur-nazir-pal

(a.c. 1800) aptly calls 'queen of the gods, into whose hands are delivered the commands of the great gods, lady of Nineveh, daughter of Sin, sister of Shamash, who rules all kingdoms, who determines decrees, the goddess of the universe, lady of heaven and earth, who hears petitions, heeds sighs; the merciful goddess who loves justice.' Equally does Esarhaddon's claim, that it was 'Ishtar, the lady of onslaught and battle,' who stood at his side and broke his enemies' bows, apply to this deity—a goddess, to whom the penitent in the anguish of his soul prays—

'Besides thee there is no guiding deity.
I implore thee to look upon me and hear my sighs.
Proclaim peace, and may thy soul be appeased.
How long, O my Lady, till thy countenance be turned towards me.
Like doves, I lament, I satiate myself with sighs.'

ASHURBANIPAL.—Son and successor of Esarhaddon on the throne of Assyria, b.c. 668–626. He is usually identified with Asnappar, Ezr. 4¹⁰. He included Manasseh of Judah among his tributaries, and kept an Assyrian garrison at Gezer. See ASSYRIA, OSNAPPAR.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ASHURITES.—One of the tribes over whom Ishbosheth ruled (2 S 2⁹). The name is clearly corrupt, for neither the Assyrians (Ashur) nor the Arabian tribe Ashurim (Gn 25⁹) can be intended. The Pesh. and Vulg. read 'the Geshurites,' whose territory bordered on that of Gilead (Jos 12⁹ 13¹¹), and who might therefore be suitably included here. It has been urged, however, against this view, that Geshur was an independent kingdom at this time (cf. 2 S 3⁹ 13¹¹), so that Ishbosheth could not have exercised control over it. We should probably read hā-Ashēri 'the Asherites,' i.e. the tribe of Asher (cf. Jg 1²).

ASHVATH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³²).

ASIA.—In the NT this word invariably means the Roman province Asia, which embraced roughly the western third of the peninsula which we call Asia Minor. It was bounded on the N.E. by the province of Bithynia, on the E. by the province of Galatia, on the S. by the province of Lycia, and had been ceded to the Romans by the will of the Pergamian king Attalus III. in a.c. 133. The following ethnic districts were in this province—Mysia, Lydia, Western Phrygia, and Caria. The province was the richest, and, with the one exception of Africa, its equal, the most important in the Roman Empire. It was governed by a proconsul of the higher grade, with three legati under him. Ephesus, Pergamum, and Smyrna were its principal cities. St. Paul's preaching in Ephesus was the most powerful cause of the spread of the gospel in this province, and the Epistle 'to the Ephesians' is probably a circular letter to all the churches in it. Seven are enumerated in Rev 1–3, which is post-Pauline.

A. SOUTER.

ASIARCH.—The form of the word is parallel with Lyciarch, Bithyniarch, etc., but the signification is by no means certain. The title of Asiarch could be held in conjunction with any civil office, and with the high priesthood of a particular city, but the high priest of Asia and the Asiarch were probably not identical; for there was only one high priest of Asia at a time, but there were a number of Asiarchs, as Ac 19³¹ shows, even in one city. The honour lasted one year, but re-election was possible. It was held in connexion with the Koinon (Council) of the province, the main duty of which was to regulate the worship of Rome and of the Emperor; and the Asiarchs were probably the deputies to the Council elected by the towns.

A. SOUTER.

ASIRIAS (1 Es 9¹⁰).—One of the sons of Phoros or Parosh who agreed to put away his 'strange' wife; answering to Malchijah (2) in Ezr 10².

ASIEL.—1. Grandfather of Jehu a Simeonite 'prince' (1 Ch 4²). 2. One of five writers employed by Esra to transcribe the Law (2 Es 14²⁴). 3. (AV Asael) An ancestor of Tobit (To 1¹).

ASIPHA (1 Es 5²²).—His sons were among the Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel; called Hasupha, Ezr 2⁴³, Neh 7⁴⁶.

ASMODÆUS, the 'evil demon' of To 3. 6. 8, appears freely in the Talmud as Ashmedai, which popular etymology connected with shamad, 'to destroy.' It is fairly certain, however, that it is the Avestan Aēma daēva, 'fury demon,' conspicuous from the earliest to the latest parts of the Parsi scriptures. It would seem that the Book of Tobit is really a Median folk-story, adapted for edification by a Jew, with sundry uncomprehended features of the original left unchanged. For these see 'Zoroastrianism' in Hastings' DB, § 4. In the Talmud Ashmedai is king of the Shedim, demons supposed to be mortal, and of either sex.

JAMES HOPE MOULTON.

ASNAH.—The head of a family of Nethinim which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁵⁰, 1 Es 7¹⁰).

ASNAPPER.—See OSNAPPER.

ASOM (1 Es 9³³). His sons were among those who put away their 'strange' wives; called Hashum, Ezr 10³³.

ASP.—See SERPENT.

ASPALATHUS (Sir 24¹⁴).—The name of an aromatic associated with cinnamon in the passage cited, but impossible to identify. It is probable that there were two or more plants, and more than one vegetable product, known by this name.

ASPATHA (Est 9⁷).—The third son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

ASPHALT.—See BITUMEN.

ASPHAR (1 Mac 9³²).—A pool in the desert of Tekoa, or Jeshimon, where Jonathan and Simon the Maccabees encamped. The site is not known with certainty, although it may plausibly be identified with the mod. Btr Selhāb, a reservoir 6 miles W.S.W. of Engedi.

ASPHARASUS (1 Es 5⁴).—One of the leaders of the return under Zerubbabel, called Mispar, Ezr 2², and Mispereth, Neh 7⁷.

ASRIEL (in AV of 1 Ch 7¹⁴ Ashriel).—A Manassite (Jos 17¹, Nu 26²⁴; in the latter the patronymic Asrielite occurs).

ASS (hamōr; 'she-ass,' 'athon [Gr. onos of both sexes]; 'young ass' or 'colt,' 'ayir [Gr. pōlos]; 'wild ass,' 'pere and 'ardāh).—The ass (Arab. hamar) is the most universally useful domesticated animal in Palestine. On it the fellah rides to his day's work, with it he ploughs his fields, threshes out his corn, and at last carries home the harvest (Neh 13¹⁴). Whole groups of donkeys traverse every road carrying corn (Gn 42²⁷), fire-wood (Gn 22³), provisions (1 S 16²⁰), skins of water or baskets full of sand, stone or refuse. A group of such animals are so accustomed to keep together that they would do so even if running away (1 S 9³, 10). The little ass carrying the barley, which leads every train of camels, is a characteristic sight. Whenever the traveller journeys through the land, the braying of the ass is as familiar a sound as the barking of the village dog. The man of moderate means when journeying rides an ass, often astride his bedding and clothes, as doubtless was done by many a Scripture character (Nu 22³¹⁻³², Jos 15¹⁸, 1 S 25¹⁰⁻³², 2 S 17²¹ 19³² etc.). A well-trained ass will get over the ground rapidly at a pace more comfortable than that of an ordinary horse; it is also very sure-footed. The man of position in the town, the sheikh of the mosque, lawyer or medical man—indeed, any peaceful citizen—is considered suitably mounted on donkey-back, especially if the animal is white (Jg 5¹⁰). A well-bred white ass fetches a higher price than a fairly good horse. A she-ass (Arab. 'atar) is preferred (Nu 22³¹⁻³², 1 S 9³, 2 K 4³¹⁻³⁴, 1 Ch 27³⁰), because quieter and more easily left tied up; a strong male is almost uncontrollable at times, and gives vent to the most dismal brays as he catches sight of female asses. The castrated animal is not often seen, because frequently wanting in 'go' and very timid. She-asses are also, when of valuable breed, prized for breeding purposes. The common ass is brown, sometimes almost black or grey. Skeletons of asses are not uncommon by the high-road sides, and the jawbone might be a not unhandy weapon in an emergency (Jg 15¹⁶, where the play on the word 'ass' [hamōr] and 'heap' [hamōr] should be noticed). Although the ass was forbidden food to the Jews, we read (2 K 6²⁵) that 'an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver' in the extremity of famine in besieged Samaria. In ploughing, the modern fellahin actually seem to prefer to yoke together an ox and an ass, or a camel and an ass (contrast Dt 22¹⁰). The idea of the stupidity of the ass is the same in the East as in the West.

The young ass (Is 30⁶, 31) or colt (Job 11¹², Zec 9⁹, Lk 19³³ etc.), the Arab. jahsh, is referred to several times. Little colts of very tender age trot beside their mothers, and soon have small burdens put on them. They should not be regularly ridden for three years. The young asses in the Bible are all apparently old enough for riding or burden-bearing.

Wild asses are not to-day found in Palestine, though, it is said, plentiful in the deserts to the East (Job 24⁵), where they roam in herds and run with extraordinary fleetness (Job 39⁴). Ishmael is compared in his wildness and freedom to a wild ass (Gn 16¹²), while Issachar is a wild ass subdued (49¹⁴, 15).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ASSANIAS (AV Assanias).—One of twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels on the return to Jerusalem, 1 Es 8⁴.

ASSAPHIOTH (AV Asaphion), 1 Es 5²².—His descendants returned with Zerubbabel among the sons of Solomon's servants. Called Hasaphereth, Ezr 2⁴³; Sophereth, Neh 7⁴⁷.

ASSASSINS, THE.—In the time of Felix a band of robbers so named disturbed Judæa. They are mentioned in Ac 21³⁸ (sicarii, AV 'murderers'). Josephus says that at Felix's suggestion they murdered Jonathan son of Ananus, the high priest (Ant. xx. viii. 5). They took a leading part in the Jewish War. See art. EGYPTIAN [THE]. A. J. MACLEAN.

ASSEMBLY.—See CONGREGATION.

ASSHUR.—See ASSYRIA.

ASSHURIM.—The Asshurim, Letushim, Leummim (Gn 25⁴) were Arabian tribes, supposed to be descended from Abraham and Keturah through Dedan. By the Asshurim the Targum understood dwellers in encampments to be meant. A tribe A'shur appears on two Minean inscriptions. J. TAYLOR.

ASSIDEANS.—See HASIDÆANS.

ASSIR.—1. A son of Korah (Ex 6²⁴, 1 Ch 6²²). 2. A son of Ebiasaph (1 Ch 6²³, 27). 3. A son of Jeconiah (AV and RVm of 1 Ch 3¹⁷). It is probable, however, that RV correctly renders 'Jeconiah the captive.'

ASSOS.—A town over half a mile from the Gulf of Adramyttium (in Mysia, province of Asia), in a splendid position on a hill about 770 feet high at its highest point. The fortifications are amongst the most excellent of their kind. It passed through various hands before it was from b.c. 334–241 under Alexander the Great and his successors, and from b.c. 241–133 under the Pergamene dynasty. At the last date it became Roman (see ASIA). It was the birth-place of the Stoic Cleanthes. St. Paul went from Troas to Assos by the land-route on his last visit to Asia (Ac 20¹⁴).

ASSUMPTION OF MOSES.—See APOC. LIT., p. 40^b.

ASSURANCE.—The word is used both in an objective and a subjective sense, according as it denotes the ground of confidence or the actual experience. When St. Paul declares at Athens (Ac 17³¹) that God has appointed Christ to judge the world, and 'has given assurance' of this unto all men by raising Him from the dead, it is an objective assurance that he means, for he knew very well that all men were not personally assured of the fact of the Resurrection. In 2 Ti 3¹⁴, again, Timothy's assurance of the things he has learned is identified with the outward authority of the person from whom he has received them. For the most part, however, 'assurance' in Scripture denotes not an objective authority or fact, but a reality of inward experience. The word occurs once in OT (Is 32¹⁷ AV), and quite characteristically assurance is there represented as the effect of righteousness. In NT assurance (plerophoria) is an accompaniment and result of the gospel (1 Th 1⁵). And the assurance produced by the gospel is not intellectual merely, or emotional merely, or practical merely, it fills and satisfies the whole inner man. There is a full assurance of understanding (Col 2²), and a full assurance of faith (He 10²²; cf. 2 Ti 1¹³), and a full assurance of hope (He 6¹¹). [Cf. 11¹ RV, where the last two forms of assurance run into each other—faith itself becoming the assurance (hypostasis) or underlying ground of hope]. But there is also an assurance of love (1 Jn 3¹⁹); love being, however, not a mere feeling but a practical social faculty, a love of deed and truth that ministers in all good things to its brethren (vv. 14-18). Thus on a higher plane—the plane of that Christian love which is the fulfilling of the Law—we come back to the prophetic ideal of an inward peace and assurance which are the effects of righteousness.

In any doctrine of assurance a distinction must again be recognized between an objective and a subjective assurance. The grounds of Christian assurance as presented in the gospel are absolute, and if faith were merely intellectual assent, every believing man would be fully assured of his salvation. But, as a positive experience, assurance must be distinguished from saving faith (cf. 1 Co 9²⁷). Yet the Spirit witnesses with our spirit that we are the children of God (Ro 8¹⁶); and those in whom the consciousness of that witness is dim and faint should seek with more diligence to grow in faith and hope and love and understanding also, that thereby they may make their calling and election sure (2 P 1¹⁰). J. C. LAMBERT.

ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.—I. ASSYRIA.—1. Natural features and Civilization.—Strictly speaking, Assyria was a small district bounded on the N. and E. by the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan, on the W. by the Tigris, on the S. by the Upper Zab. The W. bank of the Tigris was early included, and the limits of the kingdom gradually extended till the Empire included all Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and parts of Asia Minor and Egypt. The term 'Assyria,' therefore, was widely different in meaning at different periods. The earliest capital was Asshur, on the W. of the Tigris, between the mouths of the Upper and Lower Zab. The above-named district, a natural stronghold, was the nucleus of the country. For the most part hilly, with well-watered valleys and a wide plain along the Tigris, it was fertile and populous. The cities Calah at the junction of the Upper Zab, Nineveh on the Chöser, Dur-Sargon to the N.E., Imgur-Bel S.E., Tarbis to the N.W., and Arbēla between the rivers Zab, were the most noted in Assyria itself.

The climate was temperate. The slopes of the hills were well wooded with oak, plane, and pine; the plains and valleys produced figs, olives, and vines. Wheat, barley, and millet were cultivated. In the days of the Empire the orchards were stocked with trees, among which have been recognized date palms, orange, lemon, pomegranate, apricot, mulberry, and other fruits. A great variety of vegetables were grown in the gardens, including beans, peas, cucumbers, onions, lentils. The hills furnished plenty of excellent building stone, the soft alabaster specially lent itself to the decoration of halls with sculptures in low relief, while fine marbles, hard limestone, conglomerate and basalt, were worked into stone vessels, pillars, altars, etc. Iron, lead, and copper were obtainable in the mountains near. The lion and wild ox, the boar, deer, gazelle, goat, and hare were hunted. The wild ass, mountain sheep, bear, fox, jackal, and many other less easily recognized animals are named. The eagle, bustard, crane, stork, wild goose, various ducks, partridge, plover, the dove, raven, swallow, are named; besides many other birds. Fish were plentiful. The Assyrians had domesticated oxen, asses, sheep, goats, and dogs. Camels and horses were introduced from abroad.

The Assyrians belonged to the North Semitic group, being closely akin to the Aramaeans, Phoenicians, and Hebrews. Like the other Mesopotamian States, Assyria early came under the predominating influence of Babylonia. According to Gn 10¹¹, Nimrod went out from the land of Shinar into Assyria and built Nineveh, etc. That Babylonian colonies settled in Assyria is probable, but it is not clear that they found a non-Semitic population there. The Assyrians of historic times were more robust, warlike, 'fierce' (Is 33¹⁹), than the mild, industrial Babylonians. This may have been due to the influence of climate and incessant warfare; but it may indicate a different race. The culture and religion of Assyria were essentially Babylonian, save for the predominance of the national god Ashur. The king was a despot at home, general of the army abroad, and he rarely missed an annual expedition to exact tribute or plunder some State. The whole organization of the State was essentially military. The literature was borrowed from Babylonia, and to the library of the last great king, Ashurbanipal, we owe most of the Babylonian classics. The Assyrians were historians more than the Babylonians, and they invented a chronology which is the basis of all dating for Western Asia. They were a predatory race, and amassed the spoils of all Mesopotamia in their treasure-houses, but they at least learned to value what they had stolen. The enormous influx of manufactured articles from abroad and the military demands prevented a genuinely native industrial development, but the Assyrians made splendid use of foreign talent. In later times, the land became peopled by captives, while the drain upon the Assyrian army to conquer, garrison, colonize, and hold down the vast Empire probably robbed the country of resisting power.

2. History.—The excavations conducted at Nineveh and Calah by Layard, 1845 to 1851; by Botta at Khorsabad, 1843-1845; continued by Rassam, G. Smith, and others up to the present time; the edition of the inscriptions by Rawlinson, Norris, and Smith, and the decipherment of them by Rawlinson, Hincks, and Oppert, have rendered available for the history of Assyria a mass of material as yet only partially digested. Every year fresh evidence is discovered by explorers in the East, and the wide-spread influence of Assyria may be illustrated by the discovery of a stele of Sargon in Cyprus, a stele of Esarhaddon at Zinjirli on the borders of Cilicia, a letter from Ashur-uballit, king of Assyria, to Amenophis IV., king of Egypt, at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt, of statues of Assyrian kings at Nahr-el-Kelb near Beyrout. Besides this primary source of history, chiefly contemporaneous with the events it records, we have scattered incidental notices in the historical and prophetic books of the OT giving an important external view, and some records in the Greek and Latin classics, mostly too late and uncritical to be of direct value. Owing to the intimate connexion of Assyria and Babylonia, a great deal may be treated as common matter, but it will conduce to clearness to separate their history. Some of the common sources for history will be noticed here.

(a) Chronology.—(a) Year-names.—The Babylonians gave each year a name. Thus the names of the first four years of the reign of Hammurabi are: (1) the year in which Hammurabi became king; (2) the year in which Hammurabi established the heart of the land in righteousness; (3) the year in which the throne of Nannar was made; (4) the year in which the wall of Malgā was destroyed. These dates, or year-names, were decided upon and notice sent round to the principal districts, early each year. Thus we know that the date, or year-name, to be used for the eighth year of Samsu-iluna was sent as far as the Lebanon, where the tablet giving the order was found. Until the new year-name was known, the year was dated 'the year after' the last known date. Thus the fourth year of Hammurabi would be called 'the year after that in which the throne of Nannar was made.' The scribes kept a record of these dates, and a long list of year-names, in two recensions, has been published, which, if perfect, would have given the year-names from Sumu-abi to the tenth year of Ammi-zaduga. It was natural that the same ideogram MU should denote 'year' and 'name.' When, therefore, this list counts 43 MU to the reign of Hammurabi, we do not know that he reigned '43 years,' but only that he used 43 year-names in his reign. We know that the same year was sometimes called by two different names. When, therefore, the King's List gives him a reign of 55 years, we may explain the discrepancy by supposing that the list of year-names gives only the number of separate names. As a year-name often mentions a campaign, it seems most unlikely that it could have been given at the beginning of the year, still more when it records such an event as the fall of a city. The list of year-names records some event, usually domestic, religious, or military, for each year, and consequently has been called a 'chronicle.' This system of dating occurs as early as Sargon I. Its ambiguity for future generations is obvious. The kings of Larsa developed an era, the years being called the first, second, etc. (up to the 30th), 'after the capture of Isin.' In the third dynasty the method of dating by the year of the king's reign was introduced. If a king died in the 20th year of his reign, he is said to have reigned 20 years. The remainder of the year was 'the accession year' of his successor, and his first year was that beginning on the first of Nisan after his accession. Thus over a long series of years, the sum of the reigns is accurately the length in years, except for the margin at the beginning and end: it is exact to a year.

(b) Eponym Canon.—The Assyrians devised a modification of the year-name which avoided all difficulty. They named each year after a particular official, who could be selected at the beginning of the year, which was called his limmu or eponymy. The particular official for each year was originally selected by lot (pāru), but later a fixed order was followed, the king, the Tartan, the chief of the levy, the chief scribe, etc., then the governors of the chief cities. As the Empire extended, the governors of such distant places as Carchemish, Razappa, Kummuh, or even Samaria, became eponyms. Later still the order seems to be quite arbitrary, and may have been a royal choice. Lists of these officials, in their actual order of succession, known as the Eponym Canons, were drawn up, are fairly complete from B.C. 911 to B.C. 668, and can be restored to B.C. 648. This method of dating is at least as early as Arik-dēn-ilu, and was in use in Cappadocia, possibly much earlier. A very large number of names of Eponyms are known, which are not in the Canons, but as yet they can rarely be dated.

(c) Chronological statements.—This system, however, provided an accurate means of dating, and warrants great reliance on the statements of the kings as to the dates of events long before their times. Provided that they had access to earlier Eponym Canons than we possess, there is no reason why they should not be exact. Later kings were not disinclined to give such chronological statements. Thus Shalmaneser I. states that Erishum built the temple of Ashur, in Asshur, which Shamshi-Adad rebuilt 159 years later, but which was destroyed 580 years later by a fire and built afresh by him. The king does not state in which year of either of the reigns these events took place. Esarhaddon also states that the temple was built by Erishum, restored by Shamshi-Adad, son of Bel-kabi, and again by Shalmaneser I. 434 years later, and again by himself. The former statement may be preferred, as Shalmaneser I. was much nearer to the events, and it is easier to reconcile with other statements. Sennacherib's Babylonian inscription states that he recovered the gods of Ekallati, which had been carried away by Marduk-nadin-ahē, king of Akkad, in the days of Tiglath-pileser I., 418 years before, thus dating both Marduk-nadin-ahē and Tiglath-pileser I. at about B.C. 1107. Tiglath-pileser I. tells us that he rebuilt the temple of Ashur and Adad which had been pulled down by his great-grandfather Ashur-dan I., 60 years before, and had then stood 641 years since its foundation by Shamshi-Adad, son of Ishme-Dagan. This puts Shamshi-Adad about B.C. 1820 and Ashur-dan about 1170. Sennacherib also states that a seal captured from Babylon by Tukulti-Ninib I. had been carried away to Babylon again and was brought back by him 600 years later. This puts Tukulti-Ninib I. about B.C. 1289. Ashurbanipal states that on his capture of Susa he brought back the image of Nana, which had been carried off by Kudur-nanhundi, 1635 years before. This puts an invasion of Babylon at B.C. 2275. A boundary stone dated in the 4th year of Bel-nādin-apli states that from Gulkishar, probably the sixth king of the second Babylonian Dynasty, to Nebuchadnezzar I. there were 696 years. This puts Gulkishar about B.C. 1820. Nabonidus states that he restored a temple in Sippara, which had not been restored since Shagarakti-shuriash, 800 years before. This puts that king about B.C. 1350. Further, that Naram-Sin, son of Sargon I., was 3200 years before him, which dates Naram-Sin about B.C. 3750. Further, that Hammurabi lived 700 years before Burna-buriash. This dates Hammurabi about B.C. 2100, or B.C. 2150, according as we understand Burna-buriash I. or II. to be intended. It is evident that all such dates are vague. The numbers may be only approximate, 600 for 560 or 640, say. Further, we do not know from which year of the writer's reign to reckon, nor to which year of the king named. This may add a further margin of uncertainty.

(d) The Kings' List, Ptolemy's Canon, Eponym List.—The Babylonian Kings' List, if complete, would have given the names of the kings of Babylonia from the First Dynasty down to the last native ruler, Nabonidus, with the lengths of their reigns. It does furnish these particulars for long periods. The famous Canon of Ptolemy begins with Nabonassar, B.C. 747, and gives the names of the kings, including the Assyrians Poros (Tiglath-pileser III.), Sargon, and Esarhaddon, with the dates of their reigns, down to Nabonidus, then the Achæmenids to Alexander the Great, the Ptolemys and Romans, so connecting with well-known dates. The Eponym Canon lists record the eclipse of B.C. 763, and their dates are thus fixed. So far as they overlap, the last three sources agree exactly. We may then trust the Eponym Canons to B.C. 911 and the Kings' List wherever preserved.

(e) Genealogies, Date Documents.—The kings usually mention their father and grandfather by name; often an earlier ancestor, or predecessor, naming his father, and we are thus enabled to trace back a dynasty from father to son over long periods. Unfortunately we are rarely told by them how long a king reigned, but where we have documents dated by the year of his reign, we can say he reigned at least so many years.

ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA

In both Assyrian and Babylonian history there are still wide gaps, but exploration is continually filling them up. The German explorations at Asshur added quite 20 new names to the list of Assyrian rulers. It is dangerous to argue that, because we do not know all the rulers in a certain period, it ought to be reduced in length. It is as yet impossible to reconcile all the data, because we are not sure of the kings referred to. We already know five or six of the same name, and it may well be that we mistake the reference.

(5) Synchronous History.—The so-called Synchronous History of Assyria and Babylonia dealt with the wars and rectification of boundaries between the two countries from B.C. 1400 to B.C. 1150 and B.C. 900 to B.C. 800; and the Babylonian Chronicle gave the names and lengths of reign of the kings of Assyria, Babylonia, and Elam from B.C. 744 to B.C. 668. These establish a number of synchronisms, besides making considerable contributions to the history.

The bulk of the history is derived from the inscriptions of the kings themselves. Here there is an often remarked difference between Assyrian and Babylonian usage. The former are usually very full concerning the wars of conquest, the latter almost entirely concerned with temple buildings or domestic affairs, such as palaces, walls, canals, etc. Many Assyrian kings arrange their campaigns in chronological order, forming what are called Annals. Others are content to sum up their conquests in a list of lands subdued. We rarely have anything like Annals from Babylonia.

The value to be attached to these inscriptions is very various. They are contemporary, and for geography invaluable. A king would hardly boast of conquering a country which did not exist. The historical value is more open to question. A 'conquest' meant little more than a raid successful in exacting tribute. The Assyrians, however, gradually learnt to consolidate their conquests. They planted colonies of Assyrian people, endowing them with conquered lands. They transported the people of a conquered State to some other part of the Empire, allotting them lands and houses, vineyards and gardens, even cattle, and so endeavoured to destroy national spirit and produce a blended population of one language and one civilization. The weakness of the plan lay in the heavy taxation which prevented loyal attachment. The population of the Empire had no objection to the substitution of one master for another. The demands on the subject States for men and supplies for the incessant wars weakened all without attaching any. The population of Assyria proper was insufficient to officer and garrison so large an empire, and every change of monarch was the signal for rebellion in all outlying parts. A new dynasty usually had to reconquer most of the Empire. Civil war occurred several times, and always led to great weakness, finally rendering the Empire an easy prey to the invader.

The following table of monarchs is compiled from the above-mentioned materials. Where the relationship of two kings is known, it is indicated by S for 'son,' B for 'brother,' of the preceding king. When two kings are known to be contemporaries—is placed between their names. Probable dates of accession are given with a query, known dates without. Where a figure with + is placed after a name it indicates monumentally attested minimum length of reign, thus 25 + means 'at least 25 years.' The lengths of reigns in the Year List or Chronicle for the First Dynasty are given in brackets.

(b) Early traditions.—We may dismiss as mythical the Assyrian claim that Nineveh was founded directly after the Creation, but it points to a tradition of immemorial antiquity. Sargon claimed to have been preceded or his throne by 350 rulers of Assyria; but even if he counted ancient Babylonian overlords of Assyria, we have no means of checking his figures. Sennacherib professed to trace his lineage back to Gilgamesh, Eabani, and Humbaba, the heroes of the Babylonian National Epic, through such ancient rulers as Egiba, La'iti-Ashur, Ashur-gamila, Shamash-sululishu, etc., whose names are not otherwise known. The reference made by Gudea to his having built a temple for Nana (= Ishtar) in Nineveh may be meant for the Babylonian city of the same name, and an inscription of Dungi found in Nineveh might have been carried there by Assyrian conquerors.

(c) Earliest mention.—Hammurabi, however, in one of his letters refers to troops in Assyria, and in the prologue to his celebrated code of laws states that he 'returned to Asshur its gracious protecting deity and made glorious the name of Ishtar in her temple at Nineveh.' As these benefactions are placed after the benefits conferred on the Babylonian cities, we may conclude that Asshur and Nineveh were subject to him, and that the deity referred to had been carried off by invaders, perhaps the Elamites, or Kassites. A contemporary letter mentions a defaulting debtor as having gone to Assyria. These are the earliest references to the country.

(d) Earliest rulers.—The earliest rulers of Assyria styled themselves 'patesi of Asshur.' The title was that borne by the city rulers of Babylonia. Its Assyrian equivalent was ishshakku, and it often interchanges with shangā, 'priest.' It was still borne by the kings of Assyria, but while it designated them then as 'chief priest' of the nation, we may conclude that when used alone it implied that its bearer was subject to some king. Hence it has usually been supposed that the patesi of Asshur was subject to Babylonia. In the fourth year of Hammurabi one Shamshi-Adad is named in a way that suggests his being the patesi of Asshur, subject to Hammurabi. We know the names of many of these rulers. Thus Ushpia was the founder of the temple of Ashur in the city of Asshur, and may be the earliest of all. Kikia, who may be the same as Kiki-Bel otherwise known, founded the city wall of Asshur, and may be as early, if not earlier. The title descended from father to son for five generations, of whom we put Erishum as early as B.C. 2000. Then we know some pairs, father and son, of whom the last Ishme-Dagan II. and Shamshi-Adad IV. are about A.C. 1820. The order in which these groups are arranged is at present purely conjectural, and we know nothing of the intervals between them. Shamshi-Adad II., son of Bel-kabi, should be some sixty years before Shamshi-Adad IV.

(e) Early kings.—We do not know the exact date at which Assyria achieved her independence of Babylon, but it may well have synchronized with the Kassite conquest of Babylonia, or have contributed to it. A possible reference to the 'war of independence' is contained in a tablet which names a great conflict between the king of Babylon and the prince of Assyria, to whom the title 'king' is not conceded, which ended in the spoils of Babylon being carried to Assyria; but we are given no names to date events. Esarhaddon traced his descent from Adasi, father of Bel-ibni, 'who founded the kingdom of Assyria.' If we credit this, Adasi or Bel-ibni was the first 'king.' Adad-nirari III. states that Bel-kapkad was an early king who lived before Sulili. It is doubtful whether the group of three, Ashur-rabi, Ashur-nirari II., and Ashur-rim-nisheshu, the last of whom restored the city wall of Asshur, should not be put before the 'kings.' As Ashur-bel-nisheshu restored the wall of the 'Newtown' of Asshur, which a Puzur-Ashur had founded, we must put a Puzur-Ashur I. before him. The interval of time we do not know, but a city wall surely lasted years before the reign of Ashur-bel-nisheshu's father, Ashur-nirari III.

(f) Relations with Egypt and Babylonia.—About B.C. 1500 an Assyrian ruler sent gifts to Thothmes III., in his 24th and 30th years; but we are not told which king. The synchronous history now comes to our aid. Ashur-bel-nisheshu made a treaty with Kara-indash I. as to the boundaries of the two countries; a few years later Puzur-Ashur II. made a fresh treaty with Burna-buriash I. Ashur-uballit names Erba-Adad I. his father and Ashur-nadin-ahi his grandfather, in the inscription on the bricks of a well he made in Asshur. Adad-nirari I. names Puzur-Ashur, Ashur-bel-nisheshu, Erba-Adad and Adad . . . in this order, as builders at the wall of 'Newtown.' But the Ashur-uballit who wrote to Amenophis IV. in the Tell el-Amarna tablets says that his father Ashur-nadin-ahi was in friendly relationship with Amenophis III., and he was followed by his son Bel-nirari, whose son was Arik-dén-ilu and grandson Adad-nirari I., who names this Adad. . . . He must therefore follow Ashur-uballit I.

(g) Extension to the West.—Ashur-uballit II. gave his daughter Muballitat-Sherda to Burna-buriash I. to wife. Her son Kadashman-harbe I. succeeded to the throne of Babylon, but the Kassites rebelled against him, put him to death and set up a Kassite, Nazi-bugash. Ashur-uballit invaded Babylonia, deposed the pretender, and set Kurigalzu II., another son of Burna-buriash, on the throne. With Ashur-uballit also begins Assyrian history proper—the expansion to the W., which was so fateful for Palestine. In the time of the Tell el-Amarna tablets Egypt was the overlord of Palestine, but already Mitanni, the Hittites, and further to the east Assyria and Babylonia, were treating with Egypt on equal terms. Tush-ratta, king of Mitanni, offered to send Ishtar of Nineveh to Amenophis III. This has been taken to mean that Mitanni then ruled over Nineveh; it may mean only that Ishtar of Nineveh was worshipped in Mitanni. But Ashur-uballit wrested Melitia from Mitanni, and conquered the Shubari to the N.W. of Assyria. Hence he probably ruled Nineveh also. Bel-nirari was attacked by Kurigalzu III. at Sugazu on the Zalzalat, but defeated him and made a fresh boundary settlement. Arik-dén-ilu (often read Pudi-ilu) conquered N., E., and W., penetrating as far as Halah on the Habor, subduing Turuku, Nigintu, Gutium, the Aramaeans, Ahlami, and the Bedouin Suti. Adad-nirari I. was, early in his reign, defeated by Kurigalzu III., and lost the southern conquests of his predecessors, but later conquered Gutium, the Lullumi and Shubari, turned the tables by defeating Nazi-maruttash, and rectified his boundary to the S. On the W. he extended his conquests over Haran to the Euphrates. Shalmaneser I. (Shulmanu-ashared) crossed the upper waters of the Tigris, placed Assyrian colonies among the tribes to the N., subdued the Aramaeans of Upper Mesopotamia, took Melitia, the capital of Hani, defeated the Hittites, Ahlami, Musri, and Suti, captured Haran and ravaged up to Carchemish. He made Calah his capital, and restored the temple of Ishtar at Nineveh. He first bore the title shur kishadati, supposed to mark the conquest of Haran.

(h) Capture of Babylon.—Tukulti-Ninib I. conquered Gutium, the Shubari, 40 kings of Nairi, the Ukumani, Elhunia, Sharnida, Mehri, Kurhi, Kummuh, the Push-shé, Mumme, Alzi, Madani, Nihani, Alala, Arzi, Purukuzzi. His chief triumph, however, was over Babylon. He defeated and captured Bitilishu, and took him prisoner to Assyria, ruling Babylonia seven years by his nominees. The first, Bel-nadin-shum, ruled eighteen months. Elam now appeared on the scene, invaded Babylonia, and a Kassite, Kadashman-harbe II., was set up. After eighteen months more, Tukulti-Ninib I. took Babylon, slew its people with the sword and set up Adad-shum-iddina, who ruled six years. Tukulti-Ninib deported the god Marduk to Assyria and carried off great spoil from Esaggila, his temple in Babylon. Among other things he carried off a seal of lapis lazuli, which had belonged to Shagarakti-shuriash, father of Bitiliasu, and engraved his own name and titles on it. It was afterwards carried back to Babylon, whence Sennacherib brought it once more 600 years later. We thus get a date b.c. 1289, which must fall either in Tukulti-Ninib's reign or in that of Ninib-tukulti-Ashur's, 16 (?) years later, when Marduk was carried back to Babylon. After Adad-shum-iddina had reigned six years, the Kassites and Babylonians set Adad-shum-usur on 'his father's throne.' Tukulti-Ninib had built a city called Kar-Tukulti-Ninib, close to Asshur, which he intended for a new capital, but that evidently estranged his own people, for his son Ashur-nazir-apli i. rebelled against him, besieged him in a house in his new city, and finally killed him. Of the reign of the parricide we know nothing. Adad-shum-usur corresponded with two kings of Assyria, Ashur-nirari iv. and Nabû-dân, who appear to be reigning both at the same time. Perhaps they were sons of Tukulti-Ninib i., or it may be another Adad-shum-usur who was their contemporary. They are usually placed here, but we know nothing further about them. It was Ninib-tukulti-Ashur who carried back Marduk, and perhaps the seal above named, to Babylon. Possibly he took refuge from Ashur-shum-lishir. There is much doubt about this period, but Adad-shum-usur lived to defeat and kill Bêl-kudur-usur. Erba-Adad ii. is known only as father of Ninib-apil-Esharra, whom Tiglath-pileser i. calls 'a powerful king that truly shepherded the hosts of Assyria.' He was besieged by Adad-shum-usur in Asshur. Ashur-dân i. defeated Zamama-shum-iddina and captured several Babylonian cities, carrying off much spoil to Assyria. He had a long reign. We know little of Mutakkil-Nusku. Ashur-rêsh-ishi began to revive the military glories of Assyria, conquering the Ahlami, Gutium and Lullumi. He then invaded Babylonia, and Nebuchadrezzar i. attacked him in Assyria, but was defeated and lost his commander-in-chief.

(i) Tiglath-pileser I., etc.—Tukulti-apil-Esharra (Tiglath-pileser) i. has left us very full accounts of a long reign and series of conquests; chiefly in Upper Mesopotamia along the base of the Caucasus, Armenia, and W. to the N. E. corner of the Mediterranean, 'in all 42 countries with their princes,' The Bedouin Sûti were driven back across the Euphrates. The Babylonian king Marduk-nâdin-âhe invaded the S. of Assyria and carried off the gods of Ekallâtê, but, after two years' fighting, Tiglath-pileser defeated him and captured the chief cities of North Babylonia, including Sippara and Babylon itself. He was no less distinguished by his restorations of home cities, and he acclimatized all sorts of useful trees and plants. Ashur-bêl-kala, Shamshi-Adad v., and Ashur-dân ii., sons of Tiglath-pileser, followed on the throne, but in what order is not known. Adad-nirari ii. was son of Ashur-dân ii., and Ashur-nâzir-apli ii. was son of Shamshi-Adad v.; but beyond these relationships nothing much is known of them. Shalmaneser ii. tells us that he recaptured Pitru and Mitkunu on the far side of the Euphrates, which Tiglath-pileser had taken, but which were lost to Assyria in the reign of Ashur-kirbi. As Shalmaneser's six predecessors cannot be separated, it is usual to put Ashur-kirbi here. Whether the king Ilu-hirbe who set up his image near the Amanus, also named by Shalmaneser, be the same or an earlier and more successful conqueror, is not yet clear. The interval between Tiglath-pileser i. and Ashur-nirari iv., with whom accurate chronology begins, also contained Adad-nirari iii., Tukulti-apil-Esharra ii., and Ashur-dân iii., as known from genealogical notices, but as there is a gap of unknown extent at the commencement of the 8th Dynasty of Babylon, we cannot tell its length or how many things are still unknown to us. Adad-nirari iii. warred with Shamash-mudammik and Nabû-shum-lakhun of Babylon; Tukulti-Ninib ii. continued the subjugation of the mountaineers N. of Assyria, gradually winning back the Empire of Tiglath-pileser i.

With Ashur-nâzir-apli iii. began a fresh tide of Assyrian conquest, b.c. 885. He rebuilt Calah, and made it his capital. The small Aramean State of Bit-Adini, between the Balih and Euphrates, held out against him, but he conquered the Mannai, Kirrûr, and Zamûa between Lake Van and Lake Urmia. Carchemish, Unki ('Amk), or Hattin on the Orontes were raided, and the army reached the Lebanon. Tyre, Sidon, Gebal, Arvad, etc., were fain to buy off the conqueror. Ashur-nâzir-apli had invaded the Babylonian sphere of influence, and Nabû-apli-iddina sent his brother Zabdânû to support his allies. Ashur-nâzir-apli took Zabdânû and 3000 troops prisoners.

(j) Shalmaneser II., etc.—The reign of Shalmaneser ii., his son and successor, was one long campaign. He records 33 separate expeditions, and began to annex his conquests by placing governors over the conquered districts. The Armenian Empire now began to bar Assyria's progress north. Assyria now first appeared on Israel's horizon as a threatening danger. Shalmaneser's celebrated bronze doors at Balawat and the Black Obelisk give us pictures of scenes in his reign. They represent ambassadors from Girzân near Lake Urmia, from Jahuû (Jehu) of Israel, from Musri, from Marduk-aplu-usur of Suhi, and from Karparunda of Hattin. This Musri is N. E. of Cilicia (1 K 10²³), whence Solomon brought his horses. Shalmaneser invaded Kuê in Cilicia, and Tabal (Tubal), where he annexed the silver, salt, and alabaster works. He reached Tarzi (Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul). To the N. E. he penetrated Parsûa, the original Persia. In Babylonia, Nabû-apli-iddina was deposed by his son, Marduk-shum-iddina, against whom arose his brother Marduk-bêl-usâtê, who held the southern States of the Sealand, already peopled by the Chaldeans. Shalmaneser invaded Babylonia, and, passing to the E., besieged Marduk-bêl-usâtê in Mê-turnat, drove him from one stronghold to another, and finally killed him and all his partisans. In the rôle of a friend of Babylon, Shalmaneser visited the chief cities and sacrificed to the gods, captured most of the southern States, and laid them under tribute.

Shalmaneser's campaign against Hamath on the Orontes took place in b.c. 854. The fall of Bit-Adini had roused all N. Syria to make a stand. At Karkar the Assyrian army had against them a truly wonderful combination.

The presence of Ahab in this battle in which Shalmaneser claims to have won the victory is most interesting. The battle was not productive of any settled results, as Shalmaneser had to fight the same foes in b.c. 849 and again in b.c. 846. In b.c. 842 Shalmaneser defeated Hazael, besieged him in Damascus, and carried off the spoils of Malaha, his residence. At this time he received tribute from Tyre, Sidon, and Jehu, 'of the house of Omri.' Jehu's tribute is interesting—it includes silver, gold, a vessel of gold, a ladle of gold, golden drinking cups, golden beakers, tin, a sceptre, and bedolach.

Shalmaneser's last years were clouded by the rebellion of his son Ashur-dânin-apli, who alienated more than half the Empire, and was not subdued by the successor to the throne, his brother Shamshi-Adad vi., till after eight years' struggle. He may be considered actual king for those eight years. Shamshi-Adad had to fight the Babylonian kings Bau-ah-iddina and Marduk-balatsu-ikkbi. He warred in Chaldaea and advanced into Media as far as Mt. Elvend to secure the Mannai and Parsu, against the rising power of Armenia. Adad-nirari v. penetrated Media right up to the Caspian Sea. Armenia had pushed W. and secured Hani-rabbat and Dalēni, old conquests of Assyria. Adad-nirari v., however, fought several campaigns in the West. From the upper part of the Euphrates to the land of Hatti (N. Syria), Amurri (N. Palestine), Tyre, Sidon, the land of Omri (Israel), Udumu (Edom), and Palastu (Philistia), to the Mediterranean, he exacted tribute. He besieged Mari'a, king of Damascus, in his capital, captured it and carried off rich spoil. These expeditions may be placed in B.C. 804 and B.C. 797.

(k) Tiglath-pileser III.—Armenia was steadily rising in power, and Assyria gradually lost all its northern conquests in Upper Mesopotamia; under Ashur-nirari v. the dynasty fell and a new line came to the throne in Tiglath-pileser III., B.C. 745. The world of small States had given way to a few strong kingdoms; the Chaldeans were strongly forcing their way into lower Babylonia; in the north, Armenia was powerful and ready to threaten W. Syria; Egypt was awaking and anxious to interfere in Palestine. Assyria and Babylonia bade fair to fall a prey to stronger nations, when Tiglath-pileser III. roused the old energy. The Aramaeans were pouring into Babylonia, filled the Tigris basin from the lower Zab to the Ukuu, and held some of the most celebrated cities of Akkad. Tiglath-pileser scourged them into subjection, and deported multitudes to the N.E. hills. The Medes were set in order, and then Tiglath-pileser turned to the west. The new kingdom of Arpad was strongly supported by Armenia, and Tiglath-pileser swept to the right into Kummuh, and took the Armenians in the rear. He crushed them, and for the time was left to deal with the West. Arpad took three years to reduce; then gradually all N. Syria came into Assyrian hands, B.C. 740. Hamath allied itself with Azriah of Iaudi (Azariah of Judah?) and Panammu of Samal. Tiglath-pileser broke up this coalition, devastated Hamath, and made the district an Assyrian province. The Southern States hastened to avoid invasion by paying tribute. Menahem of Israel, Zabibi of Arabia, Razunnu (Rezon) of Damascus, Hiram of Tyre are noteworthy; but Gebal, Carchemish, Hamath, Militia, Tabal, Kullāni (Calno, Is 10²) also submitted, B.C. 738. In B.C. 734 Hanno of Gaza was defeated. In B.C. 733-732 Damascus was besieged and taken, Israel was invaded, the whole of Naphtali taken, and Pekah had to pay heavy toll. In B.C. 731 he was murdered, and Tiglath-pileser acknowledged Hosea as successor. Ammon, Moab, Ashkelon, Edom, and Ahaz of Judah paid tribute. Samsi, queen of the Arabians, was defeated, and the Sabaeans sent presents. This Tiglath-pileser is the Pul of 2 K 15¹⁹⁻²⁰, who, after defeating the Chaldean Ukin-zēr, who had got himself made king of Babylon, in B.C. 728 was crowned king of Babylon, as Pulu.

(l) Sargon.—Shalmaneser IV. seems to have been son of Tiglath-pileser. He was king of Babylonia as Ululai, and succeeded to Tiglath-pileser's Empire. In B.C. 724 he began the siege of Samaria, which fell after three years. We have no Assyrian accounts of this reign. Sargon at once succeeded him, but we have no knowledge of his title to the throne. He never mentions his immediate ancestors, nor does Sennacherib, but the latter evidently wished to claim ancient royal descent, and Esarhaddon claimed descent from an early king. That Sargon is called arkā, 'the later,' in his own inscriptions may be meant to distinguish him from the great Sargon of Akkad, whose reign he so closely reproduced, or from some early Assyrian monarch, Shar-kēn (Shar-kenkate-Ashir?). Samaria fell almost immediately (B.C. 722), and the flower of the nation, to the number of 27,290 persons, was deported and settled about Halah on the Habor, in the province of Gozan and in Media (2 K 17⁶), being replaced by Babylonians and Syrians. Merodach-baladan, a king of Bit Iakin, a Chaldean State in S. Babylonia, who had been tributary to Tiglath-pileser III., had made himself master of Babylon, and was supported there by Elam. Sargon met the Elamites in a battle which he claimed as a victory, but he had to leave Merodach-baladan alone as king in Babylon for twelve years. This failure roused the West under Iaubidi of Hamath, who secured Arpad, Simirra, Damascus, and Samaria as allies, supported by Hanno of Gaza and the N. Arabian Musri. Sargon in B.C. 720 set out to recover his power here. At Karkar, Iaubidi was defeated and captured, and the southern branch of the confederacy was crushed at Raphia. Hanno was carried to Assyria, 933 people deported, Shabi (Sibi, Sewe, So), the Tartan of Piru of Musri, fled, the Arabians submitted and paid tribute. Azuri of Ashdod, who began to intrigue with Egypt, was deposed and replaced by his brother, Ahimtil. A rebellion in Ashdod led to a pretender being installed, but Sargon sent his Tartan to Ashdod (Is 20¹), the pretender fled, and Ashdod and Gath were reduced to Assyrian provinces. Judah, Edom, and Moab staved off vengeance by heavy toll. Sargon's heaviest task was the reduction of Armenia. Rusa I. was able to enlist all Upper Mesopotamia, including Mita of Mushki, and it took ten years to subdue the foe. Sargon's efforts were clearly aided by the incursions of the Gimirri (Gomer) into N. Armenia. Having triumphed everywhere else, Sargon turned his veterans against Babylonia. The change of kings in Elam was a favourable opportunity for attacking Merodach-baladan, who was merely holding down the country by Chaldean troops. Sargon marched down the Tigris, seized the chief posts on the east, screened off the Elamites and threatened Merodach-baladan's rear. He therefore abandoned Babylon and fell on Sargon's rear, but, meeting no support, retreated S. to his old kingdom and fortified it strongly. Sargon entered Babylon, welcomed as a deliverer, and in B.C. 709 became king of Babylon. The army stormed Bit Iakin, but Merodach-baladan escaped over sea. Sargon then restored the ancient cities of Babylonia. His last years were crowned with the submission of far-off lands; seven kings of Cyprus sent presents, and Sargon set up a stele there in token of his supremacy. Dilmun, an island far down the Persian Gulf, did homage. Sargon founded a magnificent city, Dūr Sargon, modern Khorsabad, to the N.E. of Nineveh. He died a violent death, but how or where is now uncertain.

(m) Sennacherib.—Sennacherib soon had to put down rebellion in S.E. and N.W., but his Empire was very well held together, and his chief wars were to meet the intrigues of his neighbours, Elam and Egypt. Babylonia was split up into semi-independent States, peopled by Aramaeans, Chaldeans, and kindred folk, all restless and ambitious. Merodach-baladan seized the throne of Babylon from Marduk-zākir-shum, Sargon's viceroy, B.C. 704. The Aramaeans and Elam supported him. Sennacherib defeated him at Kish, B.C. 703, and drove him out of Babylon after nine months' reign. Sennacherib entered Babylon, spoiled the palace, swept out the Chaldeans from the land, and carried off 208,000 people as captives. On the throne of Babylon he set Bēl-ibni, of the Babylonian seed royal, but educated at his court. Merodach-baladan had succeeded in stirring the W., where Tyre had widely extended its power, and Hezekiah of Judah had grown wealthy and ambitious, to revolt. Ammon, Moab, Edom, the Arabians joined the confederacy, and Egypt encouraged. Padl, king of Ekron, a faithful vassal of Assyria, was overthrown by a rebellion in his city and sent in chains to Hezekiah. Sennacherib, early in B.C. 701, appeared on the Mediterranean coast, received the submission of the Phœnician cities, isolated Tyre, and had tribute from Ammon, Moab, and Edom. Tyre he could not capture, so he made Itubal of Sidon overlord of Phœnicia, and assailed Tyre with the allied fleet. Its king escaped to Cyprus, but the city held out. Sennacherib meanwhile passed down the coast, reduced Ashkelon, but was met at Eltekeh by the Arabians and Egyptians. He gained an easy victory, and captured Eltekeh, Timnath, and Ekron. Then he concentrated his attention upon Judah, captured 46 fortified cities, deported 200,150 people, and shut up Hezekiah, 'like a bird in a cage,' in Jerusalem. He assigned the Judean cities to the kings of Ashdod, Ekron, and Gaza, imposed fresh tribute, and received of Hezekiah thirty talents of gold, eight hundred talents of silver, precious stones, couches of ivory, thrones of ivory, precious woods, his daughters, his palace women, male and female singers, etc., an enormous spoil, which was carried to Nineveh. His siege of Lachish is depicted on his monuments. Before his campaign was over, Merodach-baladan had again appeared in Babylon. A difficulty has always been felt about the destruction of Sennacherib's army, because, if it took place after this campaign, he could hardly have been so successful in Babylonia. His inscriptions end with b.c. 689, but Esarhaddon's references to the conquests of his father in Arabia, and a fragmentary reference to Azekah, suggest that he invested Jerusalem again, on a second campaign, and that the destruction occurred then. The Biblical narrative suggests that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, had already appeared on the scene. This would date the event after b.c. 691. Further, it seems to have occurred soon before his death in b.c. 681.

In Babylonia, Bel-ibni proved unfaithful and was recalled. Ashur-nādin-shum, Sennacherib's son, was installed as king, and reigned six years. Sennacherib devastated Bit Iakin and defeated Shuzub, a Chaldean king. He then employed Phœnician shipbuilders and sailors to build ships at Til-barsip, on the Euphrates, and at Nineveh, on the Tigris. He floated his fleets down to the mouth of the rivers, shipped his army, and landed at the mouth of the Karûn, where the Chaldeans had taken refuge, b.c. 695. He sent the captives by ship to Assyria, and marched his army into S. Elam. The king of Elam, however, swooped down on Babylon and carried off Ashur-nādin-shum to Elam. Nergal-ushēzib was raised to the throne, and, aided by Elamite troops, proceeded to capture the Assyrian garrisons and cut off the southern army. Sennacherib retreated to Erech and awaited Nergal-ushēzib, who had occupied Nippur. He was defeated, captured, and taken to Assyria, b.c. 693. The Babylonians now made Shuzub, the Chaldean, king under the name of Mushēzib-Marduk. A revolution in Elam tempted Sennacherib to invade that country, perhaps in hope of rescuing his son. He swept all before him, the Elamite king retreating to the mountains, but the severe winter forced Sennacherib to retreat, b.c. 692. Mushēzib-Marduk and the Babylonians opened the treasury of Marduk to bribe the Elamites for support. A great army of Elamites, Arameans, Chaldeans, and Babylonians barred Sennacherib's return at Halûle, on the E. of the Tigris, b.c. 691. Sennacherib claimed the victory, but had no power to do more, and left Mushēzib-Marduk alone for the time. He came back to Babylonia in b.c. 690, and the new Elamite king being unable to assist, Babylon was taken, Mushēzib-Marduk deposed and sent to Nineveh. Babylon was then sacked, fortifications and walls, temples and palaces razed to the ground, the inhabitants massacred, the canals turned over the ruins, b.c. 689. Sennacherib made Babylonia an Assyrian province, and was king himself till his death (b.c. 681). There is reason to think that he appointed Esarhaddon regent of Babylonia: at any rate it seems that this prince began to rebuild Babylon before his father's death.

Sennacherib chose Nineveh, which had become a second-rate city, as his capital, and, by his magnificent buildings and great fortifications, made it a formidable rival to Calah, Asshur, and even Babylon before its destruction. His last few years are in obscurity, but he was murdered by his son or sons. See ADHAMMELECH.

(n) Esarhaddon came to the throne b.c. 680, after a short struggle with the murderers of his father and their party. He had to repel an incursion of the Cimmerians in the beginning of his reign, and then conquered the Medes. In b.c. 677 Sidon was in revolt, but was taken and destroyed, a new city called Kar-Esarhaddon being built to replace it and colonized with captives from Elam and Babylonia, Ezr 4². In b.c. 676, Esarhaddon marched into Arabia and conquered the eight kings of Bazu and Hazu (Buz and Huz of Gn 22²¹). In b.c. 674 he invaded Egypt, and again in 673. In b.c. 670 he made his great effort to conquer Egypt, drove back the Egyptian army from the frontier to Memphis, winning three severe battles. Memphis surrendered, Tirhakah fled to Thebes, and Egypt was made an Assyrian province. In b.c. 668 it revolted, and on the march to reduce it Esarhaddon died. He divided the Empire between his two sons, Ashurbanipal being king of Assyria and the Empire, while Shamash-shum-ukin was king of Babylon as a vassal of his brother.

(o) Ashurbanipal at once prosecuted his father's reduction of Egypt to submission. Tirhakah had drawn the Assyrian governors, some of them native Egyptians, as Necho, into a coalition against Assyria. Some remained faithful, and the rising was suppressed; Tirhakah was driven back to Ethiopia, where he died b.c. 664. Tantamon invaded Egypt again, and Ashurbanipal in b.c. 662 again suppressed a rising, drove the Ethiopian out, and captured Thebes. Ashurbanipal besieged Ba'al, king of Tyre, and although unable to capture the city, obtained its submission and that of Arvad, Tabal, and Cilicia. Gyges, king of Lydia, exchanged embassies, and sent Ashurbanipal two captive Cimmerians, but he afterwards allied himself with Psammetichus, son of Necho, and assisted him to throw off the Assyrian yoke. The Minni had been restless, and Ashurbanipal next reduced them. Elam was a more formidable foe. Allying himself with the Arameans and Chaldeans, Urtaku, king of Elam, invaded Babylonia, but he was defeated and his throne seized by Teumman. Ashurbanipal took advantage of the revolution to invade Elam and capture Susa; and after killing Teumman put Ummanigash and Tammartu, two sons of Urtaku, on the thrones of two districts of Elam. He then took vengeance on the Arameans, E. of the Tigris. His brother, Shamash-shum-ukin, now began to plot for independence. He enlisted the Chaldeans, Arameans, and Ummanigash of Elam, Arabia, Ethiopia, and Egypt. A simultaneous rising took place, and Ashurbanipal seemed likely to lose his Empire. He invaded Babylonia. In Elam, Tammartu put to death Ummanigash and all his family, but was defeated by Indabigash, and had to flee to Assyria. Ashurbanipal defeated his opponents and laid siege to Babylon, Borsippa, Sippara, and Cutha, capturing one after the other. Shamash-shum-ukin burnt his palace over his head, and Babylon surrendered b.c. 648. The conquest of S. Babylonia and Chaldæa was followed by campaigns against Elam, culminating in the capture of Susa and its destruction. Ashurbanipal then punished the Arabians, who, in his enforced absence in Babylonia, had invaded Palestine, overrun Edom and Moab, and threatened Damascus. The inscriptions, however, do not come down below b.c. 646, and the last years of the reign are in obscurity. Ashurbanipal appears to have reigned over Babylon as Kandalanu.

(p) Fall of Nineveh.—Ashurbanipal was succeeded by Ashur-etil-ilani, his son, who was succeeded by Sin-shar-ishkun, his brother. We do not know how long they reigned, but in b.c. 606 the Medes captured Nineveh and took the N. half of the Empire, while Nabopolassar, king of Babylon (since b.c. 626?), took Babylonia.

II. BABYLONIA.—1. History.—The history of Babylonia, as monumentally attested, falls naturally into periods: (a) the rise of the city-States and their struggle for supremacy; (b) the supremacy of Babylon and the First Babylonian Empire; (c) the Kassite supremacy and the rise of Assyria; (d) the contemporaneous kingdoms of Assyria and Babylonia; (e) the supremacy of Assyria to its fall; (f) the New Babylonian Empire.

(a) The city-States.—The prehistoric remains of the earliest settlers in Babylonia are numerous, but they have received no systematic study. The existence of a non-Semitic race, the so-called Sumerians, is at least the most convenient assumption to account for the problems of the earliest history, but it is impossible to decide how early they were intermixed with Semitic folk. It is as yet difficult to decide whether these Semites entered from the S.W., or from the side of Elam, or from N. Mesopotamia. The earliest monuments we possess show a variety of towns, each of which served as a nucleus to a wide area of villages. As populations grew, the needs of pasture for an eminently pastoral people brought about disputes as to boundaries, and wars ensued. The States entered into keen rivalry in other directions, as commerce developed. As early as B.C. 5000 the condition of things may be aptly compared with that of England under the Heptarchy. Eridu, modern Abu Shahrein, lay on the Gulf and W. of the Euphrates mouth. As the seat of the worship of Ea, god of the waters, its business was rather on the sea than on the land, but it was always revered as the primitive home of civilization and religion. We have no evidence that it was ever the seat of a kingdom. Some 10 miles to the W. lay Ur, modern Mugheir, then also on the Gulf, the home of the worship of Sin, the moon-god. Across the Euphrates, 30 miles to N.E., lay Larsa, modern Senkereh, where Shamash, the sun-god, was chief god. Twelve miles to the N.W. was Uruk, modern Warka (Erech), with its Ishtar cult. To the N. was Mar, modern Tel Ede. From Mar, 35 miles to the E., on the Shatt-el-Hai canal from the Tigris to the Euphrates, was Shurpura or Lagash, modern Telloh, with its god Ningirsu. These six cities form the group with whose fortunes most of the Telloh finds are concerned. Nippur, modern Niffer, lay halfway between the Tigris and Euphrates, 60 miles from the Gulf. Its god was the very ancient En-lil, the old Bel, 'lord of mankind.'

In the N. more than 50 miles N.W. of Nippur was Uthia, modern Tel Ibrahim, with its god Nergal, lord of the world of the dead. Further N., on the E. bank of the Euphrates, was Sippar, modern Abu Habba, with its sun-god Shamash. Near by have been Agade. The monuments place here: Kulunu (Calneh); Uki, later Opis; and Kish. Later, Babylon (wh. see) and its sister city Borsippa came into importance. In Upper Mesopotamia, Haran was probably not much later in its rise as a commercial capital and centre of the moon-god cult.

The history of this period has many gaps, probably because systematic exploration has been carried out only at Telloh and Nippur. The evidence for other cities consists chiefly of references made by the rulers of these two cities, who either ruled over others or were ruled over by them. A king of Ur might leave offerings at Nippur, or order some building to be done there; or the rulers of Nippur might name the king of Ur as their overlord. Out of such scattered references we must weave what history we can. About B.C. 4500 Enshagsagana, king of Kengi in S.W., offered to Bel of Nippur the spoils of Kish. Later, Mesilim, king of Kish, made Shurpura a subject State. About B.C. 4200 Ur-Nina was able to call himself king of Shurpura. Eannatum and Entemena of Shurpura won several victories over other cities and imposed treaties upon them. Soon Lugalzaggisi, king of Uki, about B.C. 4200, could call himself king of Erech, Ur, and Larsa. He was practically ruler of the First Babylonian Empire, from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean. About B.C. 3850, Alusharshid, king of Kish, conquered Elam and Bara'se, to N.E. and E. of Babylonia.

Shargani-shar-ali (Sargon I.), king of Agade, B.C. 3800, and his son Naram-Sin, B.C. 3750 according to Nabonidus, were lords of Nippur, Shurpura, Kish, Babylon, and Erech, and ruled, or at least levied tribute, from the Mediterranean N. into Armenia, over part of Elam, and S. into Arabia and the islands of the Persian Gulf. About B.C. 3500 Ur-Bau of Shurpura ruled in peace, as a subject prince, or patesi. Gudea, about B.C. 3100, erected wonderful buildings, evidently had great resources, and even conquered Anshan, in Elam, but was not a king. About B.C. 3000, Ur-Gur and his son Dungi, kings of Ur, built temples not only in Ur but in Kutha, Shurpura, Nippur, and Erech. A dynasty of Erech and a dynasty of Isin later claimed authority over Nippur, Ur, Eridu, and other less noted cities. The next dynasty of Ur, founded by Gungunu, included Ine-Sin, Bur-Sin II., Gamil-Sin, Dungi II. and others, B.C. 2800-2500. They warred in Syria, Arabia, and Elam.

(b) Supremacy of Babylon.—The First Dynasty of Babylon (B.C. 2396) was founded by Sumu-abi. But Larsa was under its own king Nur-Adad, who was followed by his son Sin-iddinam. The Elamites invaded the land, and under Kudur-nanhundi carried off the goddess Nane from Erech about B.C. 2290. Larsa became the seat of an Elamite king, Rim-Sin, son of Kudur-mabuk, ruler of Lamuthal in W. Elam. He ruled over Ur, Eridu, Nippur, Shurpura, and Erech, and conquered Isin. He is thought by some to be Arioch of Ellasar who with Chedorlaomer of Elam, Amraphel of Shinar, (Hammurabi?), Tidal of Gohim overthrew the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 14). At any rate he was expelled from Larsa by Hammurabi in the 31st year of his reign. Hammurabi ruled all Mesopotamia, from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf. His reign was the climax of Babylonian civilization and culture. His successors maintained his Empire for a while, but then Babylonia had to submit to foreign conquest. His period is known to us by an enormous number of inscriptions and monuments, and deserves attention as characteristic of Old Babylonia at its best.

The second dynasty has left remarkably few monuments in the districts hitherto explored, and beyond its existence we know little of it.

(c, d, e) Kassite supremacy, and rise of Assyria, etc.—The third dynasty rose on the conquest of Babylonia by the Kassites, a mountaineer people from the N.E., of non-Semitic race, thought by many to be Cush in Gn 10⁸. The Kassites attempted an invasion as early as the 9th year of Samsu-iluna, but were driven back. They first established themselves in the South, giving the name of Karduniash to it. They adopted the royal titles, worshipped the ancient gods, and wrote in the Babylonian language. The first king of whom we have important inscriptions was Agum-kakrime (Agum II.). He claims to rule over the Kishluhu, the Akkadians, Babylonia, Ashnunak, Padan, Alman, and Gutium. He restored the images of Marduk and Zarpanit his consort, which had been carried away to Hani in N. Mesopotamia. Later we learn from the Tell el-Amarna letters that as early as the time of Amenophis III., king of Egypt, Kurigalzu of Babylon was in friendly relations with Egypt, and refused to support a Canaanite conspiracy against its rule. The relations with Assyria have been already dealt with. Kadashman-harbe co-operated with his grandfather in driving out the Suti, who robbed the caravans from the West and Egypt. Kurigalzu II. waged successful war with Elam, captured the king Hurbatila with his own hands, and sacked Susa. With Melishihu and Marduk-apliddina I. Babylonian power revived, but fell again under their successors. The Kassites first gave Babylonia a national name and exalted the worship of Bel of Nippur. In their time, Babylonia had trade relations not only with Mesopotamia, Syria, and Egypt, but with Bactria, and possibly China on the E., and with Eubœa on the West.

(f) New Babylonian Empire.—The new Babylonian dynasty was that of Pashe, or Isin, a native dynasty. Nebuchadrezzar I. was apparently its founder. He defeated the Elamites and wrested from them the provinces already occupied by them, and brought back the statue of Bel which they had captured. He also reconquered the West, and left his name on the rocks of the Nahr el-Kelb. His attempts upon Assyria were unsuccessful. Henceforth Babylonia was pent up by Assyria and Elam, and merely held its own. The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth dynasties yield but a few names, of whose exploits we know next to nothing. The Aramæan migration swallowed up Mesopotamia and drove back both Assyria and Babylonia. The Chaldeans followed the old route from Arabia by Ur, and established themselves firmly in the S. of Babylonia. Akkad was plundered by the Sûti. Thus cut off from the West, the absence of Babylonian power allowed the rise of Philistia; Israel consolidated, Phœnicia grew into power. Hamath, Aleppo, Patin, Samal became independent States. Damascus became an Aramæan power. Egypt also was split up, and could influence Palestine but little. When Assyria revived under Adad-nirari, the whole W. was a new country and had to be reconquered. Babylonia had no hand in it. She was occupied in suppressing the Chaldeans and Aramæans on her borders; and had to call for Assyrian assistance in the time of Sialmaneser. Finally, Tiglath-pileser III. became master of Babylonia, and after him it fell into the hands of the Chaldean Merodach-baladan, till Sargon drove him out. Under Sennacherib it was a mere dependency of Assyria, till he destroyed Babylon. Under Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal Babylonia revived somewhat, and under Nabopolassar found in the weakness of Assyria and the fall of Nineveh a chance to recover.

Nabopolassar reckoned his reign from B.C. 625, but during the early years of his rule some Southern Babylonian cities such as Erech continued to acknowledge Sin-shar-iskun. According to classical writers, he allied himself with the Medo-Scythian hordes, who devastated Mesopotamia and captured Nineveh. He claims to have chased from Akkad the Assyrians, who from the days of old ruled over all peoples and with their heavy yoke wore out the nations, and to have broken their yoke. The Medes seem to have made no attempt to hold Mesopotamia, and Pharaoh Necho, who was advancing from Egypt to take Syria, was defeated at Carchemish B.C. 605 by Nebuchadrezzar. So Babylonia succeeded to the W. part of the Assyrian Empire. Beyond a few building inscriptions we know little of this reign.

Nebuchadrezzar's inscriptions hardly mention anything but his buildings. He fortified Babylon, enriched it with temples and palaces; restored temples at Sippara, Larsa, Ur, Dilbat, Baz, Erech, Bors, Kutua, Marad; cleaned out and walled with quays the Arahû canal which ran through Babylon, and dug a canal N. of Sippara. He left an inscription on the rocks at Wady Brissa, a valley N. of the Lebanon Mountains and W. of the upper part of the Orontes; another on a rock N. of the Nahr el-Kelb, where the old road from Arvad passes S. to the cities of the coast. A fragment of his annals states that in his 37th year he fought in Egypt against Amasis.

Amel-Marduk (Evil-Merodach), his son, was not acceptable to the priests, and was murdered by his brother-in-law Neriglissar, who had married a daughter of Nebuchadrezzar, and was son of Bel-shum-iskun, the rubâ-inga. He, too, was occupied chiefly with the temples of his land. Neriglissar was succeeded by his son Labashl-Marduk, a 'bad character,' whom the priests deposed, setting up Nabonidus, a Babylonian. He was an antiquary rather than a king. He rebuilt many of the oldest Babylonian temples, and in exploring their ruins found records which have helped to date early kings, as quoted above. For some reason he avoided

Babylon and left the command of the army to his son Belshazzar. The Manda king, Astyages, invaded Mesopotamia, and was repelled only by the aid of Cyrus, king of Anshan, who a little later by his overthrow of Astyages became king of Persia, and then conquered Croesus of Lydia. On the 16th of Tammuz B.C. 539 Cyrus entered Babylon without resistance. Nabonidus was spared and sent to Karmania. Belshazzar was killed. Cyrus was acceptable to the Babylonians, worshipped at the ancient shrines, glorified the gods who had given him leadership over their land and people, made Babylon a royal city, and took the old native titles, but the sceptre had departed from the Semitic world for ever.

2. Literature.—Babylonia was very early in possession of a form of writing. The earliest specimens of which we know are little removed from pictorial writing; but the use of flat pieces of soft clay, afterwards dried in the sun or baked hard in a furnace, as writing material, and strokes of a triangular reed, soon led to conventional forms of characters in which the curved lines of a picture were replaced by one or more short marks on the line. These were gradually reduced in number until the resultant group of strokes bore little resemblance to the original. The short pointed wedge-shaped 'dabs' of the reed have given rise to the name 'cuneiform.' The necessities of the engraver on stone led him to reproduce these wedges with an emphasized head that gives the appearance of nails, but all such graphic varieties make no essential difference. The signs denoted primarily ideas: thus the picture of a bull, or a bull's head, would symbolize 'power,' and all the words derived from the root 'to be powerful,' then from the word 'powerful' a syllabic value would be derived which might be used in spelling words. Thus the picture of a star might signify 'heaven,' the supreme god Anu, the idea 'above,' and be used to denote all things 'high, lofty, or divine'; its syllabic value being an it would be used in spelling wherever an had to be written. But, again, as 'god' was ilu, it might be used in spelling for il. Thus many signs have more than one value, even as syllables; they may also denote ideas. The scribes, however, used not far short of 500 signs, and there is rarely any doubt of their meaning. The values attached to the signs in many cases are not derivable from the words which denote their ideas, and it has been concluded that the signs were adopted from a non-Semitic people called the Sumerians. Many inscriptions cannot be read as Semitic, except by regarding them as a sort of halfway development of pictorial writing, and when read syllabically are supposed to be in the Sumerian language, which continued to be used, at any rate in certain phrases, to the last, much as Latin words and abbreviations (like E. s. d.) are used by us. There is still great obscurity about this subject, which can be solved only by the discovery of earlier or intermediate inscriptions.

At any rate, we are now able to read with certainty, except for a few obscure expressions, inscriptions which possibly date back to B.C. 6000. The earliest inscriptions hitherto recovered have been from temple archives, and naturally relate to offerings to the gods or gifts to the temples. From very early times, however, contracts such as deeds of sale, dispositions of property, marriage settlements, etc., were preserved in the archives, and many families preserved large quantities of deeds, letters, business accounts, etc. Writing and reading were very widely diffused, even women being well educated in these respects, and we have enormous collections in our museums of material relating to the private life and customs of the people at almost all periods of the history.

The Babylonians early drew up codes of laws, hymns, ritual texts, mythology, and made records of observations in all directions of natural history. The supposed influence of the heavenly bodies led to works associating celestial phenomena with terrestrial events—the so-called astrological texts which recorded astronomical observations from very early dates. A wonderful collection of extraordinary events, as births of monsters or abnormal beings, were regarded as ominous, and an attempt was made to connect them with events in national or private history. These 'omen tablets' also deal with morals, attaching to human acts consequences evincing royal or Divine displeasure. Evil conduct was thus placed under a ban, and the punishment of it was assigned to the 'hand of God or the king.' It was a very high morality that was so inculcated: to say yes with the lips and nay in the heart, to use false weights, to betray a friend, to estrange relations, to slander or backbite, are all forbidden. The conduct of a good king, of a good man, of a faithful son of his god, are set out with great care, and culminate in the precept, 'To him that does thee wrong return a gracious courtesy.' Medicine was extensively written upon, and the number of cases prescribed for is very great. We are not able, as a rule, to recognize either the ailment or the prescription; but it seems that magical spells were often used to drive out the demon supposed to be the cause of the disease.

The Babylonians had some acquaintance with mathematics, so far as necessary for the calculation of areas, and they early drew up tables of squares and cubes, as well as of their measures of surface and capacity. To them we owe the division of time into hours, minutes, and seconds. Their measures still lack the fundamental explanation which can be afforded only by finding some measured object with its Babylonian measure inscribed upon it, in a state allowing of accurate modern measures. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

3. Religion.—The religion of Babylonia was a syncretic result of the union of a number of city and local cults. Consequently Shamash the sun-god; Sin the moon-god; Ishtar, Venus; Marduk the god of Babylon, Nabû of Borsippa, Bêl of Nippur, Nergal the god of pestilence, Nusku the new-moon crescent, and a host of others, were worshipped with equal reverence by both kings and people. Most men, however, were specially devoted to one god, determined for them by hereditary cult, or possibly personal choice: a man was 'son of his god' and the god was his 'father.' In the course of time almost every god absorbed much of the attributes of every other god, so that, with the exception of such epithets as were peculiarly appropriate to him, Shamash could be addressed or hymned in much the same words as Marduk or Sin. By some teachers all the gods were said to be Marduk in one or other manifestation of his Divine activity. The whole pantheon became organized and simplified by the identification of deities originally distinct, as a result of political unification or theological system. The ideal of Divinity was high and pure, often very poetic and beautiful, but the Babylonian was tolerant of other gods, and indisposed to deny the right of others to call a god by another name than that which best summed up for him his own conception.

Magic entered largely into the beliefs and practices of life, invading religion in spite of spiritual authority. The universe was peopled with spirits, good and bad, who had to be appeased or propitiated. Conjurings, magic spells, forecasts, omens were resorted to in order to bind or check the malign influences of demons. The augurs, conjurers, magicians, soothsayers were a numerous class, and, though frowned upon by the priests and physicians, were usually called in whenever disease or fear suggested occult influence. The priest was devoted to the service of his god, and originally every head of a family was priest of the local god, the right to minister in the temple descending in certain families to the latest times. The office was later much subdivided, and as the temple became an overwhelming factor in the city life, its officials and employees formed a large part of the population. A temple corresponded to a monastery in the Middle Ages, having lands, houses, tenants, and a host of dependants, as well as enormous wealth, which it employed on the whole in good deeds, and certainly threw its influence on the side of peace and security. Although distinct classes, the judges, scribes, physicians, and even skilled manufacturers were usually attached to the temple, and priests often exercised these functions. Originally the god, and soon his temple, were the visible embodiment of the city life. The king grew out of the high priest. He was the vicegerent of the god on earth, and retained his priestly power to the last, but he especially represented its external aspect. He was ruler, leader of the army, chief judge, supreme builder of palaces and temples, guardian of right, defender of the weak and oppressed, accessible to the meanest subject. The expansion of city territory by force of arms, the growth of kingdoms and rise of empires, led to a military caste, rapacious for foreign spoils, and domestic politics became a struggle for power between the war party of expansion and conquest and the party of peace and consolidation.

The Babylonian Literature was extensive, and much of it has striking similarities to portions of the Bible (see CREATION, DELUGE, etc.). It also seems to have had influence upon classical mythology.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ASTAD, ASTATH.—1322 or 3622 of Astad's descendants are mentioned as returning with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5¹³). He is called Azgad in the can. books; and 1222 descendants are mentioned in the parallel list in Ezr 2¹², 2322 in Neh 7¹⁷. He appears as Astath, 1 Es 8¹⁸, when a second detachment of 111 return under Ezra (= Ezr 8¹²). Azgad appears among the leaders who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10¹⁵).

ASTROLOGY, ASTRONOMY.—See MAGIC, etc.

ASTYAGES (Bel¹) was the last king of Media. He was defeated and dethroned by Cyrus the Great in B.C. 550.

J. F. MCCURDY.

ASUPPIM.—1 Ch 26¹⁵. 17 AV; RV correctly 'storehouse.'

ASUR (AV Assur). 1 Es 5³¹.—His sons returned among the Temple servants under Zerubbabel; called Harhur, Ezr 2⁵¹, Neh 7²⁵.

ASYLUM.—See ALTAR, KIN [NEXT OF], REFUGE [CITIES OF].

ASYNCRITUS (Ro 16¹⁴).—A Christian greeted by St. Paul with four others 'and the brethren that are with them,' perhaps members of the same small community. The name occurs in Rom. Ins. CIL vi. 12,565, of a freedman of Augustus.

ATAD (Gn 50¹⁰⁻¹¹).—A threshing-floor on the road to Hebron. The site is unknown.

ATAR (AV Jatal). 1 Es 5²⁸.—His sons were among the porters or door-keepers who returned with Zerubbabel; called Ater, Ezr 2⁴⁵, Neh 7⁴⁸.

ATARAH.—Wife of Jerahmeel and mother of Onam (1 Ch 2²⁰).

ATARGATIS (RV less correctly Atergatis).—In addition to the sanctuary of this goddess (= Gr. Derceto) at Carnion (2 Mac 12²⁰), other shrines were situated at Hierapolis and Ashkelon. Here sacred fish were kept, and at the latter place the goddess was represented as a mermaid, resembling the supposed form of the Philistine Dagon (wh. see). Some expositors, because of the ancient name of Carnion, i.e. Ashteroth-karnaim, have identified the goddess with Astarte. The name, however, a compound of 'Athr' (= Phœn. 'Astart, Heb. 'Ashtoreth [wh. see]) and of 'Atti or 'Atah, which latter term appears as a god's name upon inscriptions, shows her to be Astarte who has assimilated the functions of 'Atti. This etymology, together with her mermaid-form and the fact that fish were sacred to her, apparently makes her a personification of the fertilizing powers of water.

N. KOENIG.

ATAROTH.—1. A town not far from Dibon (Nu 32³¹⁻³²), probably the modern Khirbet 'Atarûs, to the

ATER

N.W. of Dithān. 2. A town on the S. border of the territory of the children of Joseph (Jos 16⁹), called Ataroth-addar in v. 1, probably identical with ed-Dārīyeh, 1½ mile S.W. of Bethhoron the Lower. 3. A town not identified, towards the E. end of the same border (Jos 16⁷). 4. The name of a family (1 Ch. 2²⁴, RV Atroth-beth-Joab). W. EWING.

ATER.—1. The ancestor of certain Temple porters who returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2¹⁶, 4², Neh 7²¹, 4²; cf. ATAR. 2. (AV Aterezias), 1 Es 5¹⁵; cf. Ezr 2¹⁶. His sons returned with Zerubbabel.

ATETA (AV Teta), 1 Es 5²⁸ = Hatita, Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7¹⁵.

ATHACH, 1 S 30³⁰.—Unknown town in the south of Judah.

ATHAIAH.—A man of Judah dwelling in Jerusalem (Neh 11¹).

ATHALIAH.—1. The only queen who occupied the throne of Judah. She was the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and was married to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat. On the accession of her son Ahaziah she became queen-mother, second only to the king in power and influence. When Ahaziah was slain by Jehu, she could not bring herself to take an inferior position, and seized the throne for herself, making it secure, as she supposed, by slaying all the male members of the house of David so far as they were within her reach. One infant was preserved, and was successfully concealed in the Temple six years. The persons active in this were Jehoshcaba, sister of Ahaziah, and her husband Jehoiada, the chief priest. The story of the young prince's coronation by the body-guard is one of the most dramatic in Hebrew history. The death of Athaliah at the hands of the guard forms the logical conclusion of the incident. The destruction of the temple of Baal, which is spoken of in the same connexion, indicates that Athaliah was addicted to the worship of the Phœnician Baal, introduced by her mother into Israel (2 K 11). 2. See GOTHOLIAS. 3. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²⁶). H. P. SMITH.

ATHARIM (Nu 21¹).—Either a proper name of a place from which the route was named; so RV 'the way of Atharim,' as LXX.—or, 'the way of tracks,' i.e. a regular caravan road. (The rendering of AV, 'way of the spies,' follows Targ. and Syr.) The 'way of Atharim' will then be that described in Nu 13²¹⁻²⁸.

ATHENOBIOUS (1 Mac 15²⁸⁻³⁰).—A friend of Antiochus vii. Sidetes. He was sent to Jerusalem to demonstrate with Simon Maccabæus for the occupation of Joppa, Gazara, the citadel of Jerusalem, and certain places outside Judæa. Simon refused the terms proposed, and Athenobius was obliged to return in indignation to the king.

ATHENS.—In the earliest times, Athens, on the Gulf of Ægina, consisted of two settlements, the town on the plain and the citadel on the hill above, the Acropolis, where the population fled from invasion. Its name and the name of its patron-goddess Athene (Athena) are inextricably connected. She was the maiden goddess, the warlike defender of her people, the patroness of the arts. The city lies about 3 miles from the seacoast on a large plain. When Greece was free, during the period before B.C. 146 Athens was the capital of the district Attica, and developed a unique history in Greece. It first gained distinction by the repulse of the Persian invasions in B.C. 490 and 480, and afterwards had a brilliant career of political, commercial, literary, and artistic supremacy. It was in the 5th cent. B.C. the greatest of Greek democracies, and produced the greatest sculptures and literary works the world has ever seen. In the same century Socrates lived and taught there, as did later Plato and Aristotle. The conflict with Sparta, the effects of the Macedonian invasion, and ultimately the Roman conquest of Greece, which became a Roman province under the name 'Achaia' (wh. see), lessened the political importance of Athens, but as a State it received from Rome a position of freedom and consideration worthy of its undying merits. Athens remained supreme in philosophy and the arts, and was in St. Paul's time (Ac 17¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 1 Th 3¹) the seat of a famous university. A. SOUTER.

ATHLAI.—A Jew who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁸; called in 1 Es 9²⁹ Emmatheis).

ATIPHA (1 Es 5³²).—See HATIPHA.

ATONEMENT.—The word 'atonement' (at-one-ment), in English, denotes the making to be at one, or reconciling, of persons who have been at variance. In OT usage it signifies that by which sin is 'covered' or 'expiated,' or the wrath of God averted. Thus, in EV, of the Levitical sacrifices (Lv 1⁴, 4²¹, 28, 31, 35 etc.), of the half-shekel of ransom-money (Ex 30¹², 16), of the intercession of Moses (Ex 32³⁰), of the zeal of Phinehas (Nu 25¹³), etc. In the NT the word occurs once in AV as tr. of the Gr. word katalagē, ordinarily and in RV rendered 'reconciliation' (Ro 5¹¹). The 'reconciliation' here intended, however, as the expression 'received,' and also v. 10 ('reconciled to God through the death of his Son') show, is that made by the death of Christ on behalf of sinners (cf. Col 1²⁰ 'having made peace through the blood of his cross'). In both OT and NT the implication is that the 'reconciliation' or 'making-at-one' of mankind and God is effected through expiation or propitiation. In its theological use, therefore, the word 'atonement' has come to denote, not the actual state of reconciliation into which believers are introduced through Christ, whose work is the means to this end, but the reconciling act itself—the work accomplished by Christ in His sufferings and death for the salvation of the world.

1. IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—In tracing the Scripture teaching on the subject of atonement, it is desirable to begin with the OT, in which the foundations of the NT doctrine are laid. Here several lines of preparation are to be distinguished, which, as OT revelation draws to its close, tend to unite.

1. The most general, but indispensable, preparation in the OT lies in its doctrines of the holiness, righteousness, and grace of God; also, of the sin and guilt of man. God's holiness (including in this His ethical purity, His awful elevation above the creature, and His zeal for His own honour) is the background of every doctrine of atonement. As holy, God abhors sin, and cannot but in righteousness eternally react against it. His grace shows itself in forgiveness (Ex 34⁶⁻⁷); but even forgiveness must be bestowed in such a way, and on such conditions, that the interest of holiness shall not be compromised, but shall be upheld and magnified. Hence the bestowal of forgiveness in connexion with intercession (Moses, etc.), with sacrificial atonements, with signal vindications of the Divine righteousness (Phinehas). On man's side sin is viewed as voluntary, as infinitely heinous, as entailing a Divine condemnation that needs to be removed. All the world has gone astray from God, and the connexion in which each individual stands with his family, nation, and race entails on him a corporate as well as an individual responsibility.

2. A second important line of preparation in the OT is in the doctrine of sacrifice. Whatever the origins or ethnic associations of sacrifice, it is indisputable that sacrifice in the OT has a peculiar meaning, in accordance with the ideas of God and His holiness above indicated. From the beginning, sacrifice was the appointed means of approach to God. Whether, in the earliest narrative, the difference in the sacrifices of Cain and Abel had to do with the fact that the one was bloodless and the other an animal sacrifice (Gn 4³⁻⁵), or lay solely in the disposition of the offerers (v. 7), is not clear. Probably, however, from the commencement, a mystic virtue was attached to the shedding and presentation of the sacred element of the blood. Up to the Exodus, we have only the generic type of the burnt-offering: the Exodus itself gave birth to the Passover, in which blood sprinkled gave protection from destruction; at the ratification of the Covenant, peace-offerings appear with burnt-offerings (Ex 20²⁴ 24³); finally, the Levitical ritual provided a cultus in which the idea of atonement had a leading place. Critical questions as to the age of this legislation need not detain us, for there is an increasing tendency to recognize that, whatever the date of the final codification of the Levitical laws, the bulk of these laws rest on older usages. That the propitiatory idea in sacrifice goes back to early times may be seen in such pictures of patriarchal piety as Job 1⁵ 42⁷ 8; while an atoning virtue is expressly assumed as belonging to sacrifice in 1 S 3¹⁴. Cf. also allusions to sin- and guilt-offerings, and to propitiatory rites in so old a stratum of laws as the 'Law of Holiness' (Lv 19²¹ 22 23¹³), and in Hos 4⁸, Mic 6⁶ 7, Ezk 40³⁹ 42¹⁸ etc.

It is in the Levitical system that all the ideas involved in OT sacrifice come to clearest expression. The Epistle to the Hebrews admirably seizes the idea of the system. It has absolutely nothing to do with the ideas that underlay heathen rites, but rests on a basis of its own. It provides a means by which the people, notwithstanding their sin, maintain their fellowship with God, and enjoy His favour. It rests in all its parts on the idea of the holiness of God, and is designed throughout to impress on the mind of the worshipper the sense of the separation which sin has made between him and God. Even with sacrifice the people could not approach God directly, but only through the priesthood. The priests alone could enter the sacred enclosure; into the Most Holy Place even the priests were not permitted to enter, but only the high priest, and he but once a year, and then only with blood of sacrifice, offered first for himself and then for the people; all this signifying that 'the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest' (He 9⁷ 8).

The details of the sacrificial ritual must be sought elsewhere (see SACRIFICE). It is to be noted generally that the animal sacrifices were of four kinds—the burnt-offering, the sin-offering, the guilt-offering (a species of sin-offering which included a money-compensation to the person injured), the peace-offering. The victims must be unblemished; the presentation was accompanied by imposition of hands (on meaning, cf. Lv 16²¹); the blood, after the victim was killed, was sprinkled on and about the altar: on the Day of Atonement it was taken also within the veil. The burnt-offering was wholly consumed; in the case of the peace-offering a feast was held with part of the flesh. No sacrifice was permitted for sins done 'presumptuously,' or with 'a high hand' (Nu 15³⁰).

The design of all these sacrifices (even of the peace-offering, as features of the ritual show) was 'to make atonement' for the sin of the offerer, or of the congregation (Lv 1⁴ 42²⁶ 31 5⁶ 17¹¹ etc.). The word so translated means primarily 'to cover,' then 'to propitiate' or 'expiate.' The atoning virtue is declared in Lv 17¹¹ to reside in the blood, as the vehicle of the soul or life. The effect of the offering was to 'cover' the person or offence from the eyes of a holy God, i.e. to annul guilt and procure forgiveness. It 'cleansed' from moral and ceremonial pollution.

From this point theories take their origin as to the precise signification of sacrificial atonement. (1) Was the act purely symbolical—an expression of penitence, confession, prayer, consecration, surrender of one's life to God? Hardly; for if, in one way, the victim is identified with the offerer, in another it is distinguished from him as a creature through whose blood-shedding expiation is made for his sin. (2) Is the idea, then, as many hold, that the blood represents a pure life put between the sinful soul and God—an innocent life covering a polluted one? In this case the death is held to be immaterial, and the manipulation of the blood, regarded as still fresh and living, is the one thing of importance. The theory comes short in not recognizing that, in any case, there is in the act the acknowledgment of God's righteous sentence upon sin—else why bring sacrifice of atonement at all? It is true that the blood represents the life, but it is surely not as life simply, but as life taken—life given up in death—that the blood is presented on the altar as a covering for sin. It would be hard otherwise to explain how in the NT so much stress is always laid on death, or the shedding of the blood, as the means of redemption. (3) There remains the view that the victim is regarded as expiating the guilt of the offerer by itself dying in his room—yielding up its life in his stead in acknowledgment of the judgment of God on his sin. This, which is the older view, is probably still the truer. The theory of Ritschl, that the sacrifices had nothing to do with sin, but were simply a protection against the terrible 'majesty' of God, is generally allowed to be untenable.

3. There is yet a third line of preparation for this doctrine in the OT, viz.: the prophetic. The prophets, at first sight, seem to take up a position altogether antagonistic to sacrifices. Seeing, however, that in many indirect ways they recognize its legitimacy, and even include it in their pictures of a restored theocracy (cf. Is 56⁸ 7 60⁷ 66²⁴, Jer 17²⁴⁻²⁷ 33¹⁷ 18 etc.), their polemic must be regarded as against the abuse rather than the use. The proper prophetic preparation, however, lay along a different line from the sacrificial. The basis of it is in the idea of the Righteous Sufferer, which is seen shaping itself in the Prophets and the Psalms (cf. Ps 22). The righteous man, both through the persecutions he sustains and the national calamities arising from the people's sins which he shares, is a living exemplification of the law of the innocent suffering for the guilty. Such suffering, however, while giving weight to intercession, is not in itself atoning. But in the picture of the Servant of Jehovah in Is 53 a new idea emerges. The sufferings arising from the people's sins have, in this Holy One, become, through the spirit in which they are borne, and the Divine purpose in permitting them, sufferings for sin—vicarious, healing, expiatory. Their expiatory character is affirmed in the strongest manner in the successive verses, and sacrificial language is freely taken over upon the sufferer (vv. 5, 6, 8, 10-12). Here at length the ideas of prophecy and those of sacrificial law coincide, and, though there is no second instance of like clear and detailed portraiture, it is not difficult to recognize the recurrence of the same ideas in later prophecies, e.g., in Zec 3⁹ 12¹⁰ 13¹ 7, Dn 9²⁴ 26. With such predictions on its lips OT prophecy closes, awaiting the time when, in Malachi's words, the Lord, whom men sought, would come suddenly to His Temple (3¹).

ii. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The period between the OT and the NT affords little for our purpose. It is certain that, in the time of our Lord, even if, as some think, there were partial exceptions, the great mass of the Jewish people had no idea of a suffering Messiah, or thought of any connexion between the Messiah and the sacrifices. If atonement was needed, it was to be sought for, apart from the sacrifices, in almsgiving and other good deeds; and the virtues of the righteous were regarded as in some degree availing for the wicked. It was a new departure when Jesus taught that 'the Christ should suffer' (cf. Mk 9¹², Lk 24⁴⁶). Yet in His own suffering and death He claimed to be fulfilling the Law and the Prophets (Lk 22³⁷ 24⁴⁶).

1. Life and Teaching of Jesus.—The main task of Jesus on earth was to reveal the Father, to disclose the true nature of the Kingdom of God and its righteousness, in opposition to false ideals, to lead men to the recognition of His Messiahship, to recover the lost, to attach a few faithful souls to Himself as the foundation of His new Kingdom, and prepare their minds for His death and resurrection, and for the after duty of spreading His gospel among mankind. The dependence of the Messianic salvation on His Person and activity is everywhere presupposed; but it was only in fragmentary and partial utterances that He was able for a time to speak of its connexion with His death. Alike in the Synoptics and in John we see how this dénouement is gradually led up to. At His birth it is declared of

Him that 'he shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1²¹); He is the promised 'Saviour' of the house of David (Lk 1³¹⁻³³ 2⁴¹); the Baptist announced Him, with probable reference to Is 53, as 'the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹, cf. v. 36). From the hour of His definite acceptance of His vocation of Messiahship in His baptism, and at the Temptation, combined as this was with the clear consciousness of a break with the ideals of His nation, Jesus could not but have been aware that His mission would cost Him His life. He who recalled the fate of all past prophets, and sent forth His disciples with predictions of persecutions and death (Mt 10), could be under no delusions as to His own fate at the hands of scribes and Pharisees (cf. Mt. 9¹³). But it was not simply as a 'fate' that Jesus recognized the inevitableness of His death; there is abundant attestation that He saw in it a Divine ordination, the necessary fulfilment of prophecy, and an essential means to the salvation of the world. As early as the Judean ministry, accordingly, we find Him speaking to Nicodemus of the Son of Man being lifted up, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish (Jn 3¹⁴). He sets Himself forth in the discourse at Capernaum as the Bread of Life, in terms which imply the surrender of His body to death for the life of the world (Jn 6³²). Later, He repeatedly speaks of the voluntary surrender of His life for His sheep (Jn 10¹¹⁻¹⁶, 17, 18 etc.). After Peter's great confession, He makes full announcement of His approaching sufferings and death, always coupling this with His after resurrection (Mt 16²¹ 17²² 23 20¹⁸ 19 ||). He dwells on the necessity of His death for the fulfilment of the Divine purpose, and is straitened till it is accomplished (Mk 10³², Lk 9⁵¹ 12⁵⁰). It was the subject of converse at the Transfiguration (Lk 9³¹). Yet clearer intimations were given. There is first the well-known announcement to the disciples, called forth by their disputes about pre-eminence: 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20²⁸ ||). Here Christ announces that His death was the purpose of His coming, and, further, that it was of the nature of a saving ransom. His life was given to redeem the lives of others. To the same effect are the solemn words at the Last Supper. Here Christ declares that His body, symbolized by the broken bread, and His blood, symbolized by the poured-out wine, are given for His disciples for the remission of sins and the making of a New Covenant, and they are invited to eat and drink of the spiritual food thus provided (Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁸ ||, 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵). It is reasonable to infer from these utterances that Jesus attached a supreme importance and saving efficacy to His death, and that His death was a deliberate and voluntary surrender of Himself for the end of the salvation of the world.

If we inquire, next, as to the nature of this connexion of Christ's death with human salvation, we can scarcely err if we assume Jesus to have understood it in the light of the great prophecy which we know to have been often in His thoughts (Is 53). Already at the commencement of His Galilean ministry He publicly identified Himself with the Servant of Jehovah (Lk 4¹⁶); the words of Is 53¹ were present to His mind as the last hour drew near (Lk 22³⁷). What prophecy of all He studied could be more instructive to Him as to the meaning of His sufferings and death? This yields the key to His utterances quoted above, and confirms the view we have taken of their meaning. Then came the crisis-hour itself. All the Evangelists dwell minutely on the scenes of the betrayal, Gethsemane, the trial, the mocking and scourging, the crucifixion. But how mysterious are many of the elements in these sufferings (e.g. Mk 14³² 15³⁴, Jn 12²⁷); how strange to see them submitted to by the Prince of Life; how awful the horror of great darkness in which the Christ passed away! Can we explain it on the hypothesis of a simple martyrdom? Do we not need the solution which the other passages suggest of a sin-bearing Redeemer? Finally, there is the crowning attestation to His Messiahship, and seal upon His work, in the Resurrection, and the commission given to the disciples to preach remission of sins in His name to all nations—a clear proof that through His death and resurrection a fundamental change had been wrought in the relations of God to humanity (Mt 28¹⁸⁻²⁰, Lk 24⁴⁷, Jn 20²¹⁻²²).

2. The Apostolic teaching.—The OT had spoken; the Son of Man had come and yielded up His life a ransom for many. He was now exalted, and had shed forth the Holy Spirit (Ac 2³²⁻³³). There remained the task of putting these things together, and of definitely interpreting the work Christ had accomplished, in the light of the prophecies and symbols of the Old Covenant. This was the task of the Apostles, guided by the same Spirit that had inspired the prophets; and from it arose the Apostolic doctrine of the atonement. Varied in standpoints and in modes of representation, the Apostolic writings are singularly consistent in their testimony to the central fact of the propitiatory and redeeming efficacy of Christ's death. St. Paul states it as the common doctrine of the Church 'how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried; and that he hath been raised on the third day, according to the Scriptures' (1 Co 15³⁻⁴). St. Peter, St. Paul, St. John, the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Book of Revelation, are at one here. The class of expressions in which this idea is set forth is familiar: Christ 'bore our sins,' 'died for our sins,' 'suffered for sins, the righteous for the unrighteous,' 'was made sin for us,' 'was the propitiation for our sins,' 'was a sin-offering,' 'reconciled us to God in the body of his flesh through death,' was our 'ransom,' procured for us 'forgiveness of sins through his blood,' etc. (cf. 1 P 1¹² 1¹⁸, 19 2²¹, 24 3¹⁸, Ro 3²⁴, 25 5⁸⁻¹¹ 8³⁴, 2 Co 5²¹, Gal 1⁴ 3¹³ 4⁴, Eph 1⁷ 2¹³⁻¹⁷, 20 5², Col 1¹⁴, 20-22, 1 Ti 2⁵, Tit 2¹⁴, He 1³ 2¹⁷ 7²⁶, 27 9²⁴⁻²⁵ 10¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 1 Jn 1⁷ 2² 3⁵ 4¹⁰, Rev 1⁵ 5⁹ etc.). It is customary to speak of the sacrificial terms employed as 'figures' borrowed from the older dispensation. The NT point of view rather is that the sacrifices of the Old Covenant are the figures, and Christ's perfect offering of Himself to God, once for all, for man's redemption, is the reality of which the earlier sacrifices were the shadows and types (He 10¹⁵).

Several things stand out clearly in the Apostolic doctrine of the atonement; each of them in harmony with what we have learned from our study of the subject in the OT. The presuppositions are the same—the holiness, righteousness, and grace of God, and the sin and guilt of man, entailing on the individual and the race a Divine condemnation and exposure to wrath which man is unable of himself to remove (wrought out most fully by St. Paul, Ro 1¹⁷ 3⁹⁻¹², Gal 2¹⁸ etc.). The atonement itself is represented (1) as the fruit, and not the cause of God's love (Ro 5⁸, 1 Jn 4¹⁰ etc.); (2) as a necessity for human salvation (Ro 3¹⁹⁻²⁰, He 9²²); (3) as realizing perfectly what the ancient sacrifices did imperfectly and typically (He 9. 10); as an expiation, purging from guilt and cancelling condemnation (Ro 8¹ 3²⁵, He 1³ 9¹¹⁻¹⁴, 1 Jn 1⁷, Rev 1⁵ etc.), and at the same time a 'propitiation,' averting wrath, and opening the way for a display of mercy (Ro 3²⁵, He 2¹⁷, 1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰); (4) as containing in itself the most powerful ethical motive—to repentance, a new life, active godliness, Christian service, etc. (Ro 6¹⁵, 1 Co 6¹⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁴⁻¹⁵, Gal 2¹⁰ 6¹⁴, Eph 5¹, 2, 1 P 1²¹, 2, 1 Jn 4¹¹ etc.; with this is connected the work of the Holy Spirit, which operates these sanctifying changes in the soul); (5) as, therefore, effecting a true 'redemption,' both in respect of the magnitude of the price at which our salvation is bought (Ro 8³², 1 Ti 2⁶, He 10²⁹, 1 P 1¹⁸, 19 etc.), and the completeness of the deliverance accomplished—from wrath (Ro 5⁹, 1 Th 1¹⁰), from the power of indwelling sin (Ro 6⁸, 13-14 8² etc.), from bondage to Satan (Eph 2², 3 6¹², He 2¹⁴, 18 etc.), from the tyranny of the evil world (Gal 1⁴, 6⁴, Tit 2¹⁴, 1 P 1¹⁸ etc.), finally, from the effects of sin in death and all other evils (Ro 8²¹, 1 Co 15²⁶ etc.).

In the NT teaching, therefore, the sacrifice of Christ fulfils all that was prefigurative in the OT doctrine of atonement; yet, as the true and perfect sacrifice, it infinitely transcends, while it supersedes, all OT prefigurations. The relation of the Christian atonement to that of the Law is, accordingly, as much one of contrast as of fulfilment. This is the thesis wrought out in the Epistle to the Hebrews, but its truth is recognized in all parts of the NT. The sacrifices of the OT were, in their very nature, incapable of really removing sin (He 10⁴). Their imperfection was shown in the irrational character of the victims, in their frequent repetition, in their multiplication, etc. (He 9¹⁰). In Jesus, however, every character meets, qualifying Him to make atonement for humanity—Himself at once perfect priest and perfect sacrifice: Divine dignity as Son of God (Ro 1⁴ 8², He 1², 3 etc.); a perfect participation in human nature (Ro 1³ 8², Gal 4⁴, He 2¹⁴⁻¹⁸ etc.); absolute sinlessness (2 Co 5²¹, He 4¹⁵, 1 P 1¹⁹ 2²², 1 Jn 3⁸ etc.); entire human sympathy (Ro 8²⁴, He 2¹⁷ 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶); as regards God, undeviating obedience and surrender to the will of the Father (Ph 2⁷, 8, He 4⁸, 9 10⁵⁻¹⁰). He is 'Jesus Christ the righteous' (1 Jn 2¹), and His sacrificial death is the culmination of His obedience (Ro 5¹⁹, Ph 2⁸, He 10⁹, 10).

III. RATIONALE OF THE ATONEMENT.—The way is now open to our last question—How was atonement for sin by Christ possible? And in what did Christ's atonement consist? The NT does not develop a theology of the atonement; yet a theology would not be possible if the NT did not yield the principles, and lay down the lines, of at least a partial solution of this problem.

A chief clue to an answer to the above questions lies in what is taught (1) of Christ's original, essential relation to the creation (cf. Jn 1², 4, 1 Co 8⁶, Eph 1¹⁰, Col 1¹⁵⁻²⁰, He 1³, Rev 1¹¹ 3¹⁴); and (2), as arising out of that, of His archetypal, representative relation to the race He came to save (cf. Jn 1¹⁴, 8-14, Ro 5¹², 1 Co 15²¹⁻²², 45-47). This connects itself with what is said of Christ's Divine dignity. Deeper even than the value His Divine Sonship gives to His sacrifice is the original relation to humanity of the Creative Word which renders His unique representative relation to the race possible. It is not going beyond the representations of the NT to say, with Maurice and others, that He is the 'root of humanity.' In Him it is grounded; by Him it is sustained; from Him it derives all the powers of its development. While He condescends to take on Him the nature of created humanity, His personality is above humanity. Hence His generic relation to the race—'Son of God'—'Son of Man.' In this 'mystery of godliness' (1 Ti 3¹⁶) lies the possibility of a representative atonement for the race.

For this is the next point in the solution of our problem; Christ's identification of Himself with the race He came to save is complete. It is not merely 'federal' or 'legal'; it is vital, and this in every respect. His love is unbounded; His sympathy is complete; His purpose and desire to save are unflinching. He identifies Himself with humanity, with a perfect consciousness (1) of what He is; (2) of what the race He came to save is and needs; (3) of what a perfect atonement involves (cf. Jn 8⁴⁶). Himself holy, the well-beloved Son, He knows with unerring clearness what sin is, and what the mind of God is about sin. He does not shrink from anything His identification with a sinful race entails upon Him, but freely accepts its position and responsibilities as His own. He is 'made under the law' (Gal 4⁴); a law not merely preceptive, but broken and violated, and entailing 'curse.' Identifying Himself thus perfectly with the race of men as under sin on the one hand, and with the mind of God about sin on the other, He is the natural mediator between God and man, and is alone in the position to render to God whatever is necessary as atonement for sin.

But what is necessary, and how did Christ render it? Here come in the 'theories' of atonement; most of them 'broken lights'; all needed to do full justice to the Divine reality. We would dismiss as infra-Scriptural all theories which affirm that atonement—reparation to the violated law of righteousness—is not necessary. Christ's work, while bringing forgiveness, conserves holiness, magnifies law, vindicates righteousness (Ro 3²¹⁻³¹). Also defective are theories which seek the sole explanation of atonement in the ethical motive; purely moral theories. Atonement is taken here in the sense only of 'reconciliation'—the reconciliation of man to God. Scripture recognizes obstacles to salvation on the side of righteousness in God as well as in man's unwillingness, and atonement aims at the removal of both. It has the aspect of propitiation, of expiation, of restitutio in integrum, as well as of moral influence. It is an act of reconciliation, embracing God's relation to the world equally with the world's relation to God (cf. Ro 3²⁵ 5¹⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹).

There remain two views, one finding the essence of Christ's atonement in the surrender of a holy will to God—in the obedience of Christ unto death, even the death of the Cross (Maurice and others). This assuredly is a vital element in atonement, but is it the whole? Does Scripture not recognize also the submission of Christ to the endurance of the actual penal evil of sin—specially to death—as that rests in the judgment of God upon our race? All that has preceded necessitates the answer that it does. The other,—the legal or forensic view,—accordingly, puts the essence of atonement in this penal endurance; in the substitutionary submission of Christ to the penalty due to us for sin. But this also is one-sided and unethical, if divorced from the other, and from the recognition of the fact that not simply endurance of evil, but the spirit in which the evil is endured, and the response made to the Divine mind in it, is the one acceptable thing to God (cf. J. M'Leod Campbell). It is here, therefore, that we must seek the inmost secret of atonement. The innocent suffering with and for the guilty is a law from which Jesus did not withdraw Himself. In His consciousness of solidarity with mankind, He freely submitted to those evils (shame, ignominy, suffering, temptation, death) which express the judgment of God on the sin of the world, and in the experience of them—peculiarly in the yielding up of His life—did such honour to all the principles of righteousness involved, rendered so inward and spiritual a response to the whole mind of God in His attitude to the sin of the world, as constituted a perfect atonement for that sin for such as believably accept it, and make its spirit their own. 'By the which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all' (He 10¹⁰). See PROPITIATION, RECONCILIATION, REDEMPTION.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF.—The Day of Atonement, with its unique and impressive ritual, is the culmination and crown of the sacrificial worship of the OT. The principal details are given in Lv 16, supplemented by 23²⁸⁻³², Nu 29⁷⁻¹¹, Ex 30¹⁰, all from the Priests' Code, though not all, as we shall see, from the oldest strata of the priestly legislation. The date was the 10th day of the seventh month (Tishri) reckoning from evening to evening (Lv 16²⁹ 23³²). Not only was this day a 'sabbath of solemn rest,' on which no work of any sort was to be done, but its unique place among the religious festivals of the OT was emphasized by the strict observance of a fast. The rites peculiar to 'the Day' (Yōmā), as it is termed in later literature, may be conveniently grouped in five stages.

(a) In the preparatory stage (Lv 16¹⁻¹⁰), after the special morning sacrifices had been offered (Nu 29 7-11), the high priest selected the appointed sin- and burnt-offerings for himself and 'his house,' i.e. the priestly caste, then laid aside his usual ornate vestments, bathed, and robed in a simple white linen tunic and girdle. He next selected two he-goats and a ram for the people's offerings, and proceeded to 'cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for J', and the other lot for Azazel' (AV 'scapegoat,' see AZAZEL). These preparations completed, the proper expiatory rites were begun, and were accomplished in three successive stages.

(b) In the first stage (vv. 11-14) the high priest made atonement for himself and the priesthood. After slaying the bullock of the sin-offering, he took a censer filled with live charcoal from the altar of burnt-offering and a handful of incense, and entered the Most Holy Place. Here he cast the incense on the coals, producing a cloud of smoke, by which the dwelling-place of the Most High between the Cherubim was hidden from mortal gaze (see Ex 33²⁰). This done, he returned to the court, to enter immediately, for the second time, the inner sanctuary, carrying a basin with the blood of the bullock, which he sprinkled on the front of the mercy-seat once, and seven times on the ground before the ark.

(c) In the second stage (vv. 15-19) atonement was made in succession for the Most Holy Place, the Holy Place, and the outer court. The goat on which the lot 'for J' had fallen was slain by the high priest, who then entered the Most Holy Place for the third time with its blood, which he manipulated as before. On his return through the Holy Place a similar ceremony was performed (v. 23, cf. Ex 30¹⁰), after which he proceeded, as directed in vv. 18f., to 'cleanse and hallow' the altar of burnt-offering, which stood in the outer court.

(d) These all led up to the culminating rite in the third stage (vv. 20-22). Here the high priest, placing both hands on the head of the goat allotted to Azazel, made solemn confession—the tenor of which may still be read in the Mishnic treatise Yōmā—of all the nation's sins. By this ceremony these sins were conceived as not only symbolically but actually transferred to the head of the goat (vv. 21f., see below), which was solemnly conducted to 'a solitary land' (RV), the supposed abode of the mysterious Azazel. In NT times the goat was led to a lofty precipice in the wilderness about 12 miles east of Jerusalem, over which it was thrown backwards, to be dashed in pieces on the rocks below (Yōmā, vi. 6 ff.).

(e) We now reach the concluding stage of 'the Day's' ceremonial (vv. 23-25). The fact that the essential part was now accomplished was strikingly shown by the high priest's retiring into the Holy Place to put off 'the holy garments' (vv. 23, 25), bathe, and resume his ordinary high-priestly vestments. Returning to the court, he offered the burnt-offerings for himself and the people, together with the fat of the sin-offering. The remaining verses (25-28) deal with details, the characteristic significance of which will be discussed presently.

Reasoning from the literary history of Lv 16, from the highly developed sense of sin, and from the unique prominence given to fasting, as well as on other grounds which cannot be fully set forth here, OT scholars are now practically unanimous in regarding the Day of Atonement as an institution of the post-exilic age. There is good reason for holding—although on this point there is not the same unanimity—that it originated even later than the time of Ezra, by whom the main body of the Priests' Code was introduced. The nucleus from which the rites of Lv 16 were developed was probably the simpler ceremonial laid down by Ezekiel for the purification of the sanctuary 458^{BC}. Other elements, such as the earlier provisions for the entry of the high priest into the Most Holy Place still found in the opening verses of Lv 16, and perhaps the desire to make an annual institution of the great fast of Neh 9th, contributed to the final development of the institution as it now appears in the Pentateuch. It is doubtless much older than the earliest reference in Sir 50² (c. B.C. 180). In NT it is referred to as 'the Fast' (Ac 27⁹), and so occasionally by Josephus. To this day it remains the most solemn and most largely attended religious celebration of the Jewish year.

The dominating thought of Lv 16 is the awful reality and contagion of sin, which affects not only priest and people, but the sanctuary itself. Its correlate is the intense realization of the need of cleansing and propitiation, as the indispensable condition of right relations with a holy God. The details of the ritual by which these relations were periodically renewed are of surpassing interest, as showing how the loftiest religious thought may be associated with ritual elements belonging to the most primitive stages of religion. Thus, in the case before us, the efficacy of the blood, the universal medium of purification and atonement, is enhanced by cessation from labour and complete abstinence from food—the latter the outward accompaniment of inward penitence—and by the high priest's public and representative confession of the nation's sins. Yet alongside of these we find the antique conception of holiness and uncleanness as something material, and of the fatal consequences of unguarded contact with the one or the other. It is only on this plane of thought that one understands the need of the cleansing of the sanctuary, infected by the 'uncleannesses' of the people among whom it dwelt (16¹⁸ RV, cf. Ezk 45^{18f}). The same primitive idea of the contagion of holiness underlies the prescribed change of garments on the part of the high priest. The 'holy garments' in which the essential parts of the rite were performed had to be deposited in the Holy Place; those who had been brought into contact with the sacrosanct animals (vv. 23f.) must bathe and wash their clothes, lest, as Ezekiel says in another connexion, 'they sanctify the people with their garments' (44¹⁷), i.e. lest the mysterious contagion pass to the people with disastrous results. The most striking illustration of this transmissibility, however, is seen in the central rite by which the nation's sins are transferred to the head of 'the goat for Azazel,' the demonic spirit of the wilderness (cf. the similar rite, Lv 14^{6f}).

These survivals from the earlier stages of the common Semitic religion should not blind the modern student to the profound conviction of sin to which the institution bears witness, nor to the equally profound sense of the need of pardon and reconciliation, and of uninterrupted approach to God. By its emphasis on these perennial needs of the soul the Day of Atonement played no unimportant part in the preparation of Judaism for the perfect atonement through Jesus Christ. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in a familiar passage contrasts the propitiatory work of the Jewish high priest on this day with the great propitiation of Him who, by virtue of His own atoning blood, 'entered in once for all into the holy place' (He 9¹² RV), even 'into heaven itself,' where He remains, our great High Priest and Intercessor (7^{25f}). ATROTH-BETH JOAB.—See ATAROTH, No. 4.

ATROTH-SOPHAN.—A town E. of Jordan, near Aroer and Jazer, fortified by Gad (Nu 32³⁸). Some place it with Atareth 1. at 'Aduarā. This is hardly possible. The site is unknown. W. EWING.

ATTAL.—1. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2^{36f}). 2. A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12¹¹). 3. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11²⁰).

ATTAIN.—In Ac 27¹³ 'attain' has the literal meaning of reach a place (so RV). Elsewhere it has the figurative sense still in use.

ATTALIA (modern Adalia).—A town on the coast of Pamphylia, not far from the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, founded and named by Attalus II. It was besieged in B.C. 79 by P. Serullius Isauricus, when in possession of the pirates. In the Byzantine period

It was of great importance. It has the best harbour on the coast. Paul and Barnabas came on there from Perga, and took ship for Antioch (Ac 14²⁶).

ATTUS (AV Lettus).—Son of Sechenias (1 Es 8²⁹); same as Hattush of 1 Ch 3²² and Ezr 8².

AUDIENCE.—From Lat. audientia; 'audience' means in AV the act of hearing, as Lk 20⁴⁵ 'in the audience of all the people.' Now it means the people gathered to hear.

AUGIA.—A daughter of Zorzelleus or Barzillai (1 Es 5³⁸).

AUGURY.—See MAGIC, DIVINATION and SORCERY.

AUGUSTAN BAND (RV), AUGUSTUS' BAND (AV).—See BAND.

AUGUSTUS.—This name is Latin, and was a new name conferred (16th Jan. B.C. 27) by the Roman Senate on Caius Octavius, who, after his adoption by the dictator Caius Julius Caesar, bore the names Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus. The word means 'worthy of reverence' (as a god), and was represented in Greek by Sebastos, which has the same signification, but was avoided by Lk 2¹ as impious. In official documents Augustus appears as 'Imperator Caesar Augustus.' He was born in B.C. 63, was the first Roman emperor from B.C. 23, and died in A.D. 14. He was equally eminent as soldier and administrator, and the Empire was governed for centuries very much on the lines laid down by him. In Lk 2¹ he is mentioned as having issued a decree that all inhabitants of the Roman Empire should be enrolled (for purposes of taxation). There is evidence for a 14-year cycle of enrolment in the Roman province of Egypt.

AUTEAS.—A Levite (1 Es 9⁴³); called in Neh 8⁷ Hodiah.

AUTHORITY.—The capability, liberty, and right to perform what one wills. The word implies also the physical and mental ability for accomplishing the end desired. Authority refers especially to the right one has, by virtue of his office, position, or relationship, to command obedience. The centurion was 'a man under authority,' who knew what it meant to be subject to others higher in authority than himself, and who also himself exercised authority over the soldiers placed under him (Mt 8⁹). In like manner 'Herod's jurisdiction' (Lk 23⁷) was his authority over the province which he ruled. Hence the authority of any person accords with the nature of his office or position, so that we speak of the authority of a husband, a parent, an apostle, a judge, or of any civil ruler. The magistrates who are called in Ro 13¹ 'the higher powers,' are strictly the highly exalted and honoured authorities of the State, who are to be obeyed in all that is right, and revered as the 'ministers of God for good.' God is Himself the highest authority in heaven and on earth, but He has also given unto His Son 'authority on earth to forgive sins' (Mt 9⁶) and to execute judgment (Jn 5²⁷). After His resurrection Jesus Himself declared: 'All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth' (Mt 28¹⁸; cf. Col 2¹⁰, 1 P 3²²). In the plural the word is used in Eph 2³ 10 6¹⁷, Col 1¹⁶ 2¹⁵, to denote good and evil angels, who are supposed to hold various degrees and ranks of authority. See DOMINION, POWER.

AVENGER OF BLOOD.—The practice of blood-revenge has been very widely spread among societies in a certain stage of civilization, where there has been no central authority to enforce law and order, and where the certainty of retaliation has been the only guarantee for security of life. Among the Semites the custom was in full force from the earliest times, and it is still the only spring of order in Arabia. It depends for its maintenance upon the solidarity of the clan or tribe. All the members of the tribe, whatever may be the immediate parental relationship, are counted as being of one blood; a wrong done to one is a wrong done to all, to be avenged if necessary by all the offended clan upon all the clan of the offender. The phrase used by the Arabs is, 'Our blood has been shed.'

Of the form of blood-revenge that involved the whole clan or tribe in the murder of a single individual there are still traces in the OT (Jos 7²⁴, 2 K 9²⁴). Naturally, however, the duty of avenging the shedding of blood fell primarily upon him who was nearest of kin to the slaughtered man. This next of kin was called the gō'el. The word in Hebrew law was used in a wide sense for him whose duty it was to redeem the property or the person of an impoverished or enslaved relative (Lv 25²⁵ 47–49, Ru 4¹⁸), but it came to be used specially of the man who had to perform this most tragic duty of kinship. The steady effort of Hebrew law was to limit this ancient custom so as to ensure that a blood feud should not perpetuate itself to the ruin of a whole clan, and that deliberate murder and accidental homicide should not come under the same penalty. It is possible to trace with some definiteness the progress of this sentiment by which the gō'el was gradually transformed from being the irresponsible murderer of a possibly blameless manslayer to being practically the executioner of a carefully considered sentence passed by the community. AVITH.—A Moabite city (Gn 36³³); site unknown.

AVOID.—This verb is used intransitively in 1 S 18¹¹ 'David avoided out of his presence twice.' So Coverdale translates Mt 16²³ 'Auoyde fro me, Sathan.'

A'VOUCH.—This word, now obsolete except in legal phrases, means to acknowledge.

AVVA, AVVITES (2 K 17²⁴ 31).—See IVVAH.

AVVIM.—1. The Avvim are spoken of in Dt 2²³ (cf. Jos 13¹) as primitive inhabitants of S.W. Palestine near Gaza, who were absorbed by the immigrants from Caphtor (wh. see), i.e. the Philistines. 2. A Benjamite town (Jos 18²³); site unknown. J. F. McCURDY.

AWAY WITH.—This phrase is used idiomatically with the force of a verb in 1s 1¹³ 'the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with,' i.e. tolerate. This verb is omitted (= 'get away with,' i.e. in mod. English 'get on with').

AWL.—A boring instrument, named only in connexion with the ceremony whereby a slave was bound to perpetual servitude (Ex 21⁶, Dt 15¹⁷).

AWNING.—Correctly given by RV in Ezk 27⁷ as tr. of Heb. miksek, corrected from mekassek (AV 'thaw which covered thee').

AX, AXE.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 1, 3.

AXLE, AXLE-TREES.—See WHEEL.

AYEPHIM.—RVm of 2 S 16¹⁴, where the text is uncertain.

AZAZEL.—Father of one of the commission appointed to investigate the foreign marriages (1 Es 9¹⁴); same as Asahel No 4.

AZAZELUS.—One of those who put away their foreign wives (1 Es 9³⁴).

AZALIAH.—Father of Shaphan the scribe (2 K 22³, 2 Ch 34⁸).

AZANIAH.—A Levite (Neh 10⁹).

AZARAIAS.—The father or, more probably, a more remote ancestor of Ezra (1 Es 8¹); = Seraiah of Ezr 7¹.

AZAREL.—1. A Korahite follower of David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁶). 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25¹⁸; called in v. 4 Uzziel). 3. Prince of the tribe of Dan (1 Ch 27²²). 4. A son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10⁴¹). 5. A priest (Neh 11¹³). 6. A Levite (Neh 12³⁶).

AZARIAH.—1. King of Judah; see Uzziah. 2. 2 Ch 22⁶ for Ahaziah. 3. 2 Ch 15¹⁻⁸ a prophet, son of Oded, who met Asa's victorious army at Maresah, and urged them to begin and persevere in a religious reform. 4. High priest in the reign of Solomon (1 K 4²). 5. 1 Ch 6¹⁰, Ezr 7³, father of Amariah, who was high priest under Jehoshaphat. 6. High priest in the reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26¹⁶⁻²⁰); he withstood and denounced the king when he presumptuously attempted to usurp the priests' office of burning incense upon the altar. 7. High priest in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹⁰⁻¹³). 8. 1 Ch 6¹³⁻¹⁴, Ezr 7¹ (Ezerias, 1 Es 8¹; Azarias, 2 Es 1¹), son of Hilkiah the high priest. 9. 1 K 4⁵, a son of Nathan, who 'was over the officers' (v. 7). 10. 1 Ch 2⁸, son of Ethan whose wisdom was surpassed by that of Solomon (1 K 4³¹). 11. 1 Ch 2⁸, a man of Judah who had Egyptian blood in his veins (v. 34). 12. 1 Ch 6³⁶, a Kohathite Levite (called Uzziah in 1 Ch 6²⁴). 13. 14. 2 Ch 21², Azariah and Azariahu, two of the sons of Jehoshaphat. 15. 16. 2 Ch 23¹, Azariah and Azariahu, two of the five 'captains of hundreds' who assisted Jehoiada in the restoration of Joash. 17. 2 Ch 28¹², one of those who supported the prophet Oded when he rebuked the army of Israel for purposing to enslave the captives of Judah. 18. 19. 2 Ch 29¹², two Levites, a Kohathite and a Merarite. 20. Neh 3³, one of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem. 21. Neh 7⁷ (called Seraiah, Ezr 2²; Zacharias, 1 Es 5⁸), one of the twelve leaders of Israel who returned with Zerubbabel. 22. Neh 8⁷ (Azarias, 1 Es 9¹⁸), one of those who helped the Levites to 'cause the people to understand the law.' 23. Jer 43², son of Hoshai (the Maacathite, 40⁸), also called Jezaniah (40⁸ 42¹) and Jaazaniah (2 K 25²³). He was one of the 'captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. 24. The Heb. name of Abednego (Dn 16. 7. pl. 19 21⁷).

AZARIAS.—1. 1 Es 9²¹; called Uzziah, Ezr 10²¹. 2. 1 Es 9¹³, one of those who stood beside Ezra at the reading of the Law. 3. 1 Es 9¹⁸ = Azariah of Neh 8⁷. 4. Name assumed by the angel Raphael (To 5¹² 6⁴ 13 7⁸ 9²). 5. A captain of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5¹⁸ 36 60).

AZARU.—Ancestor of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5¹⁴).

AZAZ.—A Reubenite (1 Ch 5⁸).

AZAZEL.—The name in Hebrew and RV of the desert spirit to whom one of the two goats was sent, laden with the sins of the people, in the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16⁸ 10. 26 RV, see ATONEMENT [DAY OF]). Etymology, origin, and significance are still matters of conjecture. The AV designation scapegoat (i.e. the goat that is allowed to escape, which goes back to the capr emissarius of the Vulgate) obscures the fact that the word Azazel is a proper name in the original, and in particular the name of a powerful spirit or demon supposed to inhabit the wilderness or 'solitary land' (16² RV). The most plausible explanation of this strange element in the rite is that which connects Azazel with the illicit worship of field-spirits or satyrs (lit 'he-goats') of which mention is made in several OT passages (Lv 17⁷, Is 13²¹ etc.). It may have been the intention of the authors of Lv 16 in its present form to strike at the roots of this popular belief and practice by giving Azazel, probably regarded as the prince of the satyrs, a place in the recognized ritual. Christianity itself can supply many analogies to such a proceeding. The belief that sin, disease, and the like can be removed by being transferred to living creatures, beasts or birds, is not confined to the Semitic races, and has its analogy in Hebrew ritual, in the ceremony of the cleansing of the leper (Lv 14⁵³). In the Book of Enoch (c. b.c. 180) Azazel appears as the prince of the fallen angels, the offspring of the unions described in Gn 6^{1ff}.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

AZAZIAH.—1. A Levite (1 Ch 15²¹). 2. Father of Hoshea the prince of Ephraim (1 Ch 27²⁰). 3. An overseer of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹³).

AZBUK.—Father of Nehemiah, who took part in rebuilding the walls (Neh 3⁶).

AZEKAH.—A city of Judah (Jos 10^{10f}, 1 S 17¹, 2 Ch 11⁹, Neh 11³⁰), near the Valley of Elah; inhabited by the Jews after the Captivity. Site unknown.

AZEL.—1. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8^{37f} = 9^{43f}). 2. An unidentified site in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (Zec 14²).

AZETAS.—Head of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5¹⁵).

AZGAD.—See ASTAD.

AZIEL.—An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1²); called Azariah, Ezr 7³, and Ozias, 1 Es 8².

AZIEL.—A Levite (1 Ch 15²⁰); called in v. 18 Jaaziel—the full form of the name.

AZIZA.—A Jew who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁷); called in 1 Es 9²⁸ Zardeus.

AZMAVETH.—1. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁰). 2. One of David's mighty men (2 S 23³¹, 1 Ch 11³³), probably identical with the Azmaveth of 1 Ch 12²⁷ 27²⁶, whose sons joined David at Ziklag, and who was 'over the king's treasures.' 3. A Benjamite town (1 Ch 12², Ezr 2³, Neh 7²⁸ [Beth-azmaveth], 1 Es 5¹⁸ [Bethas-moth]); mod. Higmeh, S.E. of Gibeah.

AZMON.—An unknown place on the border of Judah (Nu 34⁴, Jos. 15⁴); called in Jos 15⁵⁴ 19⁸ Ezem.

AZNOTH-TABOR.—The lower slopes of Mt Tabor, marking the S.W. corner of the portion of Naphtali (Jos 19³⁴).

AZOR.—An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1^{1st}).

AZOTUS.—See ASHUD.

AZRIEL.—1. Head of a 'father's house' in the E. half tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch 5²⁴). 2. A Naphtalite (1 Ch 27¹⁹). 3. Father of Seraiah (Jer 36²⁰).

AZRIKAM.—1. Son of Neariah (1 Ch 3²³). 2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8³⁸ 9⁴⁴). 3. A Levite (1 Ch 9¹⁴, Neh 11¹⁵). 4. The 'ruler of the house' under Ahaz (2 Ch 28⁷).

AZUBAH.—1. Wife of Caleb (1 Ch 2^{1st}). 2. Mother of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22⁴² = 2 Ch 20³¹).

AZZAN.—Father of Paltiel (Nu 34²⁰).

AZZUR.—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹⁷). 2. Father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer 28¹). 3. Father of Jaazaniah, one of the princes of the people (Ezk 11¹).

B

BAAL (BAALI, BAALIM).—Used generally, the word ba'al means 'possessor,' 'inhabitant,' 'controller.' Thus, a married man is called 'possessor of a woman' (2 S 13²⁵), a ram, 'possessor of horns,' and even the citizens of a locality are denoted by this word (Jg 9² 20⁴, 1 S 23¹¹, 2 S 21¹²). With a similar meaning, it is applied to numerous Canaanitish local deities (pl. ba'alim, Jg 2¹¹ 3⁷ 8³³ 10¹⁰, 1 S 7¹ 12¹⁹, 1 K 18¹⁸; coll. sing. ba'al, Jg 2¹³, Jer 1¹³ etc.; cf. Baal-gad, Baalath-beer, and other compounds of this word). These gods were supposed to manifest themselves in the fertility, or in some startling natural formation, of the locality where they were worshipped. Such an animistic conception is evident from the fact that they were worshipped in high places and in groves, where such rites as prophecy (Jer 22¹³), 'ornication' (Jer 7³), self-mutilation (1 K 18²⁸), and child-sacrifice (Jer 19⁴) were practised under the guidance of kemārim or idolatrous priests (Zeph 1⁴). The same idea is also clear from the use of this word among the Arabs, who designate land irrigated by subterranean springs as 'Ba'l land,' i.e. land inhabited by a spirit. Gradually, however, some of these gods assimilated more abstract powers (cf. Baal-berith), and as their votaries extended their powers over a greater area, became the Baal par excellence, i.e. the controller of the destiny of his worshippers (cf. Jg 6³⁴, 1 K 16³¹ 18²⁶ 19¹⁸ [in the last three passages, Melkart of Tyre]).

So great a predilection for cults of such a nature was shown by the Israelites, from the time of their entrance into Canaan until the fall of the monarchy, that Jahweh was given this title. Thus Saul, a zealous worshipper of Jahweh, names (1 Ch 8³³) one of his sons Eshbaal, and one of David's heroes is called (1 Ch 12⁸) Bealiah ('J' is Baal'); cf. also Meribbaal (1 Ch 9⁴⁰), Beeliada (1 Ch 14⁷), Jerubbaal (Jg 8³⁰). A confusion, however, of Jahweh and the Canaanitish deities seems to have taken place, to avoid which, Hosea (2¹⁶, 17) demands that Jahweh be no longer called Ba'ali ('my Baal'), but 'Ishi' ('my husband'). Under the influence of such prophecies the Israelites abandoned the use of Baal for Jahweh, and in later times developed so great an antipathy to this word that later revisers substituted dōsheth ('shameful thing'), not only wherever Ba'al occurred for the Canaanitish deities (Hos 9¹⁸, Jer 3²⁴ 11¹³), but also, forgetful of its former application to Jahweh, in some of the above names (see ИИШОШЕТИ), supposing them to allude to local gods. N. KOENIG.

BAAL.—1. A Reubenite (1 Ch 5⁶). 2. A Gibeonite, granduncle of Saul (1 Ch 8²⁶ = 9²⁶).

BAAL, BAALAH, BAALATH.—1. = Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 13⁶, Jos 15⁹, 10). 2. Baalath-beer (Jos 19⁴, 1 Ch 4³² [Baal]), a site in the Negeb. 3. A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 15²⁹ 19³, 1 Ch 4³⁹). 4. Mount Baalah, between Ekron and Jabneel (Jos 15¹¹), possibly, as M. Clermont-Ganneau has suggested, the river (not mountain) of Baal (now Nahr Rubin). 5. An unknown town of Dan (Jos 19⁴⁴). 6. An unknown town (1 K 9¹⁸ = 2 Ch 8⁶). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BAAL-BERITH ('lord of the covenant').—The god of Shechem, where he had a temple (Jg 8³² 9⁴); called also El-berith (9⁴). The 'covenant' may be that amongst the Canaanite peoples or that between Canaanites and Israelites; or the title may be parallel to Zeus Horkios, the god who presides over covenants.

BAAL-GAD (? 'Baal of fortune').—A place under Hermon, in the valley of Lebanon, referred to only as the northern limit of the country conquered by Joshua (Jos 11¹⁷ 12⁷ 13⁶). Various identifications have been suggested, all uncertain. Perhaps Bania; is the most probable. See CÉSAREA PHILIPPI.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BAAL-HAMON.—The unknown site of Solomon's vineyard (Ca 8¹¹).

BAAL-HANAN.—1. A king of Edom (Gn 36³⁶, 1 Ch 1⁴⁶). 2. A Gederite (1 Ch 27²⁸).

BAAL-HAZOR.—Beside Ephraim, where were Absalom's sheep-shearers (2 S 13²⁸). Identified by Conder with Tell 'Asur, a mountain 4960 ft. above the sea, an hour's ride N.E. of Beitin.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BAAL-HERMON (Jg 3⁴, 1 Ch 5²⁸).—See HERMON.

BAALE-JUDAH = BAALAH, No. 1, i.e. Kiriath-jearim.

BAALIS.—King of Ammon in time of Gedaliah (Jer 40¹⁴).

BAAL-MEON.—A city of Moab assigned to Reuben. The name occurs in Nu 32²⁸ as Baal-meon, but in Jos 13¹⁷ as Beth-baal-meon; both forms being found also on the Moabite Stone; cf. Ezk 25⁸, 1 Ch 5⁸; also Beth-meon of Jer 48²². It is to be identified with the modern Ma'in, about 5 miles S.W. of Medeba. G. L. ROBINSON.

BAAL-PEOR.—The local deity of Mt. Peor (Dt 4¹⁶, Nu 25²). In Dt 4¹⁶ and Hos 9¹⁰ it is perhaps the name of a place.

BAAL-PERAZIM.—An unidentified site near Jerusalem (2 S 5²⁰, 1 Ch 14¹¹).

BAALSAMUS (1 Es 9⁴⁸) = Maaseiah of Neh 8⁷.

BAAL-SHALISHAH (2 K 4⁴²).—An unknown site, probably somewhere in Mt. Ephraim.

BAAL-TAMAR.—An unknown site near Bethel and Gibeah (Jg 4⁵).

BAALZEBUB (BEELZEBUB).—A Philistine god worshipped at Ekron (2 K 1² 3⁶, 16), whose name in the form of Beelzebub (AV and RV Beelzebub) has been applied to the 'prince of the devils' (Mt 10²⁸ 12²⁴, Mk 3²², Lk 11¹⁸, 18¹²). The OT form, 'Baal (controller, inhabitant) of flies,' indicates either that the god was thought to appear as a fly, or that, besides oracular powers, he possessed the ability to increase or destroy these insects. On the other hand, if the NT spelling, 'Baal of the mansion (temple),' is to be preferred, it would seem to indicate that the OT form is a deliberate perversion originating with some pious scribe, who was perhaps offended at such a title being given to any other than Jahweh. Such an interpretation would account for the variation in spelling, and for its application to Satan, whose realm was called 'the house' par excellence among the Jews of the NT period.

N. KOENIG.

BAAL-ZEPHON.—Ex 14², Nu 33⁷; the name of a place near the spot where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, apparently a shrine of 'Baal of the north.' The corresponding goddess 'Baalt of the north' is named along with the god of Kesem (Goshen), in an Eryp. papyrus of the New Kingdom, as worshipped at Memphis. F. L. L. GRIFFITH.

BAANA.—1. 2. Two of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4¹², 16). 3. Father of Zadok, one of those who rebuilt Jerusalem (Neh 3⁴). 4. One of the leaders who returned with Zerubbabel; possibly identical with the preceding, and with BAANAH No. 3.

BAANAH.—1. One of the murderers of Ishbosheth (2 S 4⁸⁻¹²). 2. A Netophathite (2 S 23²⁹, 1 Ch 11²⁰). 3. One of those who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2² Neh 7⁷ 10²⁷ [?]).

BAANI.—1 Es 9²⁴ = Bani of Ezr 10²⁴.

BAARA.—Wife of a Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁹).

BAASEIAH.—A Kohathite (1 Ch 6⁴⁰; prob. an error for Maaseiah).

BAASHA, king of Israel, obtained the crown by usurpation. He was an officer of the army under Nadab, son of Jeroboam I., and while the army was besieging Gibbethon, a Philistine town, he slew his king and mounted the throne. The execution of the whole house of Jeroboam followed. Baasha was a warlike ruler, and carried on war with Judah throughout his reign. The only incident preserved to us is his capture and fortification of Ramah, which led to the interference of Benhadad, as already recounted in the article Asa. Although Baasha died in his bed after a reign of twenty-four years, his dynasty was extinguished two years after his death (1 K 15^{27-16⁴}).

H. P. SMITH.

BABBLER.—Ac 17⁸. 'What will (RV 'would') this babbler say?' The Gr. word translated 'babblers' means one who picks up a precarious living, like a crow. 'The language of such persons,' says Bp. Chase, 'was, and is, plentiful and (on occasion) low'; but it is possible that the Athenians applied the word to St. Paul not on account of his speech, but his looks. In that case the modern coinage 'carpet-bagger' would give the sense.

BABE.—See CHILD.

BABEL, TOWER OF.—See TOWER OF BABEL.

BABI.—Head of a family which returned with Ezra (1 Es 8³⁷); called in Ezr 8¹¹ Bebai.

BABYLON.—Babel is the Hebrew form of the native name Bāb-ilī, 'Gate of God.' It was also Tin-tir or 'Seat of life,' and E or E-ki. It is likely that these names once denoted separate towns gradually incorporated. Other quarters of Babylon were Shu-anna, Tē, Shuppatu, and Litamu. According to the Heb. tradition (Gn 10¹⁰), it was as old as Erech, Akkad, and Calneh. Native tradition makes it as old as Erech and Nippur, the latter being proved by excavations to date back to prehistoric times. Babylon is from Bāb-ilāni. It lay on the E. bank of the Euphrates, part of its site being now occupied by Hillah, about 50 miles S. of Baghdad. The ruins extend for 5 miles N. to S. Bābil, the N. ruin, covers 120,000 sq. ft. and is still 90 ft. high. It covers the remains of the celebrated Esagila temple. The Mujellibeh is not much less in area, and 28 ft. high.

The Kasr contains the ruins of Nebuchadrezzar's palace, along whose E. side ran the sacred procession street, decorated with enamelled tiles representing the dragon and the re'ēm, to the Istar-gate at the S.E. corner. The whole was enclosed within an irregular triangle, formed by two lines of ramparts and the river, an area of about 8 sq. miles. The city crossed the river to the W., where are remains of a palace of Neriglissar. In later times it became coterminous with many other large cities, and Herodotus ascribes to it a circuit of 55 miles. The German excavations now being carried on may be expected to solve the many problems connected with the site.

From the very earliest times the kings and rulers of Babylonia worked at the building of its temples, palaces, walls, bridges, quays, etc. Hammurabi first raised it to be the capital of all Babylonia. It was sacked by Sennacherib in B.C. 689, the chief palaces, temples, and city walls levelled with the ground, and the waters of the Euphrates turned over it. Esarhaddon began to rebuild it, and it stood another long siege under his son, Ashurbanipal. Nabopolassar began its restoration; Nebuchadrezzar raised it to its height of glory. Cyrus took it without resistance, and held his court there. Darius Hystaspis besieged, took it, and destroyed its walls. Xerxes plundered it. Alexander the Great planned to restore it. Antiochus Soter actually began the restoration of its great temple. The foundation of Seleucia robbed it of its population, but the temple services continued to B.C. 29, at least. See, further ASSYRIA and BABYLONIA. C. H. W. JOHNS.

BABYLON (in NT).—Babylon was apparently used by the early Church as a symbol for Rome. 1. In Rev. (14⁸ 16¹⁹ 17⁸ 18² 10. 1) its destruction is foretold, because of its sins, and particularly because of its persecution. Such identification is, however, somewhat uncertain, and rests ultimately on the improbability that the word in the connexion in which it appears can refer to the city of Mesopotamia (the word is so used in Mt 1¹⁴ 12¹⁷, Ac 7²). This basal probability is supported by the fact that Babylon is called 'mystery' in Rev 17⁵, is said to be seated on seven mountains (v. 9), and to be a centre of commerce and authority (18³⁻¹⁹ 17. 14⁸). Rome is apparently called Babylon in Sib. Or. v. 143, 158; 2 Es.; Apoc. Baruch.

This identification of Babylon in Revelation with Rome dates at least from the time of Jerome. The attempt to identify it with an apostate Judah and Jerusalem can hardly be taken seriously. The fact that Revelation utilized the Jewish apocalyptic material further makes it imperative that the term symbolize a power which stood related both to Christians and Jews, in a way parallel with the relation of Babylon to the ancient Hebrew nation.

2. The reference to Babylon in 1 P 5¹³ has had three interpretations: (a) Babylon in Egypt, mentioned by Strabo and Epiphanius; (b) Babylon on the Euphrates; and (c) Rome. In view of the symbolic use of the word 'Babylon,' as mentioned in the foregoing, the last seems the most probable. Eusebius (HE II. 15) so interprets the reference, and, in view of the ancient and persistent tradition, there is nothing improbable in St. Peter's having been in Rome. This probability is strengthened by the reference to the persecution to which Christians were being subjected. Assyrian Babylon in the second half of the 1st cent. was in decay, and 1 Peter would be particularly appropriate if sent out from the seat of a persecution, such as that of Nero, or possibly of Domitian. SHAILER MATHEWS.

BABYLONISH GARMENT ('addereth Shin'ār).—Stolen by Achan (Jos 7²¹); literally 'mantle of Shinar': probably a cloak of embroidered stuff. Babylonia was famous in classical times for such costly garments, and the sculptures exhibit the most elaborately embroidered dresses. The Babylonian inscriptions enumerate an almost endless variety of such garments, worked in many colours. C. H. W. JOHNS.

BACA, VALLEY OF.—An allegorical place-name, found only in Ps 84⁶, where the RV renders 'Valley of Weeping.' Most probably it is no more an actual locality than is the 'Valley of the Shadow of Death' in Ps 23⁴. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BACCHIDES.—Governor of Mesopotamia under Demetrius Soter; sent to establish Alcimus (wh. see) in the priesthood; defeated Jonathan the Maccabee, and at a later period besieged him in the fortress of Bethbasi; was finally compelled to entertain proposals for peace (1 Mac 7²⁰⁻²⁹ 91-102; Jos. Ant. XII. x.-XIII. i.).

BACCHURUS.—A singer who put away his foreign wife (1 Es 9²⁴).

BACCHUS.—See DIONYSUS.

BACENOR.—An officer of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12²⁸).

BADGER.—Rock badger (Lv 11⁸ RVm), i.e. Hyrax Syriacus. See CONY.

BADGERS' SKINS.—Mentioned (in AV) as the upper covering of the Tabernacle, etc. (Ex 25⁵ 26¹⁴ etc.), and materials for making sandals (Ezk 16¹⁰). It is almost certain the word tahash is mistranslated 'badger,' as badgers, though found in Southern Palestine, are not common enough, nor are their skins suitable for such use to have been made of them. The RV sealskins (mg. porpoise-skins) hardly eases the difficulty zoologically, although having some support from etymology. De litzsch, from the similarity of tahash to the Assy. tahshan = 'wether,' thinks it probable that the word means the same in Hebrew. A recent suggestion that the Heb. word tahash is taken from the Egypt. th, meaning 'leather,' seems the most reasonable explanation.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BĒAN.—The name of an unknown tribe destroyed by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5⁴).

BAG, PURSE, WALLET.—Several kinds of bags, etc. may be distinguished. (a) The shepherd's and traveller's wallet for carrying one or more days' provisions. Like most of the other OT bags, it was made of skin, generally undressed, and was slung across the shoulder. This is the scrip of Mt 10¹⁰ and parallels (RV 'wallet'). The former is retained by our RV (but Amer. RV 'wallet') to render a unique word, which had to be explained even to Hebrew readers by the gloss 'the shepherd's bag' (1 S 17⁴⁰). (b) A more finished article, the leather satchel which served as a purse (Lk 10⁴, 12³³ AV here bag). For illust. see Rich., Dict. of Antiq. 217. The purse of Mt 10⁹, Mk 6⁸, however, was merely the folds of the girdle (see RVm). (c) The merchant's bag, in which he kept his stone weights (Dt 25¹³), also served as a purse (Pr 1⁴). (d) The favourite bag for money and valuables—hence the beautiful figure 1 S 25²⁹, where 'the bundle of life'=life's jewel-case—was one which could be tied with a string (2 K 12¹⁰, Pr 7²⁰, also Gn 42²⁶ EV 'bundle'). If required, a seal could be put on the knot (Job 14¹⁷). (e) Another word is used both for a large bag, capable of holding a talent of silver (2 K 5²³), and for the dainty lady's satchel (Is 3²² RV; AV crisp- ing pins). (f) The 'bag' which Judas carried (Jn. 12³²) was rather a small box (RVm), originally used for holding the mouthpieces of wind-instruments.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BAGO.—The head of a family which returned with Ezra (1 Es 8⁴⁰); called in 1 Es 5¹⁴ Bagoi, and in Ezr 2¹⁴ Bigvai.

BAGOAS.—A eunuch in the service of Holofernes (Jth 12¹¹, 13, 15 13¹⁴ 14⁴).

BAGOI.—See BAGO.

BAGPIPE.—See MUSIC.

BAHARUMITE.—See BAHURIM.

BAHURIM.—The place where Paltiel, son of Laish, was ordered to relinquish Michal (2 S 3¹⁶); where Shimei dwelt, who cursed David in his flight (2 S 16⁹); where Ahimaaz and Jonathan hid in the well from Absalom (2 S 17¹⁸ 19); and the home of Azmaveth, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11³³, 2 S 23³¹, where Barhumite is written for Baharumite). It was in the tribe of Benjamin (cf. the passages relating to Shimei), and the account of David's flight, which supplies the only topographical indications, accords with the traditional identification with Almit, N.E. from the Mount of Olives, and about a mile beyond 'Anata (Anathoth) from Jerusalem.

BALAAM is the subject of a remarkable and intricate narrative in Nu 22-24, connected with the arrival of Israel in the Promised Land, and the relationship of the chosen people to Moab and Ammon. Balaam was a soothsayer of Pethor on the Euphrates, called by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites, who were lying encamped in the Jordan valley. He had difficulty in undertaking the task, and he found, whenever he essayed to curse Israel, that the Lord had forbidden him to do so, and that his burden must be blessing instead. At the request of Balak he changed his position again and again on the heights above the Dead Sea, in the hope of obtaining a different oracle, but the message he had to deliver remained the same, and he foretold the future splendour of Israel (24²⁸). Sent away by Balak without the reward promised to him if he would deliver an oracle adverse to Israel, he returned to his own land. According to one narrative, his end was full of shame. He was accused of having induced Israel to commit immorality in connexion with religious worship, a feature common in the Semitic nature-cults. It was through this charge that he became known to subsequent ages, and his name became a name of infamy (Nu 31¹⁸ 19, 2 P 2¹⁵, Rev 2¹⁴; Jos. Ant. iv. vi. 6). The inspiration of Balaam, contrasted with his subsequent sin and disgraceful death, his knowledge of the will of God, together with his intense desire to grasp the rewards of unrighteousness, have given rise to a notable sermon literature. Bishop Butler speaks of the self-deception by which he persuades himself that the sin he commits can be justified to conscience and to God; Newman regards him as an instance of the trouble that can come on a character, otherwise noble, when the thought of material advancement is always allowed to dwell with it; Arnold adduces him as an instance of the familiar truth that the purest form of religious belief may coexist with a standard of action immeasurably below it. F. W. Robertson makes him the text for a sermon on the perversion of gifts.

This complexity of character is, however, greatly simplified by the recognition of the various strata in the narrative. It is clear that the account of P connecting Balaam with Israel's uncleanness has nothing to do with the original narrative. This original narrative is contained in Nu 22-24. According to it, Balaam was a prophet of Pethor on the river Euphrates. His fame had spread across the wilderness, and, when Balak found himself in straits through the advance of Israel, he sent for Balaam to come and curse Israel. Balaam asked God whether he should go, and was refused permission. Balak therefore sent yet greater gifts, and once again Balaam asked counsel of God. This time permission was granted. So far there had been no indication of God's displeasure; but now follows (22²⁴-24) the story of the ass, through which God's anger at the refusal of the seer to accept His answer, given once and for all, is manifested. If, however, the reader will pass from 22²¹ to 22²⁶ he will find that the narrative runs smoothly, and that he is still viewing Balaam's character from the same not unfavourable standpoint (22²⁸ [cf. vv. 20 21] is the effort to join up the threads of the story after the interpolation). When Balaam is brought in sight of Israel, he breaks out into a burst of praise (24¹⁰) which rouses the wrath of Balak. Balaam justifies himself by reminding the king that he had warned him of the constraint of the Lord (v. 13). He then utters another oracle predicting the glory of Israel and the destruction of Moab and Ammon (vv. 17-19).

This analysis leaves out of account 22²²-24 and 23, which seem to belong to a narrative dealing with the same facts, but placing a more sinister interpretation on the conduct of Balaam. The story of the ass is plainly out of harmony with the narrative just outlined. It is a story belonging not to the wilderness, but to a land of vineyards. It ignores the embassy that has been sent to bring Balaam back across the wilderness (22²⁸ 21), for it represents Balaam as travelling alone. It is also extremely unlikely that so long a journey as that from the Euphrates to Moab would be attempted upon an ass. Then ch. 23, with its elaborate building of altars and offering of sacrifices, seems to belong to a later date; while the constant shifting of position in the effort to secure a more favourable oracle presents Balaam in a much more unfavourable light than before. Although the details of this analysis are not certain, we may take it that the original story proceeds from J, and that the second narrative, more complicated both in psychology and ritual, is from E.

The narrative of P ascribing the sin of Baal-peor to Balaam is out of touch with both the other narratives. According to it, Balaam was a Midianitish seer who tried to bring about the ruin of Israel, in default of other means, by persuading them to give way to lust (Nu 31⁸, 16; Jos. Ant. iv. vi. 6). 'It has been conjectured that this story arose partly out of a difficulty on the part of the priestly narrator in conceiving of a heathen being an inspired prophet of God, partly from the need of accounting for the great sin of the Israelites' (DBI. 233*). Balaam thus seems to have fallen in the estimation of Israel from being a seer of alien race, who distinguished himself by his faithfulness to the truth he knew, to becoming synonymous with temptation of a kind that was always especially insidious for Israel.

BALAH (Jos 19³).—An unknown town of Simeon; perhaps identical with Bealoth (Jos 15²⁴) and Bilham (1 Ch 4²⁹); called Baalah in Jos 15²⁹, where it is assigned to Judah.

BALAK.—The king of Moab who hired Balaam, Nu 22-24. See BALAAM.

BALAMON.—A town near Dothaim (Jth 8³).

BALANCE.—The Hebrew balances probably differed but little from those in use in Egypt as described by Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt, [1878], ii. 246 f.). The main parts were the beam with its support, and the scales which were hung by cords from the ends of the equal arms of the beam. The 'pair of scales' is used in OT by a figure for the balance as a whole; only once is the beam so used (Is 40⁶). The weights were originally of stone and are always so termed. The moral necessity of a just balance and true weights and the iniquity of false ones are frequently emphasized by the prophets, moral teachers, and legislators of Israel; see Ain 8⁸, Mic 6¹¹, Pr 11¹ 16¹¹ ('a just balance and scales are the Lord's') 20³, Lv 19³⁵, Dt 25¹⁸.

BALM.—A product of Gilead (Gn 37²⁵ 43¹¹), celebrated for its healing properties (Jer 8²² 46¹¹ 51⁸), and an important article of commerce (Ezk 27¹⁷). Nothing is known for certain about the nature of this substance, but it is usually supposed to be some kind of aromatic gum or resin. There is now no plant in Gilead which produces any characteristic product of this nature. Mastich, a resin much used by the Arabs for flavouring coffee, sweets, etc., and as a chewing gum, is considered by many to be the sort of Gn 37²⁵ (so RVm). It has been credited with healing properties. It is a product of the Pistacia lentiscus, a plant common in Palestine. The so-called 'Balm of Gilead' of commerce, and the substance sold by the monks of Jericho to-day, this latter a product of the zakkum tree, are neither of their serious claimants to be the genuine article. BALTASAR.—The Gr. form of Belshazzar (Dn 5, etc., Bar 1¹¹.) and of Belteshazzar (Dn 4, etc.).

BAMAH (only Ezk 20³⁹) is the ordinary word for 'high place,' but is here retained in its Hebrew form as the word 'manna' in the parallel case Ex 16¹⁵, on account of the word-play: 'What (mah) is the ba-mah to which ye go (ba)?' See, further, HIGH PLACE.

BAMOTH, BAMOTH-BAAL.—Bamoth is mentioned in Nu 21¹⁹, as a station in the journey of Israel from the Arnon to the Jordan. It is prob. identical with Bamoth-baal of Nu 24¹ (RVm; AV and RV 'the high places of Baal'), to which Balaam was led by Balak. Bamoth-baal is mentioned as a Reubenite city in Jos 13¹⁷.

BAN.—The ban is an institution from remote antiquity, which still survives in the Jewish and Christian Churches. Its earlier history has not yet received the systematic treatment which it merits. The original idea, common to all the Semitic languages, is that of withdrawing something from common use and setting it apart for the exclusive use of a deity. In Hebrew the verbal root acquired the more specialized meaning of devoting to J^h His enemies and their belongings by means of fire and sword, and is usually rendered 'utterly destroy' (RVm adds 'Heb. devote'), while the cognate noun (chërem, Gr. anathema) is 'accursed' (AV) or 'devoted' (RV) thing.' In this brief treatment of a large subject we propose to distinguish between the war ban, the justice ban, and the private ban.

1. The war ban, clearly the oldest form of the institution, shows various degrees of severity. The war ban of the first degree, as it may be termed, involved the destruction not only of every man, woman, and child of the enemy, but also of their entire property of every description (see Dt 13¹⁵). The treatment of the Amalekites in 1 S 15 is a familiar example. The case of Achan, after the ban and capture of Jericho, affords a striking illustration of the early ideas associated with the ban. Every 'devoted thing,' as henceforth the inviolate property of J^h, and therefore taboo, became infected with the deadly contagion of holiness (note Lv 27²⁸ 'most holy,' lit. 'holy of holies'). Hence by retaining part of the 'devoted thing' (chërem) in his tent Achan infected the whole 'camp of Israel,' with disastrous results (Jos 6¹⁸ 7¹¹, cf. Dt 7²⁶). More frequently we meet with a relaxed form of the war ban, which may be called the ban of the second degree. In this case only the men, women, and children of the doomed city were devoted, while the cattle and the rest of the spoil became the property of the victors (Dt 2³⁴, 34¹, 7², Jos 11¹⁴). A still further relaxation, a ban of the third degree, is contemplated by the law of Dt 20¹⁰, by which only the males are put to the ban, the women and children being spared as the perquisites of the besiegers. On the other hand, only virgins were to be spared in Nu 31¹⁷ and Jg 21¹⁰, for special reasons in the latter case.

2. The justice ban differs from the other in being applicable only to members of the theocratic community. It appears in the oldest legislation as the punishment of the apostate Israelite (Ex 22⁹), and is extended in the Deuteronomic code to the idolatrous city (Dt 13¹⁶). Here only the ban of the first degree was admissible. An important modification of the judicial ban is first met with in Ezr 10⁸, where recalcitrant members of the community, instead of being put to death, are excommunicated, and only their 'substance forfeited' (RVm 'devoted') to the Temple treasury. This modified chërem became the starting-point of a long development. For these later Jewish and Christian bans see EXCOMMUNICATION.

3. The attenuated form of ban found in the late passage Lv 27²⁸ may be termed the private ban. The cases contemplated—'man or beast or field'—are evidently those of unusually solemn and inalienable dedications by private persons for religious purposes (cf. Nu 18¹⁴, Ezk 44²⁷, and the NT 'corban'), as opposed to the redeemable dedications of the preceding verses. The latter are holy while the former are 'most holy.' The following verse, on the contrary, must refer to the justice ban.

The ban was an institution of earlier date than the Hebrew conquest, and was practised by the Moabites in its most rigorous form (see Mesha's inscription, ll. 11-17), perhaps also by the Ammonites (2 Ch 29²²). Instances of similar practices among many half-civilized races are noted by the anthropologists. The original motive of the ban is probably reflected in Nu 21¹⁷, where it is represented as the return made to J^h for help against the enemy vouchsafed in terms of a preceding vow (cf. devotio from devoeo). This has to be interpreted in the light of the primitive solidarity between a god and his clan. Even in Israel the wars of the Hebrews were the 'wars of J' (Nu 21¹⁴). 'The religious element is found in the complete renunciation of any profit from the victory, and this renunciation is an expression of gratitude for the fact that the war-God has delivered the enemy, who is His enemy also, into the hands of the conqueror' (Kautsch in Hastings' DB Ext. Vol. 619^b). The ban was thus the outcome of religious zeal in an age when the moral sense was less advanced than the religious.

With regard to the wholesale application of the war ban in the Deuteronomic sections of Joshua, modern criticism has taught us to see in these ideal generalizations of the exile age. The Hebrews of the conquest were in truth the children of their age, but such a stupendous holocaust as is implied in such passages as Jos 11:10-14 must not be placed to their credit. The legislation of Dt., it must further be remembered, is the outcome of several centuries' experience of Canaanite heathenism, the true character of which the soil of Palestine is only now revealing, and of its baneful influence on the religion of J'. In this legislation the antique institution of the ban was retained as a means of protecting the community against a serious menace to its religious life. Nevertheless the enactment of Dt 13:17 remained a dead letter till the age of the Maccabees (1 Mac 5:42).

BAN.—The head of a family which could not trace its descent (1 Es 5:7, a corrupt passage).

BANAIAS.—1 Es 9:3 = Benaiah of Ezr 10:4.

BAND.—This spelling represents three historically distinct English words: (1) 'Band' in the sense of that which binds—the rendering of a variety of Heb. words, some of which are also rendered by 'bond.' (2) 'Band' in the sense of ribbon (Ex 32:35 RV 'binding'), or sash (Ex 28:8 etc. RV 'girdle'). (3) 'Band' in the sense of a company of soldiers, more or less organized, also the rendering of several Heb. words, some of them changed in RV into 'companies' (Gn 32:7) or 'troop' (1 K 11:24) or 'hordes' (Ezk 38:4).

In NT 'band' in this third sense renders speira, the Gr. equivalent of the Roman cohors (for the Roman army in NT times see LEGION). In the minor provinces such as Judaea the troops were entirely auxiliaries, of which the unit was the cohort of about 500, in certain cases 1000, men. The Roman garrison in Jerusalem consisted of such a cohort of provincials, probably 1000 strong, the 'band' which figures prominently both in the Gospels and in the Acts (Mt 27:27, Mk 15:4, Ac 21:31, and probably Jn 18:31¹²—RVm 'cohort' throughout). This cohort was under the command of a Roman prefect or of a military tribune, the 'captain' or 'chief captain' (Gr. chiliarch) of our EV.

Another auxiliary cohort is probably that named the Augustan band (Ac 27:1—Gr. Sebaste; AV 'Augustus' band). It has been much debated whether the name is a title of honour like our 'King's Own,' or a territorial designation signifying that the cohort in question was recruited from Samaria, then named Sebaste (= Augusta). Schürer (GJV 3 i. 462) curiously would combine both these views. Ramsay, on the other hand, maintains that the Augustan band was a popular, not an official, name for a body of troops detailed for some special service by the emperor (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 315). A similar uncertainty as to its place in the military organization of the time attaches to the Italian band in which Cornelius was a centurion (Ac 10:1). The name merely shows that it was a cohort of Roman citizens, probably volunteers, from Italy, as opposed to the ordinary cohorts of provincials.

BANI.—1. A Gadite, one of David's heroes (2 S 23:36). 2, 3, 4. Levites (1 Ch 6:46, Neh 3:17, cf. 8:7 [= Binnui of Ezr 8:3 and Neh 10:1]). 5. A Judahite (1 Ch 9:4). 6. Head of a family of exiles that returned (Ezr 2:10 [= Binnui of Neh 7:15] 10:2, Neh 10:14). 7. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:18). Cf. BINNUI.

BANIAS.—Ancestor of Salimoth, who returned with Ezra (1 Es 8:3).

BANISHMENT.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BANK.—1. A mound of earth in siegework, see FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT. 2. The table of a money-changer or banker, see MONEY-CHANGERS.

BANNAS.—A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5:3).

BANNEAS.—1 Es 9:3 = Benaiah of Ezr 10:4.

BANNER, ENSIGN, STANDARD.—That the Hebrews, like the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. [1878] i. 195, illust.), Assyrians, and other ancient nations, possessed military ensigns is a safe inference from Nu 2:2, but not from the mention of the standard-bearer in Is 10:18 AV, which is to be rendered as RVm. Nothing certain, however, is known regarding them. In the former passage a distinction seems to be made—for another view see Gray's Com. in loc.—between the ensigns (lit. 'signs,' cf. Ps 74: where the reference is probably to the standards of Antiochus' army) of the 'fathers' houses,' and the standards (the banner of Ca 2:4, cf. 6:10) of the four great divisions of the Hebrew tribes in the wilderness, according to the artificial theory of the priestly writer.

Equally uncertain is the relation of these to the nēz, which was a wooden pole (Nu 21:9. AV and RV 'standard' cf. the parallelism with 'mast' Is 30:17 RVm), set up on an eminence as a signal for the mustering of the troops. This word is of frequent occurrence both in the original sense and in the figurative sense of a rallying point, in the prophetic announcements of the future (Is 5:26 11:10, Jer 4:2 and often). The rendering alternates between 'ensign' and 'banner.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BANNUS.—1 Es 9:4—either Bani or Binnui of Ezr 10:4.

BANQUET.—In AV 'banquet' and 'banqueting' always mean wine-drinking, not feasting generally. Thus Ca 2:4 'He brought me to the banqueting house' (Heb. 'the house of wine'), 1 P 4:3 'banquetings' (Gr. 'drinkings,' RV 'carousings'). See MEALS.

BAPTISM.—This term, which designates a NT rite, is confined to the vocabulary of the NT. It does not occur in the LXX, neither is the verb with which it is connected ever used of an initiatory ceremony. This verb is a derivative from one which means 'to dip' (Jn 13:26, Rev 19:13), but itself has a wider meaning, = 'to wash' whether the whole or part of the body, whether by immersion or by the pouring of water (Mk 7:4, Lk 11:2). The substantive is used (a) of Jewish ceremonial washings (Mk 7:4, He 9:10); (b) in a metaphorical sense (Mk 10:8, Lk 12:50; cf. 'plunged in calamity'); and (c) most commonly in the technical sense of a religious ceremony of initiation.

1. The earliest use of the word 'baptism' to describe a religious and not merely ceremonial observance is in connexion with the preaching of John the Baptist, and the title which is given to him is probably an indication of the novelty of his procedure (Mt 3:1, Mk 8:26, Lk 7:29; cf. Mk 6:4²⁴). He 'preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins' (Mk 1:4), i.e. the result of his preaching was to induce men to seek baptism as an outward sign and pledge of inward repentance on their part, and of their forgiveness on the part of God. 'Baptism is related to repentance as the outward act in which the inward change finds expression. It has been disputed whether the practice of baptizing proselytes on their reception into the Jewish community was already established in the 1st cent.; probably it was. But in any case the significance of their baptism was that of ceremonial cleansing; John employed it as a symbol and a seal of moral purification. But, according to the Gospel record, John recognized the incomplete and provisional character of the baptism administered by him: 'I indeed have baptized you with water; but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost' (Mk 1:8).

2. Jesus Himself accepted baptism at the hands of John (Mk 1⁹), overcoming the reluctance of the Baptist with a word of authority. That Jesus Himself baptized is nowhere suggested in the Synoptic Gospels, and is expressly denied in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 4²); but His disciples baptized, and it must have been with His authority, equivalent to baptism by Himself, and involving admission to the society of His disciples. On the other hand, His instructions to the Twelve and to the Seventy contain no command to baptize. Christian baptism was to be baptism 'with the Spirit,' and 'the Spirit was not yet given' (Jn 7³⁹). It is recorded in Acts (1⁸) that the Risen Lord foretold that this promised baptism would be received after His departure, 'not many days hence.'

3. Christian baptism, although it finds a formal analogy in the baptism of John, which in its turn represents a spiritualizing of ancient Jewish ideas of lustration, appears as in its essential character a new thing after the descent of the Holy Spirit. It is a phenomenon 'entirely unique, and in its inmost nature without any analogy, because it rises as an original fact from the soil of the Christian religion of revelation' (von Dobschütz). It has been customary to trace the institution of the practice to the words of Christ recorded in Mt 28¹⁹. But the authenticity of this passage has been challenged on historical as well as on textual grounds. It must be acknowledged that the formula of the threefold name, which is here enjoined, does not appear to have been employed by the primitive Church, which, so far as our information goes, baptized 'in' or 'into the name of Jesus' (or 'Jesus Christ' or 'the Lord Jesus': Ac 2³⁸ 8¹⁶ 10⁴⁸ 19⁴; cf. 1 Co 1¹³ 15), without reference to the Father or the Spirit. The difficulty hence arising may be met by assuming (a) that Baptism in the name of Jesus was equivalent to Baptism in the name of the Trinity, or (b) that the shorter phrase does not represent the formula used by the baptizer (which may have been the fuller one), but the profession made by the baptized, and the essential fact that he became a Christian—one of Christ's acknowledged followers. But it is better to infer the authority of Christ for the practice from the prompt and universal adoption of it by the Apostles and the infant Church, to which the opening chapters of Acts bear witness; and from the significance attached to the rite in the Epistles, and especially in those of St. Paul.

4. That baptism was the normal, and probably the indispensable, condition of being recognized as a member of the Christian community appears from allusions in the Epistles (1 Co 12¹³, Gal 3²⁷), and abundantly from the evidence in Acts. The first preaching of the Spirit-filled Apostles on the day of Pentecost led to many being 'pricked in their heart'; and in answer to their inquiry addressed to 'Peter and the rest of the apostles,' Peter said unto them: 'Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 2³⁷ 38). 'They then that received his word were baptized' to the number of 'about three thousand souls.' At Samaria, when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women' (8¹²),—the earliest express statement that women were admitted to the rite. In this case the gift of the Spirit did not follow until Peter and John had come down from Jerusalem, and 'prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost.' 'Then they laid their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost' (8¹⁷). Saul was baptized by Ananias (9¹⁷) in accordance with instructions recorded by himself (22¹⁶), and that he might 'be filled with the Holy Ghost.' In these cases the gift followed upon baptism, with or without the laying-on of hands. In the case of Cornelius and his friends, the gift followed immediately upon the preaching of the word by Peter, and presumably its reception in the heart of those who heard; and it was after that that the Apostle 'commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord' (10⁴⁸). It was on the ground of this previous communication of the Holy Spirit that Peter subsequently justified his action in admitting these persons to baptism (11¹⁵⁻¹⁸).

5. The preaching of St. Paul, no less than that of St. Peter, led to the profession of faith through baptism, though the Apostle seems as a rule to have left the actual administration to others (1 Co 1¹⁴⁻¹⁷): 'for Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel.' At Philippi Lydia was baptized 'and her household'; there also the jailor, 'and all that were his' (Ac 16³³ 34); at Corinth, Crispus and Gaius, and 'the household of Stephanas' (1 Co 1¹⁴ 16).

6. The conditions antecedent to baptism are plainly set forth in Acts, viz. repentance and profession of faith in Jesus as Messiah or as 'the Lord,' following on the preaching of the word. The method of administration was baptizing with water in or into the name of Jesus. Immersion may have been employed when the presence of sufficient water made it convenient; but there is nothing to show that affusion or sprinkling was not regarded as equally valid. That baptism was 'in the name of Jesus' signifies that it took place for the purpose of sealing the new relationship of belonging to, being committed to, His Personality. The blessing attached to the rite is commonly exhibited as the gift of the Holy Spirit; the due fulfilment of the condition of baptism involved ipso facto the due fulfilment of the condition of receiving the Spirit. In the Epistles, this, the normal consequence of Christian baptism, is analyzed into its various elements. These are in the main three: (a) the 'remission of sins' (Ac 2³⁸, 1 Co 6¹¹; cf. He 10²², 1 P 3²¹). (b) In baptism the believer was to realize most vividly the total breach with his old life involved in his new attitude to God through Christ, a breach comparable only with that effected by death (Ro 6²⁻⁷, Col 2¹²); he was to realize also that the consequences of this fellowship with Christ were not only death to sin, but a new life in righteousness as real as that which followed on resurrection (Ro 6⁴). (c) Baptism conferred incorporation in the one body of Christ (1 Co 12¹³), and was thus adapted to serve as a symbol of the true unity of Christians (Eph 4⁵). The body with which the believer is thus incorporated is conceived of sometimes as the corporate community of Christians, sometimes as the Personality of Christ; 'for as many of you as were baptized into Christ, did put on Christ' (Gal 3²⁷).

Conversely, as with the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, all the elements both of qualification and of experience are sometimes summed up in a pregnant phrase and without regard to the order in which they emerge. Eph 5²⁶ may find its best interpretation through comparison with Jn 15³ (cf. 17¹³), i.e. as referring to the continuous cleansing of the Church by the word; but if the reference is to baptism, then the phrase 'by the word' probably alludes to the profession of faith by the baptized, whether it took the form of 'Jesus is Lord' (Ro 4¹⁰; cf. 1 Co 12³), or whether it expressed the content of the faith more fully. In Tit 3⁵, while baptism is the instrument by which salvation is realized, 'regeneration' and 'renewal' are both displayed as the work of the Holy Spirit. And here the Apostolic interpretation of the rite touches the anticipation of it in our Lord's words recorded in Jn 3⁵. Faith wrought by the Spirit and faith professed by the believer are alike necessary to entrance into the Kingdom of salvation (cf. Ro 10⁹ 10).

In 1 Co 15²⁹ Paul refers to the practice of persons allowing themselves to be baptized on behalf of the dead. Such a practice appears to have had analogies in the Greek mysteries, from which it may have crept into the Christian Church. As such it may be regarded as 'a purely magical, and wholly superstitious, vicarious reception of the sacrament.' Of such a practice the Apostle expresses no approval, but 'simply meets his opponents with their own weapons without putting their validity to the proof' (Rendtorff).

7. The NT contains no explicit reference to the baptism of infants or young children; but it does not follow that the Church of the 2nd cent. adopted an unauthorized innovation when it carried out the practice of infant baptism. There are good reasons for the silence of Scripture on the subject. The governing principle of St. Luke as the historian of the primitive Church is to narrate the advance of the Kingdom through the missionary preaching of the Apostles, and the conversion of adult men and women. The letters of the Apostles were similarly governed by the immediate occasion and purpose of their writing. We have neither a complete history, nor a complete account of the organization, of the primitive Church. But of one thing we may be sure: had the acceptance of Christianity involved anything so startling to the Jewish or the Gentile mind as a distinction between the religious standing of the father of a family and his children, the historian would have recorded it, or the Apostles would have found themselves called to explain and defend it. For such a distinction would have been in direct contradiction to the most deeply rooted convictions of Jew and of Gentile alike. From the time of Abraham onwards the Jew had felt it a solemn religious obligation to claim for his sons from their earliest infancy the same covenant relation with God as he himself stood in. There was sufficient parallelism between baptism and circumcision (cf. Col 2¹¹) for the Jewish-Christian father to expect the baptism of his children to follow his own as a matter of course. The Apostle assumes as a fact beyond dispute that the children of believers are 'holy' (1 Co 7¹⁴), i.e. under the covenant with God, on the ground of their father's faith. And among Gentile converts a somewhat different but equally authoritative principle, that of patria potestas, would have the same result. In a home organized on this principle, which prevailed throughout the Roman Empire, it would be a thing inconceivable that the children could be severed from the father in their religious rights and duties, in the standing conferred by baptism. Thus it is because, to the mind of Jew and Gentile alike, the baptism of infants and children yet unable to supply the conditions for themselves was so natural, that St. Luke records so simply that when Lydia believed, she was baptized 'with her household'; when the Philippian jailor believed, he was baptized, and all those belonging to him. If there were children in these households, these children were baptized on the ground of the faith of their parents; if there were no children, then the principle took a still wider extension, which includes children; for it was the servants or slaves of the household who were 'added to the Church' by baptism on the ground of their master's faith.

8. Baptism was a ceremony of initiation by which the baptized not only were admitted members of the visible society of the disciples of Christ, but also received the solemn attestation of the consequences of their faith. Hence there are three parties to it. The part of the baptized is mainly his profession of faith in Christ, his confession 'with his heart' that he is the Lord's. The second is the Christian community or Church (rather than the person who administers baptism, and who studiously keeps in the background). Their part is to hear the profession and to grant the human attestation. The third is the Head of the Church Himself, by whose authority the rite is practised, and who gives the inward attestation, as the experience of being baptized opens in the believing soul new avenues for the arrival of the Holy Spirit. C. A. SCOTT.

BAR.—Aram. word for 'son'; used, especially in NT times, as the first component of personal names, such as Bar-abbas, Bar-jesus, Bar-jonah, etc.

BARABBAS (Mt 27¹⁵⁻²³ = Mk 15⁷⁻¹⁴ = Lk 23¹⁸⁻²² = Jn 18³⁹⁻⁴⁰).—A brigand, probably one of those who instigated the Ascent of Blood (wh. see). He had taken part in one of the insurrections so frequent during the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate; and, having been caught red-handed, was awaiting sentence when Jesus was arraigned. It was customary for the procurator, by way of gratifying the Jews, to release a prisoner at the Passover season, letting the people choose whom they would; and Pilate, reluctant to condemn an innocent man, yet afraid to withstand the clamour of the rulers, saw here a way to save Jesus. His artifice would probably have succeeded had not the malignant priests and elders incited the people to choose Barabbas.

Barabbas, like Bartholomew and Bartimaeus, is a patronymic, possibly = 'the son of the father' (i.e. the Rabbi). According to an ancient reading of Mt 27¹⁷, the brigand's name was Jesus. If so, there is a dramatic adroitness in Pilate's presentation of the alternative to the multitude: 'Which of the two do ye wish me to release to you—Jesus the bar-Abba or Jesus that is called Messiah?' DAVID SMITH.

BARACHEL.—Father of Elihu, 'the Buzite' (Job 32⁵, 6).

BARACHIAH.—See ZACHARIAH.

BARAK ('lightning').—The son of Abinoam; he lived at a time when the Canaanite kingdom of Hazor, having recovered from its overthrow by Joshua (Jos 11¹⁰⁻¹⁵), was taking vengeance by oppressing Israel. He is called from his home in Kedesh-naphtali by Deborah to deliver Israel. He gathers an army of 10,000 men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. With this force, accompanied by Deborah, without whom he refuses to go forward, he encamps on Mt. Tabor, while the enemy under Sisera lies in the plain on the banks of the Kishon. At the word of Deborah, Barak leads his men down to battle, and completely defeats Sisera. The latter flees; Barak pursues him, but on reaching his hiding-place finds that he has been already slain by Jael, the wife of Heber. The glory of the victory, therefore, does not lie with Barak, but with Deborah, who was his guiding spirit, and with Jael who slew the enemy's leader (Jk 4. 5).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

BARBARIAN.—The Eng. word is used in Ac 28², 4, Ro 1¹⁴, 1 Co 14¹¹, Col 3¹¹ to translate a Gr. word which does not at all connote savagery, but means simply 'foreign,' 'speaking an unintelligible language.' The expression first arose among the Greeks in the days of their independence, and was applied by them to all who could not speak Greek. When Greece became subject to Rome, it was then extended to mean all except the Greeks and Romans. There may be a touch of contempt in St. Luke's use of it, but St. Paul uses it simply in the ordinary way; see esp. 1 Co 14¹¹. A. SOUTER.

BARBER.—See HAIR.

BARCHUS.—1 Es 5²³ = Barkos of Ezr 2³³ and Neh 7⁵⁴.

BARHUMITE.—See BAHURIM.

BARIAH.—A son of Shemaiah (1 Ch 3²²).

BAR-JESUS.—The name of 'a certain Magian, a false prophet, a Jew' (Ac 13⁹) whom St. Paul, on his visit to Cyprus, found in the retinue of Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul. The title Elymas (v. 8) is equivalent to Magus (v. 9), and is probably derived from an Arabic root signifying 'wise.' The knowledge of the Magians was half-mystical, half-scientific; amongst them were some devout seekers after truth, but many were mere tricksters. In the Apostolic age such men often acquired great influence, and Bar-jesus represents, as Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 79) says, 'the strongest influence on the human will that existed in the Roman world, an influence which must destroy or be destroyed by Christianity, if the latter tried to conquer the Empire.' The narrative implies that the proconsul was too intelligent to be deceived by the Magian's pretensions, the motive of whose opposition to the Christian teachers is expressed in a Bezan addition to v. 8, which states that Sergius Paulus 'was listening with much pleasure to them. In St. Paul's judgment on this false prophet (v. 10) there is a play upon words: Elymas was full of deceit and not of wisdom; Bar-jesus, i.e. 'son of Jesus,' had become a 'son of the devil.' This is Pauline (cf. Ph 3²).

J. G. TASKER.

BAR-JONAH.—See BAR, and JOHN (No. 6).

BARKOS.—Ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁶², Neh 7⁴⁶; called Barchus in 1 Es 5²²).

BARLEY (se'ôrāh).—As in ancient times, so to-day barley (Arab. sha'ir) is the most plentiful cereal of Palestine. It is the chief food of horses (1 K 4²⁸), mules, and donkeys, oats being practically unknown. It is still used by the poor for making bread (Jg 7¹³, Jn 6⁹⁻¹² etc.) in the villages, but not in the cities. Barley was the special ritual offering for jealousy (Nu 5¹⁵). The barley harvest (Ru 1²²) precedes that of wheat; it begins around Jericho as early as March, and in Jerusalem and the neighbourhood at the end of May.

BARN.—See AGRICULTURE, 3, and GARNER.

BARNABAS.—A surname given by the Apostles to Joseph, the Levite, whose first recorded deed (Ac 4³⁶) was the selling of his property and the devotion of its proceeds to the needs of the Christian community. In this generous act St. Luke sees a proof that Barnabas is, in accordance with the popular etymology of his name, 'a son of comfort.' His kindly introduction of Saul to the Christians at Jerusalem disarmed their fears (9²⁷); his broad sympathies made him quick to recognize the work of grace amongst the Greeks at Antioch (11²³), and to discern the fitness of his gifted friend for that important sphere of service (v. 26¹). After a year's fellowship in work at Antioch, Barnabas and Saul were appointed to convey 'the relief' sent thence to the brethren in Judæa (v. 30). From Jerusalem they brought back, as a helper, John Mark, the cousin of Barnabas (12¹² 2²; cf. Col 4¹⁰).

The church at Antioch solemnly dedicated Barnabas and Saul to missionary service (13¹); with John Mark the two friends sailed for Cyprus, and from this point, with three exceptions, their names occur in the order 'Paul and Barnabas.'

Harnack (PRE³ ii. 411) explains these three passages thus: 14¹ is accounted for by v. 12, and 15² 2² by the closer association of Barnabas with the Jerusalem church.

At Lystra (14¹²), as doubtless at other places, Paul was the chief speaker; he was also the more prominent figure at the Jerusalem conference (15²², Gal 2¹). See PAUL. Between Paul and Barnabas 'there arose a sharp contention' concerning John Mark (15³⁶), and they agreed to work apart; Gal 2¹³ also records Paul's adverse judgment of Barnabas' attitude in regard to the circumcision controversy. But the interesting reference to Barnabas in 1 Co 9⁶ affords welcome proof of St. Paul's familiarity with the work of his friend. All that is definitely known of Barnabas after he bade Paul farewell is that with his cousin Mark he 'sailed away unto Cyprus' (Ac 15³⁹). For the spurious Epistle attributed to Barnabas, see CANON OF NT, § 2.

BARODIS.—A name occurring in 1 Es 5²⁴ (om. in Ezr. and Neh.).

BARREL, 1 K 17¹² 14, 16 18³².—The large earthenware jar (so Amer. RV) used for fetching water from the well, storing grain, etc., elsewhere rendered pitcher. See HOUSE, 9.

BARRENNESS.—See CHILD.

BARABBAS.—See JOSEPH (in NT), 5, and JUDAS (in NT), 6.

BARTACUS.—Father of Apame (1 Es 4²⁹).

BARTHOLOMEW.—One of the Twelve, mentioned only in the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10³—Mk 3¹⁸—Lk 6¹⁴). Jerome says that he wrote a Gospel, preached to the Indians, and died at Albanopolis in Armenia. Bartholomew is really not a name, but a patronymic—Bar Talmi—'son of Talmi' (cf. 2 S 13¹⁷). See NATHANIEL. DAVID SMITH.

BASEMATH

BARTIMEUS (Mk 10⁴⁶).—A blind man whom Jesus, on His way to the last Passover, healed at the gate of Jericho—as He was leaving the city, according to Mt. (20²⁹) and Mk. (10⁴⁶), who condense the story of what befell at Jericho; as He approached, according to Lk. (18³⁵), whose fuller narrative preserves the proper order of events. Bartimeus is not a name but a patronymic (cf. Bartholomew), and St. Mark, for the benefit of his Gentile readers, gives the interpretation of it, 'the son of Timæus.'

DAVID SMITH.

BARUCH ('blessed').—1. Son of Neriah, the son of Mahseiah and brother of Seraiah (Jer 51⁵⁹); known from Jer 36, 45, 32¹²⁻¹⁴ 43⁸; by Jeremiah's side in the conflict with Jehoiakim (B.C. 604), again during the last siege of Jerusalem (587-6), and again amongst the Judeans left behind after the Second Captivity. 'Baruch' the scribe, named in Jer 36² along with 'Jeremiah the prophet,' is already the recognized attendant and amanuensis of the latter; he seems to have rendered the prophet over twenty years of devoted service. He belonged to the order of 'princes,' among whom Jeremiah had influential friends (26¹⁸ 36²); Baruch's rank probably secured for Jeremiah's objectionable 'roll' (ch. 36) the hearing that was refused to his spoken words. When he cast in his lot with Jeremiah, Baruch made a heavy sacrifice; he might have 'sought great things' for himself, and is warned against his natural ambition (45⁵⁻⁷). The promise that Baruch's 'life shall be given' him 'for a prey' wherever he goes, placed where it is (45⁵), suggests that he survived his master, to act as his literary executor. The Book of Jeremiah (see art.) owes much to this loyal secretary, though the final arrangement of the materials is far from satisfactory. Tradition adds nothing of any certainty to the references of Scripture; see, however, Jos. Ant. x. ix. 1, 7. For the Apocryphal writings attached to his name, see APOCRYPHA and APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE. 2. One of the wall-builders (Neh 3²⁰). 3. A signatory to the covenant (10⁶). 4. A Judahite (15¹).

G. G. FINDLAY.

BARZILLAI.—1. The name of a chieftain of Gilead who brought supplies to David and his army at Mahanaim (2 S 17²⁷). After the death of Absalom, Barzillai went across Jordan with the king, but declined to go to court (19³¹). On his deathbed David charged Solomon to 'show kindness to the sons of Barzillai' (1 K 2⁷). His descendants are mentioned in Ezr 2⁶¹, Neh 7⁶¹. 2. The Meholathite whose son Adriel is said (2 S 21⁴) to have married Michal [read Merab, cf. 1 S 18¹⁹], the daughter of Saul.

J. G. TASKER.

BASALOTH.—1 Es 5²¹—Bazluth of Ezr 2⁶² or Bazlith of Neh 7⁶⁴.

BASCAMA.—An unknown town of Gilead (1 Mac 13²⁴).

BASE.—To be base is in mod. English to be morally bad, but in AV is no more than to be of humble birth or lowly position. In the RV, however, the word is sometimes used in the sense of morally low, mean, as Dt 13¹⁸.

BASEMATH.—1. One of the wives of Esau. In Gn 26³⁴ (P) she is called the daughter of Elon the Hittite, while in Gn 36³ (prob. R) she is said to have been Ishmael's daughter, and sister of Nebaioth. But in Gn 28⁴ (P) Esau is said to have taken Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael, the sister of Nebaioth, to be his wife; and in Gn 36⁴ the first mentioned of Esau's wives is Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. There is manifestly a confusion of names in the text, which cannot be satisfactorily explained. 2. A daughter of Solomon, who became the wife of Ahimaz, one of the king's officers (1 K 4¹⁴).

BASHAN.—The name of the territory east of the Sea of Tiberias. It was the kingdom of Og, the Rephaite opponent of Israel, and with his name the country is almost invariably associated (Nu 21³³, Dt 29⁷, Neh 9²² etc.). The territory was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh, with a reservation of two cities, Golan and Be-eshterah (Ashtaroth in 1 Ch 6⁷¹), for the Gershonite Levites (Jos 21²⁷). In the time of Jehu the country was smitten by Hazael (2 K 10³³). It was noted for mountains (Ps 68¹⁴), lions (Dt 33²²), oak trees (Is 2¹³, Ezk 27⁶, Zec 11²), and especially cattle, both rams (Dt 32¹⁴) and bullocks (Ezk 39¹⁸); the bulls and kine of Bashan are typical of cruelty and oppression (Ps 22¹³, Am 4¹). The extent of the territory denoted by this name cannot be exactly defined till some important identifications can be established, such as the exact meaning of 'the region of Argob' (included in the kingdom of Og, Dt 3⁴ etc.), where were threescore great cities with walls and brazen bars, administered for Solomon by Ben-geber of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 4¹³). It included Salekah (Salkhat, on the borders of the desert), Edrei (ed-Der'a?), Ashtaroth (perhaps Tell Ashareh), and Golan, one of the cities of refuge, the name of which may be preserved in the Jaulan, the region immediately east of the Sea of Tiberias. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BASILISK.—See SERPENT.

BASKET.—The names of a round score of baskets in use in NT times are known from the Mishna (see Krenkel, Das Hausgerät in der Mishnah, pp. 39–45). They were made of willow, rush, palm-leaf, and other materials, and used in an endless variety of ways, for purely domestic purposes, in agriculture, in gathering and serving fruit, and for collecting the alms in kind for the poor, etc. Some had handles, others lids, some had both, others had neither. In OT times the commonest basket was the sal, made, at least in later times, of peeled willows or palm-leaves. It was large and flat like the Roman canistrum, and, like it, was used for carrying bread (Gn 40^{16f}) and other articles of food (Jg 6¹⁰), and for presenting the meal-offerings at the sanctuary (Ex 29³). Another (dād), also of wicker-work, probably resembled the calathus, which tapered towards the bottom, and was used in fruit-gathering (Jer 24¹). In what respect it differed from Amos' 'basket of summer fruit' (Am 8¹) is unknown. A fourth and larger variety was employed for carrying home the produce of the fields (Dt 28³ 'blessed shall be thy basket and thy kneading-trough,' RV), and for presenting the first-fruits (26²).

In NT interest centres in the two varieties of basket distinguished consistently by the Evangelists in their accounts of the feeding of the 5000 and the 4000 respectively, the kophinos and the sphyris. The kophinos (Mt 14²⁰) is probably to be identified with the exceedingly popular kūphā of the Mishna, which 'was provided with a cord for a handle by means of which it was usually carried on the back' (Krenkel), with provisions, etc., and which, therefore, the disciples would naturally have with them. The Jews of Juvenal's day carried such a provision basket (cophinus). The sphyris or sphyris (Mt 15²⁷, Mk 8⁹), from its use in St. Paul's case (Ac 9²⁶), must have been considerably larger than the other, and might for distinction be rendered 'hamper.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BASON (Amer. RV 'basin').—Chiefly the large bowl of bronze used by the priests to receive the blood of the sacrificial victims (Ex 27² 29¹⁶, 1 K 7⁴⁶ etc.). It is only once found in secular use, if the text is correct (Am 6⁶, otherwise LXX, see BOWL). Similar bowls or basins of silver were presented by the princes of the congregation (Nu 7^{13f}); those destined for Solomon's Temple were of gold (1 K 7⁵⁰). The basins of Ex 12²², 2 S 17²⁸ were probably of earthenware. A special wash-basin was used by Jesus for washing the disciples' feet (Jn 13⁸).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BASSAI (AV Bassa), 1 Es 5¹⁶—Besai, Ezr 2¹⁷, Neh 7²³.

BASTHAI (AV Bastai), 1 Es 5¹⁶—Besai, Ezr 2¹⁷, Neh 7²³.

BAT ('atallēph).—The bat is a familiar object in Palestine, where no fewer than seventeen varieties have been identified. The two commonest are the horse-shoe bat (Rhinolophus ferrum equinum) and the long-eared bat (Plecotus auritus). All varieties in Palestine are insectivorous except one, the Xantharpyia aegyptiaca, which eats fruit. Bats flit about on noiseless wings by the score on warm summer evenings, especially in the Jordan Valley, and they are to be found in great numbers in ruins, old tombs, and caves all over the land, giving rise to many tales of ghostly habitation (Is 2²⁰). They are counted as unclean 'fowl,' though a little separate from the birds, in Lv 11¹⁹, Dt 14¹⁸.

BATH.—A liquid measure; see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BATH, BATHING.—The latter term is most frequently used in our EV in connexion with purification from ceremonial defilement—contact with holy things, with the dead, etc. (see article CLEAN and UNCLEAN)—and in this sense denotes the washing of the body with water, not necessarily the total immersion of the body in water. Hence RV has rightly introduced 'wash' in many cases for 'bathe.' Bathing in the modern and non-religious sense is rarely mentioned (Ex 2⁸ Pharaoh's daughter, 2 S 11² [RV] Bathsheba, and the curious case 1 K 22²⁸). Public baths are first met with in the Greek period—they were included in the 'place of exercise' (1 Mac 1¹⁴)—and remains of such buildings from the Roman period are fairly numerous. Recently a remarkable series of bath-chambers have been discovered at Gezer in connexion with a building, which is supposed to be the palace built by Simon Maccabaeus (illustr. in PEFS, 1905, 294 f.).

The Hebrews were well acquainted with the use of mineral and vegetable alkalis for increasing the cleansing properties of water (Jer 2²², RV 'soap,' 'lye'). In the History of Susanna v. 17 is a curious reference to 'washing-balls.'

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BATH-RABIM ('daughter of multitudes').—The name of a gate of Heshbon, near which were pools, to which the Shulammite's eyes are compared (Ca 7⁴).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BATHSHEBA (1 Ch 3⁴ Bathshua: this may be a mere textual error).—Wife of Uriah the Hittite, seduced by David (2 S 11²⁻⁴), and afterwards married to him (v. 27). The child died (12¹⁸), but another son, Solomon, was subsequently born (12²⁴). Bathsheba, instigated and supported by Nathan, successfully combated Adonijah's attempt to secure the throne (1 K 1¹¹⁻¹⁴). Acting as Adonijah's intercessor in the matter of Abishag, she was most respectfully received by Solomon, but her unwise request was refused (1 K 2¹⁹⁻²⁰).

BAVVAI.—The son of Henadad (Neh 3¹⁴); rebuilt a portion of the wall of Jerusalem; called in v. 31 Binnui.

BAY.—See COLOURS, 3.

BAYITH ('house').—Occurs as a proper name in Is 15², but the true sense is uncertain.

BAY-TREE

BAY-TREE ('ezrach, Ps 37²⁸) is probably a mistranslation for 'a tree in its native soil' (RV). Many authorities, however, would here emend the Heb. text to read 'erez, 'cedar.' E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BAZLITH (Neh 7⁴⁴), Bazluth (Ezr 2⁵²)=Basaloth, 1 Es 5³¹).—Founder of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel.

BDELLIUM.—The probably correct tr. of the Heb. beddāch, which in Gn 2¹² is classed with gold and onyx as a product of the land of Havilah, and in Nu 11⁷ is described as characterizing the 'appearance' (RV) of manna. Bdelium is the fragrant yellow resin of the tree Balsamodendron mukul, growing in N.W. India, Afghanistan, Beluchistan, and at one time perhaps in Arabia. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BE.—To be is to exist, as in 'To be, or not to be, that is the question.' This primary meaning is found in Gn 5²⁴ 'Enoch walked with God; and he was not'; He 11⁶ 'he that cometh to God must believe that he is.' The auxiliary use is later. In 1611 'be' and 'are' were interchangeable auxiliary forms in the pres. indic. plu., as Ps 107³⁰ 'Then are they glad because they be quiet.'

BEALOTH (Jos 15²⁴).—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah. See BALAH.

BEAM.—1. A tree roughly trimmed serving as support of the flat roof of an Eastern house (2 K 6², Ezr 6¹¹ RV, Mt 7²⁸, Lk 6¹¹), or more elaborately dressed (2 Ch 34¹¹ RV, Ca 1¹⁷) and gilded (2 Ch 3⁷). See HOUSE, MOTE. 2. The weaver's beam (see SPINNING AND WEAVING). 3. See BALANCE.

BEANS (ḥab, Arab. ḥab).—A very common and popular vegetable in Palestine, used from ancient times; they are the seeds of the Vicia faba. The bean plant, which is sown in Oct. or Nov., is in blossom in early spring, when its sweet perfume fills the air. Beans are gathered young and eaten, pod and seed together, cooked with meat; or the fully mature beans are cooked with fat or oil. As the native of Palestine takes little meat, such leguminous plants are a necessary ingredient of his diet (2 S 17²⁰). In Ezk 4⁹ we read of beans as being mixed with barley, lentils, millet, and fitches to make bread. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BEAR (dōb).—The Syrian bear (Ursus syriacus, Arab. dōbb) is still fairly common in Hermon and the Anti-Lebanon, and is occasionally found in the Lebanon and east of the Jordan; it is practically extinct in Palestine. It is smaller and of a lighter colour than the brown bear (Ursus arctos). It is a somewhat solitary animal, eating vegetables, fruit, and honey, but, when hungry, attacking sheep (1 S 17³⁴⁻³⁵) and occasionally, but very rarely, to-day at any rate, human beings (2 K 2²⁴). The fierceness of a bear robbed of her whelps (2 S 17⁸, Pr 17¹², Hos 13⁴) is well known. Next to the lion, the bear was considered the most dangerous of animals to encounter (Pr 28¹⁵), and that it should be subdued was to be one of the wonders of the Messiah's kingdom (Is 11⁷).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BEARD.—See HAIR.

BEAST.—1. In OT (1) beḥēmāh, commonly used for a quadruped, sometimes tr. 'cattle'; see Gn 6⁷ 7², Ex 9³ 10¹⁰, Lv 11² etc. (2) chayyāh, used of animals in general but specially 'wild beasts'; see Gn 7¹⁴ 8⁹ 9² etc. (3) be'ēr sometimes tr. 'beasts' and sometimes 'cattle'; see Gn 45¹⁷, Ex 22⁶ etc. (4) šē, 'wild beasts,' Ps 50¹¹ 80¹².

2. In NT (1) thērion: Mk 1¹³, Ac 28⁴ (a viper), Tit 1¹², He 12²⁹, Ja 3⁷ and over 30 times in Rev. (2) zōon, of the 'beasts' (AV), or 'living creatures' (RV), round about the throne (Rev 5. 6. 8. 11. etc.).

BEATITUDES

BEAST (in Apocalypse).—In Revelation, particularly ch. 23, are symbolic pictures of two beasts who are represented as the arch-opponents of the Christians. The first beast demands worship, and is said to have as his number 666—a numerical symbol most easily referred to the Emperor Nero, or the Roman Empire. In the former case the reference would be undoubtedly to the myth of Nero redivivus, and this is, on the whole, the most probable interpretation.

If instead of 666 we read with Zahn, O. Holtzmann, Spitta, and Erbes, 616, the number would be the equivalent of Gaius Caesar, who in A.D. 39 ordered the procurator Petronius to set up his statue in the Temple of Jerusalem. This view is, in a way, favoured not only by textual variations, but by the fact that Revelation has used so much Jewish apocalyptic material. However this may be, it seems more probable that the reference in Rev 17¹⁰⁻¹¹, as re-edited by the Christian writer, refers to Nero redivivus, the incarnation of the persecuting Roman Empire, the two together standing respectively as the Antichrist and his kingdom over against the Messiah and His kingdom. As in all apocalyptic writings, a definite historical ruler is a representative of an empire. Until the Messiah comes His subjects are at the mercy of His great enemy.

The present difficulty in making the identification is due not only to the process of redaction, but also to the highly complex and, for the modern mind, all but unintelligible fusion of the various elements of the Antichrist belief (see ANTICHRIST). SHAILER MATHEWS.

BEATING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 9.

BEATITUDES.—This word comes from the Latin abstract beatitudo, used in Vulg. of Ro 4⁸, where David is said to 'pronounce the beatitude' or blessedness of the forgiven soul. Since the time of Ambrose the term has been used to describe the particular collection of sayings (cast in the form of which Ps 32¹ is an OT specimen) in which Christ depicts the qualities to be found in members of His kingdom—as an introduction to the discourse known as the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5³⁻¹²=Lk 6²⁰⁻²³). Each of these sayings follows the form 'Blessed (happy) are . . . , because . . . ' Mt. records eight of these general declarations, with a special application of the last of them; Lk. has only four, to which are added four corresponding Woes. There is no guarantee that even Mt. gives all the Beatitudes pronounced by Jesus on different occasions, or again that those he does give were all pronounced on that occasion. It is at least possible that in other parts of the NT we have quotations from sayings of the same kind. Thus 1 P 4¹⁴, Ja 1¹², Rev 14¹³ might easily be supposed to rest on words of Christ.

According to the prevailing view of the history of our Gospels, the Beatitudes are derived from an early collection of Logia, or sayings of Jesus, in the original Aramaic language. To a very large extent the authors of Mt. and Lk. seem to have used identical translations of this document; but in the Beatitudes there is a considerable divergence, together with some significant agreements in phraseology. Putting aside Nos. 3, 5, 6, 7 in Mt., which have no counterparts in Lk., we see the following main lines of difference—(1) Lk.'s are in the second person, Mt.'s in the third, except in the verses which apply No. 8 (5¹¹ 12); (2) Lk.'s are apparently external: the poor, the hungry, those that weep, receive felicitation as such, instead of the commiseration ('Woe') which the world would give them. But since in Lk. disciples are addressed, the divergence does not touch the real meaning. A theodicy is proclaimed in which the hardships of the present, sanctified to the disciple as precious discipline, will be transformed into abiding blessedness. Such a reversal of the order of this life involves here, as elsewhere, the casting down of those whom men count happy (cf. Is 65¹³ 14, Lk 12³⁵ 16²⁵, Jn 16²⁰, Ja 1⁹ 10). The paradoxical form of the sayings in Lk. produces a strong impression of originality, suggesting that here, as often elsewhere, Mt. has interpreted the words which Lk. has transcribed unchanged. Mt. has arranged them according to the form of Hebrew parallelism: observe how the first and last have the same refrain, the poem beginning and ending on the same note—cf. Ps 8. His No. 8 sums up in the form of the other Beatitudes the principle of the appendix vv. 11, 12, which Lk 6:22-23 shows to be original: he then inserts this as a comment, much as he appends a sentence of comment to the Lord's Prayer (6:14-15). It may perhaps be doubted whether the Beatitudes peculiar to Mt. are in their original context. No. 3, proclaiming the triumph of those who do not 'struggle to survive,' is quoted from Ps 37:11; No. 5 is found as early as Clement of Rome, in the form 'Show mercy, that mercy be shown to you'; No. 6 reproduces the sense of Ps 24:1; No. 7, echoed in Ja 3:18, may have been altered in form to fit the appropriate context. We seem to be justified in conjecturing that Lk. inserts all the Beatitudes he found in his source under the same context, and that he faithfully preserved the words as they stood: the Woes likewise belonged to the same discourse. (Note the support given to them by Ja 5:1, and the use of the commercial technical term 'have received,' so characteristic of the Sermon; cf. Mt 6:2-5, 16). The gloss with which Mt. interprets the blessing on the poor was not apparently known to St. James (2:5), whose very clear allusion to the Beatitude in its Lukan form determines the exegesis. The rich man could bring himself within the range of the blessing by accepting the 'humiliation' that Christian discipleship brought (Ja 1:9); so that Mt.'s interpretation is supported by the writer, who shows us most clearly that the exact words have not been preserved by him. In No. 2 Mt. seems to have slightly altered the original (Lk 6:21), under the influence of Is 61:1—the prophecy from which Jesus preached in the synagogue at Nazareth, and the obvious suggestive cause of the appearance of the poor at the opening of the Beatitudes. It should be observed, however, that all attempts to ascertain the original form of sayings of Jesus have at best so large a subjective element that we cannot afford to dogmatize. There are scholars of great weight, reinforced most recently by Harnack, who regard Mt. as generally preserving the lost Logia-collection in a more exact form than Lk. Moreover, we must always allow for the probability that modifications introduced by Mt. or Lk. may often rest on early traditions, so that elements not included in the principal Gospel sources may nevertheless be derived from first-hand authority.

JAMES HOPE MOULTON.

BEAUTIFUL GATE.—See TEMPLE.

BEBAI.—1. The eponym of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2:11 8:11 10:28, Neh 7:16 10:16, 1 Es 5:13 9:29). 2. An unknown locality mentioned only in Jth 15:1.

BECHER.—1. Son of Ephraim, Nu 26:35=1 Ch 7:20 where the name appears as Bered. Patronymic in Nu 26:35 Becherites (AV Bachrites). 2. Son of Benjamin, Gn 46:21, 1 Ch 7:8 and implicitly in 1 Ch 8:1 where for his first-born, Ashbel we should probably read Becher and Ashbel.

BECORATH.—One of Saul's ancestors (1 S 9:1, possibly same name as Becher of 1 Ch 7:8).

BECTILETH (Jth 2:21).—A plain between Nineveh and Cilicia. Perhaps the Bactiali of the Peutinger Tables, 21 miles from Antioch.

BED, BEDCHAMBER.—See HOUSE, 8.

BEDAD.—Father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gn 36:35=1 Ch 14:1).

BEDAN.—1. Mentioned with Jerubbaal, Jephthah, and Samuel as one of the deliverers of Israel (1 S 12:11). The name does not occur in Jg., and it is probably a corruption for Barak (so LXX and Pesh.). Chronologically Barak should precede Gideon, but the order cannot be pressed (cf. v. 3). 2. A Manassite (1 Ch 7:17).

BEDEIAH.—One of those who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10:25): in 1 Es 9:24 apparently Pedias.

BEE (debbrāh).—The bee (Apis fasciata) is a very important insect of Palestine. Wild bees are common, and stores of their honey are often found by wandering Bedouin, especially, it is said, near the Dead Sea. Most of the honey consumed and exported in large quantities is made by domesticated bees. The vast numbers of flowers and especially of aromatic plants enable the skilled bee-keeper to produce the most delicately flavoured honey, e.g. 'orange flower,' 'thyme,' etc.; he carries his hives to different parts according to the season. Many now keep bees in hives of European pattern, but the ordinary native still universally uses the primitive tube hive. This is like a wide drain-pipe of very rough earthenware, some 3 ft. long and about 8 in. in diameter, closed at the end with mud, leaving a hole for ingress and egress. A number of hives are piled one above the other. A few years ago, while the owner of several swarms of bees was transferring his brittle mud hives on donkey-back, one of the asses stumbled and in falling broke one of the hives. In a moment the whole swarm fell on the unfortunate animals and on a fine horse standing near. One donkey was quickly stung to death, and all the other animals were severely injured. Cf. Dt 14:1, Ps 118:12, and Is 7:18, where the hosts of Assyria are compared to such a swarm let loose. That a swarm of bees should settle in a carcass (Jg 14:9) is certainly an unusual occurrence, as indeed is suggested in the narrative, but the dried-up remains of animals, little but hide and ribs, so plentiful by the roadsides in Palestine, often suggest suitable places for such a settlement. Honey has probably always been plentiful in Palestine, but it is very doubtful whether 'a land flowing with milk and honey' could have meant the product of bees alone. See HONEY and VINE. In the LXX there is an addition to Pr 6:1, in which the bee is, like the ant, extolled for her diligence and wisdom.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BEELIADA ('Baal knows').—A son of David, 1 Ch 14:7, changed in conformity with later usage (see Israhel) into Eliada ('El knows') in 2 S 5:16.

BEELSARUS (1 Es 5:9).—One of the leaders of those Jews who returned to Jerus. with Zerub.; called Bilshan, Ezr 2:2, Neh 7:7.

BEELTETHMUS.—An officer of Artaxerxes residing in Pal., 1 Es 2:16, 25 (LXX 2:21). It is not a proper name, but a title of Rehum, the name immediately preceding it in Ezr 4:8. It is a corruption of be'el te'etm = 'lord of judgment,' and is rendered 'chancellor' by AV and RV in Ezr., 'story-writer' in 1 Es 2:17.

BEELZEBUB.—See BAALZEBUB.

BEER ('a well').—1. A station in the journey from Arnon to the Jordan, mentioned Nu 21:16, with a poetical extract commemorating the digging of a well at this spot. The context indicates the neighbourhood, but further identification is wanting. Perhaps the words translated 'and from the wilderness,' which immediately follow this extract (Nu 21:18), should be translated (following the LXX) 'and from Beer,' or 'the well.' It is generally identified with Beer-elim ('well of mighty men'), mentioned Is 15:8, and in the second part of the compound name it may be conjectured that there is reference to the event commemorated in the song (Nu 21:17, 18). 2. The place to which Jotham ran away after uttering his parable (Jg 9:21). Its position is unknown.

BEERA.—A man of Asher (1 Ch 7:27).

BEERAH.—A Reubenite who was carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5:8).

BEER-ELIM.—See BEER.

BEERI.—1. The father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gn 26:34), sometimes wrongly identified with Anah (wh. see). 2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1:1).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI ('The well of the Living One that seeth me').—A well between Kadesh and Bered where the fleeing Hagar was turned back (Gn 16¹⁴), where Isaac met his bride (24⁶²), and where he dwelt after Abraham's death (25¹¹). 'Ain Muweileh, about 50 miles S.W. of Beersheba, has been suggested as a not impossible identification. It is a station where there are several wells, on the caravan route from Syria to Egypt.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BEEROTH ('wells').—A Gibeonite city, usually coupled in enumeration with Chephirah and Kiriath-jearim (Jos 9¹⁷, Ezr 2², Neh 7²⁹); assigned to the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁵, 2 S 4²); the home of Rechab, murderer of Ish-bosheth (2 S 4²), and of Naharai, arinour-bearer of Joab (2 S 23³⁷). Bireh, about 10 miles from Jerusalem on the main road to the north, is the usual identification, and there seems no special reason for objecting thereto. The circumstances and date of the flight of the Beerothites to Gittaim (2 S 4²) are not recorded.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.—Probably certain wells in the territory of some nomad Horite tribe (Gn 36²⁷, 1 Ch 12²), the Benē Jaakan; a halting-place in the Israelite wanderings, between Moseroth and Hor-haggid-gad (Nu 33³¹, 32, Dt 10⁶). The site is unknown.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BEERSHEBA.—A halting-place of Abraham (Gn 21³¹), where Hagar was sent away (Gn 21¹⁴), and where he made a covenant with Abimelech, from which the place is alleged to take its name ('well of the covenant,' according to one interpretation). Isaac after his disputes with the Philistines settled here (26²³), and discovered the well Shibah, another etymological speculation (v. 33). Hence Jacob was sent away (28¹⁰), and returned and sacrificed on his way to Egypt (46¹). It was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Jos 15²⁴), but set apart for the Simeonites (19²). Here Samuel's sons were judges (1 S 8²), and hither Elijah fled before Jezebel (1 K 19⁵). Zibiah, the mother of Joash, belonged to Beersheba (2 K 12⁴). It was an important holy place; here Abraham planted a sacred tree (Gn 21³¹), and theophanies were vouchsafed to Hagar (v. 17), to Isaac (26²⁴), to Jacob (46²), and to Elijah (1 K 19⁵). Amos couples it with the shrines of Bethel and Gilgal (Am 5⁵), and oaths by its nomen are denounced (8¹⁴). It is recognized as the southern boundary of Palestine in the frequent phrase 'from Dan unto Beersheba' (Jg 20¹ etc.). Seven ancient wells exist here, and it has been suggested that these gave its name to the locality; the suffixed numeral being perhaps due to the influence of the syntax of some pre-Semitic language, as in Kiriath-arba ('Tetrapolis'). The modern name is Bir es-Seba', where are extensive remains of a Byzantine city; the ancient city is probably at Tell es-Seba', about 2 miles to the east. Till recently the site was deserted by all but Bedouin; now a modern town has sprung up, built from the ruins of the ancient structures, and has been made the seat of a sub-governor.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BE-ESHTERAH (Jos 21²⁷).—See ASHTAROTH.

BEETLE (chagbōl).—In RV 'cricket' (Lv 11²²), probably a grasshopper or locust. See LOCUST.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BEFORE.—In Gn 12²⁸ 'Haran died before his father Terah,' the meaning is 'in the presence of' as RV, literally 'before the face of.'

BEHEADING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10.

BEHEMOTH.—The hippopotamus (Job 40¹⁵), as leviathan (41¹) is the crocodile. It has been suggested that the ancient Babylonian Creation-myth underlies the poet's description of the two animals (Gunkel, Schöpfung, u. Chaos, 61 ff.). This is doubtful, but the myth undoubtedly reappears in later Jewish literature; 'And in that day will two monsters be separated, a female named Leviathan to dwell in the abyss over the fountains of waters. But the male is called Behemoth, which occupies with its breast [?] an immeasurable desert named Dendain' (En 60⁷; cf. 2 Es 6⁴⁻⁴¹, Apoc. Bar 29⁴, Baba bathra 74b). Behemoth is rendered by 'beasts' in Is 30⁶. This may be correct, but the oracle which follows says nothing about the 'beasts of the south'; either the text is corrupt or the title may have been prefixed because Rahab, another name for the chaos-monster, occurs in v. 7. The psalmist confesses, 'Behemoth was I with thee' (Ps 73²²). The LXX understood this to be an abstract noun, 'Beast-like was I with thee'; others substitute the sing., and render 'a beast,' etc. J. TAYLOR.

BEKA (AV Bekah).—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BEL, originally one of the Bab. triad, but synonym. in OT and Apocr. with Merodach, 'the younger Bel,' the tutelary god of Babylon (Jer 50² 51⁴, Is 46¹, Bar 6¹¹). See also BAAL, ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA. 'Bel and the Dragon' (in art. APOCRYPHA, § 7).

BELA.—1. A king of Edom (Gn 36²², 33, cf. 1 Ch 14¹). The close resemblance of this name to that of 'Balaam, the son of Beor,' the seer, is noteworthy, and has given rise to the Targum of Jonathan reading 'Balaam, the son of Beor' in Gn 36²². 2. The eldest of the sons of Benjamin (Gn 46²¹, Nu 26³⁸ [patronym. Belaites, 1 Ch 7⁶ 8¹]). 3. A Reubenite who was a dweller in the Moabite territory (1 Ch 5⁴¹). It is noteworthy that this Bela, like the Edomite king mentioned above, seems to have been traditionally connected with the Euphrates. 4. A name of Zoar (Gn 14² 8).

BELEMUS, 1 Es 2¹⁶ (18, LXX).—See BISHLAM.

BELIAL (BELIAR).—This word, rendered by AV and RV as a proper noun in the majority of the OT passages, is in reality a compound, meaning 'worthlessness,' whence 'wickedness,' 'destruction,' and as such is construed with another noun. In the sense of 'wickedness,' it occurs in 1 S 11⁶ 'daughter of wickedness,' i.e. 'a wicked woman' (cf. Dt 13¹³ 15⁹, Jg 9²² 20¹³, 1 S 21² 10²⁷ 25¹⁷, 2 S 16⁷ 20¹ 23¹, 1 K 21¹⁰ 13, 2 Ch 13⁷, Pr 6¹² 16²⁷ 19²⁸, for similar usage). As 'destruction,' it is found in Ps 17⁹ (cf. 2 S 22⁵) 41⁸ and Nah 1¹¹ 15 (note in Nah 1¹⁶ independent use, 'man' understood; RV 'wicked one'; others, 'destroyer'). Having such a meaning, it is used by St. Paul as a name for Satan (personification of unclean heathenism, 2 Co 6¹⁵), the Greek text spelling it 'Beliar' (AV and RV 'Belial'), a variation due to the harsh pronunciation of 'l' in Syriac. N. KOENIG.

BELIEF.—Older Eng. (akin to tief and love) for the Lat.-French 'faith,' which displaced it in AV everywhere except in 2 Th 2¹³. RV follows AV except in Ro 10¹⁶, where it restores 'belief,' after Tindale, in continuity with 'believe.' 'Unbelief' held its ground as the antonym (Mt 13¹⁸, etc., Ro 3³ etc.). In modern Eng., 'faith' signifies ethical, 'belief' intellectual, credence: 'faith,' trust in a person; 'belief,' recognition of a fact or truth beyond the sphere of sensible observation or demonstrative proof. See FAITH.

G. G. FINDLAY.

BELL.—A number of small bronze bells, both of the ordinary shape with clapper and of the 'ball and slit' form, have been found at Gezer (PEFS, 1904, 354, with illustr.). The bells of 'pure gold' (Ex 39²), which alternated with pomegranate ornaments on the skirt of the high priest's robe (28³¹), were doubtless of one or other of these forms. Their purpose is stated in v. 2, but the underlying idea is obscure (see the Comm.). The 'bells of the horses' of Zec 14²⁰ represent another word akin to that rendered 'cymbals.' Whether these ornaments were really bells or, as is usually supposed, small metal discs (cf. the 'crescents' of Jg 8²¹ RV) is uncertain. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BELLOWS.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 2.

BELMAIM (Jth 4⁷³).—It seems to have lain south of Dothan, but the topography of Judith is very difficult. Bileam in Manasseh lay farther north than Dothan.

BELOVED.—See LOVE.

BELSHAZZAR.—Son of Nebuchadnezzar, last king of Babylon before its capture by Cyrus (Dn 5). The name is somewhat variously given: Baltasar, Bar 1^{11f}. [so also LXX and Theod. in Daniel]; and Josephus says he was son of Nabonadōs. There is no doubt that Belshazzar, son of Nabonidus, is meant. He was regent in Babylon during the latter part of his father's reign. It is probable that he was in command of Babylon on its surrender, as he had been in command of the army in Akkad till the 11th year of his father's reign.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

BELTESHAZZAR.—Nebuchadnezzar is said to have conferred this name on the youthful Daniel (Dn 1⁷). The Babylonian form would be Balatsu-usur ('protect his life!') or, according to 4⁸, Bel balatsu-usur. The LXX and Theodotion employ Baltasar both for it and for Belshazzar (ch. 5); and pseudo-Epiphanius repeats a legend that Nebuchadnezzar wished to make the two men co-heirs.

J. TAYLOR.

BEN ('son').—A Levite, 1 Ch 15¹⁸, omitted in parallel list in v. 20 in both MT and LXX. The latter omits it also in the first-named passage.

BEN-ABINADAB (AV 'son of Abinadab').—One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4¹¹).

BENAIAH ('Jah hath built').—1. A brave soldier from Kabzeel in Judah (2 S 23^{30f}), captain of David's bodyguard (8¹⁸ 20²³). He became a partisan of Solomon's and carried 'the mighty men,' the Cherethites and Pelethites, with him (1 K 17⁸⁻³⁸). He played an important rôle in the young king's coronation (vv. 38, 44), and was subsequently ordered to dispatch Joab, whose place as commander-in-chief he then filled (28³⁻²⁵). 2. One of the thirty who formed the second class of David's heroes (2 S 23²⁷). He came from Pirathon in Mt. Ephraim (2 S 23³⁰, cf. Jg 12¹⁵). 1 Ch 27¹⁴ assigns to him the command of the course for the eleventh month, with twenty-four thousand Ephraimites under him. 3. Some ten obscure persons of this name appear in 1 Ch 4³⁸ 15¹⁸, 20²⁴ 16⁵, 2 Ch 20¹⁴ 31¹³, Ezr 10²⁵, 30³⁵, 43, Ezk 11¹².

J. TAYLOR.

BEN-AMMI ('son of my blood-relative' or 'son of my father's kinsman').—The story (Gn 19) purports to explain the name Ammon (v. 16). Notwithstanding the fact that incestuous marriages were common amongst these people, it is most likely that the narrative is a product of the bitter hatred which was excited by prolonged contests for the territory E. of Jordan.

J. TAYLOR.

BEN-DEKER (AV 'son of Dekar').—One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4⁹).

BENE-BERAK.—A town in the territory of Dan (Jos 19⁴³), identified with Ibn Ibrāq, about 5 miles E. of Jaffa, on the N. of Wādī Nusrah.

W. EWING.

BENEFACITOR.—Lk 22²⁸ only, 'they that exercise authority over them (the Gentiles) are called benefactors.' The word is an exact tr. of the Gr. Euergetēs, a title of honour borne by two of the Gr. kings of Egypt before Christ's day, Ptolemy III. (B.C. 247–222) and Ptolemy VII. (ix.) (B.C. 147–117). Hence RV properly spells with a capital, 'Benefactors.'

BENE-JAAKAN.—A station in the journeyings, mentioned Nu 33¹¹, 22 (cf. Dt 10⁶, and see BEEROOTH-BENE-JAAKAN).

BEN-GEBER (AV 'son of Geber').—Patronymic of one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers who had charge of a district N.E. of the Jordan (1 K 4¹²).

BEN-HADAD.—The name of three kings of Damascus in the 9th cent. B.C.

1. Benhadad I., the son of Tab-rimmon of Damascus. At the instance of Asa of Judah he intervened against Baasha of Israel, and took from him valuable territory on his northern border. For this service Benhadad received from Asa costly treasures from the Temple and royal palace (1 K 15¹⁷⁻²⁰).

2. Benhadad II., son of the preceding, was an able general and statesman. He was at the head of a league of western princes who successfully opposed the attempts of Shalmaneser II. of Assyria to conquer southern Syria. At the battle of Karkar in B.C. 854 he had Ahab of Israel as one of his chief allies. In his time war with Israel was the rule, he being usually successful. But Ahab was more fortunate in the campaigns of 856 and 855, which were followed by a treaty of peace with concessions to Israel (1 K 20). On the resumption of hostilities in the third year thereafter, Benhadad was victorious (1 K 22). He was assassinated by the usurper Hazael about B.C. 843 (2 K 8¹⁸).

3. Benhadad III., son of Hazael, probably the same as the Mari' of the Assyrian inscriptions. Under him Damascus lost his father's conquests in Palestine (2 K 13^{11f}), and he also suffered heavily from the Assyrians.

J. F. McCURDY.

BEN-HAIL ('son of might').—A prince sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁷).

BEN-HANAN ('son of a gracious one').—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4²⁰).

BEN-HESED (AV 'son of Hese'd' [= 'kindness']).—One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers who had charge of a district in Judah (1 K 4¹⁹).

BEN-HUR (AV 'son of Hur').—One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4⁹).

BENINU (perhaps 'our son').—One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹³).

BENJAMIN.—1. The youngest son of Jacob by Rachel, and the only full brother of Joseph (Gn 30^{21f}. [JE] 35¹⁷ [J] 35²⁴ [P]). He alone of Jacob's sons was native-born. J (Gn 35¹⁹) puts his birth near Ephrath in Benjamin. A later interpolation identifies Ephrath with Bethlehem, but cf. 1 S 10². P, however (Gn 35²²⁻²⁵), gives Paddan-aram as the birth-place of all Jacob's children. His mother, dying soon after he was born, named him Ben-oni ('son of my sorrow'). Jacob changed this ill-omened name to the more auspicious one Benjamin, which is usually interpreted 'son of my right hand,' the right hand being the place of honour as the right side was apparently the lucky side (cf. Gn 48¹⁴). Pressed by a famine, his ten brothers went down to Egypt, and Jacob, solicitous for his welfare, did not allow Benjamin to accompany them; but Joseph made it a condition of his giving them corn that they should bring him on their return. When Judah (Gn 43⁹ J) or Reuben (42²⁷ E) gave surety for his safe return, Jacob yielded. Throughout the earlier documents Benjamin is a tender youth, the idol of his father and brothers. A late editor of P (Gn 46²¹) makes him, when he entered Egypt, the father of ten sons, that is more than twice as many as Jacob's other sons except Dan, who had seven.

The question is, What is the historical significance of these conflicting traditions? Yāmin, 'right hand,' appears to have been used geographically for 'south,' and Ben-yāmin may mean 'son(s) of the south,' i.e. the southern portion of Ephraim. Ben-oni may be connected with On in the tribe of Benjamin. The two names may point to the union of two related tribes, and the persistence of the traditions that Benjamin was the full brother of Joseph, whereas the other Joseph tribes (Manasseh and Ephraim) are called sons, would indicate not only a close relationship to Joseph, but also a comparatively early development into an independent tribe. On the other hand, J E P all make Benjamin the youngest son, and P gives Canaan as his native land. This points to a traditional belief that the tribe was the last to develop. This and the fact that Shimel, a Benjamite, claims (2 S 19²⁰) to be 'of the house of Joseph,' suggest that the tribe was an offshoot of the latter.

The limits of the tribal territory are given by P in Jos 18¹¹⁻²¹. Within it lay Bethel (elsewhere assigned to Ephraim), Ophrah, Geba, Gibeon, Ramah, Mizpeh,

BENJAMIN GATE

Gibeah, all primitive seats of Canaanitish worship and important centres in the cultus of Israel (cf. e.g., Bethel, Am 7^{10f.}). Jericho, where in early times there may have been a cult of the moon-god (Jārēach = 'moon'), and Jerusalem are also assigned to Benjamin. Dt 33², as commonly but not universally interpreted, also assigns Jerusalem to Benjamin, though later it belonged to Judah. Anathoth, the birth-place of Jeremiah, also lay in Benjamin (Jos 21¹⁸ [P]). In the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49⁷) a fierce and warlike character is ascribed to Benjamin. The statement is all the more important, since in this 'Blessing' we have certainly to deal with vaticinia post eventum. The rugged and unfriendly nature of the tribal territory doubtless contributed to martial hardihood. The tribe participated in the war against Sisera (Jg 5¹⁴). A late and composite story is found in Jg 19–21 of an almost complete annihilation of the tribe by the rest of the Israelites. Later the tribe gave to united Israel its first king, Saul of Gibeah. It had in Asa's army, according to 2 Ch 14⁸, 280,000 picked warriors—an exaggeration of course, but a very significant one in this connexion. Benjamin, under Sheba, a kinsman of Saul, led in the revolt against David when the quarrel provoked by David's partisanship broke out between Judah and the northern tribes (2 S 20^{1f.}). From the first the tribe was loyal to the house of Saul and violently opposed to David (cf. 2 S 16², 20³). In the revolt against the oppressions of Rehoboam it joined with the North (1 K 12²⁰). A variant account joins it with Judah (12^{21f.}), but this is only a reflexion of later times. The history of the tribe is unimportant after David. Besides Saul and Jeremiah, St. Paul also traced descent to this tribe (Ph 3⁵). See also TRIBES. 2. A great-grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 7¹⁰). 3. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³²; prob. also Neh 3³² 12³⁴). JAMES A. CRAIG.

BENJAMIN GATE.—See TEMPLE.

BENO ('his son').—In both AV and RV a proper name in 1 Ch 24²⁷, but we should perhaps render, 'of Jaaziah his son, even the sons of Merari by Jaaziah his son' (Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

BENONI.—See BENJAMIN.

BEN-ZOHEHETH.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4²⁰).

BEON (Nu 32³).—Prob. = Baal-meon (wh. see).

BEOR.—1. Father of Balaam, Nu 22⁵ 24³. ¹¹ J, Jos 24⁹, also Nu 31⁸, Dt 23¹, Jos 13²², Mic 6⁴, 2 P 2¹⁶ (Bosor, AV and RVm). 2. Father of Bela, king of Edom, Gn 36²³ J, 1 Ch 14¹.

BERA.—King of Sodom at time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gn 14²).

BERACAH ('blessing').—1. One of Saul's brethren who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12³). 2. 'The valley of blessing,' where Jehoshaphat gave thanks for victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, who had marched from Engedi to Tekoa (vv. 2–10). The name survives at the ruin Bereikūt on the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, west of Tekoa.

BERAIAH.—A man of Benjamin (1 Ch 8²¹).

BEREA (1 Mac 9⁴).—See BERGEE 3.

BERECHIAH.—1. Father of Asaph (1 Ch 6³⁹, AV Berachiah). 2. Son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²⁰). 3. Father of Meshullam, one of Nehemiah's chiefs (Neh 3³⁴, 36 6¹⁴). 4. A Levite guard of the ark (1 Ch 9¹⁸ 15²³). 5. Father of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 1¹). 6. An Ephraimite chief (2 Ch 28¹²).

BERED.—1. An unknown place, mentioned but once (Gn 16⁴) as an indication fixing the site of Beer-lahai-roi. The identification with Halasah, which has been suggested, is mere guess-work. 2. See BECHER, No. 1. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BERI.—A division of an Asherite clan (1 Ch 7³).

BERIAH.—1. Son of Asher (Gn 46¹⁷, Nu 26⁴,

BETHABARA

1 Ch 7^{30f.}). 2. Son of Ephraim, begotten in the days of mourning occasioned by the death of Ephraim's four sons, who were killed by the men of Gath whilst cattle-raiding; hence the false etymology, bera'ah = 'in affliction' (1 Ch 7²³). 3. A Benjamite at Ajalon, who, with Shema, put the Gathites to flight (cf. No. 2). 4. Son of the Levite Shimei (1 Ch 23^{10f.}). He and his brother Jeush had not many sons, and therefore were counted as a single family. J. TAYLOR.

BERITES.—Descendants of Beriah, No. 1 (Nu 26⁴⁴).

BERITES.—2 S 20¹⁴. The reading Bichrites is suggested, though not actually given, by LXX and Vulg. See art. SHEBA.

BERNICE or BERENICE.—Sister of Agrippa II. (Ac 25¹³, 23 26³⁰), married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis.

BERODACH-BALADAN.—See MERODACH-BALADAN.

BERGEE.—1. A town in the district of Macedonia called Emathia. The earliest certain reference to it occurs in an inscription of the end of the 4th cent. B.C. After the battle of Pydna (B.C. 168) it was the first city which surrendered to the Romans. In winter B.C. 49–48 it was the headquarters of Pompey's infantry. In St. Paul's time there was a Jewish community there to which he preached the gospel with success (Ac 17¹⁰, 12 [Sopater, a native] 20⁴). It was a populous city, and is in modern times called Verria by Greeks, Karaferio by Turks, and Ber by Slavs.

2. The place where Antiochus Eupator caused Menelaus, the ex-high priest, to be put to death (2 Mac 13⁴). It is now the well-known Haleb or Aleppo, with about 100,000 inhabitants.

3. Mentioned 1 Mac 9⁴, perhaps the same as Beeroth (Jos 9¹⁷ or Beroth (1 Es 5¹³); modern Bireh, about 10 miles N. of Jerusalem. A. SOUTER.

BEROTH.—1 Es 5¹³ = Beeroth of Ezr 2³⁶.

BEROTHAN, BEROETHAI.—A city of Syria, despoiled by David (2 S 8⁸), and named by Ezekiel as a limiting point in his ideal restoration of the kingdom (Ezk 47¹⁶). Ezekiel places it between Hamath and Damascus; the site is otherwise unknown. In 1 Ch 18⁸, which is parallel to 2 S 8⁸, for Berothai is substituted Cun. [Berothite in 1 Ch 11³⁹ is obviously meant for Berothite. See BEEROTH]. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BERYL.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

BERZELUS.—See ZORZELLEUS.

BESAI.—Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁴⁰ Neh 7³²; = Basthai, 1 Es 5³¹).

BESODEIAH (Neh 3⁸).—Meshullam, the son of Besodeiah, took part in repairing the Old Gate.

BESOM (lit. 'sweeper') occurs only fig. Is 14²³, 'I will sweep it [Babylon] with the sweeper of destruction.' One such besom of twigs the writer remembers having seen in the museum of Egyptian antiquities in Cairo.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BESOR (Brook).—A torrent-valley, apparently S. or S.W. of Ziklag (1 S 30⁹, 10 21). It is probably the modern Wady Ghuzzeh, which empties itself into the sea S.W. of Gaza.

BESTIALITY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

BETAH (2 S 8⁹).—See TIBHATH.

BETANE (Jth 1³).—A place apparently south of Jerusalem, and not Bethany. It may be the same as Beth-anoth.

BETEN (Jos 19²⁸).—A town of Asher, noticed next to Achshaph. The site is doubtful. In the fourth century it was shown 8 Roman miles east of Ptolemais (Acco). It may be the present village el-B'aneh.

BETH.—The second letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such used in Ps 119 as the heading of the second part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

BETHABARA.—Mentioned once only, Jn 1²⁸, as the scene of John's baptism; the principal codices, followed by the RV, here read Bethany. There is no clue to the position of Bethabara, except that it was probably in or near Galilee (cf. Mt 3⁹). Identification with a ford named 'Abdrah, about 12 miles south of the outlet of the Sea of Galilee, has with some plausibility been suggested.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-ANATH.—A town of Naphtali, now the village 'Ainatha, in the mountains of Upper Galilee.

BETH-ANOTH (Jos 15³⁹).—A town in the mountains of Judah near Gedor. It is the present Beit 'Ainūn, S.E. of Hahul.

BETHANY.—A village about 15 stadia (2910 yards or about 1½ mile) from Jerusalem (Jn 11¹⁸) on the road from Jericho, close to Bethphage and on the Mount of Olives (Mk 11¹, Lk 19²⁹). It was the lodging-place of Christ when in Jerusalem (Mk 11¹¹). Here lived Lazarus and Martha and Mary (Jn 11¹), and here He raised Lazarus from the dead (Jn 11¹). Here also He was entertained by Simon the leper, at the feast where the woman made her offering of ointment (Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³). From 'over against' Bethany took place the Ascension (Lk 24⁵⁰). In this case the topographical indications agree exceptionally with the constant tradition which fixes Bethany at the village of el-'Azariyeh, on the S.E. of the Mount of Olives beside the Jericho road. The tomb of Lazarus and the house of Martha and Mary are definitely pointed out in the village, but of course without any historical authority. For a possible Bethany in Galilee, see BETHABARA.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-ARABAH ('place of the Arabah' [wh. see], Jos 15⁶, 61 18²²).—A place in the Jericho plain, apparently north of Beth-hoglah, in the 'wilderness.' The name has not been recovered.

BETH-ARBEL (Hos 10¹⁴ only).—The site is quite uncertain. It is said to have been spoiled by Shalman (perhaps Shalmaneser III.), and may have been in Syria. Two places called Arbela exist in Palestine, one (now Irbid) west of the Sea of Galilee (Jos. Ant. xii. xi. 1), the other (Irbid) in the extreme north of Gilead, both noticed in the 4th cent. A.D. (Onom. s.v. 'Arbela').

BETHASMOTH (1 Es 5¹⁸).—For Bethazmaveth. See AZMAVETH.

BETH-AVEN ('house of iniquity,' or 'idolatry'?).—Close to Ai (Jos 7²), by the wilderness (18²), north-west of Michmash (1 S 13²), and on the way to Ajlun (14²²), still inhabited in the 8th cent. B.C. (Hos 5⁸). The 'calves of Bethaven' were probably those at Bethel close by (Hos 10⁸). Bethel is probably meant also in Hos 4¹⁵ 5⁸ (see Am 5²⁶) 10⁸ (Aven).

BETH-AZMAVETH (Neh 7²⁸).—See AZMAVETH.

BETH-BAAL-MEON (Jos 13¹⁷).—See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-BARAH (Jg 7²⁴).—Near Jordan and the valley of Jezreel. Some suppose it to be the same as Bethabara, in which case the guttural has been lost in copying.

BETHBASI (1 Mac 9²² 24).—Josephus reads Beth-hoglah. The name has not been recovered.

BETH-BIRI (1 Ch 4²¹).—A town of Simeon, perhaps textual error for Beth-lebaoth, Jos 19⁶=Lebaoth, Jos 15³². The ruin Bireh on the west slopes of the Debir hills may be intended.

BETH-OAR ('house of a lamb').—A place mentioned once only, 1 S 7¹¹, as the terminus of the pursuit of the Philistines under Samuel's guidance. The site is quite unknown, save that it must have been somewhere near Jerusalem, on the west. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-DAGON ('house of Dagon').—1. A city of Judah (Jos 15⁴¹), somewhere in the Shephelah. The name is preserved in the modern Beit Dejan, some 4 miles S.E. of Jaffa. This, however, is quite a modern village. Near it is a Roman site, named Khurbet Dafun. The Biblical Beth-dagon is still to seek. 2. A border city in the tribe of Asher (Jos 19²⁷), not yet discovered.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM ('house of two fig-cakes'?).—In Jer 48²² mentioned with Dibon and Nebo; the next camp to Dibon before Nebo (Nu 33⁴¹).

BETH-EDEN (Am 1⁵ marg.).—See EDEN [HOUSE OF].

BETHEL.—1. On a rocky knoll beside the great road to the north, about 12 miles from Jerusalem, stands the modern Beitūn, a village of some 400 inhabitants, which represents the ancient Bethel. Four springs furnish good water, and in ancient times they were supplemented by a reservoir hewn in the rock, south of the town. Luz was the original name of the town. The name Bethel was first applied to the stone which Jacob set up and anointed (Gn 28²²). See PILLAR. But 'the place' (v. 11 etc.) was evidently one with holy associations. It was visited by Abraham, who sacrificed here (12⁹). This may have induced Jacob to come hither on his way to the north, and again on his return from Paddan-aram. From an eminence to the east almost the whole extent of the plains of Jericho is visible. This may have been the scene of Lot's selfish choice (Gn 13). 'Bethel' in the end prevailed over 'Luz,' and the town came to be known by the name of the sanctuary, the neighbourhood of which lent it distinction.

Bethel, a royal Canaanite city (Jos 12¹⁶), fell to Benjamin in the division of the land (18²⁷), but he failed to make good his possession. It was finally taken by Ephraim (Jg 1²⁷, 1 Ch 7²⁸). Hither the ark was brought from Gilgal (Jg 20¹⁸ LXX), and Bethel was resorted to as a place of sacrifice (1 S 10⁸). The prophetess Deborah dwelt between Bethel and Ramah (Jg 4⁵). In judging Israel, Samuel went from year to year in circuit to Bethel (1 S 7¹⁰). No doubt the ancient sanctity of the place led Jeroboam to choose Bethel as the site of the rival shrine, which he hoped might counteract the influence of the house of the Lord at Jerusalem (1 K 12²⁹). It became the great sanctuary of the Northern Kingdom, and the centre of the idolatrous priests who served in the high places (v. 22). At Bethel, Jeroboam was denounced by the man of God out of Judah (13¹⁸). It was one of the towns taken from Jeroboam by Abijah king of Judah (2 Ch 13¹⁹). It is noteworthy that Elijah is silent regarding the calf-worship at Bethel; and that a school of the prophets, apparently in sympathy with him, flourished there (2 K 2²¹). But the denunciations of Amos (3¹⁴ 4¹ 5⁵ etc.) and Hosea (Hos 4¹⁵ 5⁸ etc.) lack nothing in vehemence. The priest resided at Bethel, who was brought by the king of Assyria to teach the mixed peoples, who lived in the country during the Exile, the manner of the God of the land (2 K 17²⁰). Bethel was reoccupied by the returning exiles (Ezr 2²⁸ etc.). We find it in the hands of Bacchides (1 Mac 9⁵⁰). It was one of the towns 'in the mountains' taken by Vespasian in his march on Jerusalem (Jos. BJ iv. ix. 9).

2. A town in Judah, not identified, called in different places, Bethul, Bethel, and Bethuel (Jos 19⁴, 1 S 30²⁷, 1 Ch 4³⁰).

W. EWING.

BETH-EMEK ('house of the deep valley', Jos 19²⁷).—A town of Zebulun in the border valley, east of Acco, apparently near Cabul. The name has not been recovered.

BETHER ('mountains of cutting'—or 'of divisions,' Ca 2¹⁷).—If a proper name, the famous site of Bether, near Jerusalem, might be intended. Bether is celebrated for the resistance of the Jews to Hadrian under Bar Cochba in A.D. 135. The site was recognized by Canon Williams at Bittr, south-west of Jerusalem—a village on a cliff in a strong position, with a ruin near it called 'Ruin of the Jews,' from a tradition of a great Jewish massacre at this place. See MALORATHRON.

BETHESDA.—A reservoir at Jerusalem, remarkable (according to a gloss inserted in the text in some authoritative MSS) for a periodic disturbance of the water which was supposed to give it healing properties. Here were five porches. It was 'by the sheep-gate.' An impotent man, one of the many who waited for the troubling of the water, was here healed by Christ (Jn 5²). The only body of water at Jerusalem that presents any analogous phenomenon is the intermittent spring known as the Virgin's Fountain, in the Kidron valley, but it is not near the Sheep-gate. There is little that can be said in favour of any other of the numerous identifications that have been proposed for this pool.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-EZEL (Mic 1¹¹).—Perhaps 'place near,' see AVm: mentioned with Zaanan and Shaphir. It seems to have been a place in the Philistine plain, but the site is unknown. According to some it is=Azel of Zec 14⁵.

BETH-GADER (1 Ch 2²⁴), mentioned with Bethlehem and Kirjath-jearim. It may be the same as Geder, Jos 12¹⁵.

BETH-GAMUL (Jer 48²²).—A place in Moab, noticed with Dibon, Kirjathaim, and Beth-meon. It is now the ruin Umm el-Jemal, towards the east of the plateau, south of Medeba.

BETH-GILGAL (Neh 12²⁹, AV 'house of Gilgal'), perhaps identical with Gilgal to the east of Jericho. See GILGAL.

BETH-HACHEREM ('place of the vineyard'), Neh 3¹, Jer 6¹.—It appears to have had a commanding position for a beacon or ensign. Tradition fixed on Herodium south of Bethlehem, probably because it was a conspicuous site near Tekoa, with which it is noticed. A possible site is 'Ain Karim, west of Jerusalem, where there are vineyards.

BETH-HARAM was situated 'in the valley-plain of the Jordan' (Jos 13²⁷). In Nu 32²⁴ Bethharan. Its site has been recovered at Tell Rameh at the mouth of the Wady Heshān, 6 miles east from the familiar bathing-place of pilgrims in the Jordan. It was rebuilt and fortified by Herod Antipas when he became tetrarch, and in honour of the Roman empress was called Livia or Libias. Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 383) gives reasons for believing that it was in the palace here that Herod celebrated his birthday by the feast recorded (Mt 14¹⁻¹², Mk 6²¹⁻²⁹), and that the Baptist's head was brought hither from Machærus, some 20 miles south.

BETH-HARAN (Nu 32²⁶).—See BETH-HARAM.

BETH-HOGLAH ('place of the partridge'), Jos 15⁸ 18¹⁹.—In the Jericho plain. Now the large spring called 'Ain Hajlah, 'partridge spring,' south-east of Jericho.

BETH-HORON.—The upper and nether, two towns represented by the villages Beit 'Ur el-foka and Beit 'Ur et-tahla, said to have been built by Sheerah (1 Ch 7²⁴). Their position, as commanding the ancient great high-road from the maritime plain into the heart of the mountains of Benjamin, made these places of great importance, and several celebrated battles occurred in their neighbourhood. Here Joshua defeated the Canaanites (Jos 10¹⁰⁻¹⁴). Solomon fortified both these cities (2 Ch 8⁵, 1 K 9¹⁷). By this road Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded Judah. Here Judas Maccabæus defeated the Syrian general Seron (1 Mac 3¹³⁻²⁴) and five years afterwards Nicanor (7³⁹⁻⁴⁰); more than 200 years later the Jews at the same place beat back the Roman army under Cestius Gallus. In few places in Palestine can we with greater precision set history in its geographical setting; the whole ancient road, with abundant traces of Roman work, can be followed throughout, and the two Beit 'Urs, less than two miles apart, stand sentinel above the road as the two Beth-horons did in ancient times. The Beth-horons were on the frontier between Benjamin and Ephraim (Jos 16²⁻⁴ and 18¹²⁻¹⁴). They belonged to the latter (Jos 21²²), and followed the Northern Kingdom. Possibly Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 2¹⁰) was from here. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BETH-JESHIMOTH ('the place of the desert').—The S. limit of the encampment on 'the plains of Moab' at the close of the journeyings (Nu 33⁴⁹). In Jos 12⁹ it is mentioned as in the S. of the Arabah towards the Dead Sea. In 13²⁰ it is assigned to Reuben; and in Ezk 25⁹ it is spoken of as belonging to Moab. Eusebius places it 10 miles S. of Jericho. Some ruins and a well at the N.E. end of the Dead Sea bear the name of Suwaimeh, which may be a modification of Jeshimoth; and this situation suits the Biblical narrative.

BETH-LE-APHERAH (AV 'house of Aphrah').—The name of a town apparently in Phil. territory, whose site is quite unknown (Mic 1¹⁰). In the call 'at Beth-le-Aphrah roll thyself in the dust,' there is a double play upon words, 'Aphrah' containing a punning allusion to 'aphar' (dust), and hithpallashi (roll thyself) to Petishti (Philistine).

BETH-LEBAOTH (Jos 19⁴ 'house of lionesses'?).—A town of Simeon. See BETH-BIRI.

BETHLEHEM ('house of bread' or, according to some, 'of the god Lakhmu').—The name of two places in Palestine.

1. Bethlehem of Judah, otherwise Ephrathor Ephrathah, now represented by the town of Beit Lahm, 5 miles S. of Jerusalem. On the way thither Rachel was buried (Gn 35¹⁹ 48⁷). Hence came the two Levites whose adventures are related in Jg 17, 19. It was the home of Elimelech, the father-in-law of Ruth (Ru 1¹), and here Ruth settled with her second husband Boaz, and became the ancestress of the family of David, whose connexion with Bethlehem is emphasized throughout his history (1 S 16¹⁻¹⁸ 17¹² 20⁶ etc.). The Philistines had here a garrison during David's outlawry (2 S 23⁴, 1 Ch 11¹⁶). Here Asahel was buried (2 S 2²³), and hence came Elhanan, one of the mighty men (2 S 23²⁴, cf. 21¹⁹). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 11⁶), and here the murderers of Gedaliah took refuge (Jer 41¹⁷). Whether the Salma referred to in 1 Ch 2²⁴ as 'father of Bethlehem' (whatever that expression may exactly mean) be the same as the Salmon who was father of Boaz (Ru 4²⁰)—a theory the Greek version seems to justify—is doubtful. The town had some sanctity, and is indicated (Ps 132⁶) as a suitable place for the Tabernacle. The birth of the Messiah there is prophesied in Mic 5² (quoted Mt 2⁶, Jn 7⁴²), a prophecy fulfilled by the birth of Christ (Mt 2¹⁻⁶, Lk 2⁴⁻¹⁵). Here Herod sent to seek the new-born Christ, and not finding Him ordered the massacre of the infants of the city (Mt 2⁸⁻¹⁶). The modern town, containing about 8000 inhabitants, is Christian and comparatively prosperous. Within it stands the basilica of the Nativity, founded by Constantine (about 330), and restored by Justinian (about 550) and many later emperors. Within it are shown grottoes in which the various events of the Nativity are localized with the usual unreasoning definiteness.

2. Bethlehem of Zebulun, a place named but once (Jos 19¹⁵), in enumerating the towns of that tribe. It is identified with Beit Lahm, 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. It is probable that this was the home of Ibzan, the judge (Jg 12⁹⁻¹⁰), as almost all the judges belonged to the northern tribes. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-LOMON (1 Es 5¹⁷).—For Bethlehem of Judah.

BETH-MAACAH.—A descriptive epithet of the city of Abel (2 S 20¹⁴⁻¹⁵), where 'Abel and B.' should be 'Abel of B.' (cf. 1 K 15²⁰, 2 K 15²⁰). See ABEL (OF) BETH-MAACAH.

BETH-MARCAOTH ('place of chariots' Jos 19⁴, 1 Ch 4²¹).—A city of Simeon in the southern plains near Ziklag, deserted in David's time; site unknown.

BETH-MEON.—See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MERHAK

BETH-MERHAK (2 S 15¹⁷ RV, for AV 'a place that was far off'; RVM 'the Far House').—Stade and others understand it to mean the last house of the city. No town so called is known between Jerusalem and Jericho.

BETH-MILLO (Jg 9⁸ RVM; 2 K 12²⁰ AVm, text 'house of Millo').—See MILLO.

BETH-NIMRAH ('place of the leopard,' Nu 32²⁸ etc., called Nimrah v. 3, and, some think, Nimrim is 15⁶, see NIMRIM).—A town in the territory E. of Jordan allotted to Reuben. It is represented by the modern Tell Nimrin, 6 miles E. of the Jordan, about 10 miles N. of the Dead Sea, on the S. bank of Wady Shaib.

W. EWING.

BETH-PAZZEZ (Jos (19²¹)).—A town of Issachar near En-gannim and En-haddah. The name has not been recovered.

BETH-PELET (RV; in AV Beth-palet, Jos 15²⁷. Beth-phelet, Neh 11²⁸).—The Paltite, 2 S 23²⁸, called by scribal error Pelonite in 1 Ch 11²⁷ 27¹⁰, was an inhabitant of this place. The site was south of Beer-sheba, but is unknown.

BETH-PEOR.—A city belonging to Reuben (Jos 13²⁰), located most probably some four or five miles north of Mt. Nebo, near the Pisgah range. Just opposite to it, in the ravine (Wady Hesban probably), the Israelites encamped (Dt 32⁴⁶). Moses was buried in the valley 'over against Beth-peor' (Dt 34⁶). Conder suggests a site several miles to the S., near 'Ain el-Minyeh, but the impression given by Nu 25¹⁻³ is that the city was not so far distant from the plain of Shittim.

G. L. ROBINSON.

BETHPHAGE ('house of figs').—The place whence Christ, on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem, sent His disciples to fetch the ass (Mt 21¹, Mk 11¹, Lk 19²⁹). It must have been close to Bethany, and is traditionally identified with Abu Dis, a village that satisfies this condition.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-RAPHA ('house of the giant'?).—An unknown place mentioned in 1 Ch 4¹².

BETH-REHOB.—A town or district near Laish (Jg 18²⁸), whose inhabitants joined the Ammonites against David (2 S 10⁶). Its site is unknown.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETHSAIDA.—A place on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, whither Christ went after feeding the five thousand (Mk 6⁴⁵, cf. Lk 9¹⁰), and where He healed a blind man (Mk 8²³); the home of Philip, Andrew, and Peter (Jn 14¹²). It was denounced by Christ for unbelief (Mt 11²¹, Lk 10¹³). The town was advanced by Philip the tetrarch from a village to the dignity of a city, and named Julias, in honour of Caesar's daughter. The situation is disputed, and, indeed, authorities differ as to whether or not there were two places of the same name, one east, one west of the Jordan. Et-Tell, on the northern shore of the sea, east of the Jordan, is generally identified with Bethsaida Julias: those who consider that the narrative of the crossings of the Lake (Mk 6⁴⁵) requires another site west of the Jordan, seek it usually at 'Ain el-Tabigha near Khan Minyeh. The latest writers, however, seem inclined to regard the hypothetical second Bethsaida as unnecessary (see Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 41), and to regard et-Tell as the scene of all the incidents recorded about the town.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

BETH-SHEAN, BETH-SHAN.—The site of this ancient stronghold, allotted to Manasseh, although in the territory of Issachar (Jos 17¹¹, Jg 17¹), is marked by the great mound and village of Beisan, in the throat of the Vale of Jezreel, where it opens into the Ghor. Manasseh failed to eject the Canaanites, but at a later date they were reduced to servitude. Here the Philistines dishonoured the bodies of Saul and his sons (1 S 31¹²). During the Greek period it was known as Seythopolis; but the ancient name again prevailed in the form of Beisan. After changes of fortune in the Maccabæan struggle, and in the time immediately succeeding, it attained considerable prosperity as a member of the Decapolis (1 Mac 12¹⁰, Jos. Ant. xiv. v. 2, BJ iii. iv. 7, etc.). There must always have been a strong admixture of heathen inhabitants (Jos. Vita, 6; Adhoda Zarah i. 4). It is now in the hands of a body of Circassians.

W. EWING.

BETH-SHEMESH ('house' or 'temple of the sun').—1. A town in Judah (Jos 15¹⁰ etc., called Ir-Shemesh in Jos 19¹¹) allotted to the children of Aaron (Jos 21¹⁸). Hither the ark was brought when sent back by the Philistines, and the inhabitants were smitten because of their profane curiosity (1 S 6). Here Amaziah was defeated and captured by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 K 14¹¹⁻¹³). It was one of the cities taken by the Philistines in the time of Ahaz (2 Ch 28¹⁸). It is identified with the modern 'Ain Shems, on the S. slope of Wady es-Surur, 15 miles W. of Jerusalem. 2. A city in Issachar (Jos 19²²), unidentified. 3. A city in Naphtali (Jos 19³³), unidentified. 4. A city in Egypt, a seat of heathen idolatry (Jer 43¹³), identified with the ancient Heliopolis, called 'Ain Shems by the Arabs (Wallis Budge, The Nile, 281f.).

W. EWING.

BETH-SHITTAH ('place of the acacia,' Jg 7²²).—In the vicinity of Abel-meholah. It is the present Shutta, a village on a knoll, in the Jezreel valley.

BETHSURA (1 Mac 6³², 41 67²⁸, 2. 1. 49 50¹⁰ 10¹⁴ 11¹⁴ 147, 2 Mac 13¹⁹ 22).—The Greek form of Bethsur. In 2 Mac 11¹ Bethsuron.

BETH-TAPPUAH ('place of apples' Jos 15²⁸).—A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains (see Tappuah in 1 Ch 24). Now the village Taffuh, west of Hebron.

BETHUEL.—1. The son of Nahor and Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Laban and Rebekah (Gn 22²³ 24¹⁵, 24. 47. 50 25²⁰ 28² 5). In Gn 28⁶ (P) he is called 'Bethuel the Syrian.' 2. 1 Ch 4²⁰; or Bethul (Jos 19¹). See BETHEL, 2.

BETHUL (Jos 19¹).—See BETHEL, No. 2.

BETHULIA.—The locality of the scenes of the Book of Judith (Jth 4⁶⁻⁷ etc.). If not a synonym for Jerusalem itself, it is an unknown site south of the plain of Jezreel. Mithilyah from the similarity of the name, Sanur from its commanding position, and even Shechem, have all been suggested as possible sites.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BETH-ZACHARIAS (1 Mac 6³², 22).—A village on the mountain pass, south of Jerusalem and west of Bethlehem, now the ruin Beit Sakaria. It was the scene of the defeat of Judas Maccabæus by Lysias.

BETH-ZUR ('house of rock,' Jos 15⁸, 1 S 30²⁷ [in LXX], 1 Ch 24⁶, 2 Ch 11⁷, Neh 3¹⁶).—The Bethsura of 1 Mac 4²⁸ etc. A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, fortified by Rehobam, and still important after the Captivity. Judas Maccabæus here defeated the Greeks under Lysias in B.C. 165. It is the present ruined site, Beit Sur, on a cliff west of the Hebron road, near Halhul.

BETOLION (AV Betolius, 1 Es 5²¹; in Ezz 2²⁸ Bethel).—Fifty-two persons of this place returned from captivity with Zerubbabel.

BETOMASTHAIM (Jth 15⁴, AV Betomasthem); BETOMESTHAIM (4⁸, AV Betomestham).—Apparently N. of Bethulia and facing Dothan. There is a site called Deir Massin W. of the Dothan plain, but the antiquity of this name is doubtful.

BETONIM (Jos 13²³).—In N. Gilead. The name may survive in that of the Butein district, the extreme N. of Gilead.

BETROTHING.—See MARRIAGE.

BEULAH ('married' [of a wife]).—An allegorical name applied to Israel by the Deutero-Isaiah (Is 62⁴ 5). She was no longer to be a wife deserted by God, as she had been during the Captivity, but married

(1) to God, (2) by a strange application of the figure, to her own sons.

BEWITCH—See MAGIC.

BETRAY—To bewray (from Anglo-Saxon prefix be and wreġan, to accuse) is not the same as to betray (from be and Lat. tradere to deliver). To bewray, now obsolete, means in AV to make known, reveal, as Mt 26⁷³ 'thy speech bewrayeth thee.' Adams (Works, ii. 328) distinguishes the two words thus: 'he . . . will not bewray his disease, lest he betray his credit.' Sometimes however, bewray is used in an evil sense, and is scarcely distinguishable from betray. Cf. bewrayer in 2 Mac 4¹ 'a bewrayer of the money, and of his country.'

BEZAANANNIM (Jos 19²⁴ RVm).—See ZAANANNIM.

BEZAI—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10⁸). 2. The eponym of a family that returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2¹⁷, Neh 7²³) = Bassai of 1 Es 5¹⁶.

BEZALEL.—1. The chief architect of the Tabernacle. The name occurs only in P and in the Bk. of Chron. (1 Ch 2², 2 Ch 1⁵). It probably signifies 'in the shadow (i.e. under the protection) of El.' According to P's representation, Bezalel was expressly called by J^r (Ex 31¹) to superintend the erection of the 'tent of meeting,' and endowed with the special gifts required for the proper execution of his task (vv. 3, 6). He was also charged with the construction of the furniture for court and Tabernacle, as well as with the preparation of the priestly garments, and of the necessary oil and incense. Among the gifts thus bestowed upon him, not the least was the gift of teaching the arts of which he was himself a master, to his subordinates (Ex 35³⁴), the chief of whom was Oholiab (Ex 31¹ 35³⁴ etc.). 2. One of the sons of Pahath-moab who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁰). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BEZEK.—Two places so called are perhaps to be distinguished in OT. 1. Jg 1⁵. A place attacked by Judah after Joshua's death, probably Bezakah, a ruin W. of Jerusalem, in the lower hills. 2. 1 S 11⁸, where Saul gathered Israel before advancing on Jabesh-gilead. The most likely site in this connexion is the ruin Izbik, N.E. of Shechem, opposite Jabesh.

BEZER ('fortress').—1. An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁷). 2. A city belonging to Reuben, situated 'in the wilderness, on the mtshôr,' or flat table-land, E. of Jordan (Dt 4⁴ Jos 20²); a city of refuge allotted, according to P to the Merarites (Jos 21³⁴, whence 1 Ch 6⁷⁴ (63)). It is mentioned also by Mesha' (Moab. Stone, l. 27), as being in ruins in his day, and as having been rebuilt by him, after his revolt from Ahab, and expulsion of the Israelites from the territory N. of the Arnon. From its being described as being in the 'wilderness' (cf. Dt 2²) it may be inferred that it was situated towards the E. border of the Moabite table-land. The site has not yet been recovered.

BEZETH.—An unknown site, apparently near Jerusalem (1 Mac 7¹⁹).

BIBLE.—1. The Name.—The word 'Bible' strictly employed is the title of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, though occasionally by a loose usage of the term it is applied to the sacred writings of pagan religions. It is derived from a Greek word Biblia—originating in biblos, the inner bark of papyrus (paper)—literally meaning 'Little Books'; but since the diminutive had come into common use in late popular Greek apart from its specific signification, the term really means simply 'books.' It is the Gr. tr. of the Heb. word for 'books,' which is the oldest designation for the Jewish Scriptures as a collection (see Dn 9²). The title 'Holy Books'—equivalent to our 'Holy Scripture'—came later among the Jews (1 Mac 12⁹, Ro 1², 2 Ti 3¹⁶). The Greek word Biblia is first met with in this connexion in the Introduction to Sirach, written by the grandson of Sirach, the phrase 'the rest of the books' implying that the Law and the Prophets previously named, as well as those books subsequently known specially as 'the Writings,' are included. It is used in the Hebrew sense, for the OT, by the unknown author of the Christian homily in the 2nd cent., designated The Second Epistle of Clement (xiv. 2). It does not appear as a title of the whole Christian Scriptures before the 5th cent., when it was thus employed by Greek Church writers in lists of the canonical books. Thence it passed over into the West, and then the Greek word Biblia, really a neuter plural, came to be treated as a Latin singular noun, a significant grammatical change that pointed to the growing sense of the unity of Scripture. The word cannot be traced in Anglo-Saxon literature, and we first have the English form of it in the 14th century. It occurs in Piers Plowman and Chaucer. Its adoption by Wyclif secured it as the permanent English name for the Scriptures, as Luther's use of the corresponding German word fixed that for Continental Protestants.

2. Contents and Divisions.—The Jewish Bible is the OT; the Protestant Christian Bible consists of the OT and the NT, but with the Apocrypha included in some editions; the Roman Catholic Bible contains the OT and NT, and also the Apocrypha the latter authoritatively treated as Scripture since the Council of Trent. The main division is between the Jewish Scriptures and those which are exclusively Christian. These are known respectively as the OT and the NT. The title 'Testament' is unfortunate, since it really means a will. It appears to be derived from the Latin word testamentum, 'a will,' which is the tr. of the Gr. word diathēkē, itself in the classics also meaning 'a will.' But the LXX employs this Gr. word as the tr. of the Heb. berith, a word meaning 'covenant.' Therefore 'testament' in the Biblical sense really means 'covenant,' and the two parts of our Bible are the 'Old Covenant' and the 'New Covenant.' When we ask why the Gr. translators used the word meaning 'will' while they had ready to hand another word meaning 'covenant' (viz. synthēkē), the answer has been proposed that they perceived the essential difference between God's covenants with men and men's covenants one with another. The latter are arranged on equal terms. But God's covenants are made and offered by God and accepted by men only on God's terms. A Divine covenant is like a will in which a man disposes of his property on whatever terms he thinks fit. On the other hand, however, it may be observed that the word diathēkē is also used for a covenant between man and man (e.g. Dt 7⁷). The origin of this term as applied by Christians to the two main divisions of Scripture is Jeremiah's promise of a New Covenant (Jer 31³¹), endorsed by Christ (Mk 14²⁴, 1 Co 11²⁵), and enlarged upon in NT teaching (e.g. Gal 4²⁴, He 8⁶). Here, however, the reference is to the Divine arrangements and pledges, not to the books of Scripture, and it is by a secondary usage that the books containing the two covenants have come to be themselves designated Testaments, or Covenants.

The Jewish division of the OT is into three parts known as (1) the Law, (2) the Prophets, and (3) the Writings, or the Sacred Writings (Hagiographa). The 'Law' consisted of the first 5 books of our Bible (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy), ascribed to Moses; and it was treated as peculiarly sacred, the most holy and authoritative portion of Scripture. It was the only part of the Hebrew Scriptures accepted by the Samaritans, who worshipped the very document containing it almost as a fetish. But the name 'Law' (Heb. Torah, Gr. Nomos) is sometimes given to the whole Jewish Bible (e.g. Jn 10³⁴). The 'Prophets' included not only the utterances ascribed to inspired teachers of Israel, but also the chief historical books later than the Pentateuch. There were reckoned to be 8 books of the Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets) and 11 of the Hagiographa (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, and Chronicles). Thus there were reckoned to be in all 24 books. Josephus reckoned 22—probably joining Judges to Ruth and Lamentations to Jeremiah. The list was reduced to this number by taking Samuel, Kings, Ezra and Nehemiah, and Chronicles as one book each, and by making one book of the Minor Prophets. Ezra is not divided from Nehemiah in the Talmud or the Massora.

The books now known as the Apocrypha were not in the Hebrew Bible, and were not used in the Palestinian synagogues. They were found in the LXX, which represents the enlarged Greek Canon of Alexandria. From this they passed into the Latin versions, and so into Jerome's revision, the Vulgate, which in time became the authorized Bible of the Roman Catholic Church. They were not accepted by the Protestants as Divinely inspired, but were printed in some Protestant Bibles between the OT and the NT, not in their old places in the Septuagint and Vulgate versions, where they were interspersed with the OT books as though forming part of the OT itself. The Apocrypha consists of 14 books (1 and 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, The Rest of Esther, The Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch with the Epistle of Jeremy, The Song of the Three Holy Children, The History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, The Prayer of Manasses, 1 and 2 Maccabees).

The NT was slowly formed. Probably the first collection of any of its books was the bringing together of the Synoptic Gospels into one volume (called by Justin Martyr 'The Memoirs of the Apostles'). Subsequently the Fourth Gospel was included in this volume; Tatian's Diatessaron is a witness to this fact. Meanwhile collections of St. Paul's Epistles were being made, and thus there came to be two volumes known as 'The Gospel' and 'The Apostle.' The Apocalypse was early honoured as a prophetic book standing by itself. Gradually the other NT books were gathered in—probably forming a third volume. Thus the NT—like the OT—consisted of three parts—the Four Gospels, the Pauline Writings, and the remaining books. The similarity may be traced a step further. In both cases the first of the three divisions held a primacy of honour—the Law among the Jews, the Gospels among the Christians. The complete NT consists of 27 books, viz. Four Gospels, Acts, 13 Epistles of St. Paul, Hebrews, James, 2 Epistles of St. Peter, 3 of St. John, Jude, Revelation.

Within the books of the Bible there were originally no divisions, except in the case of the Psalms, which were always indicated as separate poems, and elsewhere in the case of definite statements of differences of contents, such as the Song of Miriam, the Song of Deborah, 'the words of Agur,' and 'the words of King Lemuel' (in Prov.). For convenience of reading in the synagogues, the Law was divided into sections (called Parashahs). Selections from the Prophets (called Haphtarahs) were made to go with the appointed sections of the Law. The first indications of divisions in the NT are ascribed to Tatian. They did not break into the text, but were inserted in the margins. The earliest divisions of the Gospels were known as 'titles' (Titloi); somewhat similar divisions were indicated in the Epistles by 'headings' or 'chapters' (Kephalaia), a form of which with more numerous divisions than the 'titles' was also introduced into the Gospels. Eusebius based his harmony on the references of the sections said to have been arranged by Ammonius of Alexandria in the early part of the 3rd cent., and therefore known as the 'Ammonian Sections.' These are much shorter than our chapters. Thus in Matthew there were 68 'titles' and 355 'Ammonian Sections'; in Mark the numbers were 48 and 236, in Luke 83 and 342, and in John 18 and 232 respectively. The chapters in the Acts and the Epistles are ascribed to Euthalius, a deacon of Alexandria (subsequently bishop of Sulci, in Sardinia) in the 5th century. These chapters nearly corresponded in length to the Gospel 'titles.' Thus there were 40 in Acts, 19 in Romans, etc. A still smaller division c^t the books of Scripture was that of the stichoi, or lines, a word used for a line of poetry, and then for a similar length of prose, marked off for the payment of copyists. Subsequently it was employed for the piece of writing which a reader was supposed to render without taking breath, and the marks of the stichoi would be helps for the reader, indicating where he might pause. In Matthew there were 2560 stichoi; the same Gospel has 1071 modern verses. Scrivener calculates 19,241 stichoi for the 7959 modern verses of the whole NT—giving an average of nearly 2½ stichoi per verse. Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro is credited with having made our present chapter divisions about A.D. 1248 when preparing a Bible index. But it may be that he borrowed these divisions from an earlier scholar, possibly Lanfranc, or Stephen Langton. The Hebrew Bible was divided into verses by Rabbi Nathan in the 15th century. Henry Stephens states that his father Robert Stephens made verse divisions in the NT during the intervals of a journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons. Whether he actually invented these arrangements or copied them from some predecessor, they were first published in Stephens' Greek Testament of 1551.

3. Historical Origin.—The Bible is not only a library, the books of which come from various writers in different periods of time; many of these books may be said to be composed of successive literary strata, so that the authors of the most ancient parts of them belong to much earlier times than their final redactors. All the OT writers, and also all those of the NT with one exception (St. Luke), were Jews. The OT was nearly all written in the Holy Land; the only exceptions being in the case of books composed in the valley of the Euphrates during the Exile (Ezekiel, possibly Lamentations, Deutero-Isaiah, or part of it, perhaps some of the Psalms, a revision of the Law). The NT books were written in many places; most of the Epistles of St. Paul can be located; the Gospel and Epistles of St. John probably come from Ephesus or its neighbourhood; but the sites of the origin of all the other books are doubtful.

Probably the oldest book of the Bible is Amos, written about B.C. 750. A little later in the great 8th cent. we come to Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah. The 7th cent. gives us Nahum, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and Habakkuk among the prophets, also Deuteronomy, and at the beginning of this century we have the earliest complete historical books, Samuel and Judges. The end of this century or beginning of the 6th cent. gives us Kings. In the 6th cent. also we have Obadiah (?), Ezekiel, part, if not all, of the Deutero-Isaiah (40-50), Haggai, Zechariah (1-8), Lamentations, Ruth. The 5th cent. gives us the completed Pentateuch—or rather the Hexateuch, Joshua going with the 5 books of the Law, perhaps the latter part of the Deutero-Isaiah (51-60), Malachi, Books 1 and 2 of the Psalter. The 4th cent. has Proverbs, Job, Book 3 of the Psalter, and the Prophets Joel and Jonah. From the 3rd cent. we have Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, Zechariah (9-14), Ecclesiastes, Esther. Lastly, the 2nd cent. is credited with Daniel and Books 4 and 5 of the Psalter. Several of these later dates are more or less conjectural. Moreover, they refer to the completion of works some of which are composite and contain elements which originated in much earlier times. Thus Proverbs and the 5 Books of the Psalms are all collections which, though probably made at the dates assigned to them, consist of materials many of which are considerably older. When we look to the analysis of the books, and inquire as to the dates of their constituent parts, we are carried back to pre-historic ages. The Hexateuch contains four principal parts, known as J (the Jahwistic prophetic narrative), E (the Elohist prophetic narrative), D (Deuteronomy and Deuteronomic notes in other books), P (the Priestly Code, represented especially by Leviticus, the author of which revised the earlier parts of the Law-books and inserted additions into them). But J and E are closely intertwined—an indication that they have both been revised—and the result of this revision gives us the composite narrative known as JE. Thus we have now three main strata, viz. (1) JE, the prophetic element, written in the spirit of the prophets, dated about B.C. 700; (2) D, the moral and legal element, seen especially in Deuteronomy, dated about B.C. 620; (3) P, the priestly element, dated about B.C. 444. The author of P appears to have revised the whole work and given it out as the complete Law. This may have been done by the Euphrates during the Exile, so that the Law-book brought up to Jerusalem would be the Pentateuch (or the Hexateuch), or it may have been after the Return, in which case the Law-book would be only P. But in any case the whole work after its completion underwent some further slight revision before it assumed its present form. See HEXATEUCH.

If now we ask not what was the first complete book of the OT, but what was the first portion of the OT actually written, it is not easy to give a reply. The literature of most peoples begins with ballads. Possibly the Song of Deborah is a ballad which should have assigned to it the first place in the chronological order of Hebrew writings. Such a ballad would be handed down in tradition before it was put into writing. Then some of the laws in Exodus, those of the 'Book of the Covenant,' may have come down in tradition or even in writing, from a remote antiquity. The code of Hammurabi, king of Babylon, B.C. 2285-2242, was a written law nearly 1000 years earlier than the time of Moses. The striking resemblance between some of the laws of Israel and some of these Babylonian laws points to a certain measure of dependence. This might go back to patriarchal days; but, of course, it would have been possible for the Jews in the Exile to have access to this venerable code at the very time P was being constructed.

There is much less range of question for the dates of the NT books. The earliest date possible for any of them is A.D. 44 for James; although, as Prof. Harnack holds, perhaps this is almost the latest written book of the NT. Laying aside the much disputed question of the date of James, we have 1 Thess. as apart from this the earliest written NT book. Following the usually accepted chronology, the date of this Epistle is A.D. 53 (Harnack, A.D. 49; Turner, A.D. 51). The latest written NT book is 2 Peter, which must be assigned to a late decade of the 2nd century. Apart from this Epistle, which stands quite by itself as a pseudonymous work, and James, which may be either the earliest or one of the latest NT books, the last written works are the Johannine writings, which cannot be earlier than near the end of the 1st century. Thus we have a period of about 50 years for the composition of the bulk of the NT writings, viz. the second half of the 1st cent. A.D.

4. Original Languages.—The bulk of the OT was written in Hebrew, and without vowel points. Hebrew is the Israelite dialect of the Canaanite language, which belongs to the Semitic family, and is closely allied to Aramaic. Some portions of the OT (viz. documents 'n Ezr 4:7-6:18 and 7:1-2, Dn 2:4-7:28 and a few scattered words and phrases elsewhere) are in Aramaic, the language of Syria, which was widely known, being found in Babylonia, Egypt, and Arabia. After the Exile, since Aramaic then became the everyday language of the Jews, Hebrew was relegated to a position of honourable neglect as the language of literature and the Law, and Aramaic came into general use. Probably the earliest writings which are embodied in the NT were in this language. When Papias says that Matthew wrote 'the oracles of the Lord in the Hebrew dialect,' he would seem to mean Aramaic. Since Jesus taught in Aramaic, it is not likely that His discourses were translated into the more archaic language; it is more probable that they were written down in the very language in which they were spoken. Similarly, it is probable that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was in Aramaic. But, however far we may go with Dr. Marshall and Dr. Abbott in allowing that Aramaic writings are to be detected beneath and behind our Gospels, it cannot be held that any of these Gospels, or any other NT books, are translations from that language. Matthew, the most Jewish of the Gospels, contains quotations from the LXX as well as direct translations from the Hebrew OT, which shows that while its author—or at all events the author of one of its sources—knew Hebrew, the Gospel itself was a Greek composition. All the NT was originally written in Greek. It was long held that this Greek was a peculiar dialect, and as such it was named Hellenistic Greek. But the discovery of contemporary inscriptions and papyri (especially the Oxyrhynchus papyri) shows that the colloquial Greek, used in commerce and popular intercourse all round the Mediterranean during the 1st cent., has the same peculiar forms that we meet with in the NT, many of which had been attributed to Semitic influences. These discoveries necessitate the re-writing of grammars on the Greek of the NT, as Prof. Deissmann and Dr. J. H. Moulton have shown by their recent studies in the new field of research. It must still be admitted that a certain amount of Hebrew influence is felt in the NT style. This is most apparent in the Gospels, especially Matthew and above all the earlier chapters of Luke (except the Preface), and also in the Apocalypse. The Preface of Luke is the nearest approach to classical Greek that we have in the NT. After this come Hebrews, the middle and latter part of the Gospel of Luke, and Acts. St. Paul's writings and the General Epistles take an intermediate position between the most Hebraistic and the least Hebraistic writings. The Fourth Gospel is written in good Greek; but the structure of the sentences indicates a mind accustomed to think in Hebrew or Aramaic. Nevertheless, in spite of these differences, it remains true that the grammar and style of the NT are in the main the grammar and style of contemporary Greek throughout the Roman Empire.

5. Translations.—The OT was first translated into Greek, for the benefit of Jews residing in Egypt, in the version known as the Septuagint (LXX), which was begun under Ptolemy II. (B.C. 285-247), and almost, if not quite, completed before the commencement of the Christian era. Another Greek version is ascribed to Aquila, who is said to have been a disciple of the famous Rabbi Akiba, and is by some even identified with Onkelos, the author of the Targum. This version, which is commonly dated about A.D. 150, is remarkable for its pedantic literalness, the Hebrew being rendered word for word into Greek, regardless of the essential differences between the two languages in grammar and construction. On the other hand, about the end of the 2nd cent. A.D., Symmachus, who, according to Epiphanius, was a Samaritan turned Jew, although Eusebius calls him an Ebionite, produced a version the aim of which was to render the original text into idiomatic Greek of good style, with the result, however, that in some places it became a paraphrase rather than a translation. Lastly may be mentioned the version of Theodotion, a Marcionite who went over to Judaism. This is really a revision of the LXX; it is assigned to about the year A.D. 185. Other versions of all or parts of the OT are known as the Quinta and the Sexta; there are doubtful references to a Septima.

Oral paraphrases, the Targums, or 'interpretations,' were made in Aramaic for the benefit of Palestinian Jews; but the earliest written paraphrase is that known as the Targum of Onkelos—the official Targum of the Pentateuch —the compilation of which in whole or part is assigned to the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. Later, with indications at least as late as the 7th cent. A.D., in its present form is the Jerusalem Targum, known as the Targum of pseudo-Jonathan. This is more free and interpolated with 'Haggadistic' elements. The official Targum of the Prophets also bears the name of Jonathan. Originating in Palestine in the 3rd cent. A.D., it received its final shaping in Babylon in the 5th century. The Targums of the Hagiographa are much later in date.

The oldest versions of the NT are the Syriac and the Latin, both of which may be traced back in some form to the 2nd cent. A.D., but there is much difference of opinion as to the original text of the former. First, we have the Peshitta, literally, the 'simple' version, which has become the standard accepted text in the Syrian Church. There is no doubt that in its present form this text represents successive revisions down to a late Patristic age. Two other versions, or two forms of another version of the Gospels, were discovered in the 19th cent., viz. the Curetonian, edited by Cureton, and the Sinaitic, found in a MS at the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. Lastly, there is the version represented by Tatian's Diatessaron, which may be distinct from either of these. While it is admitted that a primitive text underlying the Peshitta may be as ancient as any of these versions, scholars are fairly agreed that the Peshitta, as we know it, is considerably more recent than Tatian and the Sinaitic Gospels, both of which may be assigned to the 2nd cent. A.D. The earliest Latin Version appeared before the end of the 2nd cent. and probably in North Africa, where Latin was the language commonly used, while Greek was then the language of Christian literature at Rome. Tertullian knew the North African Latin Version. Somewhat later several attempts were made in Italy to translate the NT into Latin. The confusion of text induced Damasus, bishop of Rome, to commit to Jerome (A.D. 382) the task of preparing a reliable Latin version of the Bible. This came to be known as the Vulgate, which for 1000 years was the Bible of the Western Church, and which, since the Council of Trent, has been honoured by Roman Catholics as an infallibly correct rendering of the true text of Scripture. Augustine refers to a version which he calls 'Itala,' but it has been shown that this was probably Jerome's version. The NT was early translated into Coptic, and it appeared in three dialects of that language. The Sahidic Version, in Upper Egypt, can be traced back to the 4th century. The Bohairic, formerly used at Alexandria, has been assigned to as early a date as the 2nd cent.; but Prof. Burkitt shows reasons for bringing it down to the 6th. It is the version now used ecclesiastically by the Copts. Lastly, there is the Fayumic Version, represented by MSS from the Fayum. The original Gothic Version was the work of Ulphilas in the 4th century. He had to invent an alphabet for it. This work may be considered the first literary product in a Teutonic language. The Ethiopic and Armenian Versions may be assigned to the 5th century. Subsequent ages saw the Georgian Version (6th), the Anglo-Saxon (8th to 11th), the Slavonic (9th). The Reformation period—from Wyclif onwards—saw new translations into the vernacular; but the great age of Bible translation is the 19th century. The British and Foreign Bible Society now produces the Scriptures in over 400 languages and versions.

W. F. ADENEY.

BICHRI.—'Sheba the son of Bichri' (2 S 20¹) should rather be 'Sheba the Bichrite,' i.e. a descendant of Becher (Gn 46²¹).

BIDKAR.—An officer of Ahab and afterwards of Jehu (2 K 9²⁸).

BIER.—See MOURNING CUSTOMS, TOMB.

BIGTHA.—A eunuch of Ahasuerus (Est 1¹⁰).

BIGTHAN (Est 2²¹), or BIGTHANA (6²).—One of the two eunuchs whose plot against the life of Ahasuerus was discovered and foiled by Mordecai.

BIGVAI.—1. A companion of Zerubbabel (Ezr 2³—Neh 7⁷; cf. Ezr 2¹⁴ [1 Es 5¹⁴ Bagoi, 8¹⁰ Bago]—Neh 7¹⁰, Ezr 8¹⁴). 2. A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10¹⁸).

BILDAD.—See JOB.

BILEAM (1 Ch 6⁷⁰).—A Levitical city of Manasseh, the same as Ibleam of Jos 17¹¹, Jg 12⁷, 2 K 9²⁷; prob. the mod. Bel'ame (see Moore on Jg 12⁷).

BILGAH ('cheerfulness').—1. Head of the 15th course of priests (1 Ch 24¹⁴). 2. A priest who returned with Zerub. (Neh 12⁴, 18). The same as Bilgal (Neh 10⁴).

BILGAI.—See BILGAH.

BILHAH.—1. A slave-girl given to Rachel by Laban (Gn 29²⁹ (P)), and by her to Jacob as a concubine (Gn 30³, 4 (JE)); the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gn 30⁴, 7 (JE) 35² (P) 46²⁸ (R). 1 Ch 7¹³). She was guilty of incest with Reuben (Gn 35²² (P)). The etymology is uncertain. These narratives and genealogies probably embody early traditions as to the origin and mutual relations of the tribes, rather than personal history. Tribes are traced to a concubine ancestress, because they were a late accession to Israel. 2. A Simeonite city (1 Ch 4³¹)—Baalath (Jos 15²³), Balah (Jos 19⁸), and, according to some, Baalath (Jos 10⁴, 1 K 9¹⁸, 2 Ch 8⁹). Site uncertain.

BILHAN.—1. A Horite chief, the son of Ezer (Gn 36²⁷—1 Ch 1¹²). 2. A descendant of Benjamin, son of Jediael, and father of seven sons who were heads of houses in their tribe (1 Ch 7¹⁰).

BILL.—1. In the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16¹) 'bill,' RV better bond, renders the Gr. grammata, the equivalent of the contemporary Heb. legal term sheṭṭār (lit. 'writing'), an acknowledgment of goods or money received written and signed by the debtor himself (Baba bathra x. 8). Edersheim's statement (Life and Times of Jesus, ii. 272) that the Gr. word was adopted into Hebrew is based on a false reading. See, further, DEBT. 2. Bill of divorce; see MARRIAGE. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BILSHAN ('inquirer').—A companion of Zerubbabel (Ezr 2³, Neh 7⁷—Beelsarus, 1 Es 5⁸).

BIMHAL ('son of circumcision').—A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7²²).

BINDING AND LOOSING.—See POWER OF THE KEYS.

BINEA.—A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8³⁷ 9⁴).

BINNUI ('a building').—1. Head of a family that returned with Zerub. (Neh 7¹⁴—Bani of Ezr 2¹⁰). 2. A Levite (Ezr 8²⁴ [prob. = Bani of Neh 8⁷ and Bunni of Neh 9¹, Neh 12²]). 3. A son of Pahath-moab (Ezr 10³⁰—Balnuus of 1 Es 9³¹). 4. A son of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³⁸). There appears to be a confusion in some instances between the similar names Binnui, Bani, Bigvai.

BIRD.—1. In OT: (1) 'oph, tr. 'birds' or 'fowl,' usually joined with 'of heaven' or 'of the air': see Gn 1²⁰, 26, Lv 17¹³, 2 S 21¹⁰, Jer 4³, Ezk 31⁴, 18; (2) 'ayit, usually tr. 'fowls' (AV) and 'birds of prey' (RV): Gn 15¹¹, Job 28⁷, Is 18⁴, Ezk 39⁴; (3) tsippor (cf. Arab. asfār), small birds like sparrows which twitter: Gn 7¹⁴, Lv 14⁶, Ps 84³ etc.; (4) ba' al kânph, 'possessor of a wing,' Pr 17². 2. In NT: (1) peteina, Mt 13¹, Lk 13¹ etc. (2) ornea, 'birds of prey,' Rev 18² 19¹⁷, 21.

Birds abound in Palestine, and evidently did so in ancient times. They were sympathetically watched and studied; we read, for example, of their migrations (Jer 8⁷ etc.), their care of their young (Dt 32¹¹, Mt 23³⁷ etc.), the helplessness of their young (Pr 27⁸, Is 16⁷ etc.), their nesting (Ps 104¹², 17); indeed, every phase of bird life is touched upon. There are many references to the snares of the fowler (see SNARES). Birds are divided into clean and unclean. In some cases they were allowed as sacrificial offerings (Lv 14¹⁷ 14⁴⁸). It is a curious thing that the duck is not apparently (unless, as some think, in 1 K 4²², under the 'fatted fowl'—barburim 'abūsim') mentioned in the OT, although a beautifully modelled clay duck of an early period, certainly earlier than the OT records, was found during the recent excavations in Gezer. All birds mentioned by name in the Bible are dealt with in separate articles.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BIRSHA (etym. and meaning unknown).—King of Gomorrah at the time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gn 14²).

BIRTH.—See CHILD, CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 1.

BIRTHDAY.—Birthday celebrations are mentioned only in connexion with royalty, viz. Pharaoh's birthday (Gn 40²⁰), the monthly celebration of that of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 8⁷), and the birthday feast given by Herod Antipas (Mt 14⁶, Mk 6²¹). The 'day of our king', to which Hosea refers (7³), may have been the anniversary either of the king's birth or of his accession. Some authorities (e.g. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, i. 672) regard Herod's feast as celebrating the anniversary of his accession—a view based on a mistaken exegesis of the Talmudic passage Aboda zara i. 3 (see the full discussion in Schürer, GVV i. 438–441).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BIRTHRIGHT.—See FIRSTBORN.

BIRZAITH (1 Ch 7²¹).—Apparently a town of Asher, probably Bir ez-Zeit, near Tyre.

BISHLAM ('peaceful?').—An officer of Artaxerxes in Pal. at the time of the return from captivity under Zerub. (Ezr 4⁷); called Belemus in 1 Es 2¹⁶.

BISHOP (Gr. episkopos, Lat. episcopus, Ital. vescovo, Fr. evêque, Germ. Bischof), ELDER (Gr. presbyteros, Lat. presbyterus, Fr. prêtre, Eng. priest).—The two words are so closely connected in the NT that they must be taken together here.

1. The terms.—The Greek word for 'bishop' is common in the general sense of an overseer, and in particular of sundry municipal officers. In LXX it is used in Is 60¹⁷ of taskmasters, in Neh 11¹⁹ of minor officials, and in 1 Mac 1⁴ of the commissioners of Antiochus who enforced idolatry. But, so far as we can see, it was not the common name for the treasurers of private associations.

In the NT the word is found five times. In Ac 20²⁸ St. Paul reminds the elders of Ephesus that the Holy Ghost has made them bishops over the flock; in Ph 1⁴ he sends a greeting to the saints at Philippi 'with bishops and deacons'; in 1 Ti 3² he tells Timothy that 'the bishop must be blameless,' etc.; in Tit 1⁷ he gives a similar charge to Titus; and 1 P 2²⁵ speaks of Christ as 'the shepherd and bishop of your souls.'

In the OT the word 'elder' is used from early times of an official class having jurisdiction both civil and religious, so that when synagogues were built, the elders of the city would naturally be the elders of the synagogue, with the right of regulating the services and excluding offenders.

In NT times the idea would be carried over to the churches. It is indirectly recognized in Lk 22²⁶; but we cannot infer the existence of elders from Ac 5⁶, for 'the younger men' who carry out Ananias are simply 'the young men' in v. 10 when they carry out Sapphira. The first clear trace of Christian elders is at Jerusalem. In Ac 11³⁰ (A.D. 44) they receive the offerings from Barnabas and Saul; in 15⁶ (A.D. 50) they take part in the Conference; in 21¹⁸ (A.D. 58) they join in the welcome to St. Paul. Earlier than this may be Ja 5¹⁴, where the word seems to denote officials. After this we hear no more of them till the Pastoral Epistles and 1 Peter.

For the last two hundred years it has been generally agreed that bishops and elders in the NT and for some time later are substantially identical. For (1) bishops and elders are never joined, like bishops and deacons as distinct classes of officials. (2) Ph 1¹ is addressed 'to bishops and deacons.' Had there been an intermediate class of elders, it could not well have been omitted. So 1 Ti 3 ignores the elders, though (5¹⁷) there were elders at Ephesus, and had been (Ac 20¹⁷) for some time. Conversely, Tit 1⁷ describes elders instead, and nearly in the same words. (3) The bishop described to Timothy, the elders of Ac 20, those of 1 Ti 5¹⁷, those described to Titus, and those of 1 P 5², all seem to hold a subordinate position, and to have rather pastoral duties than what we should call episcopal. (4) The same persons are called elders and bishops (Ac 20¹⁷, 28). The words are also synonymous in Clement of Rome, and (by implication) in the Teaching of the Apostles and in Polycarp. Ignatius is the first writer who makes a single bishop ruler of a Church; and even he pleads no Apostolic command for the change.

The general equivalence of the two offices in the Apostolic age seems undeniable; and if there were minor differences between them, none have been clearly traced. The only serious doubt is whether bishops and deacons originally denoted offices at all. The words rather describe functions. Thus Ph 1⁴ 'to bishops and deacons' (no article) will mean 'such as oversee and such as serve'—that is, the higher and the lower officials, whatever titles they may bear. This would seem proved by Tit 1⁵, 'that thou appoint elders . . . for the bishop (overseer) must be blameless.' The argument is that the elder must be so and so, because the bishop must be so and so. This is vain repetition if the bishop is only the elder under another name, and bad logic if he is a ruler over the elders; but it becomes clear if the 'bishop' is not a defined official, but an overseer generally. Then, the elder being a particular sort of overseer, the argument will be from a general rule to a particular case.

2. Appointment.—At first popular election and Apostolic institution seem to have gone together. The Seven (Ac 6³, 6) are chosen by the people and instituted by the Apostles with prayer and laying-on of hands. In the case of the Lycaonian elders (Ac 14²³) the Apostles 'appointed' them with prayer and fastings. Similarly the elders in Crete (Tit 1⁵) are 'appointed' by Titus, and apparently the bishops at Ephesus by Timothy. In these cases popular election and laying-on of hands are not mentioned; but neither are they excluded. 1 Ti 5²² does not refer to ordination at all, nor He 6² to ordination only. The one is of the laying-on of hands in restoring offenders, while the other takes in all occasions of laying-on of hands. But in any case Timothy and Titus would have to approve the candidate before instituting him, so that the description of his qualifications is no proof that they had to select him in the first instance. Conversely, popular election is very prominent (Clement, and Teaching) in the next age; but neither does this exclude formal approval and institution. The elders are already attached (1 Ti 4¹⁴) to the Apostles in the conveyance of special gifts; and when the Apostles died out, they would act alone in the institution to local office. The development of an episcopate is a further question, and very much a question of words if the bishop (in the later sense) was gradually developed upward from the elders. But the next stage after this was that, while the bishop instituted his own elders, he was himself instituted by the neighbouring bishops, or in still later times by the bishops of the civil province or by a metropolitan. The outline of the process is always the same. First popular election, then formal approval by authority and institution by prayer, with (at least commonly) its symbolic accompaniments of laying-on of hands and fasting.

3. Duties.—(1) General superintendence: Elders in Ac 20²⁸, 1 Ti 5¹⁷, 1 P 5² (ruling badly); bishops in 1 Ti 3². Indicated possibly in 1 Co 12²⁸ 'helpers, governments': more distinctly in Eph 4¹¹ 'pastors and teachers.'

n pointed contrast to 'apostles, prophets, and evangelists,' whose office was not local. So 1 Th 5¹² 'those that are over you,' Ro 12⁸ 'he that ruleth,' and He 13¹⁷. 17. 24 'them that have the rule over you,' remind us of the bishops and elders who rule (1 Ti 3⁴ 5¹⁷). So, too, the 'rulers' in Clement must be bishops or elders, for these bishops plainly have no earthly superior, so that they must be themselves the rulers.

Under this head we may place the share taken by the elders: (a) at Jerusalem (Ac 15⁶) in the deliberations of the Apostolic Conference, and (Ac 21¹⁸) in the reception held by James; (b) elsewhere (1 Ti 4¹⁴) in the laying-on of hands on Timothy, whether that corresponds to ordination or to something else.

(2) Teaching: 1 Th 5¹² rulers admonishing in the Lord; 1 Ti 3² the bishop apt to teach; 5¹⁷ double honour to the elders who rule well, especially those who toil in word and teaching; Tit 1⁹ the elder or bishop must be able to teach, and to convince the gainsayers. Yet 1 Ti 5¹⁷ seems to imply that elders might rule well who toiled in other duties than word and teaching; and if so, these were not the sole work of all elders.

Preaching is rather connected with the unlocal ministry of apostles, prophets, and evangelists: but in their absence the whole function of public worship would devolve on the local ministry of bishops and deacons. This becomes quite plain in the Teaching and in Clement.

(3) Pastoral care: This is conspicuous everywhere. To it we may also refer: (a) visiting of the sick (Ja 5¹⁴) with a view to anointing and cure—not as a viaticum at the approach of death; (b) care of strangers and a fortiori of the poor (1 Ti 3², Tit 1⁹, the bishop to be a lover of strangers). H. M. GWATKIN.

BISHOP'S BIBLE.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS.

BIT, BRIDLE.—The Hebrews were doubtless well acquainted with the bit, but there is no clear mention of it as distinct from the bridle, the words for which in Gr. and Lat. include bit, headstall, and reins. In Ja 3³ the context is decisive for 'bridle' (RV and AV 'bit'); in Ps 32⁹ for 'bit and bridle' we should probably render 'bridle and halter,' and so in the other passages where the two Hebrew words respectively occur, e.g. 'bridle,' Pr 26³, but 'halter,' Job 30¹.

In Ps 39¹ 'bridle' should certainly be 'muzzle' (cf. the crocodilian verb in Dt 25⁴). The crocodile's 'double bridle' (Job 41¹³) is his jaws, but the text is doubtful. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BITHIAH ('daughter,' i.e. worshipper, 'of J').—The daughter of a Pharaoh, who became the wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4¹⁸). Whether Pharaoh is to be taken here as the Egypt. royal title or as a Heb. proper name, it is difficult to determine.

BITHRON (2 S 22⁹ 'the gorge,' probably not a proper name).—A ravine leading to Mahanaim.

BITHYNIA.—A district in the N.W. of Asia Minor, which had been a Roman province since b.c. 74. For administrative purposes it was generally united with the province of Pontus, which bounds it on the E., under one governor. The province was senatorial till about A.D. 165, and governed by a proconsul. The younger Pliny governed it from A.D. 111–113 by a special commission from the emperor Trajan. Paul and Silas were prevented by the Spirit from preaching in Bithynia (Ac 16⁷), and the beginnings of Christianity there are unknown. It is probable that it came by the Black Sea. That there were churches there after St. Paul's time is certain from the address of the First Epistle of Peter, which was probably written A.D. 75–80. A. SOUTER.

BITTER HERBS (merōrim, Ex 12⁸, Nu 9¹¹).—The bitter herbs of the modern Jewish Passover in Palestine are specially lettuce and endive. Other salads, such as parley, cucumber, chicory, and water-cress, are also commonly eaten, indeed are prime favourites. The author of La 3¹⁵, in using the same word merōrim (tr. 'bitterness'), doubtless had more bitter and less whole some plants in his mind, perhaps the colocynth or Ecballium elaterium, the wild gourd of 2 K 4³⁹. See, further, PASSOVER.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

BITTER WATER (lit., as RV, Water of Bitterness, Nu 5¹⁰).—See JEALOUSY.

BITTERN (Is 14²³ 34¹¹, Zeph 2¹⁴).—Although the bird of this name—the Botaurus stellaris—is found in Palestine, especially in the Huleh marshes, the philological evidence is quite against this translation. The Heb. word is kippōd, and is generally accepted to be the equivalent of the Arab. kunfudh, 'porcupine.' This animal suits the Scriptural requirements at least as well as the bittern. It (the Hystrix cristata) is common all over Palestine. Large specimens measure as much as 3 ft. from the nose to the tip of the spines. The porcupine is a vegetable-eating, nocturnal animal; it is solitary in its habits, and very timid of man. It glides about in the twilight or starlight in a most weird way, giving vent at times to peculiar short grunts. When roused to self-defence, the porcupine is most dangerous; its erect quills, which pierce like a needle, make it most difficult to capture. In all respects the porcupine is a likely and appropriate inhabitant of desolate ruins untrodden by the foot of man. Porcupine are eaten by both fellahin and Bedouin.

BITUMEN, asphalt, or mineral pitch is an inflammable viscous substance, composed of hydrocarbons of the same series as those which constitute mineral oil or petroleum. It has in fact been described as 'petroleum hardened by evaporation and oxidation,' and may vary in consistency from a solid to a semi-liquid condition. It occurs both in Mesopotamia and Palestine. The springs at Kit, on the Euphrates, 150 miles above Babylon, are mentioned by Herodotus (l. 179), and still yield an abundant supply. There are similar springs at Kal at Sherkat, on the Tigris, 60 miles S. of Nineveh (Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, l. 467). In Pal. it is found at Hasbeyah, near Mt. Hermon, and in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea (hence called Asphaltitis Limnē by Josephus [BJ iv. viii. 4] and Lacus Asphaltites by Pliny [HN v. xv. 15]). Some of the limestone strata in the last-named locality are highly bituminous, and masses of bitumen are known to float on the Dead Sea itself after earthquakes. In the OT there are three Heb. words which denote some form of this substance.

In the Flood-story kōpher (LXX asphaltos, EV pitch) is used in the construction of the ark (Gn 6¹⁴). Hēmar (AV and RV slime, RVm 'bitumen') was the mortar employed by the early Babylonian builders (Gn 11³, LXX asphaltos). Bitumen pits or wells, into which the pitchy liquid (LXX asphaltos) oozed from the earth, are mentioned as occurring in the Vale of Siddim, i.e. the Dead Sea basin (Gn 14¹⁰). This is quite in keeping with the nature of the region, though such wells are not now found in it. In Ex 2³ hēmar is one of the substances with which the ark of bulrushes was made watertight, the other being zepheth (EV 'pitch'). LXX includes both in the general rendering asphaltopissa, and they probably denote the more solid and the more liquid varieties of bitumen respectively. Zepheth also occurs twice in Is 34⁹ (LXX pissa, EV 'pitch'). The context makes it probable that the reference is again to bitumen.

JAMES PATRICK.

BIZIOTHIAH (Jos 15²⁸).—A corruption for ben-dithēah 'her villages,' referring to Beersheba (cf. also Neh 11²⁷).

BIZTHA (Est 1¹⁰).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus.

BLACK.—See COLOURS, 2.

BLAIN.—A blain is an inflammatory swelling on the body. In one of the plagues of Egypt the dust became a 'boil breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast' (Ex 9⁸, 10). See BOTCH, MEDICINE.

and cf. Wyclif's tr. of Job 27 'He smot Iob with the werste stinkende bleyne fro the sole of the fot unto the nol.' The word is still retained in the compound chüblain.

BLASPHEMY.—The modern use of this word is more restricted in its range than that of either the OT or the NT. 1. In the former it is narrower in its scope than in the latter, being almost universally confined to language or deeds (1 Mac 2⁹) derogating from the honour of God and His claims to the over-lordship of men (Lv 24¹⁰⁻¹⁶, cf. 1 K 21¹⁰⁻¹³, 2 K 19⁶ etc.). The contemptuous scorning of sacred places was regarded as blasphemy (see 1 Mac 2⁸ 7³⁸, cf. Ac 6¹³), as was also the light and irresponsible utterance of the sacred Name (Is 52⁶, Ezk 36²⁰, Dt 5¹¹), the degradation of Jehovah-worship by conformity to pagan rites (Ezk 20⁷), and the continued wilful transgression of Divine commands and despising of 'the word of the Lord' (Nu 15^{20f.}). The incident of the man gathering sticks on the Sabbath seems to be a concrete example of blasphemy (Nu 15^{22f.}).

2. When we come to the NT, the word is found more frequently, and is employed in a manner more nearly allied to the usage of classical writings. The EV has accordingly tr. it often as 'railing' or slanderous talk generally (Mt 15¹²—Mk 7²², Eph 4³¹, Col 3⁸, 1 Ti 6⁴, Jude⁹), looked at, however, on its ethical and religious side. The cognate verb, too, is treated in the same way (Mk 15²⁹—Mt 27³⁹, Lk 22⁶⁶ 23³⁹, Ro 3⁸ 14¹⁶, 1 Co 4¹⁴ 10³⁰, Tit 3², 1 P 4⁴, 14, 2 P 2² 10, 12, Jude 6, 10), as is also the derived adjective (2 Ti 3², 2 P 2¹¹).

One of the most frequent of the charges brought by the Jews against Jesus was that of blasphemy, and when we inquire into the meaning of the accusation, we find that it was the application to Himself of Divine attributes and prerogatives (Mk 2⁷—Mt 9², Mk 14⁶⁴—Mt 26⁶⁵, Jn 10³² *). On the other hand, the NT writers regarded the unreasoning attitude of the Jews to the claims and teaching of Jesus as blasphemous (Mk 15²⁹—Mt 27³⁹, Lk 22⁶⁶ 23³⁹, Ac 13⁴⁵ 18⁶). It is interesting also to notice that this is the word put by the author of the Acts into the mouth of the town-clerk of Ephesus when he was appeasing the riotous mob who were persuaded that St. Paul and his companions had insulted the local deity (Ac 19³⁷).

3. The legal punishment for blasphemy was death (Lv 24¹⁶), and so the Jews claimed the life of Jesus, as the just and lawful outcome of His words and teaching (Jn 19⁷, cf. 10³³ 8^{58f.}). The proto-martyr Stephen lost his life, too, on a charge of blasphemy (Ac 6¹³ 7⁵⁸), when his enemies, in a violent and sudden fit of rage, forgot the limitation imposed on them as vassals of the Roman Empire (cf. Jn 18³¹; see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, Additional Note in loc.). On the 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost,' see art. SIN, III. 1.

BLASTING.—See MILDEW.

BLASTUS.—A chamberlain of Agrippa I., through whose intervention the people of Tyre and Sidon secured a hearing at Caesarea (Ac 12²⁰).

BLEMISH.—See MEDICINE.

BLESSEDNESS.—The substantive does not occur either in AV or RV of the OT, and has rightly been expunged from the RV of Ro 4⁸. 9, Gal 4¹⁴, where alone it had place in the AV of the NT. 'Blessed' and 'happy' are found in both Testaments as a varying translation of the same Heb. or Gr. word; 'blessed' greatly preponderating. The Biblical blessedness represents a conception of happiness in which the religious relation is taken into account, with its emotions and its issues. In the OT these issues sometimes lie rather in material prosperity—life, long life, wealth, children, outward peace—but it is recognized that the conditions of these are spiritual (Ps 1), and in not a few instances the inward and spiritual is itself represented as the content of true happiness (e.g. Ps 32 [but see v.¹⁰], Pr 4⁷ [but see 3² 10]).

In the NT the stress is decisively shifted to the spiritual content of blessedness, which may consist with the most adverse earthly conditions (Mt 5¹⁰⁻¹¹, Lk 6²², Ja 1¹²). The thought of compensation in future reward is not absent, even from the 'Beatitudes' (esp. in their Lukan form, Lk 6²⁰⁻²³); but the reward is clearly only the consummation of a blessedness already attained by the poor in spirit, the meek, the merciful, etc. In the teaching of Jesus the summum bonum appears now as place in the Kingdom of God, now as eternal life (e.g. Mt 25³⁴, Mk 10¹⁷. 23, Jn 3³⁻⁵ 4¹⁴), and both are described as a present possession (Lk 17²⁰. 21, Jn 3³⁶).

Finally, in the Johannine writings the religious relation, already in the OT an essential condition of blessedness (e.g. Ps 2² 33¹²), is made supreme and in itself all-sufficing. Eternal life is personal union with Christ, revealer of the Father, by trust and fellowship (e.g. Jn 5²⁴ 6⁴ 17³, 1 Jn 5¹¹⁻²⁰). For so man becomes partaker of the life of Him who is Himself the 'blessed God' (1 Ti 1¹¹ 6¹⁵).

BLESSING.—See BEATITUDES.

BLINDNESS.—See MEDICINE.

BLOOD.—Among all primitive races the blood, especially of human beings, has been and is regarded with superstitious, or rather, to be just, religious awe. By the Hebrews also blood was invested with peculiar sanctity as the seat of the soul (nephesh), that is of the principle of life (Lv 17¹¹ 'the life [Heb. nephesh] of the flesh is in the blood'). From this fundamental conception of blood as the vehicle of life may be derived all the manifold social and religious beliefs and practices with regard to it, which play so large a part in Scripture. BOANERGES (Mk 3¹⁷), 'Sons of Thunder.'—The Master's appellation of James and John. Jerome takes it as a reference to their fiery eloquence. Others derive it rather from their fiery disposition in early days (cf. Lk 9⁵²⁻⁵⁶). It would thus be a playful yet serious sobriquet, constantly reminding them of their besetting sin and warning them to overcome it.

DAVID SMITH.

BOAR.—The wild boar (Arab. khanzir) is quite common in the Jordan Valley, specially in the reed thickets near the Dead Sea. It is also found on Mount Tabor. It is still noted for its destructiveness (Ps 80¹³). Though a forbidden food to the Moslem as well as the Jew (Lv 11⁷, Dt 14⁸), the flesh is eaten by the nominally Moslem Bedouin of Palestine. See SWINE.

BOAT.—See SHIPS AND BOATS.

BOAZ.—A Bethlehemite of wealth, the son of Salmon; grandfather of Jesse, and thus ancestor of David (Ru 4¹¹. 22, 1 Ch 2¹¹, Mt 1⁶. 9, Lk 3³²). He became the second husband of the widowed Ruth, whom he married (according to ancient Hebrew custom) as next-of-kin, when her 'near kinsman' refused to undertake this duty (Ru 4¹⁻¹⁰). See RUTH.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

BOAZ, the name of one of the two bronze pillars which stood in front of Solomon's Temple. The other was named Jachin (1 K 7²¹, 2 Ch 3¹⁷). See JACHIN AND BOAZ, TEMPLE.

BOCCAS.—See BORITE.

BOCHERU.—A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8⁹ 9⁴).

BOCHIM ('weepers,' Jg 2¹).—Unknown as a geographical site. Possibly the orig. reading was Bethel.

BODY in OT represents various Heb. words, especially that for 'flesh.' In Ex 24¹⁰ it means, by a common idiom, 'the framework of heaven'; there is no personification. In NT, though the body may be the seat of sin and death (Ro 6⁷ 7⁴), it is never treated with contempt (Ro 12¹, 1 Co 6¹³ 13¹⁹); Ph 3²¹ is a well-known mistranslation. Accordingly it could be used metaphorically of the Church, Christ being sometimes the Head, sometimes the Body itself. C. W. EMMET.

BODY-GUARD.—See ARMY, § 1, GUARD.

BOHAIRIC VERSIONS.—See art. TEXT (OT and NT).

BOHAN.—A son of Reuben, acc. to Jos 15⁹ 18¹⁷ (both P). The stone of Bohan is mentioned in these two passages as forming a mark of division between Judah and Benjamin. It is impossible to identify the site where it stood.

BOILS.—See MEDICINE.

BOLLED.—The boll of a plant is its seed-vessel or pod. Cf. Fitzherbert, 'The bolles of flaxe . . . made drye with the son to get out the sedes.' Thus Ex 9³¹ 'the flax was bolled,' means it had reached the seed stage. But the Heb. means only that it was in flower.

BOLSTER.—This word, which appears six times in AV (1 S 19¹³ 16 26⁷ 11 12 16) as the rendering of a Heb. word signifying 'the place at the head,' 'head-place,' has rightly disappeared from RV, which gives 'head' throughout. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOLT.—See HOUSE, § 6.

BOND.—1. See BAND. 2. See BILL. 3. See CHAIN.

BONDAGE, BONDMAN, BONDMAID, BONDMAN, etc.—See SLAVE, SLAVERY.

BONES is used widely in OT as a synonym for the body, living or dead, or the person (Ps 42¹⁰ 51⁸). As the solid framework of the body, the bones are the seat of health and strength, so that breaking, rottenness, dryness of the bones are frequent figures for sickness or moral disorder (Pr 14¹⁰ 17²², Ps 6³ 22¹⁴). 'Bone of my bone' answers to the English phrase 'of the same blood'; but the concluding words of Eph 5³⁰ should be omitted. In Lk 24³⁹ the unique expression seems to emphasize the nature of the Resurrection body, as different from the ordinary 'flesh and blood.' See Gibson, Thirty-Nine Articles, p. 188.

C. W. EMMET.

BONNET.—With the exception of Is 3²⁰, this is the AV designation of the special headdress of the rank and file of the priesthood according to the priestly writer (Ex 28⁴⁰ 29⁹ etc., RV head-tire). It consisted of a long swathe of fine white linen wound round the head—note Ex 29⁹ RV 'bind (or wind) head-tires'—to form an egg-shaped turban. Cf. Jos. Ant. iii. vii. 3; and Rich, Dict. Rom. and Gr. Ant. s.v. 'pileus' for illust. of the egg-shaped cap of Ulysses, with which Jerome compares the priestly turban. See DRESS, § MITRE.

BOOK.—1. A roll of papyrus or parchment; see WRITING. 2. A sacred or canonical document (Dn 9²); see CANON OF OT. 3. 'Book of life,' etc.; see next art. and ESCHATOLOGY.

BOOK OF LIFE.—The legalistic conception of morality which existed among the Jews involved a record of the deeds of life on the basis of which the final judgment of God would be given. Allied with this was another conception, derived from the custom of enrolling citizens (Jer 22³⁰, Neh 7⁶ 12²¹; cf. Ex 32²⁹), of a list of those who were to partake of the blessings of the Messianic Age. A second natural step was to conceive of God as keeping two sets of books, a Book of Life (Dn 12¹, Mal 3¹⁶, Ps 69²⁸) for the righteous, and a Book of Death for the wicked (Jub xxx 20–22).

To have one's name blotted out from the Book of Life was equivalent to complete condemnation (Eth. Enoch 108²).

In the Apocalyptic writings of Judaism the Final Judgment was to be based upon the records contained in the books supposedly kept by the archangel Michael. In some cases Rabbinical thought elaborated the figure until each man was to read and sign his record. The judgment of God was thus supposed to be based upon absolute justice, and determined by the balance of recorded good and evil deeds. In the NT are to be found references both to the books of records (Rev 20¹² 13; cf. Dn 7¹⁰, Eth. Enoch 89¹⁵), and to the books containing a list of those who were to enjoy eternal life (Lk 10²⁰, Ph 4³, He 12²³, Rev 3⁵ 13⁸ 17⁸ 21²⁷). SHAILER MATHEWS.

BOOTH.—See ARMOUR, § 2 (d), DRESS, § 6.

BOOTH.—The Heb. sukkah (note Gn 33¹⁷ RVm) was a simple structure erected for rest and shelter in his field or vineyard (Is 1⁸ RV). In AV and RV it is variously rendered booth, cottage, hut, pavilion, tabernacle, tent. The booth was also a convenient shelter for cattle (Gn 33¹⁷) and for the army in the field (2 S 11¹⁴ RV).

BOOTH, FEAST OF.—See TABERNACLES.

BOOTY.—See WAR. Cf. BAN.

BORDER (of the garment).—See FRINGES.

BORITH.—An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1²); called in 1 Es 8² Boccas, and in Ezr 7⁴ Bukki.

BORROWING.—See DEBT.

BOSOR (1 Mac 5²⁶ 27).—A town in Gilead. The site is uncertain.

BOSORA (1 Mac 5²⁶ 27).—Mentioned with Bosor. Apparently the great city of Bosrah—the Roman Bostra on the E. of Bashan, which is not mentioned in the Bible.

BOSS.—Only Job 15²⁸, where it is doubtful whether metal bosses for strengthening the shield are implied in the figure, or whether we should render 'the stout curves of his bucklers.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOTCH.—A botch (connected with 'beat' and 'boss') is a swelling, an eruption in the skin. It occurs in reference to Dt 28³⁷ 'the botch of Egypt.' See BLAIN, MEDICINE. The modern word is 'boil,' which is also the more common word for the same Heb. in AV. For the Eng. word see Milton PL xlii. 180—

'Botches and blaines must all his flesh imboss.'

BOTTLE.—Although glass was not unknown in Palestine in Bible times, the various words rendered 'bottle' in AV denote almost exclusively receptacles of skin. In RV the NT revisers have wisely introduced skins and wine-skins in the familiar parable (Mt 9¹⁷ ||), but their OT collaborators have done so only where, as in Jos 9⁴ 13, the context absolutely required it. These skins of the domestic animals, in particular of the goat, were used not only, as we have seen, for wine, but for water (Gn 21⁴), milk (Jg 4¹⁹), oil, and other liquids. They were doubtless used, as at the present day, both tanned and untanned. In later times (Mishna), the larger skins sometimes received a coating of pitch on the inside, and were furnished at the neck with a reed to serve as a funnel.

The 'potter's earthen bottle' of Jer 19¹ 10 was a narrow-necked wine-jar, which might also be used for honey (1 K 14¹⁸ EV 'cruse'). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOTTOMLESS PIT.—See ABYSS.

BOW, BATTLE BOW.—See ARMOUR, 1 (d).

BOWELS.—The bowels are in Biblical language the seat of the emotions. Hence Ps 40⁸ 'Thy law is in the midst of my bowels,' i.e. the object of my deepest affection.

BOWL

BOWL.—It is impossible to distinguish with certainty between the numerous words rendered, somewhat indiscriminately, 'cup,' 'bason,' and 'bowl.' The wandering Bedouin of to-day make little use, for obvious reasons, of the fragile products of the potter's art, preferring vessels of skin, wood, and copper. The 'lordly dish' with which Sisera was served (Jg 5²) was a bowl, doubtless of wood; so too, perhaps, Gideon's bowl (6²) which bears the same name. For ordinary domestic purposes bowls of glazed or unglazed earthenware were preferred, of which specimens in endless variety have been unearthed (see POTTERY). Among the wealthier classes silver and even gold (1 K 10²) were employed. Of one or other of these were doubtless the large bowls—the word elsewhere used for the sacrificial basins (wh. see)—from which the nobles of Samaria quaffed their wine (Am 6¹). Similar, probably, were the large wine-bowls, distinguished from the smaller cups, to which Jeremiah refers (Jer 35⁵ RV and AV 'pots').

From the above are to be distinguished the bowl or reservoir for the oil of the 'candlestick' (Zec 4²), the golden cup-like ornaments of the Tabernacle lampstand (Ex 25³¹ AV 'bowls,' RV 'cups'), and the 'bowls of the chapters' (2 Ch 4¹², RV and AV 'pommels'). See, further, CUP, BASON, VIAL.

For an important ritual use of bowls and lamps, recently discovered, see HOUSE, § 3.

BOX.—1. The nature of the prophet's 'box of oil' (2 K 9¹ RV vial, as 1 S 10¹ AV) is unknown. Was it another name for 'the horn of oil' of 1 K 1²? 2. For the 'alabaster box' (Mt 26⁷ ||, RV cruse) see JEWELS and PRECIOUS STONES, ad fin. 3. For Judas' money-box (Jn 12⁶ 13³ AV 'bag,' RV in 'box') see BAG. 4. Nothing is known of the perfume boxes (lit. 'houses, i.e. receptacles of perfume [or perhaps ointment]') of the Jerusalem ladies (Is 3²⁰ RV and AV 'tablets').

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BOX-TREE (teashshūr, Is 41¹⁹ 60¹³, Ezk 27⁸).—Whether the teashshūr was the box-tree (Buxus longifolia) or the sherbīn, mod. Arab. for the cypress (Cupressus sempervirens), as RV adopts, or, as others propose, a kind of juniper, is quite unsettled. So good an authority as Post rejects the first as improbable.

BOY.—See CHILD, FAMILY.

BOZEZ (1 S 14¹).—A steep cliff on one side of the Michmash gorge opposite Seneh. It seems to be the northern cliff, a remarkable bastion of rock E. of Michmash.

BOZKATH.—A town of Judah (Jos 15²⁹, 2 K 22¹), in the plain near Lachish and Eglon. Unknown.

BOZRAH ('fortification').—1. An Edomite city known only as the place of origin of Jobab, son of Zerah, one of the Edomite kinks (Gn 36², 1 Ch 14¹). It was, however, of such importance in the kingdom of Edom that it is coupled with the name of the latter in poetic parallelisms (e.g. the denunciation in Is 34⁴; cf. Jer 49²²). The reference in Is 63¹ to 'dyed garments' of Bozrah, and in Mic 2¹² to 'sheep of Bozrah,' may indicate the industries for which it was noted. The guesses that have been made at its identification are of no importance. 2. A Moabite city denounced by Jeremiah (48²), and also unknown.

BRACELETS.—See ORNAMENTS, § 4.

BRAMBLE.—See THORNS.

BRAN.—The burning of bran for incense is mentioned in Bar 6⁴ as an accompaniment of the idolatrous worship of the women of Babylon.

BRANCH.—1. The great variety of Heb. words rendered by our 'branch' may be gathered from the following list of passages, in each of which a different term is used: Gn 40¹⁹, Ex 25², Nu 13²², Is 16² 27¹⁰, Jer 11¹⁶, Zec 4¹², Ps 104¹², Job 15²² 18¹⁴. In the following verses RV or RVM adds or substitutes another word: Is 18⁵ ('spreading branches') 25⁸ ('song'), Ezk 17² ('top,' 'lofty top'), Ps 80¹⁴ ('Heb. son'), RVM of Gn 49²², in like manner has 'Heb. daughters'), Pr 11²⁸ ('leaf') Job 8¹⁶ ('shoot'). In the NT four Greek words are translated 'branch,' but RVM points out that 'layers of leaves' are meant at Mk 11¹⁴, and at Jn 12¹³ palms-branches are in question. 2. 'Branch' is used figuratively for human offspring (Job 15²²), especially for the scion of a royal house (Dn 11⁷); also for persons in lofty station (Is 9¹⁴). The Heb. netser, properly signifying 'sprout' or 'shoot,' but rendered 'branch' (Is 11¹), is a designation of the Messianic king; not improbably this was in the Evangelist's mind when he wrote Mt 2². We have the same English term at Jer 23⁴ 33¹⁴, where another word, tsemach, is a title of the Messiah, intimating that this 'shoot' should arise out of 'the low estate' of the restored remnant. Zec 3⁸ 6¹², following Jeremiah, actually makes Tsemach a proper name. The Targ. on Jer. and Zech. unhesitatingly substitutes for it 'the Messiah.'

BREAD

J. TAYLOR.

BRASIER.—See COAL and FIREPAN.

BRASS is an alloy of copper and zinc, the general use of which is comparatively modern. In ancient times its place was supplied by bronze, an alloy of copper and tin. Where 'brass' occurs in EV, we must understand either bronze or copper itself. In some of the references, such as those to mining (Dt 8⁹ 'out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass') and smelting (Job 28¹ 'Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone'), it is clear that only copper can be meant, and RVM adopts this rendering everywhere (see on Gn 4²²). Copper is not found in Palestine proper, but in the Lebanon and Hermon (possibly the 'mountains of brass' of Zec 6¹). Weapons of copper have been found at Tell el-Hesi (dating from c. B.C. 1500). From very early times copper was largely worked by the Egyptians in the Sinaitic peninsula, where traces of the mining and smelting are still to be seen. A full account of these operations and their remains is given in Flinders Petrie's Researches in Sinai.

BRAVERY.—In Is 3¹⁸ 'the bravery of their tinkling ornaments,' bravery means splendour, ostentation. The word is connected with 'brag.'

BRAZEN SEA.—See TEMPLE.

BRAZEN SERPENT.—See SERPENT [BRAZEN].

BREACH.—'Breach' is a literal trans. of the Heb. in 2 S 6⁸ and 1 Ch 13¹¹ 'the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah,' and in Job 16¹⁴ 'He breaketh me with breach upon breach.' The word in both places is used figuratively of an outburst of wrath.

BREAD.—The pre-eminence of bread in the dietary of the Hebrews is shown by the frequent use in OT, from Gn 3¹⁹ onwards, of 'bread' for food in general. It was made chiefly from wheat and barley, occasionally mixed, more especially in times of scarcity, with other ingredients (Ezk 4²; see FOOD). Barley was in earlier times the main breadstuff of the peasantry (Jg 7¹³) and poorer classes generally (Jn 6¹³, cf. Jos BJ v. x. 2).

The first step in bread-making, after thoroughly sifting and cleaning the grain, was to reduce it to flour by rubbing, pounding, or grinding (cf. Nu 11⁹). In the first process, not yet extinct in Egypt for certain grains, the grain was rubbed between two stones, the 'corn-rubbers' or 'corn-grinders,' of which numerous specimens have been found at Lachish and Gezer (PEPSt, 1902, 326; 1903, 118; cf. Erman, Egypt, 180 for illust. of actual use). For the other two processes see MORTAR and MILL respectively. Three qualities of flour are distinguished—a coarser sort got by the use of the pestle and mortar, the 'beaten' (RV 'bruised') corn' of Lv 24¹⁴, ordinary flour or 'meal,' and the 'fine meal' for honoured guests (Gn 18⁶) or 'fine flour' for baking's kitchen (1 K 4²²) and the ritual meal-offerings.

The flour was then mixed with water and kneaded in the wooden basin or kneading-trough (Ex 8³ 12²⁴). In a case of urgency the dough was at once made into cakes and fired. These unleavened cakes were termed mazzoth and were alone permitted for the altar and during Passover and the immediately following Feast of Unleavened Cakes (Mazzoth). On ordinary occasions, however, a small lump of yesterday's baking, which had been reserved for the purpose, was broken down and mixed with to-day's 'batch.' The whole was then set aside for a few hours till thoroughly leavened (see LEAVEN).

Three modes of firing bread are found in OT, as in the East at the present day. (a) The first is represented by Elijah's 'cake baked on the hot stones' (1 K 19⁶ RVm). A few flat stones are gathered together, and a fire lighted upon them. When the stones are sufficiently heated, the embers are raked aside, the cakes are laid on the stones and covered with the embers. After a little the ashes are again removed, the cake is turned (Hos 7⁸) and once more covered. Presently the cake is ready. (b) In Syria and Arabia to-day a convex iron plate is much used, especially among the Bedouin. It is placed over a small fire-pit with the convex side uppermost, on which the cakes of dough are laid and fired. The Hebrew 'baking-pan' (Lv 25 7⁹ RV) must have resembled this species of iron 'girdle.' (c) The settled population, however, chiefly made use of one or other of the various kinds of oven, then as now called tannur. In one form, which may be termed the bowl-oven, since it consists of a large clay bowl inverted, with a movable lid, the heat is applied by heaping cattle dung, etc., on the outside. The cakes are baked on the heated stones covered by the oven. In other parts of the country the jar-oven is used. This is really a large earthenware jar which is heated by fuel, consisting of stubble (Mal 4¹), grass (Mt 6³⁰), dry twigs (1 K 17²³) and the like, placed in the bottom of the jar. When the latter is thoroughly heated, the cakes are applied to the inside walls. From this type was developed the pit-oven, which was formed partly in the ground, partly built up of clay and plastered throughout, narrowing from the bottom upwards. Many of these pit-ovens have been discovered in the recent excavations. It is to the smoke issuing from one of these, while being heated, that the smoke of the ruined cities of the plain is compared in Gn 19²⁸ (EV furnace, and often unnecessary rendering for 'oven'). Such no doubt were the ovens of the professional bakers in the street named after them in Jerusalem (Jer 37²¹).

Bread-making was at all times the special charge of the women of the household. Even when, as we have just seen, baking became a recognized industry, a large part of the baker's work had been, as now in the East, merely to fire the bread baked by the women at home.

A considerable variety of bakemeats (Gn 40¹⁷, lit. 'food, the work of the baker') is met with in OT, but only in a few cases is it possible to identify their nature or form. The ordinary cake—the loaf of OT and NT—was round and fairly thick; such at least was the rolling 'cake of barley bread' of Jg 7¹³. These cakes were always broken by the hand, never cut. A cake frequently used for ritual purposes (Ex 29² and often) seems, from its name, to have been pierced with holes like the modern Passover-cakes. The precise nature of the cracknels of 1 K 14³ (Amer. RV 'cakes') is unknown. The wafer, often named in ritual passages (cf. also Ex 16³¹), was evidently a very thin species of cake. For what may be called the pastry of the Hebrews, the curious in these matters are referred to the art. 'Bakemeats' in the Encyc. Bibl. col. 460 f.

BREASTPLATE.—See ARMOUR, 2 (c).

BREASTPLATE (of the High Priest).—In the directions for the official dress of the high priest, as laid down by the priestly writer, a prominent place is occupied by the breastplate or pectoral. The fuller designation 'the breastplate of judgment' (Ex 28¹⁵, Sir 45¹⁰) is significant of the purpose of the breastplate, which was to form a fitting receptacle or pouch for the Urim and Thummim (wh. see), by means of which judgment was pronounced. The special directions for the making of the breastplate are given in Ex 28¹²⁻²⁶ (cf. 39⁸⁻²¹). It was made of an oblong piece of richly wrought linen, which, folded in two, formed a square of half a cubit, or 9 inches, in the side. Attached to the outer side were four rows of precious stones in gold settings, twelve in all, each stone having engraved upon it the name of a tribe 'for a memorial before J' continually' (28¹²). The breastplate was kept in position by means of two cords of 'wreathen work' of gold, by which it was attached to a couple of gold 'ouches' (probably rosettes of gold filigree) on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, while the lower part was fastened to the ephod by a 'lace of blue' (28²³) at each corner.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BREECHES.—Rather short drawers of white linen ordered to be worn by the priests on grounds of modesty (Ex 28², Lv 16⁴, Ezk 44¹⁸, Sir 45⁸). Josephus describes those worn in his time in his Ant. iii. vii. 1. The modern trousers are represented in AV by hosen (wh. see).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD.—Jesus was Mary's first-born (Lk 2⁷), and she subsequently (according to the view accepted in the present article) bore to Joseph four sons, James, Joseph, Judas, and Simon, and several daughters (Mt 13⁵⁶⁻⁵⁸ = Mk 6³). During His ministry the Lord's brethren did not believe in Him. They sneered at Him (Jn 7³⁻⁵), and once they concluded that He was mad, and wished to arrest Him and convey Him away from Capernaum (Mk 3²¹, 31). After the Resurrection, however, convinced by so tremendous a demonstration, they joined the company of the believers (Ac 1¹⁴).

In early days, partly at least in the interests of the notion of Mary's perpetual virginity, two theories were promulgated in regard to the 'Brethren of the Lord.' (a) They were supposed to be sons of Joseph by a former marriage, having thus no blood-relationship with Jesus. So Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Epiphanius. (b) They were held to be His cousins, sons of Mary, the wife of Alphaeus (Mt 27⁵⁶ = Mk 15⁴⁰); 'brother' here implying merely kinship, as Abraham calls himself and his nephew Lot 'brethren' (Gn 13⁸), and Laban calls Jacob, his sister's son, his 'brother' (29¹⁵). So Jerome and Augustine. That Mary, the wife of Alphaeus and mother of James the Little, was a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, is an inference from Jn 19²⁵, where it is supposed that only three women are mentioned: (1) His mother, (2) His mother's sister, viz., Mary, the wife of Clopas (= Alphaeus), and (3) Mary Magdalene. But there are probably four: (1) His mother, (2) her sister Salome, the mother of the sons of Zebedee (cf. Mt. = Mk.). (3) Mary, the wife of Clopas, and (4) Mary Magdalene. It is very unlikely that two sisters should have been named Mary; and moreover, James, the son of Alphaeus, was an Apostle (Mt 10³ = Mk 3¹⁸ = Lk 6¹⁴), and none of the Lord's brethren was an Apostle in His life-time (cf. Ac 1¹²⁻¹⁴).

BRIBERY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 5.

BRICK.—The use of sun-dried bricks as building material in OT times, alongside of the more durable limestone, is attested both by the excavations and by Scripture references (see HOUSE). The process of brick-making shows the same simplicity in every age and country. Suitable clay is thoroughly moistened, and reduced to a uniform consistency by tramping and kneading (Nah 3⁴ RV 'go into the clay, and tread the mortar'). It then passes to the brick-moulder, who places the right quantity in his mould, an open wooden frame with one of its four sides prolonged as a handle, wiping off the superfluous clay with his hand. The mould is removed and the brick left on the ground to dry in the sun. Sometimes greater consistency was given to the clay by mixing it with chopped straw and the refuse of the threshing-floor, as related in the familiar passage Ex 57¹⁹. As regards the daily 'tale of bricks' there referred to, an expert moulder in Egypt to-day is said to be able to turn out no fewer than 'about 3000 bricks' per diem (Vigouroux, Dict. de la Bible, i. 1932). The Egyptian bricks resembled our own in shape, while those of Babylonia were generally as broad as they were long. According to Flinders Petrie, the earliest Palestine bricks followed the Babylonian pattern.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM

There is no evidence in OT of the making of kiln-burnt bricks, which was evidently a foreign custom to the author of Gn 11³. The brickkiln of 2 S 12³¹, Nah 3⁴ is really the brick-mould (so RVin). In the obscure passage Jer 43⁹ RV has brickwork. A curious ritual use of bricks as incense-altars is mentioned in Is 65³.

Reference may also be made to the use of clay as a writing material, which was introduced into Palestine from Babylonia, and, as we now know, continued in use in certain quarters till the time of Hezekiah at least. Plans of buildings, estates, and cities were drawn on such clay tablets, a practice which illustrates the command to Ezekiel to draw a plan of Jerusalem upon a tile or clay brick (4¹, see the elaborate note by Haupt in 'Ezekiel' (PB), 98 ff.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM.—See MARRIAGE.

BRIDGE.—Only 2 Mac 12¹³ AV, where RV reads the proper name Gephyrun. For the extreme antiquity of the arch see ARCH.

BRIDLE.—See BIT.

BRIER.—See THORNS.

BRIGANDINE.—The 'brigand' was originally simply a light-armed irregular foot soldier, and the coat of mail which he wore was called a 'brigandine.' The word is used in Jer 46⁴ 51³ (RV 'coat of mail'). See ARMOUR.

BRIMSTONE, or sulphur, is one of the chemical elements. It is found in volcanic regions both uncombined as a deposit and also as a constituent of the gases (sulphur di-oxide and sulphuretted hydrogen) which are exhaled from the earth or dissolved in the water of hot springs. Such sulphur springs are abundant in the Jordan Valley and on the shores of the Dead Sea. The account of the destruction of the Cities of the Plain (Gn 19²⁴, 25, Lk 17³³) states that the Lord rained upon them 'brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven,' and the most generally accepted view is that the disaster was due to an eruption of petroleum, caused by an earthquake. This is more probable on geological grounds than a volcanic eruption. In either case the 'brimstone' would not be solid sulphur, but the choking gases mentioned above, which would accompany the rain of fire (see Driver, in loc.; Tristram, Land of Israel, 353 f.; Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 129 f.). This passage suggests the imagery of a number of others in which 'fire and brimstone' are agencies of destruction (Ps 11⁵, Ezk 38²², Rev 9¹⁷, 18 14¹⁰ 19²⁰ 20¹⁰ 21⁸). In the last three of these the peculiar feature of the 'lake' may be a reminiscence of a volcanic crater filled with molten lava and exhaling sulphurous fumes (cf. the 'great mountain burning with fire,' Rev 9²). In Dt 29²⁴ there is a warning that if Israel is disobedient, their whole land will be 'brimstone and salt,' like the desolate region round the Dead Sea. In Is 34⁹ a similar threat is uttered against Edom. In Is 30²⁵ the 'breath of the Lord' kindling Tophet, is like a stream of brimstone.

BROTHERLY LOVE

BROAD PLACE.—See CITY.

BROID.—To broid or to braid is to plait. Both spellings are used in AV. 1 Ti 2⁹ 'with broided hair' (Gr. 'in plaits'), Jth 10³ 'braided the hair of her head.'

BROIDER.—This Eng. word has no connexion with broid. It means to adorn cloth with needlework. The mod. form is embroider. 'Broider' occurs in Ex 28⁴ and in Ezk 16¹⁰, 13, 18 26¹⁶ 27¹⁶, 24. See EMBROIDERY.

BRONZE.—See BRASS.

BROOCH.—Ex 35²² RV, for AV 'bracelets.' See ORNAMENTS, § 5.

BROOK.—The Heb. words thus rendered are—1. Aphiq, meaning the actual bed of the stream (Ps 42¹), tr. also by 'stream' and 'river.' 2. Ye'ôr—almost always used of the Nile and water-trenches of Egypt. It is tr. 'brook' only in Is 19⁶ 7⁸. Once it is used for the water-channel (Job 28¹⁰); once (Is 33²¹) it is rendered 'stream'; while in Dn 12 it stands for the Tigris. 3. Mikhal (2 S 17³⁰), a word of uncertain derivation and meaning. 4. Nachal is the most usual word for EV 'brook.' It is the exact equivalent of the Arab waddy, which means a valley containing a stream of water. It may be applied to the valley (Nu 21¹² etc.), or to the water-course alone (Dt 9²¹ etc.), which is still 'the wady,' even after it has escaped from the valley.

The slopes of the mountain range of Western Palestine are deeply furrowed by a succession of great wadys. The sides of the mountains that dip into the Jordan Valley are far steeper than those to the W., and the streams flowing eastward plunge down through awful chasms, worn deep with the lapse of ages. In the longer descent westward the valleys frequently open into beautiful and fertile glades. For the most part the brooks, fed only by the rain, dry up in the summer-time, and the mills along their banks fall silent, waking to fresh activity again only with the music of the rushing storm. There are, however, streams fed by perennial springs, such as el-'Aujeh and the Kishon, W. of Jordan, and the Yarnuk and the Jabbok on the east. W. EWING.

BROOM.—See JUNIPER.

BROTHER.—See FAMILY, and BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

BROTHERLY LOVE.—Philadelphia is not 'brother-like love,' but 'brother-love,' the love one has for brothers or sisters, scil. 'love of the brethren.'—so AV in 1 P 1²² and RV uniformly (add Ro 12¹⁰, 1 Th 4⁹, He 13¹, 2 P 1⁷). The adjective in 1 P 3⁸ should be rendered 'loving your brethren,' not 'loving as brethren' (AV, RV). This adj. appears in classical Gr. in its primary (family) sense, as the epithet, e.g., of the Græco-Egyptian king Ptolemy Philadelphus, and of Attalus II. of Pergamus, founder of Philadelphia (Rev 1¹¹ etc.), named after this king. The term received no wider application in either Greek or Jewish (OT) ethics; Jews called each other 'brethren' as being 'children of the stock of Abraham' (Ac 13²⁶). First occurring in its religious use in 1 Thess., philadelphia looks like a coinage of St. Paul's; but its elements lie in the teaching of Jesus. 'Calling no one on earth father' because they 'have one Father, the heavenly Father,' His disciples are 'all brothers' (Mt 23⁸, 9; cf. 6⁹); the love of the natural household is transferred, with a deepened sense, to 'the household of faith' (see Gal 6¹⁰, Eph 2¹⁹). This sentiment is formed in the community gathered around Christ its 'first-born,' the family of the 'sons' and 'heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ' (Ro 8¹⁴⁻¹⁷, 29). 'Go to my brethren,' the Risen Lord had said, 'and tell them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father' (Jn 20¹⁷; cf. Mt 12⁵⁰ 28¹⁰); He required them to cherish toward each other the love He showed toward them, making this the mark of discipleship (Jn 13³⁴, 35 15¹², 13, 1 Jn 2⁷, 3¹¹ 4¹⁹, 21, 2 Jn¹, 1 Co 8⁴ etc.).

The body to which this love belongs is called 'the brotherhood' in 1 P 2¹⁷ (also 5⁹), where 'love to the brotherhood' is associated with respect for humanity and fear of God as a fundamental Christian instinct (cf. 1 Th 4⁹, Col 3¹⁴, 1 Co 13, etc.). St. Paul describes this affection as the mutual 'care' of 'members' of 'one body' (1 Co 12¹²⁻²⁷): it forbids envy, unkindness, schism; it animates, and virtually includes, all services and duties of Christians towards each other (1 Co 13, Gal 5¹³⁻¹⁵); it is the first 'fruit of the Spirit' (Gal 5²², cf. 4⁸, 7⁵⁶), the fruit of God's love to us and the test of our love to God (1 Jn 4¹¹⁻²¹), 'the fulfilment of the law' (Ro 13⁸⁻¹⁰), and the crown of Christian purity (1 P 1²); the Cross supplies its model and its inspiration (Eph 4¹¹⁻⁵, 1 Jn 3¹⁴). When St. Paul speaks of 'love,' he means 'brother-love' in the first place, but not exclusively (Gal 6¹⁰, 1 Th 5¹⁰, Ro 12¹³⁻²¹; cf. Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁸ etc.). Amongst the manifestations of philadelphia, hospitality (philoxenia) is conspicuous (He 13¹⁻³, 1 P 4⁹⁻¹⁰, 3 Jn 1⁸⁻⁹); also 'communication' or 'ministering to the necessities of the saints' (Ro 12¹³, 15²⁷, He 6¹⁰ 13¹⁵, 1 Jn 3¹⁷, 18). The prominence, and strangeness to the world, of this feature of primitive Christianity are strikingly attested by the Epistle to Diognetus, § 1, Tertullian's Apol. § 39, and (from outside) Lucian's de Morte Peregrini, xii. 16, and Julian's Epist. 49.

BROWN.—See COLOURS, § 2.

BRUIT.—A bruit (pronounced as brute) is a rumour or report (Fr. bruit, from bruire to roar). Thus 2 Mac 4⁹ 'the bruit of his manliness was spread everywhere'; Nah 3¹⁹ 'all that hear the bruit of thee shall clap the hands over thee.'

BUCKET.—See HOUSE, 9.

BUCKLE.—See ORNAMENTS, § 5.

BUCKLER.—See ARMOUR, 2 (a).

BUGEAU.—A descriptive epithet applied to Haman in Ad. Est 12⁹ RV (AV has 'Agagite'). Bougaios occurs in Homer (Il. xiii. 824, Od. xviii. 79) as a term of reproach = 'bully' or 'braggart.' Whether the Sept. intended it in this sense, or as a gentile adjective, is wholly uncertain.

BUILDER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 3.

BUKKI.—1. Son of Jogli, a prince of the tribe of Dan, and one of the ten men entrusted with the task of dividing the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel (Nu 34²²). 2. Son of Abishua and father of Uzzi, fifth in descent from Aaron in the line of the high priests through Phinehas (1 Ch 6⁴¹, Ezr 7⁴). In 1 Es 8² he is called Boccas, for which Borith is substituted in 2 Es 1².

BUKKIAH.—A Levite of the sons of Heman, and leader of the sixth band or course in the Temple service (1 Ch 25⁴⁻¹²).

BUL.—1 K 6³⁵, the Canaanite name for the month which the Babylonians termed Marcheshvan. See TIME.

BULL, BULLOCK.—See OX.

BULRUSH.—See REED.

BULWARK.—See FORTIFICATION AND SIEGE CRAFT.

BUNAH ('intelligence').—A man of Judah, a son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2²⁶).

BUNCH.—Besides meaning bundle (of hyssop, Ex 12², Heb. 'something tied together') and cluster (of raisins, 2 S 16¹, 1 Ch 12⁴⁰, Heb. 'something dried'), bunch is used also for the hump of a camel in Is 30⁶. Cf. Shaks. Rich. III. i. iii. 248—

'This pois'nous bunch-back'd d'oad.'

BUNDLE.—A bundle of money is spoken of in Gn 42³⁵, of myrrh in Ca 1⁴, of life in 1 S 25² (on wh. see Exp. Times, xvii. 435); also in Jer 10¹ RVm a bundle for a journey (see Driver's Jer. p. 354); and in NT of tares (Mt 13³⁰) and of sticks (Ac 28³).

BUNNI, Neh 9⁴ 10¹¹, but in each case perhaps the text is corrupt.

BURDEN.—The word so rendered in the OT is derived from a root which means to 'lift' or 'carry.' It has the two senses of an actual burden and a prophetic utterance. Instances of the former are 2 K 5¹⁷, Neh 13¹⁹, Nu 4¹⁴. Related usages are frequent; in Is 22²⁵ the word suggests the pressure of something hanging on a peg, in Nu 11¹ the responsibility and in Hos 8¹⁰ the privilege of government, in Ps 38⁴ the responsibility for sin. The second sense is that of a solemn utterance, and the marginal alternative 'oracle' (Is 14²⁸ et al.) is to be preferred. It was customary to explain this use of the word as due to the threatening character of the utterance; but many of the utterances are not threatening (cf. Zec 12. 9¹, 9-17; in Pr 30¹ and 31¹ RV puts 'oracle' in the text and 'burden' in the margin), and the word-play in Jer 23³² involves a reproof of the men who were disposed to regard the oracle of God as literally a burden. Most utterances of the prophets, moreover, were of necessity from their occasion minatory. 'Burden' in this second usage denotes simply something taken up solemnly upon the lips, both weighty in itself and weighty in its communication. It is not used of merely human utterances, but always carries with it the suggestion of Divine inspiration, actual or falsely assumed (La 2⁴).

In the NT, Ac 21⁴ is an instance of the literal use. The figures are easy. The word is used for the ordinances of the Law as interpreted by the Pharisees (Mt 23⁴, Lk 11⁴⁶), for the prohibitions of the Apostolic decree (Ac 15²⁴; cf. Rev 2²⁴), for the pressure and load of life (Mt 20¹²), for an exacting or even legitimate charge upon others (2 Co 11¹² 12¹³), for the imagined difficulties of following Christ (Mt 11³⁰). Two other kinds of burdens with their right treatment are contrasted. Other men's errors and sorrows must be shared in sympathy (Gal 6²); though in the service of Christ there can be no transfer of obligations, but each man must carry his own kit and do his own duty (Gal 6²).

BURGLARY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 6.

BURIAL.—See MOURNING CUSTOMS, TOMB.

BURNING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 11.

BURNING BUSH.—See BUSH.

BURNT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

BUSH (seneh, Ex 3⁴, Dt 33¹⁰).—The 'burning bush' has traditionally been supposed to be a kind of bramble (Rubus), of which Palestine has several varieties, but one of the thorny shrubs of Sinai of the acacia family would seem more probable. Sacred bushes and trees are common in Palestine and Arabia. 'In (or at) the bush' in Mt 12²⁹ || Lk 20²⁷—the passage dealing with the burning bush (RV 'in the place concerning the bush').

BUSHEL.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BUTLER.—See CUPBEARER.

BUTTER.—See FOOD, MILK.

BUZ.—1. The second son of Nahor and Milcah, and nephew of Abraham (Gn 22²¹). Elihu, one of the friends of Job (Job 32⁷), is called a Buzite, and may have belonged to a tribe of that name against which judgments are denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 25²²). 2. A man of the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5⁴).

BUZI.—The father of the prophet Ezekiel (ch. 1³) and consequently a member of the priestly house of Zadok. Of the man himself nothing is known. Jewish writers were led to identify him with Jeremiah, partly by a supposed connexion of the name with a verb meaning 'despise,' and partly by a theory that when the father of a prophet is named it is to be understood that he also was a prophet.

BUZITE.—See BUZ.

BY.—In the Authorized Version of Is generally used for the agent and by for the instrument. Thus Mt 1²² 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of (RV 'by') the Lord by (RV 'through') the prophet.'

In 1 Co 4⁴ 'I know nothing by myself,' by means contrary to, against, as in Hamilton's Catechism, 1559 (the Tabil), 'Jugis quihlk fur lufe of rewardis dois only thing by the oraour of justice'; also fol. vii., 'cursit ar thal quihlk gangis by ye commondis of God.'

BY AND BY.—In AV 'by and by' means immediately, not as now after some time. Thus Lk 21¹ 'the end is not by and by' (RV 'immediately').

BYWAY.—See ROADS.

C

CAB.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CABBON (Jos 15¹⁰).—A town of Judah near Egion. See MACHBENA.

CABIN.—The Eng. word 'cabin' is now chiefly confined to an apartment in a ship, but was formerly used of any small room. It occurs in AV for the cell (which is the word in AVm and RV) in which Jeremiah was confined (Jer 37¹⁸). Cf. Spenser, FQ i. vi. 23—

'So long in secret cabin there he held
Her captive to his sensual desire.'

CABUL (Jos 19¹⁷, 1 K 9¹³).—A town of Asher on the border of Zebulun. The district was ceded by Solomon to Tyre. Prob. the large village Kabul, E. of Acco.

CÆSAR.—This is the cognomen or surname of the gens Julia, which was borne, for example, by its most illustrious representative, Caius Julius Cæsar. The emperor Augustus (B.C. 23–A.D. 14) had it by adoption, and was officially named 'Imperator Cæsar Augustus.' His stepson, the emperor Tiberius, officially 'Tiberius Cæsar Augustus' (A.D. 14–37), had it through his adoption by Augustus. It was borne also, amongst other less important persons, by the emperor Caius Cæsar Germanicus (nicknamed 'Caligula,' 'Boots') (A.D. 37–41), who was a son of Germanicus, the adopted son of the emperor Tiberius. These alone among the Roman emperors had it as a family name, but all the emperors bore it as a title except Vitellius (A.D. 69), and hence we find it continued in the titles Kaiser and Czar. The beginning of this use is seen in the NT. There the name is found always, except twice (Lk 21³), by itself, simply equal to 'the Emperor.' The remaining emperors of the 1st cent. are Claudius (wh. see), Nero (wh. see), Galba (9 June 68–15 Jan. 69), Otho (15 Jan.–25 Apr. 69), Vitellius (2 Jan. 69–20 [?] Dec. 70), Vespasian (69–79), Titus (71–79–81), Domitian (81–96), Nerva (96–98), Trajan (97–98–117). A. SOUTER.

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD.—In Ph 4²² 'they that are of Cæsar's house' send special greetings to the Philippians. St. Paul wrote from Rome, where he was in semi-captivity, and some of the Christians in Rome belonged to the efficient and talented body of slaves and freedmen who worked in the Imperial palace and performed varied service for the emperor Nero. The number of these servants was very large, and amongst them were accountants, governors of provinces, secretaries, stewards, etc., as well as a great many officials concerned with humbler duties. They were persons of influence and often of considerable wealth, drawn from all nations within the Empire. The testimony of inscriptions makes it certain that most of the persons named in Ro 16 were 'of Cæsar's household.' A. SOUTER.

CÆSAREA (mod. Kaysariyeh).—A city rebuilt by Herod the Great on the site of Straton's Tower, on the coast of Palestine, between Joppa and Dora. Its special features were—a large harbour protected by a huge mole and by a wall with 10 lofty towers and soloss; a promenade round the port, with arches where sailors could lodge; a temple of Augustus raised on a platform, and visible far out at sea, containing two colossal statues of Rome and the Emperor; a system of drainage whereby the tides were utilized to flush the streets; walls embracing a semicircular area stretching for a mile along the sea-coast; two aqueducts, one of them 8 miles in length, displaying great engineering skill; a hippodrome; an amphitheatre capable of seating 20,000 persons; a theatre; a court of justice, and many other noble structures. The city took 12 years to build, and Herod celebrated its completion (B.C. 10–9) with sumptuous games and entertainments which cost £120,000. Herod used the port for his frequent voyages. Here he condemned to death his two sons Alexander and Aristobulus. After the banishment of Herod's successor Archelaus, Cæsarea became the official residence of the Roman procurators of Palestine (broken only by the brief interval during which it was under the independent rule of Herod Agrippa I., who met his tragic death here in B.C. 44 [Ac 12^{20–21}]). The fifth of these, Pontius Pilate, ordered a massacre in the hippodrome of Cæsarea of those Jews who had flocked to implore the removal from Jerusalem of the profane eagle standards and images of the Emperor recently introduced. Only on their baring their necks for death and thus refusing to submit, did Pilate revoke the order, and direct the ensigns to be removed. Christianity early found its way here, Philip probably being the founder of the Church (Ac 8¹⁴), while Paul passed through after his first visit to Jerusalem (Ac 19³⁰). Cæsarea was the scene of the baptism of Cornelius (Ac 10). Here also the Holy Spirit for the first time fell on heathen, thus inaugurating the Gentile Pentecost (v. 4). Paul may have passed through Cæsarea (Ac 18²) at the time when numbers of Jewish patriots, captured by Cumanus, had here been crucified by Quadratus, legate of Syria. It was at Cæsarea that Paul's arrest in Jerusalem was foretold by Agabus (Ac 21^{8–14}). Here he was imprisoned for two years under Felix (Ac 23). During that time a riot broke out between Greeks and Jews as to their respective rights, and Felix ordered a general massacre of the Jews to be carried out in the city. On the recall of Felix, Nerosent Porcius Festus, who tried Paul (Ac 25⁶) and also allowed him to state his case before Herod Agrippa II. and Berenice (Ac 26). The wickedness of the last procurator, Gessius Florus, finally drove the Jews into revolt. A riot in Cæsarea led to a massacre in Jerusalem, and simultaneously 20,000 of the Jewish population of Cæsarea were slaughtered. During the Great War, Cæsarea was used as the base for operations, first by Vespasian, who was here proclaimed Emperor by his soldiers (A.D. 69), and latterly by his son Titus, who completed the destruction of Jerusalem. The latter celebrated the birthday of his brother Domitian by forcing 2500 Jews to fight with beasts in the arena at Cæsarea. The city was made into a Roman colony, renamed Colonia Prima Flavia Augusta Cæsarensis, released from taxation, and recognized as the capital of Palestine.

Several Church Councils were held at Cæsarea. It was from A.D. 200 to 451 the residence of the Metropolitan bishop of Palestine. Origen taught there, and Eusebius was its bishop from A.D. 313 to 340. It was the birthplace of Procopius, the historian. In A.D. 548 the Christians were massacred by the Jews and Samaritans. In 638 it surrendered to the Moslems under Abu Obeida. It was recovered in 1102 by Baldwin I., who massacred the Saracens in the mosque, once the Christian cathedral. The loot contained the so-called 'Holy Grail' of medieval legend. Saladin recaptured Cæsarea in 1187, but it was retaken by Richard I. in 1192. The city, however, was so ruined that when restored it covered only one-tenth of the original ground. In 1251 Louis IX. fortified it strongly. In 1265 it was stormed by Sultan Bibars, who utterly demolished it. To-day it is a wilderness of dreary ruins, tenanted only by a few wandering shepherds.

G. A. FRANK KNIGHT.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI.—The scene of Christ's charge to Peter (Mt 16¹³⁻²⁰, Mk 8²⁷). Here was a sanctuary of Pan—a fact still remembered in the modern name Banias—and when Herod the Great received the territory from Augustus in B.C. 20, he erected here a temple. His son Philip refounded the city, and changed its name from Panæas to Cæsarea in honour of Augustus—adding his own name to distinguish the town from the similarly named city founded by his father on the sea-coast. For a while it was called Neronias, but ultimately the old name came once more to the surface and ousted the others. Here Titus celebrated with gladiatorial shows the capture of Jerusalem. It was captured by the Crusaders in 1130, and finally lost by them to the Moslems in 1165. It lies 1150 ft. above the sea in a recess of the Hermon mountains, and is well watered. Under the ancient castle of the Crusaders a copious stream issued from a cave, now much choked with fallen fragments of rock, where was the shrine of Pan. The modern village is small, and the remains of the Roman city meagre. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

CAGE.—Birds were taken to market in a cage or coop of wicker work (Jer 5²⁷); a similar cage might hold a decoy-bird in fowling (Sir 11²⁰). One of Ashurbanipal's hunting scenes shows a cage of strong wooden bars from which a lion is being let loose (cf. Ezk 19⁸ RV). In Rev 18² render, with RV, 'hold' or 'prison' for AV 'cage.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CALAPHAS.—Joseph Calaphas, the son-in-law of Annas (Jn 18¹³), was high priest between A.D. 18 and 36; and thus 'the memorable year' of our Lord's trial fell in the course of his pontificate (Jn 11⁴ 18¹³). He was, like all the priestly order, a Sadducee; and he was a man of masterful temper, with his full share of the insolence which was a Sadducean characteristic. He figures thrice in the NT. 1. After the raising of Lazarus, the rulers, alarmed at the access of popularity which it brought to Jesus, convened a meeting of the Sanhedrin to determine what should be done. Calaphas presided ex officio, and with a high hand forced a resolution that Jesus should be put to death (Jn 11⁴⁷⁻⁵³). 2. He presided at the subsequent meeting of the Sanhedrin when Jesus was tried and condemned; and there again he displayed his character by his open determination to find Him guilty, and his shameless disregard of the forms of law in order to bring about that end (Jn 18²⁴, Mt 26⁵⁷⁻⁶⁸ = Mk 14⁵³⁻⁶⁵ = Lk 22⁶⁶⁻⁷¹). 3. He took part in the examination of Peter and John (Ac 4⁶). DAVID SMITH.

CAIN.—In Gn 4¹ the name (Qayin) is derived from qandh, 'procure.' This, however, is linguistically impossible. It is probably to be connected with a root signifying to 'forge' in metal (cf. vv. 2-4).

1. (a) vv. 1-16 (J). Cain and Abel are represented as the sons of Adam and Eve. But it is clear that the narrative was at one time independent of Adam and Eve; it presupposes a much later stage in human progress. The distinction between pastoral and agricultural life (v. 2), and between cereal and animal offerings (vv. 3, 4), the custom of blood-revenge (v. 4), and the large increase in the number of human beings implied in Cain's fear of being slain (vv. 14-15), in his possession of a wife (v. 17), and in his erection of a city

(ib.), all show that a long period must be understood to have elapsed since the primitive condition of the first pair. The meaning of certain passages in the story is uncertain; vv. 7, 12, 15 must be studied in the commentaries. When Cain was condemned to be a fugitive and a wanderer, he feared death in revenge for his murder of Abel; but Jahweh 'appointed a sign' for him. This is not explained, but the writer probably thought of it as something which rendered Cain sacrosanct, so that, according to a deeply rooted Semitic conception, it would be a defilement and a crime to touch him (see art. HOLINESS). And he went and dwelt (v. 16) in the land of Nôd ('Wanderland'). The fact that the story appears to describe conditions long subsequent to those of the first pair has led many writers to hold that Cain is the eponymous ancestor of a tribe, and that the tradition was intended to explain the wild and wandering life of Arabian nomads. This kind of life, so different from the prosperous peace of settled agricultural communities, must have been the result of a primitive curse, incurred by some crime. And the narrative relates that the settled, agricultural Cainite tribe ruthlessly destroyed members of an adjacent tribe of pastoral habits; that the fear of strict blood-revenge was so great that the Cainites were obliged to leave their country, and become wandering nomads; and that some tribal sign or badge—such as a tattoo, or incisions in the flesh—was adopted, which marked its possessors as being under the protection of their tribal god. It is further conjectured, owing to the formation of the two names from the same root, that 'Cain' stands for the Kenites (cf. Nu 24²², Jg 4¹¹ with RVm). See Driver, Genesis, p. 72.

(b) vv. 17-24 seem to contain a different tradition, but incorporated also by J. Cain's erection of a city scarcely seems to harmonize with his being a fugitive and a wanderer in fear of his life. The purpose of the tradition was to explain the origin of early arts and social conditions—e.g. the beginnings of city-life (v. 17), polygamy (v. 19), nomad life (v. 20), music (v. 21), metallurgy (v. 22).

2. The value of the story lies, as always, mainly in its religious teaching. We know not of how much crude superstition and polytheism the tradition may have been divested by the prophetic writer who edited it. But in its present form, the connexion of Cain with Adam and Eve suggests the thought of the terrible effects of the Fall: the next generation reaches a deeper degree of guilt; Cain is more hardened than Adam, in that he feels no shame but boldly tries to conceal his guilt; and the punishment is worse—Adam was to till the ground with labour, but Cain would not henceforth receive from the earth her strength. The story teaches also the sacredness of human life, the moral holiness of God, and the truth that a result of sin is a liability to succumb to further sin (v. 7b).

3. In the NT Cain is referred to in He 11⁴, Jude 1, 1 Jn 3¹². The latter passage must be explained by vv. 9-10. The children of God—qua children of God—cannot sin; and conversely the children of the devil cannot do righteousness or love one another. Cain, then, murdered his brother because he belonged to the latter category, and his brother to the former.

A. H. M'NEILE.

CAINAN.—1. The son of Enos and father of Mahalaleel (Lk 3³⁷). See KENAN. 2. The son of Arphaxad (Lk 3³⁸, which follows LXX of Gn 10²⁴ 11¹³). The name is wanting in the Heb. text of the last two passages.

CAKE.—See BREAD.

CALAH.—The Kalach of the inscriptions, one of the great fortresses which after the fall of Nineveh (cf. Jon 4¹¹ and the Greek writers) were supposed to make up that city. Both Nineveh and Calah were, however, always separate in structure and in administration. Calah lay on the site of the great modern mounds of Nimrud, as was first proved by the explorer Layard

In Gn 10¹¹ it is said to have been founded by Nimrod, and, along with Nineveh and other cities, to have formed part of 'the great city.' It was the capital, or at least the chief royal residence, under several of the greatest Assyrian kings, whose palaces have been excavated by modern explorers. Here also was found the famous black obelisk of Shalmaneser II.

J. F. McCURDY.

CALAMOLALUS (1 Es 5²²).—A corrupt place-name, probably due to a conglomeration of the two names Lod and Hadid in Ezr 2³³ (cf. Neh 7³⁷).

CALAMUS.—See REED.

CALCOOL.—A Judahite, a descendant of Zerah (1 Ch 2⁶), otherwise described in 1 K 4⁴¹ (where AV has Chalcol) as a son of Mahol, famous for wisdom, but surpassed by Solomon.

CALDRON.—See HOUSE, § 9.

CALEB ('dog,' one of the numerous animal names in the OT which testify to early totemistic conceptions).—The son of Jephunneh (Nu 13⁶). As an individual, he appears as one of the spies who were sent to 'spy out the land' of Canaan. He represented the tribe of Judah, and, together with Joshua, advocated an immediate attack upon the land; the fear of the people he denounces as rebellion against Jahweh (Nu 14⁹); this, however, is resented by the people, who threaten to stone both him and Joshua. The carrying out of this threat is frustrated by the appearance of the Shekinah ('the glory of the Lord') in the Tabernacle (v. 10). As a reward for his faithfulness Caleb is specially singled out for Jahweh's favour (Nu 14^{30, 31}, Dt 1³⁷). He is thus one of the great champions of Jahweh.

As a name of a clan, Caleb (=Calebites) formed a branch of the children of Kenaz, an Edomite tribe, who settled in the hill-country north of the Negeb; they had possessions also in the Negeb itself (Jos 14¹³⁻¹⁵, 1 S 30¹⁴, 1 Ch 2²²); they ultimately became absorbed in the tribe of Judah. W. O. EOSTERLEY.

CALEB-EPHRATHAH.—Named in 1 Ch 2²⁴ as the place where Hezron died. It is not improbable, however, that we should read: 'after Hezron died, Caleb came unto Ephrath the wife of Hezron his father.'

CALENDAR.—See TIME.

CALF, GOLDEN.—The incident of 'the golden calf' is related in detail in Ex 32 (cf. Dt 9⁷⁻²¹), a chapter which belongs to the composite Prophetic source of the Pentateuch (JE). At the request of the people, who had begun to despair of Moses' return from the mount, Aaron consented to make a god who should go before them on the journey to Canaan. From the golden ear-rings of their wives and children he fashioned an image of a young bull; this, rather than 'calf,' is the rendering of the Heb. word in the present connexion. The view that 'calf' is diminutive and sarcastic for bull' is precluded by the use of the word elsewhere to denote the young but mature animal. A 'feast to J' was proclaimed for the following day, and an altar erected on which sacrifice was offered. The sequel tells of Moses' return, of the destruction of the image, and finally of Moses' call to his tribesmen, the sons of Levi, to prove their zeal for the pure worship of J' by taking summary vengeance on the backsliders, 3000 of whom fell by their swords.

Two to three centuries later, bull images again emerge in the history of Israel. Among the measures taken by Jeroboam I. for the consolidation of his new kingdom was one which was primarily designed to secure its independence of the rival kingdom of the South in the all-important matter of public worship. With this end in view, perhaps also with the subsidiary purpose of reconciling the priesthood of the local sanctuaries to the new order of things, Jeroboam set up two golden calves, one at Bethel and the other at Dan, the two most important sanctuaries, geographically and historically, in his realm (1 K 12²⁸⁻³³, 2 Ch 11¹⁴). Of the workmanship of Jeroboam's 'calves,' as of that of Aaron, it is impossible to speak with certainty. The former probably, the latter possibly (cf. Ex 32²), consisted of a wooden core overlaid with gold. The view that the Heb. term necessarily implies that the images were small, has been shown above to be groundless. It is also uncertain whether the other chief sanctuaries of the kingdom were at a later period provided with similar images, the leading passage (Am 8¹⁴) being capable of another interpretation.

With regard to the religious significance of this action on the part of Jeroboam, it is now admitted on all hands that the bulls are to be recognized as symbols of J'. He, and He alone, was worshipped both in the wilderness (see Ex 32¹ 'a feast to J'') and at Bethel and Dan under the symbol of the golden bull. For the source of this symbolism we must not look to Egypt, as did the scholars of former days, but to the primitive religious conceptions of the Semitic stock to which the Hebrews belonged. Evidence, both literary and monumental, has accumulated in recent years, showing that among their Semitic kin the bull was associated with various deities as the symbol of vital energy and strength. Jeroboam, therefore, may be regarded as having merely given official sanction to a symbolism with which the Hebrews had been familiar, if not from time immemorial, at least since their association with the Canaanites.

A comparison of Ex 32¹ with 1 K 12²⁸ shows that the two narratives have a literary connexion, of which more than one explanation is possible. In the opinion of most recent scholars, the author or editor of Ex 32 has adapted the traditional material on which he worked so as to provide a polemic, in the spirit of Hosea, against the established worship of the Northern Kingdom, which is here represented as condemned in advance by J' Himself (Ex 32¹⁴). The attitude of Amos to this feature of the established worship at Bethel is not so evident as might have been expected, but of the attitude of Hosea there can be no doubt. It is one of profound scorn and bitter hostility (see 8¹⁴, 10⁵, 13²—the last passage gives the interesting detail that the bulls were kissed like the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca). In the same spirit, and in harmony with the true character of the religion of J'), as revealed through the prophets who succeeded Hosea, the Deuteronomist editor of the Books of Kings repeatedly characterizes the introduction of the bull images into the cult of J' as the sin wherewith Jeroboam made Israel to sin (1 K 14¹⁶, 15²⁴, etc.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CALITAS.—One of the Levites who undertook to repudiate his 'strange wife,' 1 Es 9²². He bore a second name, Colius. A Levite of the same name, and probably the same person, is mentioned in v. 44 as one of those who expounded the Law. See also KELAIAH.

CALLISTHENES (2 Mac 8³³).—A Syrian, captured by the Jews in a small house, where he had taken refuge after the great victory over Nicanor and Gorgias, in B.C. 165 (cf. 1 Mac 4¹⁻³⁴). At a festival in celebration of the victory, the Jews burnt Callisthenes to death, because he had set fire to the portals of the Temple (cf. 1 Mac 4³³).

CALNEH, CALNO.—1. Calneh is associated in Gn 10¹⁰ with Babylon, Erech, and Accad as the earliest cities of Shinar. The Talmudic assertion that 'Calneh means Nippur' receives some support from the age and importance of Nippur, but it is not known that this was ever the name of that city. Kulun, the early name of an important city near Babylon, may be meant. 2. Calneh, linked with Hamath and Gath in Am 6³, is probably the Kulnia (Kullani) associated with Arpad and Hadrach, Syrian cities, in the Assyrian 'tribute' lists, Kullanhu now six miles from Arpad. 3. Calno, compared with Carchemish in Is 10¹, is probably the same as No. 2.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

CALVARY (Lk 23³¹).—See GOLGOTHA.

CALVES OF THE LIPS.—Hos 14¹ (AV 'so will we render the calves of our lips'; RV '... [as] bullocks [the offering of] our lips'), an obscure passage. A very slight change of the MT yields the LXX and Syr. rendering 'the fruit of our lips.'

CAMEL.—The bones of camels are found among the remains of the earliest Semitic civilization at Gezer, B.C. 3000 or earlier, and to-day camels are among the most common and important of domesticated animals in Palestine. They have thus been associated with every era of history in the land. Two species are known: the one-humped Camelus dromedarius, by far the more common in Bible lands; and the Bactrian, two-humped Camelus bactrianus, which comes from the plateau of Central Asia. This latter is to-day kept in considerable numbers by Turkomans settled in the Jaulan, and long caravans of these magnificent beasts may sometimes be encountered coming across the Jordan into Galilee or on the Jericho-Jerusalem road. The C. dromedarius is kept chiefly for burden-bearing, and enormous are the loads of corn, wood, charcoal, stone, furniture, etc., which these patient animals carry: 600 to 800 lbs. are quite average loads. Their owners often ride on the top of the load, or on the empty baggage-saddle when returning; Moslem women and children are carried in a kind of palanquin—the camel's furniture of Gn 31³⁴. For swift travelling a different breed of camel known as hafn is employed. Such a camel will get over the ground at eight to ten miles an hour, and keep going eighteen hours in the twenty-four. These animals are employed near Beersheba, and also regularly to carry the mails across the desert from Damascus to Baghdad. They may be the 'dromedaries' of Est 8¹⁰.

Camels are bred by countless thousands in the lands to the E. of the Jordan, where they form the most valuable possessions of the Bedouin, as they did of the Midianites and Amalekites of old (Jg 7¹³). The Bedouin live largely upon the milk of camels (Gn 32¹⁵) and also occasionally eat their flesh, which was forbidden to the Israelites (Dt 14⁷, Lv 11⁴). They also ride them on their raids, and endeavour to capture the camels of hostile clans. The fellahin use camels for ploughing and harrowing.

The camel is a stupid and long-enduring animal, but at times, especially in certain months, he occasionally 'runs amok,' and then he is very dangerous. His bite is almost always fatal. The camel's hair which is used for weaving (Mk 1⁴, Mt 3⁴) is specially taken from the back, neck, and neighbourhood of the hump: over the rest of the body the ordinary camel has his hair worn short. His skin is kept anointed with a peculiar smelling composition to keep off parasites. The special adaptation of the camel to its surroundings lies in its compound stomach, two compartments of which, the rumen and the reticulum, are especially constructed for the storage of a reserve supply of water; its hump, which though useful to man for attachment of burdens and saddles, is primarily a reserve store of fat; and its wonderful fibrous padded feet adapted to the softest sandy soil. The camel is thus able to go longer without food and drink than any other burden-bearing animal, and is able to traverse deserts quite unadapted to the slender foot of the horse and the ass. On slippery soil, rock or mud, the camel is, however, a helpless flounderer. The camel's food is chiefly tibn (chopped straw), kursenneh, beans, oil-cake, and occasionally some grain. There seems, however, to be no thorn too sharp for its relish.

In the NT references to the camel it is more satisfactory to take the expressions 'swallow a camel' (Mt 23³⁴) and 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle,' etc. (Mt 19²⁴), as types of ordinary Oriental proverbs (cf. the Talmudic expression 'an elephant through a needle's eye') than to weave fancied and laboured explanations. The present writer agrees with Post that the gate called the 'needle's eye' is a fabrication.

CAMPHIRE (kôpher, Ca 1¹⁴ 4¹³) is the henna plant (Lawsonia alba), a small shrub which may still be found at Engedi. It is a great favourite with the people of Palestine to-day, and a 'cluster' of the flowers is often put in the hair; the perfume is much admired. It is also extensively used for staining the hands (especially the nails), the feet, and the hair; it stains an ochre-red, but further treatment of the nails with a mixture of lime and ammonia turns the colour almost black. Old women frequently redden their hair, and Moslems their beards, by means of henna. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CANA.—A Galilean village, where Christ turned water into wine (Jn 2¹) and healed with a word a nobleman's son who lay sick at Capernaum (4⁴⁶). Nathanael was a native of this place (21²). Three sites have been suggested as identifications, any one of which would satisfy the meagre indications. These are Kanat el-Jelil, perhaps the most probable, north of Sephurieh; 'Ain Kana, east of Nazareth; and Kefr Kenna, north-east of, and a little farther from, the same town. The last is the site fixed upon by ecclesiastical tradition. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

CANAANITES.—A name given in the J document to the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine (e.g. Gn 24²⁻⁷ 38², Ex 3⁸ 17 13⁵ 11, Nu 14¹³ 44 21¹, Jg 1¹ 5 17 28 29 30 32).

In this usage the P document concurs, though the E document generally calls them 'Amorites' (wh. see). The E document (Nu 13³⁹) says that the Canaanites dwell by the sea, and the Amorites in the mountains. All the writers unite in calling Palestine the land of Canaan. Opinions differ as to whether the people were named from the land or the land from the people. The earliest usage in the el-Amarna tablets (where it is called Kinahhi and Kinahni) and in the Egyptian inscriptions of the XIXth dynasty, seems to confine the name to the low land of the coast (cf. KIB v. 50.41, 151.50; and Müller, Asien und Europa, 205 ff.). The Phœnicians, much later, on their coins called their land Canaan; and two or three Greek writers testify that they called it Chna (cf. Schröder, Phœn. Sprache, 6 ff.). A view proposed by Rosenmüller has been held by many modern scholars, viz.:—that Canaan means 'lowland,' and was applied to the seacoast of Palestine, as opposed to the central range and the Lebanon. If this view were correct, the Canaanites would have received their name after settling in the coast-land. This view has been proved incorrect by Moore (Proc. of Am. Or. Soc. 1890, p. lxxvii ff.). Probably 'Canaanite' was a tribal name, and the people gave their name to the land (cf. Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine, 68). It appears from Dt 3² that the language of the Canaanites differed only dialectically from that of the Amorites. Both peoples were therefore closely related. Probably the Canaanites were a later wave of Amorites. In Is 19¹⁸ Hebrew is called 'the language of Canaan,'—a statement which is substantiated by the Moabite Stone, the Phœnician inscriptions, and the Hebrew idioms in the el-Amarna tablets. It appears from the latter that the Canaanites had given their name to the country before B.C. 1400. Paton connects their migration with that movement of races which gave Babylonia the Kassite dynasty about B.C. 1700, and which pushed the Hyksos into Egypt. Probably their coming was no later than this.

In Jg. 1 we are told of many Canaanites whom Israel did not at first conquer. After the time of Solomon, however, those resident in the high lands who had not been absorbed into the Israelitish tribes (cf. ISRAEL, §§ 3, 11), were reduced to task-work. The coming of the Philistines pushed the Canaanites out of the maritime plain south of Mt. Carmel, so that ultimately the Phœnicians were the only pure Canaanites left. The leading Phœnician cities were such commercial centres that 'Canaanite' afterwards became equivalent to 'trader' (cf. Hos. 12^a, Is 23^a, Zeph 1¹¹, Ezk 17^a, Pr 31¹⁰).

CANANÆAN or CANAANITE occurs in Mt 10^a and Mk 3^{1a} as a designation of Simon, one of the disciples of Jesus. The first is the correct reading, the Gr. Kananaios being the transliteration of kan'anayyā (a late Heb. derivative from kannā = 'jealous'). It is rendered in Lk 6¹¹ and Ac 1¹³ by Zēlotes (zealot). The Canaanians or Zealots were a sect founded by Judas of Gamala, who headed the opposition to the census of Quirinius (A.D. 6 or 7). They bitterly resented the domination of Rome, and would fain have hastened by the sword the fulfilment of the Messianic hope. During the great rebellion and the siege of Jerusalem, which ended in its destruction (A.D. 70), their fanaticism made them terrible opponents, not only to the Romans, but to other factions amongst their own countrymen.

CANDACE.—Queen of Ethiopia. A eunuch belonging to her, in charge of her treasure, was baptized by Philip (Ac 8²⁷). The name was borne by more than one queen of Ethiopia. The Candace who invaded Egypt in B.C. 22 (Strabo) is, of course, earlier than this. A Candace is perhaps named on one of the pyramids of Meroë. See CUSH. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

CANNEH.—A town named with Haran and Eden (Ezk 27²²), not identified. Mez (Gesch. der Stadt Harrān, 34) suggests that it may be a clerical error for bēnē, i.e. benē Eden, 'sons of Eden' (see Guthe, Bibelwörterbuch, s.v.). W. EWING.

CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—1. Explanation of terms.—The word 'Testament' is the Eng. tr. of the Gr. Diathēkē, which in its turn represents the Heb. Berith or 'Covenant.' The epithet 'Old' was introduced by Christians after the NT had come into being. Jews recognize no NT, and have a polemic interest in avoiding this designation of their Holy Scripture. The Gr. word kanōn, meaning primarily a measuring-rod, a rule, a catalogue, was applied by Christian authors of the 4th cent. to the list of books which the Church acknowledged to be authoritative as the source of doctrine and ethics. In investigating how the Hebrew race formed their Bible, these later appellations of their sacred books have to be used with the reservations indicated.

2. The three periods of formation.—Briefly stated, the process of forming the OT Canon includes three main stages. Under the influence of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Law (Torah) as in the Pentateuch was set apart as Holy Scripture; at some date prior to B.C. 200, the Prophets (Nebi'im), including the prophetic interpretation of history in the four books—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings—had been constituted into a second canonical group; by B.C. 132, most, though not all, of the remaining books ranked as Scripture. This third group was defined, and the OT Canon finally fixed, by the Synod of Palestinian Jews held at Jamnia, near Joppa, about the year A.D. 90.

3. Pre-canonical conditions.—(a) The art of writing. The formation of language and the invention of writing must precede the adoption of a sacred book. An illiterate race can have no Scripture. Israel's language was in its main features an inheritance from the common ancestors of the Semites; even its religious vocabulary was only in part its own creation. As to writing, the Semites in Babylonia had used the cuneiform syllabic script, and Egypt had invented the hieroglyphs before the Hebrews had arisen as a separate race. But, happily for the Canon, an alphabet had become the possession of some of the Semitic family before the Hebrews had anything to put on record. The provincial governors of Canaan about B.C. 1400 sent their reports to Egypt in Babylonian cuneiform; whereas Mesha, king of Moab, and Panammu, king of Ya'di in North Syria, in extant inscriptions from about B.C. 900, make use of an Aramaic alphabet. After B.C. 1400, and some time before B.C. 900, must therefore be placed the genesis of the Hebrew alphabet.

(b) Absence of any precedent.—In the case of other sacred books, the influence of a historical precedent has contributed to their adoption. Recognizing the OT, Christians were predisposed to use a literary record in preserving the revelation they had received. Similarly Islam admitted the superiority of 'the people of a book' (Jews and Christians), and were easily induced to accord like sanctity to their own Koran. But such a precedent did not come into operation in the early religion of Israel. It is true that the Code of Hammurabi (c. B.C. 2200) was recorded on stone, and publicly set forth as the rule of civil life in Babylonia. But this method of regulating communal life can hardly have affected the earliest legislators in Israel. The relation of the Code of Hammurabi to the Mosaic Laws appears to be correctly indicated by Mr. Johns: 'The co-existing likenesses and differences argue for an independent recension of ancient custom deeply influenced by Babylonian law.' Egypt also had literature before Moses, but the Hebrews appear to have acted on an independent initiative in producing and collecting their religious literature. The OT Canon is thus peculiar in being formed as the first of its kind.

(c) Religious experience.—Other conditions of a less general kind have also to be noted. The religious leaders of the people must have had definite convictions as to the attributes of Jehovah before they could judge whether any given prophet or document were true or false. The life depicted in the book of Genesis reveals a non-writing age, when religious experience and unwritten tradition were the sole guides to duty. The Sinaitic legislation, although it formed the basis of national life, did not till late in the monarchy penetrate the popular consciousness. Mosaic Law provided that Divine guidance would be given through the voice of prophets and of priests (Dt 18¹⁸ 19¹⁷ 21⁵ 24⁸); with these living sources of direction, it would be less easy to feel dependence on a book. The symbolism of a sacrificial system compensated for the want of literature. It was only after books of various kinds had become prevalent that the utility of writing began to be appreciated. Isaiah (30⁸), about B.C. 740, perceives that what is inscribed in a book will be permanent and indisputable. On the other hand, Hosea (8¹²), about B.C. 745, sees a limit to the efficacy of a copious literature. The exponents of the traditional Law appear to have applied it with arbitrary freedom. Even a high priest in Josiah's reign had apparently had no occasion to consult the Law-book for a long period. Variations appear in the reasons annexed even to the Decalogue; and the priests who offered incense to the brazen serpent in the Temple in the days of Hezekiah cannot have regarded the Tables of the Law in the light of canonical Scripture.

4. Josiah's reformation.—The first trace of a Canon is to be found in the reign of King Josiah about B.C. 621. By this time the Northern Kingdom had disappeared with the Fall of Samaria (B.C. 722). It had left behind, as its contribution to the future Bible, at least the works of Hosea and the Elohist historian. The prophets, Isaiah I., Amos, and Micah, had delivered their message a century ago, and their words were in the possession of their disciples. The fate of the ten tribes had vindicated the prophetic warnings. The beginnings of Israel's history were made familiar by the beautiful narratives of the Jahwist historian. Many songs were known by heart, and contributed to the growth of a feeling that the nation had a Divine mission to fulfil. Laws, that had been kept for rare reference in the sanctuary, were studied by disciples of the prophets, and were expounded with a new sense of their Divine obligation. The annals of the monarchy had been duly recorded by the official scribes, but their religious significance was as yet unthought of. Other books, which afterwards disappeared, were also in circulation. Such were 'the Book of the Wars of the Lord' (Nu 21¹⁴), and 'the Book of Jashar' (Jos 10¹³, 2 S 1¹⁸). In such conditions at Jerusalem there came about Josiah's reformation, described in 2 K 22, 23.

5. Inspiration recognized in the Bk. of Deuteronomy.

—A book identified on satisfactory grounds with our Deuteronomy (excluding possibly the preface and the appendix) was discovered in the Temple and read to the king. In consequence, Josiah convened a general assembly at Jerusalem, and read the words of the book to all the people. All parties agreed that this Law-book should constitute a solemn league and covenant between themselves and Jehovah. The grounds of its acceptance are its inherent spiritual power, the conviction it produced that it truly expressed the will of Jehovah, and also its connexion with the great name of Moses. The book was not imposed merely by royal authority; the people also 'stood to the covenant.' These conditions combine to give Deuteronomy canonical authority of an incipient kind from that date onwards (b.c. 622).

6. Pentateuch made canonical. The next stage in the growth of the Canon is found in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (b.c. 457-444). Much had happened in the intervening 170 years. The captivity in Babylon (b.c. 586-536) intensified national feeling and made their books more precious to the exiles. Temple ceremonial had now no place in religious practice; and spiritual aspiration turned to prayer and reading, both public and private. Fresh expositions of the Mosaic Law were prepared by the prophet Ezekiel (b.c. 592-570), and by the anonymous priest who put the Law of Holiness (Lv 17-26) into written form. Just as the Fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 supplied the incentive for recording in the Mishna the oral tradition of the Pharisees, so in Babylon expatriation impelled the priestly families to write out their hereditary usages, thus forming the document known as the Priestly Code. The problem of suffering, national and individual, was considered in the work of the Second Isaiah and in the book of Job. The past history of Israel was edited so as to show the method of Divine Providence. The Restoration of the Temple (b.c. 516) and the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah began a new chapter in the story of Judaism. Many of the Jews remained in Babylon, and continued their activity in the study of the national literature. From Babylon they sent Ezra the scribe (b.c. 457) and Nehemiah (b.c. 444) with help for the Jerusalem community. Under the influence of these leaders the Pentateuch was made canonical (Neh 8-10). This work had been formed by constructing a 'Harmony' of the various expositions of Mosaic Law (Ex 20-23, Deut., Lv 17-26, and the Priestly Code) and combining these with the histories of the Jahwist and the Elohist. The initial cosmology shows the high plane of religious thought that had now been attained. Some opposition appears to have come from the priests, who favoured mixed marriages and a Samaritan alliance; but the people as a whole 'make a sure covenant and write it. And our princes, our Levites, and our priests seal unto it' (Neh 9³⁸). That this Canon included only the Torah is proved by the fact that the Samaritans, who were severed from Judaism shortly after Nehemiah's time, never had any Canon beyond the Pentateuch. Their apocryphal Joshua does not prove that Ezra's Canon was the Hexateuch. Had Joshua been attached to the Law, the LXX version of it would have been less inaccurate. Nor is it easy to see how a book so solemnly adopted could ever after have been relegated to a secondary place.

7. Canon of the Prophets.—The next addition to the Canon consists of the Prophets, reckoned as 8 books—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve (Minor Prophets) forming one book. No account of their canonization is available, and the process has to be inferred from what is known of the period. The books themselves give some guidance. Under the influence of Deut., history was studied so as to reveal the progress of a Divine purpose. The books of Kings record events down to about b.c. 560, hence their preparation for the Canon must have been some time later. Isaiah includes the works of the first and second of that name, besides chapters from later sources. The redaction of the whole must have been made at a time when the separate authorship was forgotten. Jeremiah (b.c. 627-586) is supplemented by extracts from the book of Kings written after 560. The Twelve include Malachi, who wrote between b.c. 458 and 432. Jonah and Zechariah are also late, and the latter book has a supplement of uncertain date. Internal evidence thus implies that when the Law was made canonical, the prophets had not been carefully edited or collected into one group. The Chronicler, writing about b.c. 300, recognizes that the Law has become Holy Scripture, but he makes the freest use of the history in Samuel and Kings. After Malachi the people became well aware that the voice of true prophecy had ceased (Zec 13¹, Neh 6⁷, 14, Ps 74¹, 1 Mac 9²⁷ etc.). The predictions of the prophets had been ominously vindicated by the course of history. Such observations would tend continually to increase the veneration for the prophetic literature. The rivalry of Hellenic culture after the conquests of Alexander the Great (c. b.c. 300) may possibly have suggested to the Jews an increase of their own sacred Canon. At all events, the canonization of the prophetic literature had become matter of past history by b.c. 200. This limit is fixed by the testimony of Jesus ben-Sira, who writes the book in the Apocrypha called Ecclesiasticus. His praise of the famous men in Israel (chs. 44-50) shows that the Law and the Prophets were invested with canonical authority in his day. The Lectinary of the Synagogue would quickly establish the unique position of the Law and the Prophets as Holy Scripture (cf. Ac 13¹⁵, 27).

8. The Hagiographa made canonical.—The third division of the OT is called in Hebrew Kethubim, i.e. 'Writings.' In Greek the name is Hagiographa, i.e. 'Sacred Writings.' In a Hebrew Bible these books are arranged in the following order:—

1. The Poetical Books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job.
2. The Five Megilloth ('Rolls'): Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther.
3. Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles.

This group is much more varied in form and substance than the first two parts of the Canon. Several of these books may have been prized as highly as the Prophets, though their inclusion in the Second Canon would have been incongruous. The Psalter, for instance, had been for long familiar through its use in Temple services; and its influence on religious life was great, apart from any declaration of canonicity. But as some Psalms (e.g. 74, 79) appear to have been composed about b.c. 170-160, the final collection of the smaller hymnaries into the Psalter of five books cannot have been made before b.c. 150. The priestly summary of history in Chron., Ezr.-Neh. would be widely acceptable in an age when the Priestly Code was the dominant influence. The book about Daniel, published during the Maccabean persecutions (a.c. 165), quickly won recognition and proved its religious worth.

(a) Disputed books.—A hesitating approval was extended to Esther, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes, owing to the nature of their contents. Other books, apocalyptic and apocryphal, were competing for a place in the religious library. There is no means of showing how or when the third group was separated from other books. The conjecture is probable that the effort of Antiochus Epiphanes to destroy the copies of the Law may have evoked the determination to preserve the later religious literature by giving it a place in the Canon.

(b) Prologue to Sirach.—The earliest testimony to the existence of sacred books in addition to the Law and the Prophets is given in the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus. The grandson of ben-Sira wrote in Egypt about a.c. 132, and made a Greek translation of his kinsman's 'Wisdom.' In the preface he refers three times to 'the Law, the Prophets, and the other books of our fathers.' He speaks of Greek versions of these books. But this statement does not say that the third group was definitely completed. In the 1st cent. a.d., the schools of Hillel and Shammai differed as to whether Ecclesiastes was in the Canon or not.

(c) New Testament.—The NT expresses a doctrine of Holy Scripture; it acknowledges a threefold division (Lk 24⁴); it implies that Chronicles was the last book in the roll of the OT (Mt 23³⁴, Lk 11¹³); but it does not quote Esther, Cant., Eccl., and leaves undecided the question whether these disputed books were as yet admitted to the Canon.

(d) Philo.—Philo of Alexandria (d. a.d. 40) acknowledges the inspiration of Scripture (the Mosaic Law pre-eminently), and quotes many of, but not nearly all, the OT books. His use of the Greek Apocrypha for information only, suggests, however, that he did know of a Palestinian limit to the third group.

(e) Josephus.—Josephus (a.d. 100), defending his earlier books against adverse reviews, maintains that Jewish records had been made by trained historians. The elegant inconsistencies of Greek narratives had no place in his authorities.

'It is not the case with us,' he says (c. Apion. i. 8), 'to have vast numbers of books disagreeing and conflicting with one another. We have but two-and-twenty, containing the history of all time, books that are justly believed in. . . . Though so great an interval of time has passed, no one has ventured either to add or to remove or to alter a syllable; and it is the instinct of every Jew from the day of his birth to consider these books as the teaching of God, to abide by them, and, if need be, cheerfully to lay down life in their behalf.'

The number 22 is probably due to his reckoning, with the LXX, Ruth and Judges as one, and Lamentations and Jeremiah as one. It is less likely that he refused to count Cant. and Eccl. as Scripture. His words reveal the profound reverence now entertained for the OT as a whole, although individuals may still have cherished objections to particular books.

(f) Synod of Jamnia.—The completion of the Hebrew Canon must be associated with a synod held at Jamnia, near Joppa, where the Sanhedrin settled after Jerusalem was taken by Titus (a.d. 70). The popularity of the Alexandrian OT, including Apocrypha, and the growing influence of NT books caused the Rabbinical teachers to remove all doubt as to the limits of their Scripture. 'All Holy Scriptures defile the hands' (the Hebrew phrase for 'are canonical'); Canticles and Ecclesiastes 'defile the hands.' Such was the dictum at Jamnia (c. a.d. 90) to which Rabbi Akiba (d. a.d. 135) appealed in dismissing the possibility of reopening discussion on the limits of the Canon.

9. Text.—The Hebrew Bible was now complete. Elaborate precautions were taken to secure an unchangeable text; and a system of vowel-signs was invented some centuries later to preserve the old pronunciation. It has been considered strange that the oldest dated MS of the OT should be so recent as a.d. 916, whereas the Greek Bible and NT are found in MSS of the 4th and 5th centuries. This may be due to the requirement of the Synagogue that the copy in use should be perfect, and that any roll deficient in a word or letter should be suppressed, if not destroyed. The vigilant care of copies in use lessened the interest in superseded MSS.

10. Relation of the Church to the OT.—The NT freely acknowledges Divine inspiration in the OT. Such a formula as 'All this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet' (Mt 1²²), implies that the Supreme Disposer of events had intimated His purpose through the prophets. Posterity, therefore, rightly apprehends any occurrence when it has detected its place in the scheme of things foretold by the prophets. But it is also recognized that Scripture may be misapplied, and that therefore criticism is essential. The interpretation of the OT must differ among Jews and Christians. The logic of events cannot be ignored, and the Advent of the Messiah cannot be treated as a negligible accident. The attitude of our Lord has the effect of making the OT a subordinate standard as compared with His own words and the teaching of the Apostles. He did not report the word of the Lord as received by vision or prophecy; in His own name He supplied what was wanting in Law and Prophets. He did not pronounce any book in itself adequate to determine the communion between the Living God and living men; all Scripture must be illuminated by the testimonium Spiritus Sancti. The 24 Hebrew books are valid for the Church only in so far as their authority is sanctioned by the NT. But, subject to this limitation, the OT remains 'profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness' (2 Ti 3¹⁶).

CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. —1. Title.—The Greek word 'canon,' meaning originally a 'rod' and so a 'rule for measuring,' is used in a variety of senses by the Patristic writers, among the most familiar instances being the expressions 'rule of truth' and 'rule of faith' for the doctrinal teaching officially recognized by the bishops. Hence, since we meet with the phrase 'canonical books' in Origen, as rendered by Rufinus' translation, before we see the substantive 'canon' applied to the list of NT books, it has been argued that the adjective was first used in the sense of 'regulative,' so that the phrase means 'the books that regulate faith or morals.' But the substantive must mean the 'list' of books, and in Athanasius we have a passive participle in the phrase 'canonized books,' i.e. books belonging to the Canon; soon after which the actual word 'canon' is applied to the books of the NT by Amphilocheus, the bishop of Iconium (end of 4th cent. a.d.). The NT Canon, then, is the list of NT books, and this simple meaning, rather than 'the regulative books,' is the more likely interpretation of the expression to have occurred to people who were in the habit of using the term for lists of officials, lists of festivals, etc. The question of the Canon differs from questions of the authenticity, genuineness, historicity, inspiration, value, and authority of the several NT books in concerning itself simply with their acceptance in the Church. Primarily the question was as to what books were read in the churches at public worship. Those so used became in course of time the Christian Scriptures. Then, having the value of Scripture gradually associated with them, they came to be treated as authoritative. The first stage is that of use in the form of Church lessons; the second that of a standard of authority to be employed as the basis of instruction, and to be appealed to in disputed cases of doctrine or discipline.

2. The Formation of the Canon in the 2nd Century.—

The very earliest reading of NT books in the churches must have occurred in the case of epistles addressed to particular churches, which of course were read in those churches; next come the circular letters (e.g. Eph., 1 Peter), which were passed round a group of churches. Still this involved no repeated liturgical use of these writings as in a church lectionary. During the obscure period of the sub-Apostolic age we have no indication of the use of epistles in church worship. Clement of Rome assumed that the church at Corinth was acquainted with 1 Corinthians, although he was writing nearly 40 years after St. Paul had sent that Epistle to the church, and a new generation had arisen in the interval; but there is no proof or probability that it was regularly read at the services. The earliest references to any such reading point to the Synoptic Gospels as alone having this place of honour, together with the OT prophets. This was the case in the worship described by Justin Martyr (1 Apol. lxvii.). A little later Justin's disciple Tatian prepared his Harmony (Diatessaron) for use in the church at Edessa. This was constructed out of all four Gospels; i.e. it included John, a Gospel probably known to Justin, though not included in his Memoirs of the Apostles. As yet no epistles are seen in the place of honour of church reading side by side with OT Scriptures. But long before this a collection had been made by Marcion (c. A.D. 140) in his effort to reform the Church by recalling attention to the Pauline teaching which had fallen into neglect. Marcion's Canon consisted of a mutilated Gospel of St. Luke and 10 Epistles of St. Paul (the 3 Pastoral Epistles being omitted). Although other early Church writers evidently allude to several of the Epistles (e.g. Clemens Rom., Ignatius, Polycarp, 'Barnabas'), that is only by way of individual citation, without any hint that they are used in a collection or treated as authoritative Scripture. Marcion is the earliest who is known to have honoured any of the Epistles in this way. But when we come to Irenæus (180) we seem to be in another world. Irenæus cites as authoritative most of the books of the Christian Scriptures, though he does not appear to have known Hebrews. We now have a NT side by side with the OT; or at all events we have Christian books appealed to as authoritative Scripture, just as in the previous generation the LXX was appealed to as authoritative Scripture. Here is evidence of a double advance: (1) in the addition of the Epistles to the Gospels as a collection, (2) in the enhancement of the value of all these books for the settlement of questions of doctrine.

This is one of the most important developments in the thought and practice of the Church. And yet history is absolutely silent as to how, when, where, and by whom it was brought about. Nothing is more amazing in the history of the Christian Church than the absence of all extant contemporary references to so great a movement. The 30 years from Justin Martyr, who knew only a collection of 3 Gospels as specially authoritative, and that simply as records of the life and teaching of Christ, to Irenæus, with his frequent appeals to the Epistles as well as the Gospels, saw the birth of a NT Canon, but left no record of so great an event. Irenæus, though bishop of Lyons and Vienne in Gaul, was in close communication with Asia Minor where he had been brought up, and Prof. Harnack conjectures that bishops of Asia Minor in agreement with the Church at Rome deliberately drew up and settled the Canon, although we have no historical record of so significant an event. It may be, however, that Irenæus was himself a pioneer in a movement the necessity of which was recognized as by common consent. Some authoritative standard of appeal was wanted to save the essence of Christian teaching from being engulfed in the speculations of Gnosticism. The Gospels were not sufficient for this purpose, because they were accepted by the Gnostics, who, however, interpreted them allegorically. What was needed was a standard of doctrinal truth, and that was found in the Epistles.

Near this time we have the earliest known Canon after that of Marcion, the most ancient extant list of NT books in the Catholic Church. This is named the 'Muratorian Fragment,' after its discoverer Muratori, who found it in a 7th or 8th cent. monk's commonplace book in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and published it in 1740. The fragment is a mutilated extract of a list of NT books made at Rome probably before the end of the 2nd cent., since the author refers to the episcopate of Pius as recent (nuperrime temporibus nostris), and Pius I., who died in A.D. 157, is the only bishop of Rome of that name in the early age to which unquestionably, as internal evidence indicates, the original composition must be assigned. The fragment begins in the middle of a sentence which appears to allude to St. Peter's connexion with our Second Gospel, and goes on to mention Luke as the Third Gospel and John as the Fourth. Therefore it evidently acknowledged the 4 Gospels. Then it has Acts, which it ascribes to Luke, and it acknowledges 13 Epistles of Paul—admitting the Pastorals, but excluding Hebrews, though it subsequently refers to 'an Epistle to the Laodiceans,' and another 'to the Alexandrians forged under the name of Paul,' as well as 'many others' which are not received in the Catholic Church 'because gall ought not to be mixed with honey.' Further, this Canon includes Jude, 2 Epistles of John, and the Apocalypse, which it ascribes to John. It also has the Book of Wisdom, which it says was 'written by the friends of Solomon in his honour,' and the Apocalypse of Peter, although acknowledging that there is a minority which rejects the latter work, for we read 'we receive moreover the Apocalypses of John and Peter only, which [latter] some of our body will not have read in the church.' This indicates that the author's church as a whole acknowledges the Apocalypse of Peter, and that he associates himself with the majority of his brethren in so doing, while he candidly admits that there are some dissentients. Lastly, the Canon admits Hermas for private reading, but not for use in the church services. We have here, then, most of our NT books; but, on the one hand, Hebrews, 1 and 2 Peter, James, and one of the 3 Epistles of John are not mentioned. They are not named to be excluded, like the forged works referred to above; possibly the author did not know of their existence. At all events he did not find them used in his church. On the other hand, Wisdom, without question, and the Apocalypse of Peter, though rejected by some, are included in this canon, and Hermas is added for private reading.

Passing on to the commencement of the 3rd cent., we come upon another anonymous writing, an anti-gambling tract entitled 'Concerning dice-players' (de Aleatoribus), which Prof. Harnack attributes to Victor of Rome (A.D. 200–230). In this tract the Shepherd of Hermas and the Didache are both quoted as 'Scripture.' The author refers to three divisions of Scripture: (1) Prophetic writings—the OT Prophets, the Apocalypse, Hermas; (2) the Gospels; (3) the Apostolic Writings—Paul, 1 John, Hebrews.

Neither of these Canons can be regarded as authoritative either ecclesiastically or scientifically, since we are ignorant of their sources. But they both indicate a crystallizing process, in the Church at Rome about the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd centuries, that was tending towards our NT, though with some curious variations. The writings of the Fathers of this period agree in the main with Irenæus in their citations from most of the NT books as authoritative—a condition very different from that of Justin Martyr half a century earlier. Two influences may be recognized as bringing this result about: (1) use in churches at public worship, (2) authoritative appeals against heresy—especially Gnosticism. It was necessary to settle what books would be read in church and what books should be appealed to in discussion. The former was the primary question. The books used at their services by the churches, and therefore admitted by them as having a right to be so employed, were the books to be appealed to in controversy. The testing fact was church usage. Canonical books were the books read at public worship. How it came about that certain books were so used and others not is by no means clear. Prof. Harnack's theory would solve the problem if we could be sure it was valid. Apart from this, (1) traditional usage and (2) assurance of Apostolic authorship appear to have been two grounds relied upon.

Turning to the East, we find Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 165-220) acknowledging the 4 Gospels and Acts, and 14 Epistles of Paul (Hebrews being included), and quoting 1 and 2 John, 1 Peter, Jude, and the Apocalypse. He makes no reference to James, 2 Peter, or 3 John, any of which he may perhaps have known, as we have no list of NT books from his hand, for he does not name these books to reject them. Still, the probability as regards some, if not all, of them is that he did not know them. In the true Alexandrian spirit, Clement has a wide and comprehensive idea of inspiration, and therefore no very definite conception of Scriptural exclusiveness or fixed boundaries to the Canon. Thus he quotes Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, the Preaching of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Sibylline Writings as in some way authoritative. He was a literary eclectic who delighted to welcome Christian truth in unexpected places. Still he had a NT in two volumes which he knew respectively as 'The Gospel' and 'The Apostle' (see Euseb. HE vi. 14). Origen (A.D. 184-253), who was a more critical scholar, treated questions of canonicity more scientifically. He acknowledged our books of the OT and some parts of the Apocrypha, such as 1 Mac.; and in the NT the 4 Gospels, Acts, 13 Epistles of Paul, Hebrews (though the latter as of doubtful authorship; nevertheless in his homily on Joshua he seems to include it among St. Paul's works, since he makes them 14, when he writes that 'God, thundering on the 14 trumpets of his [i.e. Paul's] Epistles, threw down even the walls of Jericho, that is all the instruments of idolatry and the doctrines of the philosophers'), 1 Peter, 1 John, Revelation. He does not directly mention the Epistles of James or Jude, although he seems to refer to them once in a rhetorical way, classing Peter, James, and Jude with the 4 Evangelists as represented by Isaac's servants—if we are to trust Rufinus' version. He mentions 2 Peter and 2 and 3 John as of disputed genuineness, and refers to the Gospel of the Hebrews in an apologetic tone, the Gospels of Peter and James, and the Acts of Paul, and quotes Hermas and Barnabas as 'Scripture,' while he admits that, though widely circulated, Hermas was not accepted by all. It is a significant fact, however, that he wrote no commentaries on any of those books that are not included in our NT.

3. The Settlement of the Canon in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries.—An important step towards the settlement of the Canon on historical and scientific lines was taken by Eusebius, who, with his wide reading and the great library of Pamphilus to resort to, also brought a fair and judicious mind to face the problems involved. Eusebius saw clearly that it is not always possible to give a definite affirmative or negative answer to the question whether a certain book should be in the Canon. Therefore he drew up three lists of books—(1) The books that are admitted by all, (2) the books which he is disposed to admit although there are some who reject them, (3) the books that he regards as spurious. A fourth class, which really does not come into the competition for a place in the Canon, consists of heretical works which 'are to be rejected as altogether absurd and impious' (HE iii. 25). The first class, consisting of the books universally acknowledged, contains the 4

Gospels; Acts; the Epistles of Paul—which in one place (iii. 3) are reckoned to be 14, and therefore to include Hebrews, although in another place (vi. 14) Hebrews is placed in the second class, among the disputed books; 1 Peter; 1 John; and Revelation (doubtfully). The second class, consisting of books widely accepted, though disputed by some (but apparently all admitted by Eusebius himself), contains James; Jude; 2 Peter—regarded in another place (iii. 3) as spurious; 2 and 3 John. The third class, consisting of spurious works, contains the Acts of Paul; the Shepherd of Hermas; the Apocalypse of Peter; the Didache; and perhaps, according to some, the Revelation. Under the orders of Constantine, Eusebius had 50 copies of the Scriptures sumptuously produced on vellum for use in the churches of Constantinople. Of course these would correspond to his own Canon and so help to fix it and spread its influence. After this the fluctuations that we meet with are very slight. Athanasius in one of his Festal Letters (A.D. 365) undertakes to set forth in order the books that are canonical and handed down and believed to be Divine. His NT exactly agrees with our Canon, as does the NT of Epiphanius (c. A.D. 403). Cyril of Jerusalem (who died A.D. 386) gives a list of 'Divine Scriptures' which contains all the NT except the Revelation; and Amphilochius of Iconium (A.D. 395) has a versified catalogue of the Biblical books, in which also all our NT books appear except the Revelation, which he regards as spurious; Amphilochius refers to doubts concerning Hebrews and to a question as to whether the number of Catholic Epistles is 7 or 3. Even Chrysostom (who died A.D. 405) never alludes to the Revelation or the last 4 Catholic Epistles. But then he gives no list of the Canon. One of the Apostolical Canons (No. 85), which stand as an appendix to the 8th book of the Apostolical Constitutions (85), and cannot be dated earlier than the 4th cent. in their present form, gives a list of the books of Scripture. Sirach is here placed between the OT and the NT with a special recommendation to 'take care that your young persons learn the wisdom of the very learned Sirach.' Then follow the NT books—the 4 Gospels, 14 Epistles of Paul (Hebrews therefore included in this category), 2 Epistles of Peter, 3 of John, James, Jude, 2 Epistles of Clement, the 8 books of the Constitutions, Acts. Thus, while Clement and even the Apostolical Constitutions are included, the Revelation is left out, after a common custom in the East. Manifestly this is an erratic Canon.

Returning to the West, at this later period we have an elaborate discussion on the Canon by Augustine (A.D. 430), who lays down rules by which the canonicity of the several books claimed for the NT may be determined. (1) There are the books received and acknowledged by all the churches, which should therefore be treated as canonical. (2) There are some books not yet universally accepted. With regard to these, two tests are to be applied: (a) such as are received by the majority of the churches are to be acknowledged, and (b) such as are received by the Apostolic churches are to be preferred to those received only by a smaller number of churches and these of less authority, i.e. not having been founded by Apostles. In case (a) and (b) conflict, Augustine considers that 'the authority on the two sides is to be looked upon as equal' (Christian Doctrine, ii. viii. 12). Thus the tests are simply Church reception, though with discrimination as to the respective authority of the several churches. The application of these tests gives Augustine just our NT.

Jerome (A.D. 420) also accepts our NT, saying concerning Hebrews and the Revelation that he adopts both on the authority of ancient writers, not on that of present custom. He is aware that James has been questioned; but he states that little by little in course of time it has obtained authority. Jude was even rejected by most people because it contained quotations from Apocryphal writings. Nevertheless he himself accepts it. He notes that 2 and 3 John have been attributed to a presbyter whose tomb at Ephesus is still pointed out. The immense personal influence of Augustine and the acceptance of Jerome's Vulgate as the standard Bible of the Christian Church gave fixity to the Canon, which was not disturbed for a thousand years. No General Council had pronounced on the subject. The first Council claiming to be (Ecumenical which committed itself to a decision on the subject was as late as the 16th cent. (the Council of Trent). We may be thankful that the delicate and yet vital question of determining the Canon was not flung into the arena of ecclesiastical debate to be settled by the triumph of partisan churchmanship, but was allowed to mature slowly and come to its final settlement under the twofold influences of honest scholarship and Christian experience. There were indeed local councils that dealt with the question; but their decisions were binding only on the provinces they represented, although, in so far as they were not disputed, they would be regarded as more or less normative by those other churches to which they were sent. As representing the East we have a Canon attributed to the Council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 360). There is a dispute as to whether this is genuine. It is given in the MSS variously as a 60th canon and as part of the 59th appended in red ink. Half the Latin versions are without it; so are the Syriac versions, which are much older than our oldest MSS of the canons. It closely resembles the Canon of Cyril of Jerusalem, from which Westcott supposed that it was inserted into the canons of Laodicea by a Latin hand. Its genuineness was defended by Hefele and Davidson. Jülicher regards it as probably genuine. This Canon contains the OT with Baruch and the Epistle of Jeremy, and all our NT except the Revelation. Then in the West we have the 3rd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), which orders that 'besides the Canonical Scriptures nothing be read in the Church under the title of Divine Scriptures,' and appends a list of the books thus authorized in which we have the OT, the Apocrypha, and just our NT books. Here we have a whole province speaking for those books; when we add the great authority of Augustine, who belongs to this very province, and the influence of the Vulgate, we can well understand how the Canon should now be considered fixed and inviolable. Thus the matter rested for ten centuries.

4. Treatment of the Canon at the Renaissance and the Reformation.—The question of the Canon was revived by the Renaissance and the Reformation, the one movement directing critical, scholarly attention to what was essentially a literary question, the other facing it in the interest of religious controversy. Erasmus writes: 'The arguments of criticism, estimated by the rules of logic, lead me to disbelieve that the Epistle to the Hebrews is by Paul or Luke, or that the Second of Peter is the work of that Apostle, or that the Apocalypse was written by the Evangelist John. All the same, I have nothing to say against the contents of these books, which seem to me to be in perfect conformity with the truth. If, however, the Church were to declare the titles they bear to be canonical, then I would condemn my doubt, for the opinion formulated by the Church has more value in my eyes than human reasons, whatever they may be'—a most characteristic statement, revealing the scholar, the critic, the timid soul—and the satirist (?). Within the Church of Rome even Cardinal Cajetan—Luther's opponent at Augsburg—freely discusses the Canon, doubting whether Hebrews is St. Paul's work, and whether, if it is not, it can be canonical. He also mentions doubts concerning the five General Epistles, and gives less authority to 2 and 3 John and Jude than to those books which he regards as certainly in the Holy Scriptures. The Reformation forced the question of the authority of the Bible to the front, because it set that authority in the place of the old authority of the Church. While this chiefly concerned the book as a whole, it could not preclude inquiries as to its contents and the rights of the several parts to hold their places there. The general answer as to the authority of Scripture is an appeal to 'the testimony of the Holy Spirit.' Calvin especially works out this conception very distinctly. The difficulty was to apply it to particular books of the Bible so as to determine in each case whether they should be allowed in the Canon. Clearly a further test was requisite here. This was found in the 'analogy of faith' (Analogia fidei), which was more especially Luther's principle, while the testimony of the Holy Spirit was Calvin's. With Luther the Reformation was based on justification by faith. This truth Luther held to be confirmed (a) by its necessity, nothing else availing, and (b) by its effects, since in practice it brought peace, assurance, and the new life. Then those Scriptures which manifestly supported the fundamental principle were held to be ipso facto inspired, and the measure of their support of it determined the degree of their authority. Thus the doctrine of justification by faith is not accepted because it is found in the Bible; but the Bible is accepted because it contains this doctrine. Moreover, the Bible is sorted and arranged in grades according as it does so more or less clearly, and to Luther there is 'a NT within the NT,' a kernel of all Scripture, consisting of those books which he sees most clearly set forth the gospel. Thus he wrote: 'John's Gospel, the Epistles of Paul, especially Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and 1 Peter—these are the books which show thee Christ, and teach all that it is needful and blessed for thee to know even if you never see or hear any other book, or any other doctrine. Therefore is the Epistle of James a mere epistle of straw (eine rechte stroherne Epistel) since it has no character of the gospel in it' (Preface to NT¹, 1522; the passage was omitted from later editions). Luther places Hebrews, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse at the end of his translation, after the other NT books, which he designates 'the true and certain capital books of the NT, for these have been regarded in former times in a different light.' He regards Jude as 'indisputably an extract or copy from 2 Peter.' Nevertheless, while thus discriminating between the values of the several books of the NT, he includes them all in his translation. Luther's friend Carlstadt has a curious arrangement of Scripture in three classes, viz. (1) The Pentateuch and the 4 Gospels, as being 'the clearest luminaries of the whole Divine truth'; (2) The Prophets 'of Hebrew reckoning' and the acknowledged Epistles of the NT, viz. 13 of Paul, 1 Peter, 1 John; (3) the Hagiographa of the Hebrew Canon, and the 7 disputed books of the NT. Dr. Westcott suggested that the omission of Acts was due to its being included with Luke. Calvin is more conservative with regard to Scripture than the Lutherans. Still in his Commentaries he passes over 2 and 3 John and the Revelation without notice, and he refers to 1 John as 'the Epistle of John,' and expresses doubts as to 2 Peter; but he adds, with regard to the latter, 'Since the majesty of the Spirit of Christ exhibits itself in every part of the Epistle, I feel a scruple in rejecting it wholly, however much I fail to recognize in it the genuine language of Peter' (Com. on 2 Peter, Argument). Further, Calvin acknowledges the existence of doubts with respect both to James and to Jude; but he accepts them both. He allows full liberty of opinion concerning the authorship of Hebrews; but he states that he has no hesitation in classing it among Apostolical writings. In spite of these varieties of opinion, the NT Canon remained unaltered. At the Council of Trent (1546) for the first time the Roman Catholic Church made an authoritative statement on the Canon, uttering an anathema (anathema sit) on anybody who did not accept in their integrity all the books contained in the Vulgate. Thus the Apocrypha is treated as equally canonical with the OT books; but the NT Canon is the same in Roman Catholic and Protestant Canons. Translations of the Bible into the vernacular of various languages laid the question of the Canon to rest again, by familiarizing readers with the same series of books in all versions and editions.

6. The Canon in Modern Criticism.—In the 18th cent. the very idea of a Canon was attacked by the Deists and Rationalists (Toland, Diderot, etc.); but the critical study of the subject began with Semler (1771-5), who pointed out the early variations in the Canon and attacked the very idea of a Canon as an authoritative standard, while he criticised the usefulness and theological value of the several books of the NT. Subsequent controversy has dealt less with the Canon as such than with the authenticity and genuineness of the books that it contains. In the views of extreme negative criticism canonicity as such has no meaning except as a historical record of Church opinion. On the other hand, those who accept a doctrine of inspiration in relation to the NT do not connect this very closely with critical questions in such a way as to affect the Canon. Thus doubts as to the authorship of the Pastoral Epistles, 2 Peter, James, etc., have not given rise to any serious proposal to remove these books from the NT. The Canon rests mainly on tradition and usage. But the justification for it when this is sought is usually found (1) in the Apostolic authorship of most of the NT books; (2) in the Apostolic atmosphere and association of the remaining books; (3) in the general acceptance and continuous use of them in the churches for centuries as a test of their value; (4) in their inherent worth to-day as realized in Christian experience. It cannot be said that these four tests would give an indefeasible right to every book to claim a place in the Canon if it were not already there—e.g. the small Epistle of Jude; but they throw the burden of proof on those who would disturb the Canon by a serious proposal to eject any of its contents: and in fact no such proposal—as distinct from critical questions of the dates, authorship, historicity, etc., of the several books—is now engaging the attention of scholars or churches. W. F. ADENEY.

CANOPY.—A loan-word from the Gr. kāndapeion, a mosquito-net. It is used to render this word in the description of the bed of Holofernes with its mosquito-curtain (Jth 10¹¹ etc.); also in Is 4⁵ RV for Heb. chuppah in the sense of a protective covering. This Heb. word is becoming naturalized in English to denote the canopy under which a Jewish bridegroom and bride stand while the wedding ceremony is being performed. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CANTICLES.—See SONG OF SONGS.

CAP.—See DRESS, § 5 (a).

CAPER-BERRY (abtyyōnah).—Ec 12⁵ RV; AV 'desire.' The RV tr. is supported by the LXX, Pesh. and the Mishna. The caper-berry is the fruit of Capparis spinosa, a common Palestine plant, which, largely on account of its habit of growing out of crevices in walls, has been identified with the hyssop (wh. see). Various parts of the caper plant are extensively used as medicine by the fellaḥin. The familiar capers of commerce are the flower buds. The 'failure' of the caper-berry in old age may have been its ceasing to act as a stimulant, either as an aphrodisiac or a stomachic. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CAPERNAUM.—The headquarters of Christ in His Galilean ministry, after His rejection at Nazareth (Mt 4¹³, Jn 2¹²). Here he healed the centurion's palsied servant (Mt 8⁵⁻¹³, Lk 7²⁻¹⁰), provided the half-shekel for the Temple tribute (Mt 17²⁴), taught in the synagogue (Mk 1²¹, Lk 4³¹, Jn 6⁵⁹), performed many miracles (Mk 1²²⁻²³, Lk 4³²⁻⁴¹), taught humility to the disciples (Mk 9³⁵), healed a nobleman's son by a word from Cana (Jn 4⁴⁶). For its unbelief He denounced the city (Mt 11²³, Lk 10¹⁴). Though it was evidently a town of considerable importance, the site is forgotten and is a matter of dispute. The two sites most in favour are Tell Hum and Khan Minyeh, both on the north side of the Sea of Galilee, the former about midway between the latter and the mouth of the Jordan. At Tell Hum are extensive ruins, including the remains of a synagogue. Khan Minyeh does not show such important remains, and, as these seem all to be Arab, the balance of probability is on the side of Tell Hum, whose name should probably be written Telhum, and regarded as a corruption of Caphar Tanhum, the Talmudic form of the city's name (see the latest discussion on the subject in PEFST 1907, p. 220). If the remains at Tell Hum are not Capernaum, it is difficult to say what important city they represent (see Sanday's art. 'Capernaum' in Hastings' DCG). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

CAPH or KAPH.—Eleventh letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 11th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CAPHARSALAMA (1 Mac 7³¹).—Apparently near Jerusalem. Kefr Silwān, the village of Siloam, is possibly intended.

CAPHIRA (1 Es 5¹⁹).—A town of Benj., inhabitants of which returned with Zerubbabel; called in Ezr 2³⁵ Chephirah; cf. Neh 7²⁹.

CAPTOR.—The region whence the Philistines came to Palestine (Am 9⁷, Jer 47¹). Hence in Dt 2²³ Caphthorim means the Philistines. In Gn 10¹⁴ Caphthorim is used of the country itself in place of Capthor; it should be placed in the text immediately after Casuhim. Many identifications of Capthor have been attempted. The favourite theory has been that it means the island of Crete (cf. CHERETHITES). Next in favour is the view that Capthor was the coast of the Egyptian Delta. It has also been identified with Cyprus. The correct theory is suggested by inscriptions of Ramses III. of Egypt (c. B.C. 1200), who tells of his having repelled a great invasion by enemies who had entered Syria and Palestine from the north. The leaders of these barbarians were called Purusati, which (Egyp. r being Sem. l) is equivalent to the Heb. Peleshim. Connecting these facts with the circumstance that the southern coast of Asia Minor, more especially Cilicia, was called Kefto or Kafto in the Egyptian inscriptions, it appears very probable that this Kafto and Capthor are identical. The further conjecture might be hazarded that the writing of the Hebrew waw as a vowel-letter in an original Kafto gave rise to the additional rēsh. Compare the similar case ASHKENAZ. J. F. McCurdy.

CAPPADOCIA.—A large district in the mid-eastern part of Asia Minor, formed into a Roman province in A.D. 17. It was administered by a procurator sent out by the reigning emperor, being regarded as an unimportant district. In A.D. 70 Vespasian united it with Armenia Minor, and made the two together a large and important frontier province, to be governed by an ex-consul, under the title of legatus Augusti pro praetore, on the emperor's behalf. The territory to the N. and W. of Cilicia, the kingdom of the client-king Antiochus, was incorporated in it at the time, and it afterwards received various accessions of territory. Jews from Cappadocia are mentioned in Ac 2⁹, and their presence there (c. B.C. 139) is implied in 1 Mac 15²² where a letter in their favour is addressed by the Roman Senate to king Arathes. Cappadocia was not visited by St. Paul, probably as insufficiently Romanized, but it was one of the provinces to which 1 Peter (? about A.D. 70-80) was sent. A. SOUTER.

CAPTAIN.—This word occurs very frequently in the OT (AV and RV), and appears to have been favoured by the translators as a comprehensive term to denote a ruler, or a military commander of any unit, whatever its size might be. In modern military language it means especially the commander of a company of infantry, numbering about 100 to 110 men, and is quite unsuitable as a translation. It represents in OT 13 different Hebrew words. In Ezekiel it is often used for the secular head of the Messianic kingdom: 'prince' will there and often elsewhere do as a rendering; 'officer' and 'chief' will suit other passages. There are further places where none of these words will do as a translation. In the NT it translates four Greek words, and means: (1) Jn 18¹⁴, Ac 22²⁸ a Roman military officer, a tribune of the soldiers, in command of about 1000 men, constituting the garrison of Jerusalem (hence Rev 6¹⁶ 19¹⁴ in a general sense); (2) Lk 22⁴, Ac 4¹ etc., the captain of the Temple, a Levite, who had under him a body of police, probably themselves also priests, whose duty it was to keep order in the Temple at Jerusalem and guard it by night; (3) He 2¹⁰ (RV 'author') leader, initiator; (4) Ac 28¹⁶ AV 'captain of the guard' (wanting in RV), a doubtful reading and of doubtful sense. See also ARMY, § 2. A. SOUTER.

CAPTIVITY.—See ISRAEL, I. 23.

CARABASION (1 Es 9²⁴).—A corrupt name of one of those who put away their 'strange' wives. It seems to correspond to Meremoth in Ezr 10²⁶.

CARAVAN.—See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

CARBUNCLE.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

CARCAS (Est 1¹⁰).—One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus.

CARCHEMISH was the northern capital of the Hittite empire, but was probably also of consequence before the era of the Hittites, as it commanded the principal ford of the Euphrates on the right bank, and was therefore indispensable to travel and commerce in Northern Syria. It was shown by George Smith to have lain on the site of the modern Jerablus or Hie-rapolis. It was an obstacle to the march of the invading Egyptians about B.C. 1600. Several Assyrian conquerors attempted to capture it. It was taken finally by Sargon in B.C. 717 (cf. Is 10³), after which it became the capital of an Assyrian province. Here Nebuchadnezzar defeated Pharaoh-necho in B.C. 605, and thus ended the latest native Egyptian régime in Asia (Jer 46², 2 Ch 35²⁰). J. F. MCCURDY.

CAREFULNESS.—Careful and carefulness do not express approbation in the English of the Bible, as they do now. To be careful is to be too anxious, to worry. 'Be careful for nothing,' says St. Paul (Ph 4⁶), and 'I would have you without carefulness' (1 Co 7²³). Latimer says: 'Consider the remedy against carefulness, which is to trust in God.' Again, to be careless is not blame-worthy, meaning simply to be without apprehension, to feel safe, as Jg 18⁷ 'they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure.'

CARIA (S.W. of Asia Minor) is mentioned only in 1 Mac 15²² as one of the districts to which the Roman Senate sent a letter in favour of the Jews in B.C. 139-138. It was free at that date, with its inland States federated. The more important States, Rhodes, etc., are separately named. A. SOUTER.

CARITES occurs in the Kethibh of the Heb. text and margin of RV in 2 S 20²³, where the Kerē has Cherethites, and in RV of 2 K 11⁴, where the AV has captains (RVm executioners). The Carites were possibly Phil. mercenaries from Caria, as the Cherethites were from Crete.

CARMEL.—1. A town in the mountains south of Hebron, in the territory of Judah (Jos 15⁶⁴). Here Saul set up a memorial of his conquest of the Amalekites (1 S 15¹⁸), and here Nabal (1 S 25²) and Uzziah (2 Ch 26¹⁰ AV) had property. It was the home of Hezrai or Hezro, one of David's followers (2 S 23³⁴, 1 Ch 11³⁷). It is identified with Kurmul, about 10 miles S.E. of Hebron. 2. A hilly promontory by which the sea-coast of Palestine is broken, forming the south side of the bay of Acca. It continues as a ridge running in a S.E. direction, bordering the plain of Esdraelon on the S., and finally joining the main mountain ridge of the country in the district round about Samaria. On this ridge was Jokneam, reduced by Joshua (Jos 12²¹). The promontory was included in the territory of Asher (19²⁴). It was the scene of Elijah's sacrifice (1 K 18), and hither after Elijah's translation Elisha came on the way to Samaria (2 K 2²³). Elisha was for a time established here (4²⁵). The fruitfulness of Carmel is alluded to (Is 33⁹ 35², Am 1²); it was wooded (Mic 7¹⁴), a fact which made it a good hiding-place (Am 9³). The head of the Shulammites is compared to Carmel (Ca 7³).

The mountain seems from a very early period to have been a place of sanctity. In the list of Tahutmes III. of places conquered by him in Palestine, Maspero sees in one name the words Rosh Kodan, 'holy headland,' referring to Carmel. The site was probably chosen for the sacrifice whereby the claims of Baal and Jehovah were tested, because it was already holy ground. An altar of Jehovah existed here before Elijah (1 K 18²⁶). The traditional site is at the E. end of the ridge, but it is probably a mere coincidence that on the bank of the river Kishon just below there is a mound known as Tell el-Kasia, 'the mound of the priest.' Tacitus (Hist. ii. 78) refers to the mountain as the site of an oracle; the Druses hold the traditional site of the sacrifice of Elijah sacred; and the mountain has given its name to the Carmelite order of friars.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

CARMI.—1. A Judahite, the father of Achan (Jos 7¹⁻¹⁸, 1 Ch 2⁷). 2. The Carmi of 1 Ch 4¹ should probably be corrected to Chelubai, i.e. Caleb (cf. 1 Ch 2¹⁵). 3. The eponym of a Reubenite family (Gn 46⁹, Ex 6¹⁴, 1 Ch 5²), the Carmites of Nu 26⁶.

CARMONIANS (2 Es 15¹⁰, AV Carmanians).—A people occupying an extensive district north of the entrance to the Persian Gulf, between Persis on the west and Gedrosia on the east. They are said to have resembled the Medes and Persians in customs and language. The name survives in the present town and district of Kirman. In the above verse the reference is probably to Sapor I. (A.D. 240-273), the founder of the Sassanid dynasty, who, after defeating Valerian, overran Syria, and destroyed Antioch.

CARNAIM, 1 Mac 5²², 4², and Carnion, 2 Mac 12²¹. = (RVm Carnain).—The ancient Ashteroth-karnaim (wh. see).

CARNELIAN.—See AGATE under JEWELS.

CARNION.—See CARNAIM.

CAROB (Lk 15¹⁶) RVm.—See HUSKS.

CARPENTER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1.

CARPUS.—An inhabitant of Troas, with whom St. Paul stayed, probably on his last journey to Rome (2 Ti 4¹³). The name is Greek, but we have no means of proving his nationality.

CARRIAGE.—This word is always used in the AV in the literal sense of 'something carried,' never in the modern sense of a vehicle used for carrying. Thus Ac 21¹¹ 'we took up our carriages' (RV 'baggage').

CARSHENA.—One of the wise men or counsellors of king Ahasuerus (Est 1¹⁴).

CART, WAGON.—The cart, like the chariot, is an Asiatic invention. The earliest wheeled carts show a light framework set upon an axle with solid wheels (illust. in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. [1878], i. 249). The type of cart in use under the Heb. monarchy may be seen in the Assyrian representation of the siege of Lachish (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, ii. pl. 23), where women captives and their children are shown seated in wagons with a low wooden body (cf. 1 S 6¹⁴), furnished with wheels of 6 and 8 spokes. They were drawn by a pair of oxen (Nu 7², 7³)—exceptionally by two cows (1 S 6⁷, 8⁹)—yoked to a pole which passed between them, and were used for the transport of persons (Gn 45¹⁰.) and goods (Nu 1.c.), including sheaves of grain to the threshing-floor (Am 2¹³). The rendering 'covered wagons' (Nu 7³) is doubtful. For the threshing-wagon, see AGRICULTURE, § 3.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CASEMENT.—Only Pr 7⁴ AV; RV 'lattice,' as Jg 5³, where the same word is used in both places parallel to 'window.' Cf. also the Heb. text of Sir 42¹¹ 'Let there be no lattice to the room where thy daughter dwells.' See, further, HOUSE, § 7.

CASIPHIA.—A settlement in the neighbourhood of Ahava (wh. see) in North Babylonia (Ezr 8¹⁷), whose site has not been identified. J. F. McCURDY.

CASLUHIM.—A name occurring in Gn 10⁴, 1 Ch 1³ in connexion with the names of other peoples there spoken of as descended from Mizraim, esp. the Caphtorim and Philistines.

CASPHOR (1 Mac 5³ *, AV Casphon; 2 Mac 12¹⁰ Caspin).—Near a large lake in Gilead. The site is unknown.

CASSIA.—1. qiddah, Ex 30⁴, Ezk 27¹⁹. 2. qetst' oth, Ps 45⁴. Both these words apparently refer to some kind of cassia wood. The cassia bark from the Cinnamomum cassia is very similar in smell and properties to cinnamon (wh. see). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CASTANET.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

CASTLE.—1. In Gn 25¹⁴, Nu 31¹⁰, 1 Ch 6⁴, an obsolete, if not erroneous, rendering in AV of a word denoting a nomad 'encampment' (so RV).

2. In 1 Ch 11¹, 7 AV speaks of the 'castle' of Zion, the citadel or acropolis of the Jebusite city, but RV renders as in 2 S 5⁷, 9, 'stronghold.' A different word (bīrah) is used of the castle or fort which in Nehemiah's day defended the Temple (Neh 2⁷ 7²), and of the fortified royal residence of the Persian kings at Susa (Neh 1¹, Est 1² etc.; RV 'palace,' marg. 'castle'). The fortress in Jerusalem to which the authors of the books of Maccabees and Josephus give the name of Acra, is termed 'the castle' in 2 Mac 4²⁷ 5¹ 10²⁰ AV, where RV has throughout 'citadel' (so also 1 Mac 1³ and elsewhere). See, further, CITY, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, § 4. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CASTOR AND POLLUX.—See DIOSCURI.

CAT.—This animal is mentioned only in the Apocr. (Ep. Jer v. 2 [Gr. 2]). There are two species of wild cat in the Holy Land.

CATERPILLAR.—See LOCUST.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES.—The title of 'Catholic' was given by the early Church to the seven Epistles which bear the names of James, Peter, Jude, and John. There is much uncertainty as to the meaning of the title. Perhaps the most probable explanation is that this group of Epistles was looked upon as addressed to the Church generally, while the Pauline Epistles were written to particular churches and were called forth by local circumstances.

CATHUA (1 Es 5²⁰).—One of the heads of families of Temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity. It appears to correspond to Giddel in Ezr 2¹⁷; cf. Neh 7¹⁰.

CATTLE.—The word commonly used in OT is migne, meaning primarily possessions or wealth—oxen, camels, sheep, and goats being the only wealth of peoples in a nomadic stage of civilization. It includes sometimes horses and asses, e.g. Ex 9³, Job 1³. The word is also sometimes rendered 'possessions' (e.g. Ec 2⁷), 'flocks' (Ps 78⁴), and 'herds' (Gn 47¹³). For other words rendered in EV 'cattle,' see BEAST. See also OX, SHEEP, SHEPHERD, etc. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CAUDA (AV wrongly Clauda; now Gaudho) is an island off the S. coast of Crete. St. Paul's ship, sailing from Myra to Rome, shortly after rounding Cape Matala was making in a W.N.W. direction when a sudden strong wind coming from E.N.E. drove it along at a rapid rate for about 23 miles, till it got under the lee of Cauda (Ac 27¹⁰). Such a change of wind is frequent there at the present day. A. SOUTER.

CAUL.—The Eng. word 'caul' is used (1) in Is 3¹⁰ for a veil of net-work. (2) In Ex 29¹³, Lv 3⁴, 10, 15 4² 7⁴ 8¹⁵, 9¹⁰, 19 for the fatty mass at the opening of the liver (wh. see). (3) In Hos 13⁴ for the pericardium.

CAUSEY.—This Eng. word was used in the original edition of AV in 1 Ch 26¹⁵, 18, and in the margin of Pr 15¹⁰ and Is 7⁴. It is now found only in Pr 15¹⁰ marg., being changed in modern editions in the other places into causeway. The Heb. word is literally 'a raised way,' and is used of a public road, but never of a street in a city. The word 'causey' is still used in Scotland for the raised footpath by the side of a road or street.

CAVE.—The soft limestone hills of Palestine abound in caves, natural and artificial; and these must have attracted attention from a very early period. The aboriginal race of Horites were cave-dwellers, and the excavation at Gezer has revealed remains of a probably analogous race in W. Palestine. Lot (Gn 19³⁰) and David (1 S 22¹ etc.) dwelt for a time in caves; and their use as places of hiding and refuge is illustrated by many passages, e.g., Jos 10¹⁸, Jg 6², 1 K 18⁴ etc. Caves were also used, at all periods in the history of Palestine, for sepulture, as in the case of Machpelah (Gn 23). Probably the most remarkable series of caves yet discovered in Palestine are the great labyrinths tunnelled in the hills round Beit Jibrin; one of these, in Tell Sandahannah, contains sixty chambers, united by doors and passages, and groups containing fourteen or fifteen chambers are quite common in the same hill. Another artificial cave near Beit Jibrin contains a hall 80 ft. high and 400 ft. long; it has now fallen in. Other groups of caves, only less extensive, occur in various parts of Palestine on both sides of the Jordan. Little or nothing is known about the history of these great excavations; no definite information about their origin has yet been yielded by them, so far as they have been scientifically explored. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

CEDAR (erez).—The finest of the trees of Lebanon, the principal constituent of its 'glory' (Is 35¹ 60¹¹); it was noted for its strength (Ps 29⁴), its height (2 K 19²⁰) and its majesty (1 K 4², 2 K 14³, Zec 11¹ 2). Its wood was full of resin (Ps 104¹⁵), and, largely on that account, was one of the most valuable kinds of timber for building, especially for internal fittings. It was exceedingly durable, being not readily infected with worms, and took a high polish (cf. 1 K 10¹⁷, Ca 1¹⁷, Jer 22¹⁴). It was suitable, too, for carved work (Is 44¹⁴, 15). In all these respects the 'cedar of Lebanon' (Cedrus Libani) answers to the requirements. Though but a dwarf in comparison with the Indian cedar, it is the most magnificent tree in Syria; it attains a height of from 80 to 100 feet, and spreads out its branches horizontally so as to give a beautiful shade (Ezk 31¹) it is evergreen, and has characteristic egg-shaped cones. The great region of this cedar is now the Cilician Taurus Mountains beyond Mersina, but small groves survive in places in the Lebanon. The most famous of these is that at Kadisha, where there are upwards of 400 trees, some of great age. In a few references erez does not mean the Cedrus Libani, but some other conifer. This is specially the case where 'cedar-wood' is used in the ritual of cleansing after defilement by contact with a leper (Lv 14⁴) or a dead body (Nu 19⁶). Probably erez here is a species of juniper, Juniperus Sabina, which grows in the wilderness. The reference in Nu 24⁶ to 'cedar trees beside the waters' can hardly apply to the Lebanon cedar, which flourishes best on bare mountain slopes. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CEDRON.—See KIDRON.

CEILED, CEILING.—See CIELED, CIELING.

CELLAR.—See HOUSE.

CENCHREÆ (AV Cenchrea is wrong) was the southern harbour of Corinth, and was on the Saronic Gulf about 7 miles E. of Corinth. It was a mere village, and existed solely for the transit of goods to and from Corinth. Thence St. Paul set sail for Syria (Ac 18¹⁸). Phœbe, the lady commended for her service to the church here (Ro 16¹), carried St. Paul's Epistle to Rome.

A. SOUTER.

CENDERÆUS.—A general of Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who was given the command of the sea-coast, and sent with an army into Palestine in order to enforce the claims of Antiochus against Simon Maccabæus. In a battle which took place in a plain not far from Modin the Jews gained a complete victory over Cenderæus, and pursued the Syrians as far as Kidron and the neighbourhood of Ashdod (1 Mac 15¹⁸ 16¹; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3).

CENSER.—See FIREPAN, INCENSE.

CENSUS.—See QUIRINIUS.

CENTURION.—A centurion was a Roman military officer, corresponding in the number of infantry commanded by him (100) to the modern 'captain,' but in his status like our non-commissioned officers. The passage to the higher ranks was even more difficult in his case than it is amongst our non-commissioned officers. However, the chief centurion of a legion, known as the 'centurion of the first (chief) pike,' was sometimes promoted to the equestrian order. The Capernaum centurion (Mt 8¹³, Lk 7¹⁻¹⁰) was probably in Herod's army, not in the Roman army strictly so called. Some of those mentioned in the NT were on special service in command of their units, and separated from the cohorts or legions of which they formed a part.

A. SOUTER.

JEPHAS.—See PETER.

CHABRIS.—One of the three rulers of Bethulia (Jth 6¹⁵ 8¹⁰ 10⁶).

CHADIASAI (AV 'they of Chadias', 1 Es 5³⁰).—They are mentioned as returning, to the number of 422, with Zerubbabel. There are no corresponding names in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CHEREAS (AV Chereas) held command at the fortress of Gazara, i.e. probably Jazer in the trans-Jordanic territory (see 1 Mac 5⁸⁻⁹). He was slain upon the capture of Gazara by Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 10²²⁻²³).

CHAFF.—See AGRICULTURE, § 3.

CHAIN is used in two different senses. 1. Chains for securing prisoners are denoted by a variety of words in OT and NT, which are also rendered by 'bonds' or 'fetters,' although the monuments show that ropes were more generally used for this purpose. 2. A chain of precious metal was worn as a sign of rank, as by Joseph and Daniel, or purely as an ornament. See ORNAMENTS, § 2.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CHALCEDONY.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

CHALDEA, CHALDEANS.—The Heb. Kasdim is generally rendered 'Chaldees' (Gn 11²⁸), and in Jer 50¹⁰ 51²⁴ 25¹³, and often, is used for 'Babylonian.' The word is derived from the Bab. name Kaldû for the district S.E. of Babylonia proper, on the sea-coast as it then was. From B.C. 1000 onwards its capital was Bit Yakin. The people were Arameans, independent and aggressive. In the time of Babylonian weakness they pushed into the country, and Merodach-baladan was a Chaldean usurper. Nabopolassar was also a Chaldean, and, from his time, Chaldeæ meant Babylonia. The Chaldeans were Semites and not the same as the Kashdu, Kashru, or Kassites, who conquered Babylonia, and ruled it from the 13th cent. B.C. onwards, but they came through, and probably had absorbed a part of, the country to which the Kassites had already assured the name Kashda.

The name as applied since Jerome to the Aramaic portions of Daniel and Ezra is incorrect. The use of the term 'Chaldean' (Dn 1⁴ and often) to denote a class of astrologers is not found in native sources, but arose from a transfer of a national name to the Babylonians in general, and occurs in Strabo, Diodorus, etc. It can hardly be older than Persian times.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

CHALK-STONES (Is 27¹ only).—The expression is of much interest, as showing that the practice of burning limestone and slaking with water was followed in Pal. in OT times.

CHALLENGE.—To 'challenge' in the language of AV is to claim, as in Golding's tr. of Calvin's Job, p. 578; 'Iob neuer went about to challenge such perfection, as to haue no sinne in him.' The word occurs in Ex 22¹, in the heading of Is 45 'By his omnipotency he chal-lengeth obedience,' and in Job 3⁴ AVm.

CHALPRI (AV Calphi).—The father of Judas, one of the two captains of Jonathan Maccabæus who stood firm in a battle fought against the Syrians at Hazor in N. Galilee (1 Mac 11⁷⁰).

CHAMBER.—Now obsolescent, is used by AV in a variety of connexions where modern usage employs 'room,' as e.g. 'bed-chamber,' 'upper chamber,' etc. See, generally, HOUSE. For the Temple chambers, see TEMPLE.

CHAMBERLAIN.—In OT the word occurs in 2 K 23¹¹ and repeatedly in Est., where the original is 'eunuch' (sdriś); but it is generally believed that this name is not to be taken always in a literal sense, and hence it is often rendered by the word 'officer.' In Esther, however, the chamberlain evidently belongs to that class of persons who are entrusted with the watchful care of the harems of Oriental monarchs. In NT at Ac 12²⁰ it is said that the people of Tyre and Sidon sought the favour of Herod Agrippa through the mediation of Blastus 'the king's chamberlain,' showing that the office was one of considerable influence. The word occurs again in AV in Ro 16²³, but is rendered in RV more accurately 'treasurer of the city.'

CHAMBERS OF THE SOUTH.—See STARS.

CHAMELEON.—The chameleon (Chamaeleon vulgaris) is a very common Palestine lizard. It may be found on hot days clinging with its bird-like feet and prehensile tail to the trees, or passing with slow and deliberate walk over the ground. It is remarkable for its marvellous protective gift of changing the colour of its skin to resemble its surroundings, and for its eyes which, moving independently, one looking backwards while the other looks to the front, give it an unusual range of vision. Even to-day it is supposed by the ignorant, as in olden times, to live upon air. In reality it lives on small insects, catching them by means of its long sticky tongue, which it can protrude and withdraw with extraordinary quickness. Two words in Lv 11³⁰ are rendered 'chameleon' in the Eng. versions. In the AV kôach is so translated, but in the RV we have 'land crocodile' (see LIZARD); while in the RV tinahemeth—'mole' in AV—is tr. 'chameleon.' Both renderings are very uncertain. See MOLE.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CHAMOIS (zemer, Dt. 14⁵).—The tr. of zemer as 'chamois' in EV and as 'carnelopard,' i.e. giraffe, in LXX, are both certainly incorrect, as neither of these animals occurs in Palestine. Tristram suggests the wild sheep, Ovis trapelaphus, an animal about 3 feet high with long curved horns. It is well known to the Bedouin.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CHAMPAIGN.—This spelling in modern editions of AV has replaced champion (Dt 11²⁰, Jth 5¹) and cham- pian (Ezk 37² marg.) of the 1611 edition of AV. The word means an open plain.

CHANCELLOR.—See BEELTHEMUS and REHUM.

CHANGES OF RAIMENT (Gn 45², Jg 14¹², 2 K 5⁴).

—A literal tr. of a Heb. expression which not merely denotes a change of garments in the modern sense, but implies that the 'changes' are superior, in material or texture or both, to those ordinarily worn. Hence 'gala dresses,' 'festal robes,' or the like, may be taken as a fair equivalent. Gifts of such gala robes have always been common in the East as special marks of favour or distinction. Cf. DRESS, § 7.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CHANUNEUS (AV Channuneus), 1 Es 8⁸.—A Levite, answering to Merari, if to anything, in the parallel list in Ezr 8¹⁹.

CHAPHENATHA (1 Mac 12²⁷).—Close to Jerusalem on the east. Unknown.

CHAPTER.—See TEMPLE.

CHAPMAN.—A chapman is a trader, the word being still used in some places for a travelling merchant. It occurs in 2 Ch 9¹⁴ AV and RV, and also in 1 K 10¹⁶ RV. The Amer. RV has 'trader' in both places.

CHARAATHALAN (AV Charaathalar), 1 Es 5²⁶.—A name given to a leader of certain families who returned under Zerubbabel. But 'Charaathalan leading them and Allar' is due to some perversion of the original, which has 'Cherub, Addan, Immer,' three names of places in Babylonia, from which the return was made (Ezr 2²⁴; cf. Neh 7⁴¹).

CHARAX (2 Mac 12¹⁷, RV 'to Charax,' AV 'to Characa').—East of Jordan, and apparently in the land of Tob. Unknown.

CHAREA, 1 Es 5³²—Harsha, Ezr 2³², Neh 7²⁴.

CHARGER.—An obsolete word for a large flat dish on which meat was served. The Amer. RV everywhere substitutes 'platter,' e.g. Nu 7¹³, Mt 14⁸ and parallels.

CHARIOT.—The original home of the chariot was Western Asia, from which it passed to Egypt and other countries. In OT chariots are associated mainly with war-like operations, although they also appear not infrequently as the 'carriages,' so to say, of kings, princes, and high dignitaries (Gn 50², 2 K 5⁴, Jer 17²⁵; cf. Ac 8²⁸, the case of the Ethiopian eunuch) in times of peace. When royal personages drove in state, they were preceded by a body of 'runners' (2 S 15¹, 1 K 1⁵).

The war chariot appears to have been introduced among the Hebrews by David (2 S 8⁴ LXX), but it did not become part of the organized military equipment of the State till the reign of Solomon. This monarch is said to have organized a force of 1400 chariots (1 K 10²⁶, 2 Ch 1¹⁴), which he distributed among the principal cities of his realm (1 K 9¹⁹ 10²⁶). At this time, also, a considerable trade sprang up in connexion with the importation of chariots and horses. It was not from Egypt, however, which was never a horse-breeding country, that these were imported as stated in the corrupt text of 1 K 10²⁶, but from two districts of Asia Minor, in the region of Cappadocia and Cilicia, named Musri and Kuë (see Skiuner, Cent. Bible, in loc.). In the following verse a chariot from Musri is said to have cost 600 shekels of silver (see MONEY), and a horse 150, but the Gr. text gives 100 shekels and 50 shekels respectively. Similarly in 2 K 7⁶ the reference is to the chariotry of the Hittites and their allies of Musri.

Until the Macedonian period, when we first hear of chariots armed with scythes (2 Mac 13³), the war chariot of antiquity followed one general type, alike among the Assyrians and the Egyptians, the Hittites and the Syrians. It consisted of a light wooden body, which was always open behind. The axle, fitted with stout wheels with 6 or 8 spokes (for the Heb. terms see 1 K 7²³), was set as far back as possible for the sake of greater steadiness, and consequently a surer aim. The pole was fixed into the axle, and after passing beneath the floor of the chariot was bent upwards and connected by a band of leather to the front of the chariot. The horses, two in number, were yoked to the pole. Traces were not used. In Assyrian representations a third horse sometimes appears, evidently as a reserve. The body of the chariot naturally received considerable decoration, for which, and for other details, reference may be made to Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. (1878), i. 224-241, and Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies (1864), ii. 1-21, where numerous illustrations are also given. The 'chariots of iron' of the ancient Canaanites (Jos 17¹⁶, Jg 1¹⁹ 4⁹) were chariots of which the woodwork was strengthened by metal plates.

In Egypt and Assyria the normal number of the occupants of a war chariot was two—the driver, who was often armed with a whip, and the combatant, an archer whose bow-case and quiver were usually attached to the right-hand side of the car. Egyptian representations of Hittite chariots, however, show three occupants, of whom the third carries a shield to protect his comrades. This was almost certainly the practice among the Hebrews also, since a frequently recurring military term, shālîsh, signifies 'the third man,' presumably in such a chariot.

Mention may be made, finally, of the chariots set up at the entrance to the Temple at Jerusalem, which were destroyed by Josiah. They were doubtless dedicated originally to J^h, although they are termed by the Hebrew historian 'chariots of the sun' (2 K 23¹¹), their installation having been copied from the Babylonian custom of representing Shamash, the sun-god, riding in a chariot. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CHARITY.—The word 'charity' never occurs in AV in the sense of almsgiving, but always with the meaning of love. It comes from the Vulg. caritas, which was frequently used to translate the Greek agapē, probably because amor had impure associations, and because dilectio (which is sometimes so used) was scarcely strong enough. Wyclif followed the Vulg., as did afterwards the Rhemish translators. Tindale and the Geneva Version preferred 'love'; but in the Bishops' Bible 'charity' was again often used, and the AV followed the Bishops in this. In the RV, however, 'charity' never occurs, the Gr. agapē being everywhere rendered 'love.'

For Feast of Charity (Jude 1² AV) see LOVE FEAST.

CHARM.—See AMULETS AND CHARMS; and MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY.

CHARME (1 Es 5²³).—Called Harim, Ezr 2³², Neh 7⁴². The form in 1 Es. is derived from the Heb., and not from the Gr. form in the canonical books.

CHARMIS (Gn 46⁹).—Son of Melchiel, one of three rulers or elders of Bethulia (Jth 6¹⁸ 8¹⁰ 10⁴).

CHASE.—See HUNTING.

CHASEBA (1 Es 5¹¹).—There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

CHASTITY.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, and MARRIAGE.

CHEBAR.—A canal in Babylonia (Ezk 1¹⁰.) beside which the principal colony of the first Exile of Judah was planted. It has been identified by the Pennsylvania expedition with the canal Kabaru, named in cuneiform documents of the time of Artaxerxes I. It apparently lay to the east of Nippur. The name means 'great.' Hence for 'the river Chebar' we may read 'the Grand Canal.' J. F. McCurdy.

CHECKER WORK.—A designation applied in 1 K 7¹¹ (only) to the net-ornament on the pillars before the Temple.

CHODOR-LAOMER.—An early king of Elam, who, according to Gn 14, exercised dominion over a considerable part of Western Asia. His vassals, Amraphel, king of Shinar, Arioch, king of Ellasar, and Tidal, king of Gilm, helped him to defeat the Canaanite princes of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, who had rebelled against him after having acknowledged his authority for twelve years. Chodor-laomer and his allies defeated the Canaanite princes in the valley of Siddim, and sacked Sodom and Gomorrah. But the story relates that they were in turn defeated by 'Abram, the Hebrew,' who surprised them by night and recovered the spoil of Sodom and his nephew Lot. The name of Chodor-laomer is a purely Elamite name (Kudur-Lagamar or Kutir Lagamar), though it has not yet been found upon the inscriptions as that of an early king of Elam. But the recent excavations of M. de Morgan at Susa confirm the Biblical story, by revealing the considerable part which Elam played in the early history of Western Asia. L. W. KING.

CHEEK.—The seat of health and beauty (Ca 1¹⁰ 5¹⁹). To be smitten on the cheek was the climax of insult and violence. That the command in Mt 5³⁹ is not to be interpreted literally is shown by Christ's own protest in Jn 18². C. W. EMMET.

CHEESE.—See MILK.

CHELAL.—One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10¹⁰).

CHELLIANS.—Probably the inhabitants of the town Chellus (wh. see). Cf. Jth 1²².

CHELUS.—From the text (Jth 1⁹) this place is supposed to have been situated S.W. of Jerus. near Betane and N. of Kadesh and the 'river of Egypt,' i.e. the Wady-el-Arish; but any certain identification is impossible.

CHELOD.—Jth 1^{6b} reads, not as AV and RV 'many nations of the sons of Chelod assembled themselves to battle,' but 'there came together many nations unto the array (or ranks) of the sons of Chelod.' It is not certain whether the 'many nations' are allies of Nebuchadrezzar or of Arphaxad, or whether they come to help or to fight the 'sons of Chelod.' Probably v.^{1b} summarizes v.^{1a}; hence 'sons of Chelod' should be Nebuchadrezzar's army. But he is, in Jth., king of Assyrians, not Chaldeans. No probable conjecture as to Aram. original has been made.

CHELUB.—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4¹¹). 2. The father of Ezri, one of David's superintendents (1 Ch 27²).

CHELUBAI (1 Ch 2⁹).—Another form of Caleb. Cf. 1 Ch 2¹⁸ 4, and see CALEB, and CARMI, No. 2.

CHELUHI.—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁶).

CHEMARM.—In EV this word is found only in Zeph 1⁴; but the original of which it is the transliteration is used also at 2 K 23² and Hos 10⁶, and in both instances Chēmārim is placed in the margin of AV and RV. Chōmer, of which Chēmārim is the plural, is of Aram. origin, and when used in Syr. carries no unfavourable connotation. In the Heb. of the OT, however, Chēmārim always has a bad sense; it is applied to the priests who conducted the worship of the calves (2 K 23³, Hos 10⁶), and to those who served the Baalim (Zeph 1⁴). Kimchi believed the original significance of the verbal form was 'to be black,' and explained the use of the noun by the assertion that the idolatrous priests wore black garments. Others take the root to mean, 'to be sad,' the chumra being a sad, ascetic person, a monk or priest.

CHEMOSE.—The national god of the Moabites (Nu 21²⁹; in Jg 11²⁴ probably 'Chemosh' is a scribal or other error for 'Milcom' [wh. see], who held the same position among the Ammonites). His rites seem to have included human sacrifice (cf. 2 K 3²⁷). It was for this 'abomination of Moab' that Solomon erected a temple (1 K 11⁷), later destroyed by Josiah (2 K 23¹³). N. KOENIG.

CHENANANAH.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 7¹⁰). 2. The father of Zedekiah the false prophet in the reign of Ahab (1 K 22¹¹, 2 Ch 18¹⁰).

CHENANI.—A Levite (Neh 9⁴).

CHENANIAH.—Chief of the Levites at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15²² 27), named among the officers and judges over Israel (26¹⁹).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI ('village of the Ammonites,' Jos 18²⁴).—A town of Benjamin. Probably the ruin Kefr 'Ana near Bethel.

CHEPHIRAH ('village,' Jos 9¹⁷ 18²⁸, Ezr 2²⁸, Neh 7²⁹).—One of the four Hivite cities which made peace with the Hebrews; re-peopled after the Captivity, having belonged to Benjamin; called in 1 Es 5¹⁹ Oaphira. Now Kefreh S.W. of Gibeon.

CHEQUER WORK.—See SPINNING AND WEAVING.

CHERAN.—One of the children of Dishon, the son of Seir, the Horite (Gn 36²⁸, 1 Ch 1⁴¹).

CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.—These were mercenary soldiers, who probably began to attach themselves to David whilst he was an outlaw (2 S 22² etc.), and subsequently became the king's bodyguard and the nucleus of his army (2 S 8¹⁸ 15¹⁹ 20⁷ 23, 1 K 1³⁸ 4, 1 Ch 18¹⁷). Benaiah, whom Josephus calls 'captain of the guard' (Ant. vii. xi. 8), was their commander. They accompanied David in his retreat from Jerusalem (2 S 15¹⁸), fought against Absalom (2 S 20⁷ 23), acted as Solomon's bodyguard at his coronation (1 K 1³⁸ 4). The Cherethites were a Philistine clan (1 S 30¹⁴), dwelling on the coast (Ezr 25¹⁶, Zeph 2⁵); and the name Pelethites may have been a corrupt form of Philistines. Unwillingness to believe that foreigners stood so near the national hero led certain Jewish scholars to assert that the two clans were Israelites. The appellation 'Cherethite' seems to be connected with Crete, and there is good ground (but see CAPHTOR) for the belief that Caphtor, from which Am 9⁷ says the Philistines came, is to be identified with Crete. The LXX of Ezk 25¹⁶, Zeph 2⁵ uses Cretans as the equivalent of Cherethites. J. TAYLOR.

CHERITH.—The 'brook' by which Elijah lived (1 K 17³ 4) was 'before,' i.e. on the E. of Jordan. The popular identification of Cherith with the Wady Kel between Jerusalem and Jericho is unwarranted.

CHERUB (Ezr 2⁶⁸, Neh 7⁶¹).—One of the places from which certain families, on the return from Babylon, failed to prove their register as genuine branches of the Israelite people. See CHARAATHALAN.

CHERUBIM.—1. The most important passage for determining the origin of the Hebrew conception of the cherubim is Ps 18¹⁰. The poet, in describing a theophany of Jehovah, represents the God of Israel as descending to earth on the black thunder-cloud: 'He rode upon a cherub and did fly, yea, he soared on the wings of the wind.' According to this passage, the cherub is a personification of the storm-cloud, or, as others prefer to interpret, of the storm-wind which bears Jehovah from heaven to earth.

2. We shall next discuss the part the cherubim play in the religious symbolism of the OT. In the Tabernacle there were two small golden cherubim, one at each end of the mercy-seat. It was these figures that invested the ark with its special significance as an emblem of the immediate presence of Jehovah. Cherubic figures were embroidered on the curtain separating the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place, and on the other tapestries of the sanctuary. In the Temple two huge cherubim of olive wood, overlaid with gold, overshadowed the ark with their wings (1 K 6²⁵⁻²⁸). Cherubic figures were also found among the other decorations of the Temple (1 K 6^{29-32, 36}). In both sanctuaries they are figures of religious symbolism; they act as bearers of Deity, and are consequently emblematic of Jehovah's immediate presence. Hence we have the phrase 'Thou that sittest on the cherubim' (Ps 80¹ et al.). In Ezekiel's inaugural vision (ch. 1) the four composite figures of the living creatures are in a later passage termed cherubim (10³). They support the firmament on which the throne of Jehovah rests, and in this connexion we again have them as bearers of Deity. In the Paradise story, the cherubim perform another function; they appear as guardians of the tree of life (Gn 3²⁴ J). A different version of this story is alluded to by Ezekiel (28^{14, 16}); according to this prophet, a cherub expels the prince of Tyre from Eden, the garden of God. In both these passages they perform the function of guardians of sacred things, and in view of this it is probable that, in the Temple and Tabernacle, they were looked upon as guardians of the contents of the ark as well as emblems of the Divine presence.

3. As to the figure of the cherubim in the sanctuaries we have no clue, and Josephus is probably correct when he says that no one knows or can guess their form. The prophet Ezekiel and the results of Babylonian excavations assist us in solving the enigma. The prophet's living creatures were composite figures, each having the face of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. We are not to suppose that these forms corresponded exactly to anything that the prophet had seen, but he worked out these figures in his gorgeous imagination, combining elements Hebrew and Babylonian. The native element is to some extent an unsolved riddle, but of the contribution made by Babylonian art there can be no reasonable doubt. The huge composite figures with human head, eagle's wings, and bull's body, which were placed as guardians at the doors of temples and palaces in Babylonia, supplied the prophet with the material for his vision. The writer of the story of the Garden of Eden had some such figures in mind. Basing his conjecture on Ezekiel's vision, Schultz (OT Theol. ii, p. 236) imagines that the cherubim of the sanctuary were composite figures with feet of oxen, wings of eagles, manes of lions, and human bodies and faces, standing upright and spreading their wings over the ark. This view is somewhat problematic. Cheyne and Dillmann prefer to associate them with the griffin, which so often appears in mythology as a guardian of sacred treasures. The former asserts that the Hebrew cherubim were of Hittite origin. It is not correct to suppose that they were directly borrowed either from the Babylonians or the Hittites, but the Hebrew imagination combined foreign and native elements as they were suited to its purpose. The derivation of the Heb. word from the Bab. kurubu, a designation of the steer-god, is, although advocated by Delitzsch, exceedingly uncertain and is denied by Zimmern. We are now in a position to judge the three theories as to the nature of the cherubim,—that they were (1) real, (2) symbolical, and (3) mythical. That they were higher angelic beings with actual existence is now generally discarded. They were in reality creations of the imagination, the form being borrowed from mythological sources and afterwards invested with a symbolic meaning.

4. In Jewish theology the cherubim are one of the three highest classes of angels, the other two being the seraphim and ophanim, which guard the throne of the Most High. They appear as youthful angels in Rabbinical literature. Philo allegorizes them as representing two supreme attributes of God—His goodness and authority; he also mentions other views (for Jewish ideas, cf. JE s.v.). The living creatures of the Apocalyptic vision are borrowed from Ezekiel's imagery. Starting with this passage (Rev 4⁶), and borrowing elements from Jewish theology, some Christian theologians have incorrectly maintained that the cherubim of Scripture were supramundane spiritual essences.

JAMES A. KELSO.

CHESALON.—Near Kiriath-jearim on the border of Judah (Jos 15¹⁰). Now the village Kesla on the hill N. of Kiriath-jearim.

CHESÉD.—One of the sons of Nahor and Milcah (Gn 22² J). He is obviously here introduced into the genealogy of the Terahites as the presumptive forefather of the Kasdim or Chaldeans. This probably represents a different tradition from that in P, where Ur of the Chaldees (i.e. Kasdim) is spoken of as the dwelling place of Terah (Gn 11), Nahor's father.

CHESIL (Jos 15¹⁰).—The LXX reads Bethul, probably for Bethul, as in the parallel passage, Jos 19¹, and Chesil of MT is prob. a textual error.

CHESTNUT TREE (armôn, Gn 30³⁷, Ezk 31⁸. RV plane).—There is no doubt that the RV is correct. The chestnut tree is only an exotic in Palestine, but the plane (Arab. dīb) is one of the finest trees of the land. It attains great development; a wonderful specimen, which has a small room or shop within its hollow trunk, is to be seen in one of the streets of Damascus. The plane (Planus orientalis) peels its outer layers of bark annually, leaving a white streaky surface. It flourishes specially by watercourses (Sir 24¹⁴).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CHESULLOTH (Jos 19¹⁴).—The same as Chialoth-tabor, Jos 19¹⁴. A place on the border of Zebulun. Now the ruin Ikad at the foot of the Nazareth hills, in the fertile plain W. of Tabor.

CHETH.—Eighth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 8th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

CHEZIB (Gn 38⁸).—See ACHZIB, No. 2.

CHIDON.—The name, acc. to 1 Ch 13³, of the threshing-floor where Uzzah was struck dead for rashly touching the ark (see UZZAH). In 2 S 6⁸ the name is given as Nacon. No locality has ever been identified with either name.

CHIEF OF ASIA.—Ac 19¹; RV 'chief officers of Asia'; RVM 'Asiarchs.' See ASIARCH.

CHILD, CHILDREN.—1. Value set on the possession of children.—Throughout the Bible a noteworthy characteristic is the importance and happiness assigned to the possession of children, and, correspondingly, the intense sorrow and disappointment of childless parents. Children were regarded as Divine gifts (Gn 4¹ 33³), pledges of God's favour, the heritage of the Lord (Ps 127³). It followed naturally that barrenness was looked upon as a reproach, i.e. a punishment inflicted by God, and involving, for the woman, disgrace in the eyes of the world. Thus, Sarah was despised by her more fortunate handmaid Hagar (Gn 16¹); Rachel, in envy of Leah, cried, 'Give me children or else I die' (Gn 30¹); Hannah's rival taunted her to make her fret, because the Lord had shut up her womb (1 S 1¹); Elisabeth rejoiced when the Lord took away her 'reproach among men' (Lk 1²⁵). 'He maketh the barren woman to keep house and to be a joyful mother of children' (Ps 113⁹), cries the Psalmist as the climax of his praise. The reward of a man who fears the Lord shall be a wife like a fruitful vine, and children like olive branches round about his table (Ps 128³). Our Lord refers to the joy of a woman at the birth of a man into the world (Jn 16²¹). Not only is natural parental affection set forth in these and similar passages, but also a strong sense of the worldly advantages which accompanied the condition of parentage. A man who was a father, especially a father of sons, was a rich man; his position was dignified and influential; his possessions were secured to his family, and his name perpetuated. 'Be fruitful and multiply' was a blessing desired by every married couple—for the sake of the latter part of the blessing, the necessary accompaniment of fruitfulness—'replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion': for fatherhood involved expansion of property and increase in importance and wealth.

2. The filial relationship.—The position of children was one of complete subordination to their parents. Gn 22, Jg 11³⁰, and the sacrifices to Molech of children by their parents (Lv 18²¹ 20²⁻⁵, 2 K 23¹⁰, Jer 32²⁵) indicate that the father had powers of life and death over his children; these powers are limited in Dt 21¹⁸⁻²¹. Reverence and obedience on the part of children towards their parents were strongly enjoined (Ex 20¹², Lv 19³, Dt 27¹⁶, Pr 1⁸ etc.). Any one smiting or cursing his father or mother is to be put to death (Ex 21^{15, 17}). Any one who is disrespectful to his parents is accursed (Dt 17¹⁶). Irreverence on the part of children towards an older person is visited by a signal instance of Divine judgment (2 K 23^{25, 26}). Several passages in the Book of Proverbs urge care, even to severity, in the upbringing of children (Pr 3¹² 13²⁴ 15⁵ 22⁶ 29¹⁵ etc.). The outcome of this dependence of children upon their parents, and of their subordination to them, was an intensely strong sense of the closeness of the filial bond, and a horror of any violation of it. A son who could bring himself to defy his father and break away from his home life was indeed no longer worthy to be called a son (Lk 15¹⁹). The disobedience of Israel is bewailed in penitence by the prophet because it appears to him like the most heinous crime, the rebellion of children against a loving father: 'Surely they are my people, children that will not err. . . . In his love and in his pity he redeemed them, . . . and he bare them and carried them all the days of old. But they rebelled' (Is 63⁸⁻¹⁰). In this connexion some of the sentences in our Lord's charge to the Twelve must have fallen upon startled ears (Mt 10^{21, 26-33}). Children were expected to follow in the footsteps of their parents and to resemble them. Hence such expressions as 'Abraham's children,' which carried the notion of resemblance in character. Hence also the figurative use of the word 'children': 'children of transgression', 'children of disobedience'. Phrases like these are closely connected with others in which the words 'children' or 'sons' are used in a spiritual sense conveying the ideas of love and trust and obedience. St. Peter speaks of 'Mark, my son.' In touching anxiety for their spiritual welfare, St. Paul, writing to the Galatians, addresses them: 'My little children'; and St. John, in his Epistles, is fond of the same expression.

3. The feeling for childhood.—Tenderness towards child life, appreciation of the simplicity, the helplessness, of children, affection of parents for their children, and children for their parents: all these are features of the Bible which the most superficial reader cannot fail to observe. There are many touching and vivid examples of and references to parental love. All the sons and daughters of Jacob rose up to comfort him for the loss of Joseph, but he refused to be comforted (Gn 37²⁷). 'If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved' (43¹⁴), is his despairing cry when Benjamin also is taken from him—Benjamin, 'a child of his old age, a little one . . . and his father loveth him' (44²⁰). Hannah dedicated her little son to the service of the Lord in gratitude for his birth; and then year by year 'made a little robe and brought it to him' (1 S 2¹⁹). David fasted and lay all night upon the ground praying for the life of his sick child (2 S 12¹⁶). The brief account of the death of the Shunammite's boy is a passage of restrained and pathetic beauty (2 K 4³²⁻³⁷). Isaiah's feeling for the weakness and helplessness of children is displayed in the mention of the words first articulated by his own son (Is 8⁴); and in his description of the time when the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and little children, still dependent for life and protection upon their mother's care, should, without fear of harm on her part, be allowed to play among wild beasts and handle the asp and the adder (11⁸⁻⁹). Zechariah dreams of the happy time when Jerusalem shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets (Zec 8³). The beauty of a child's humble simplicity is acknowledged by the Psalmist, who likens his own soul to a weaned child with its mother (Ps 131²); unconsciously anticipating the spirit of One, greater than he, who said that only those who became as little children should in any wise enter the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 18³), and who gave thanks to His Father for revealing the things of God to 'babes' (Mt 11²⁵).

E. G. ROMANES.

CHILDREN (SONS) OF GOD.—There are a few passages in the OT in which the term 'sons of God' is applied to angelic beings (Gn 6¹⁻⁴, Job 1⁶ 2¹ 38⁷; cf. Dn 3³⁸ RV). Once the judges of Israel are referred to as 'gods,' perhaps as appointed by God and vested with His authority (but the passage is very obscure; may the words be ironical?), and, in parallel phrase, as 'sons of the Most High' (Ps 82⁶, cf. Jn 10³⁴; also, Ps 29¹, 89⁶ RVm).

With these exceptions, the term, with the correlative one of 'Father,' designates the relation of men to God and of God to men, with varying fullness of meaning. It is obvious that the use of such a figure has wide possibilities. To call God 'Father' may imply little more than that He is creator and ruler of men (cf. 'Zeus, father of gods and men'); or it may connote some phase of His providence towards a favoured individual or nation; or, again, it may assert that a father's love at its highest is the truest symbol we can frame of God's essential nature and God's disposition towards all men. Similarly, men may conceivably be styled 'children of God' from mere dependence, from special privilege, from moral likeness, or finally from a full and willing response to the Divine Fatherhood in filial love, trust, and obedience. It is, therefore, not surprising that the Scripture facts present a varying and progressive conception of God as Father and of men as His children.

I. IN THE OT.—The most characteristic use of the figure is in connexion with God's providential dealings with His people Israel. That favoured nation as a whole is His 'son.' He their 'Father': it is because this tie is violated by Israel's ingratitude and apostasy that the prophets rebuke and appeal, while here, too, lies the hope of final restoration. Thus Hosea declares that God loved Israel and called His 'son' out of Egypt (Hos 11¹, cf. Ex 4²² 'Israel is my son, my firstborn'); and, in spite of the Divine rejection of the Northern Kingdom (Hos 1⁴ Lo-ammi, 'not my people'), prophesies that it shall still be said to them 'ye are the sons of the living God' (11¹⁰). So too Isaiah: 'I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me . . . Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider' (12^{2, 3}). In Deuteronomy the same figure is used (12¹ 8⁵ 14^{1, 2}), and in the Song of Moses (Dt 32) receives striking development. God is the 'Father' of Israel, whom He begat by delivering them from Egypt, nourished in the wilderness and established (vv. 6, 10-15, 18); the people are His 'sons and daughters,' His 'children' (vv. 19, 20). Yet they are warned that this sonship has moral implications, and may be forfeited by neglect of them (v. 5 'they have dealt corruptly with him, they are not his children'); and the hint is given of the bringing in of the Gentiles through a sonship based, not on national privilege but on faith and obedience (v. 21, cf. Ro 10^{12, 13, 19}).

Thus the relation is not merely formal but ethical, and on both sides. The Divine Fatherhood towards Israel is manifested in protecting and redeeming love: it involves the Divine faithfulness, to which His people may make appeal in their extremity (Jer 31^{9, 10-20}, Is 43¹ 63¹⁶ 64⁵⁻¹²). The fact of Israel's sonship carries with it the obligation of filial response: 'a son honoureth his father . . . if then I be a Father, where is mine honour?' (Mal 1^o). But such response is, of necessity, not only national, but also, and first, individual; and the way is opened for a conception of God as Father of every man (cf. Mal 2¹⁰), and of all men as, at least potentially, 'children of God.'

The Psalms have been left for separate reference. For if the religion of Israel had really attained to any clear conception of God as Father and of men as His children, it would most naturally find utterance in these compositions, in which we have at once the devoutest expression of the personal religious consciousness and the chosen vehicle of the worship of the congregation. But the dominating conception is of God as King and of man as His servant. True, the Divine care for man and the Divine help are set forth under a wealth of imagery: God is shield, rock, fortress, refuge, shepherd, light, salvation, but not Father. Twice only is the name used of Him, not as appellative but in simile, to describe His tender mercies. He is 'a Father of the fatherless' (Ps 68³); 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him' (103¹³, cf. Is 66¹³). Once the term 'thy children' is applied to 'Israel, even the pure in heart' (Ps 73¹³⁻¹⁴); and in several passages the term 'son of God' is used of the theocratic king, as representing ideal Israel (Ps 2⁷; see also Ps 89²⁶⁻²⁷, 2 S 7¹⁴, He 1⁵).

It cannot, then, be said that in the OT we have a doctrine of men as 'children of God,' springing from, and developed under, a conception of God as essentially Father. Nor is it clear that later Judaism made advance towards this closer and more individual conviction of sonship.

Bousset affirms that 'the belief comes to light, more and more frequently the nearer we approach to Jesus' own time, that God is the Father of each individual believer' (Jesus, p. 113, Eng. ed.). But against this may be set the judgment of Wendt: 'In the later Judaism, down to the time of Jesus, there was by no means a development of the conception of God . . . inclining to a more prevalent use of the name of Father. The development proceeded rather in the way of enhancing to the utmost the idea of God's transcendent greatness and judicial authority over men. According to the Pharisaic view, the moral relation of man to God was one of legal subjection' (Teaching of Jesus, i. 190).

The relevant passages in the Apocrypha, at least, leave the gulf unbridged between OT and NT (To 13⁴, Wis 5¹⁴, Sir 23¹⁻⁴, 36¹² 51¹⁰, Ad. Est 16⁹), and nowhere does our Lord's teaching appear in sharper contrast to current religious ideas than in relation to the Divine Fatherhood (e.g. Jn 8³⁹⁻⁴²).

II. IN THE NT.—The outstanding fact is that in the self-revelation of Jesus Christ, as well as in His teaching, the characteristic name for God is 'Father.' He enters into full inheritance of the OT conception of the Divine power and transcendence, proclaims a Kingdom of God, and develops its meaning for His disciples; but the King is also Father, and the stress of Christ's teaching on this side is not on the Kingship but on the Fatherhood of God. In what unique sense He knew God as 'His own Father,' Himself as 'Son of God,' we do not here inquire (see JESUS CHRIST), noting only how simply, in the deepest experiences of joy or trouble, His faith uttered itself in the name 'Father' (Mt 11²⁶, Lk 23⁴⁶). But there was that in His religious consciousness which He could freely share with His disciples as 'children of God': the faint and halting analogy of the OT became through Him a clear and steadfast revelation of the Divine Fatherhood, and of sonship, in its fullest sense, as the possible and indeed normal relation of human to Divine.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.—The essential and universal Fatherhood of God appears in such sayings as that of Mt 5⁴⁵⁻⁴⁸, and, supremely, in the parable of the Prodigal Son. Even when, as generally, it is in discourse to the disciples that the term 'your Father' is used, it still connotes what is in God, awaiting in man that obedient recognition which is sonship. It is the appeal of Christ to His disciples against hypocrisy, unforgiveness, lack of faith (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁵); it stands as symbol of the Divine providence, forgiveness, redemption—in a word, of the Divine love (Lk 6³⁵ 11¹³, Mk 11²⁵), and hence it gives the ground and manner of all access to God,—'Whosoever ye pray, say, Father' (Lk 11¹³).

If with Jesus the Fatherhood of God lies in His disposition towards men, not in the mere fact that He created them, so the filial relationship is ethical. God is Father, men must become children. In the Synoptic Gospels the term implying generation—'child (children) of God'—is not used, and the references to 'sons of God' are few, though sufficient to emphasize the moral conditions of sonship. Thus, the peacemakers 'shall be called sons of God' (Mt 5⁹): love to one's enemies has for its motive 'that ye may become sons of your Father which is in heaven' (Mt 5⁴⁵, cf. Lk 6³⁵). But since sonship is virtually identical with membership of the Kingdom of God, these direct references must be supplemented by the many sayings in which the conditions of entrance into the Kingdom are laid down: it is the righteous (and what the term means is set forth in the Sermon on the Mount) who 'shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father' (Mt 13⁴³).

2. The Gospel (and 1 Ep.) of St. John.—In the Fourth Gospel (considered here rather than in its chronological sequence, for the sake of comparison with the Synoptics) certain elements in our Lord's revelation of the Father receive new emphasis.

(a) The unique Sonship of Jesus is the prevailing theme (Jn 1¹⁴, 18 20³¹). Hence the Synoptic phrase 'your Father' all but disappears. What it implies is not absent, but is to be reached through a rich unfolding of, and fellowship with, the personal religious consciousness of Jesus Himself, under the terms 'my Father' and, especially, 'the Father.' Only once does He speak to the disciples of 'your Father,' when, after His resurrection, He links them with Himself as 'brethren' in the message, 'I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God' (Jn 20¹⁷, cf. 14²⁰).

(b) The sonship of the disciples is to be attained through Jesus Christ: 'No one cometh unto the Father but through me' (Jn 14⁶). What is exceptional in the Synoptics (Mt 11²⁶, Lk 10²²) becomes the normal teaching of the Fourth Gospel: to see, know, believe, love, confess the Son, is the one way of access to the Father (Jn 14-17, 1 Jn 2³). Moreover, the impulse of attraction to Christ is itself from the Father (Jn 6⁴⁴⁻⁴⁵), and the Divine initiative, as well as the completeness of the break required with 'the world' and 'the flesh' (1 Jn 2¹⁵, Jn 3⁴), is described as being 'born anew,' 'born of the Spirit,' 'born of God' (Jn 3⁵⁻⁶ 11¹³, 1 Jn 3⁹). In 1 Jn. the moral fruits of this new birth are set forth—righteousness, incapability to sin, love, faith in the Son of God, victory over the world (1 Jn 2²⁹ 3⁴ 4⁷ 5¹⁻⁴).

These are the elements which combine in the conception of sonship in the Johannine writings: the actual phrase 'children (not 'sons') of God' occurs Jn 1¹² 11¹², 1 Jn 3¹⁻², 10 5².

3. The Epistles of St. Paul.—St. Paul speaks both of 'children of God' and of 'sons of God.' His doctrine comprises the mystical and the ethical elements already noted, while it is enriched and developed by additional features. In his speech at Athens (Ac 17²⁹) he for a moment adopts the Greek point of view, and regards all men as the 'offspring' of God. Apart from this, he—like the Fourth Gospel, but in his own way—connects sonship with faith in Christ: it is part of his doctrine of redemption, a status and privilege conferred by God upon men through faith in Christ, attested by the indwelling Spirit and His fruits. 'Ye are all sons of God, through faith, in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁶); 'The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of God' (Ro 8¹⁶); 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God' (Ro 8¹⁴). It is as 'children of God' that his converts have a moral mission to the world (Ph 2¹⁴).

The idea of sonship as a Divinely conferred status is expressed by St. Paul under the Roman custom of 'adoption' (wh. see), by which a stranger could be legally adopted as 'son' and endowed with all the privileges of the 'child' by birth (Eph 1¹⁻⁴, cf. Ro 8²⁹). The figure suggests fresh points of analogy. To the Romans, St. Paul makes moral appeal on the ground that in exchange for the 'spirit of bondage' they had received the 'spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father' (Ro 8¹⁵). In the passage Gal 3²⁶⁻⁴⁷ he likens the state of the faithful under the Law to that of 'young children' needing a 'tutor'; 'heirs,' yet, because under guardians, differing nothing from 'bondservants.' The Law as 'tutor' has led them to Christ, in whom they are now 'sons of God'; Christ has 'redeemed' them from the bondage of Law that they might 'receive the adoption of sons,' and, because they are sons, 'God sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father.' The spiritual sonship, open to all believers, should be no stumbling-block to Israel, though to them specially belonged 'the adoption' (Ro 9⁴). It fulfils the typical distinction within Israel itself of 'children of the flesh' and 'children of the promise': by Divine election alone men become 'children of God,' 'sons of the living God' (Gal 4¹⁸, Ro 9⁸).

St. Paul further conceives of sonship as looking forward for its full realization. We are 'waiting for our adoption, to wit the redemption of our body' (Ro 8²³). As Christ was Son of God, yet was by His resurrection 'declared to be the Son of God with power' (Ro 1⁴), so will deliverance from the 'bondage of corruption' reveal the 'sons of God,' and all creation shall share in 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8¹⁸⁻²³). This ultimate realization of sonship is 'to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8²⁹, cf. 1 Jn 3²). Finally, the greatness and the certainty of the future glory are set forth under the thought of the son as 'heir' (Ro 8¹⁷, Gal 4¹⁻⁷, cf. Eph 1¹¹⁻¹³).

4. Other NT writers.—The opening chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews emphasize the greatness and finality of a revelation through the Son, who in stooping to redeem men is not ashamed to call them 'brethren'; they are 'children' whose nature He shares, 'sons' who through Him are brought to glory (He 2⁹⁻¹³). And at the close of the Epistle the readers are exhorted to regard suffering as the Divine chastening, which marks them out as 'sons' and comes from 'the Father of spirits' (12¹⁻¹³).

If the Ep. of St. James suggests a universal view of the Fatherhood of God in the phrases 'the God and Father,' 'the Lord and Father,' 'the Father of lights' (Ja 1²⁷ 3¹⁷), it also endorses the deeper spiritual sonship under the figure, 'Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth' (1¹⁸). The same metaphor of spiritual birth is used by St. Peter. In 1 P 1³ this birth, in James, is through the 'word of God'; in 1³ it is attributed to the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and is joined with the Pauline thought of an inheritance yet to be fully revealed. The name 'Father' appears as the distinctively Christian name for God—'if ye call on him as Father' (1¹⁷). But the idea of sonship is not developed: the thought does not occur in the enumeration of Christian privileges in 2¹⁻¹⁰, where the phrase 'sons of the living God' is absent from the reference to Hosias, though found in the corresponding reference by St. Paul (cf. 1 P 2¹⁰ with Ro 9²⁶).

Finally, in Revelation we meet with this figure of sonship, with emphasis on its ethical side, in the vision of the new heaven and the new earth: 'He that overcometh shall inherit these things: and I will be his God, and he shall be my son' (Rev 21⁷, cf. v. 4).

CHILDREN, SONG OF THE THREE.—See APOC-
RYPHA, p. 42⁸.

CHILEAB.—The second son of David by Abigail, the widow of Nabal the Carmelite (2 S 3³). In 1 Ch 3² he is called Daniel.

CHILARCH (Rev 19¹⁸ RVm).—See BAND.

CHILIASM.—A peculiar doctrine of the future, based upon a developed and literalized exposition of the eschatological pictures of the NT. It includes the doctrine of the Millennium (whence its name fr. Gr. chilioi), that is to say, the period of 1000 years between the resurrection of the saints and that of the rest of the dead, of the visible appearance of Christ to establish His Kingdom of risen saints and defeat an equally literal Antichrist, and of the Last Judgment.

The germ of developed Chiliasm is to be found in the teaching of the Apostles, and particularly in Rev. 20; but it seems to have had no great prominence in doctrinal development until the middle of the 2nd cent., when it spread from Asia Minor, particularly among the Jewish Ebionites. Justin Martyr believed in the earthly reign of Christ, but knew that some orthodox Christians did not. Papias describes the coming Kingdom with the extravagant imagery of the Jewish Apocalyptic. The Montanists were extreme chiliasts, but Origen opposed the doctrine. Augustine may be said to have given the death-blow to the chiliastic expectation in the early Church by his identification of the Church with the Kingdom of God on earth; and throughout the Middle Ages his view obtained.

A revival of chiliastic conceptions came with the Reformation, when attention was again concentrated on NT teaching. The fanatics among the reforming sects, particularly the Anabaptists at Münster, expected the speedy establishment of Christ on earth, apparently taking some steps towards preparation therefor. The Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions, however, condemn Chiliasm, and the leading Reformers, while they expected the speedy coming of Christ, did not attempt to literalize descriptions of this event. Throughout the 17th cent. the chiliastic views again appear—a fact doubtless due, as in the time of the early Church and of the Reformation, to persecution. The view, however, was never regarded as strictly orthodox, although advocated by prominent writers on both the Continent and in England.

In modern times Chiliasm has been championed by a number of prominent theologians, but particularly by sects like the Mormons, the Second Adventists, and, as pre-millenarians, by many professional evangelists. There is, however, no uniformity in these chiliastic views, except as to the belief in the coming of the Millennium (see MILLENNIUM), in which all share. The opinions as to the nature of the Kingdom also range from extremely sensuous views like those of certain of the early Church Fathers to the highly socialistic views of men like Oetinger. At the present time, outside of the circle of the pre-millenarians, chiliastic views have little influence, and the tendency is strong to substitute belief in social evolution, under the inspiration of Christianity, for the cataclysmic establishment of a literal kingdom by Jesus at His second Advent.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

CHILION and Mahlon were the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi (Ru 1¹⁻²). They married women of the Moabites—Mahlon marrying Ruth, and Chilion Orpah (Ru 4¹⁰)—and after a sojourn of ten years in Moabite territory died there. Chilion means 'wasting away,' Mahlon means 'sickly.' Neither of these names occurs elsewhere in the Bible. The two names occur in varying order in Ru 1² and 4⁹, so that no conclusion can be drawn as to which was the elder.

CHILMAD occurs in Ezk 27²³ at the close of the list of nations that traded with Tyre. The name has been thought to be the Aram. form of Charmande, a town on the Euphrates mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. i. 8. 10). George Smith identified Chilmad with the modern Kalwaddha near Baghdad—but neither of these conjectures has much probability.

CHIMHAM.—Probably the son (cf. 1 K 27) of Barzillai the Gileadite, who returned with David from beyond Jordan to Jerusalem after the death of Absalom (2 S 19¹¹). See, further, GERUTH-CHIMHAM.

CHIMNEY.—See HOUSE, § 7.

CHINNERETH.—A city (Dt 31⁷, Jos 11² [in latter spelt Chinneroth] 19³⁶) which gave its name to the Sea of Chinnereth (Nu 34¹¹, Jos 12¹³ 13²⁷), the OT designation of the Sea of Galilee. The site of the town is uncertain, but it follows Rakkath (probably Tiberias), and may have been in the plain of Gennesaret (cf. 1 K 15³⁰).

CHIOS.—An island in the Ægean Sea opposite the Ionian peninsula in Asia Minor. In the 5th cent. B.C. the inhabitants were the richest of all the Greeks. The city was distinguished in literature also, and claimed to be the birth-place of Homer. Up to the time of Vespasian it was, under the Roman Empire, a free State. The chief city was also named Chios. St. Paul passed it on his last voyage in the Ægean Sea (Ac 20¹⁴).

CHISLEV (AV Chisleu, Neh 1¹, Zec 7¹).—See TIME.

CHISLON ('strength').—Father of Elidad, Benjamin's representative for dividing the land (Nu 34²¹ P).

CHISLOTH-TABOR, Jos 19¹².—See CHESULLOTH.

CHITHLISH (Jos 15⁴⁰, AV Kithlish).—A town in the Shephelah of Judah. The site is unknown.

CHITTIM (1 Mac 1¹ 8⁵) for Kittim (wh. see).

CHIU.—Am 5³⁰ (see REPHAN, SICCUTH). As shown by the appositional phrase 'your god-star,' this name refers to the Assyrian Kaiwanu, the planet Saturn (= Ninib, war-god), whose temple, Bit Ninib, in the province of Jerusalem is mentioned by the Egyptian governors of this city as early as B.C. 1450. The translation of the word as an appellative ('pedestal') by some is due to the vocalization of the Massoretes, who are supposed to have considered it a common noun. However, it is far more probable that they, conscious of its reference, substituted for the original vowels those of the word shiqqûs ('abomination')—an epithet often applied to strange gods.

N. KOENIG.

CHLOE (mentioned only in 1 Co 1¹⁴).—St. Paul had been informed of the dissensions at Corinth prob. by some of her Christian slaves. Chloe herself may have been either a Christian or a heathen, and may have lived either at Corinth or at Ephesus. In favour of the latter is St. Paul's usual tact, which would not suggest the invidious mention of his informants' names, if they were members of the Corinthian Church.

CHOBÄ (Jth 4⁴; Chobai 15⁴), noticed with Damascus.—Perhaps the land of Hobab (wh. see).

CHOIR (Neh 12⁸ RVm).—See PRÄISE.

CHOLA.—An unknown locality mentioned in Jth 15⁴.

CHOLER is used in Sir 31²⁰ 37²⁰ in the sense of a disease, 'perhaps cholera, diarrhoea'—Oxf. Eng. Dict. (RV 'colic'); and in Dn 8⁷ 11¹ in the sense of bitter anger. Both meanings are old, and belonged indeed to the Lat. cholera as early as the 3rd and 4th centuries.

CHORAZIN.—A place referred to only in the denunciation by Christ (Mt 11²¹, Lk 10²³). It is with probability identified with Kerazeh, north of Tell Hum, where are remains of pillars, walls, etc., of basalt.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

CHORBE (AV Corbe), 1 Es 5¹²—Zaccai, Ezr 2⁹, Neh 7¹⁴.

CHOSAMEUS (1 Es 9²²).—It is not improbable that the Gr. reading is due to a copyist's error, especially seeing that the three proper names that follow Simeon in the text of Ezr 10¹¹ are omitted in 1 Esdras.

CHRIST.—See JESUS CHRIST, and MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN.—This name, from very early times the distinctive title of the followers of Jesus Christ, occurs only thrice in NT (Ac 11²⁶, 26²⁸, 1 P 4¹⁶).

1. Time and place of origin.—Our only information on this point comes from Ac 11²⁶. It was in Antioch, and in connexion with the mission of Barnabas and Saul to that city, that the name arose. It has sometimes been suggested that the infrequent use of 'Christian' in the NT points to a considerably later origin, and that the author of Acts had no better reason for assigning it to so early a date than the fact that the founding of the first Gentile church appeared to him to be an appropriate occasion for its coming into use. But apart from St. Luke's well-established claim, as the historian of Christ and early Christianity, to have 'traced the course of all things accurately from the first,' his own non-employment of the word as a general designation for the disciples of Christ suggests that he had no reason other than a genuine historical one for referring to the origin of the name at all.

2. Authors of the name.—(1) It is exceedingly unlikely that it was originally adopted by the Christians themselves. As the NT shows, they were in the habit of using other designations—the disciples' (Ac 11²⁶ and passim), 'the brethren' (Ac 9³⁰, Ro 16¹¹ and constantly), 'the elect' (Ro 8³³, Col 3¹²), 'the saints' (Ac 9¹³, Ro 12¹³), 'believers' (Ac 5¹⁴, 1 Ti 4¹²), 'the Way' (Ac 9² 19⁹). But in NT times we never find them calling themselves Christians. In Ac 26²⁸ it is king Agrippa who employs the name. And though in 1 P 4¹⁶ it comes from the pen of an Apostle, the context shows that he is using it as a term of accusation on the lips of the Church's enemies.

(2) It cannot have been applied to the followers of Jesus by the Jews. The Jews believed in 'the Christ,' i.e. 'the Anointed One,' the Messiah; and they ardently looked for Him to come. But it was their passionate contention that Jesus of Nazareth was not the Christ. To call His followers Christians was the last thing they would have thought of doing. They referred to them contemptuously as 'this sect' (Ac 28²², cf. 24¹⁴), and when contempt passed into hatred they called them 'Nazarenes' (Ac 24⁶, cf. Jn 1⁴⁶). It is true that Agrippa, a Jewish king, makes use of the name; but this was nearly 20 years after, and when, in that Roman world with which he lived in close relations, it had become the recognized designation of the new faith.

(3) Almost certainly the name owed its origin to the non-Christian Gentiles of Antioch. As these Antiochenes saw Barnabas and Saul standing day by day in the market-place or at the corners of the streets, and proclaiming that the Christ had come and that Jesus was the Christ, they caught up the word without understanding it, and bestowed the name of 'Christians' on these preachers and their followers. Probably it was given, not as a mere nickname, but as a term of convenience. Yet doubtless it carried with it a suggestion of contempt, and so may be compared to such titles as 'Puritan' and 'Methodist' originally applied by those who stood outside of the spiritual movements which the names were meant to characterize.

3. The spread of the name.—Originating in this casual way, the name took deep root in the soil of human speech, and the three passages of the NT in which it occurs show how widely it had spread within the course of a single generation. In Ac 26²⁸ we find it on the lips of a Jewish ruler, speaking in Cæsarea before an audience of Roman officials and within 20 years after it was first used in Antioch. A few years later St. Peter writes to 'the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia' (1 P 1¹); and, without suggesting that 'Christian' was a name which the Church had yet adopted as its own, he assumes that it was perfectly familiar to the 'elect' themselves over a vast region of the Dispersion; and further implies that by this time, the time probably of Nero's persecution (A.D. 64), to be called a Christian was equivalent to being liable to suffer persecution for the sake of Christ (4¹⁶). It was later still that St. Luke wrote the Book of Acts; and when he says that the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (Ac 11²⁶), he evidently means that this was a name by which they were now commonly known, though his own usage does not suggest that they had even yet assumed it themselves.

Outside of the NT we find Tacitus and Suetonius testifying that the designation Christian (or 'Chrestian') was popularly used in Rome at the time of the Neronian persecution; while from Pliny, early in the 2nd cent., we learn that by his day it was employed in Roman courts of law. 'Are you a Christian?' was the question he was himself accustomed to put to persons brought before him on a charge of being followers of Christ. By the time of Polycarp's martyrdom (soon after the middle of the 2nd cent.), the term of accusation and cross-examination has become one of joyful profession. 'I am a Christian' was Polycarp's repeated answer to those who urged him to recant. It was natural that those who were called 'to suffer as Christians' should come to glory in the name that brought the call and the opportunity to confess Christ. And so a name given by the outside world in a casual fashion was adopted by the Church as a title of glory and pride.

4. The meaning attached to the name.—The original meaning was simply 'a follower of Christ.' The Antiochenes did not know who this Christ was of whom the preachers spoke; so little did they know that they mistook for a proper name what was really a designation of Jesus. But, taking it to be His personal name, they called Christ's disciples 'Christians,' just as Pompey's followers had been called 'Pompeians,' or the adherents of Herod's dynasty 'Herodians.' No doubt they used the word with a touch of good-humoured contempt—the Christians were the followers of somebody or other called Christ. It is contempt again, but of an intenser kind, that seems to be conveyed by Agrippa's words to St. Paul, 'With but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian!' (Ac 26²⁸). In 1 Peter a darker shadow has fallen upon the name. Nero has made it criminal to be a Christian, and the word is now one not of scorn merely, but of hatred and fear. The State ranks a Christian with murderers and thieves and other malefactors (cf. 1 P 4¹⁴ with v. 16). On its adoption by the Church, deeper meanings began to be read into it. It testified to the dignity of the Church's Lord—'the Anointed One,' the rightful King of that Kingdom which hath no end. It proclaimed the privileges that belonged to Christians themselves; for they too were anointed with the oil of God to be a holy generation, a royal priesthood. Moreover, in Greek the word christos ('anointed') suggested the more familiar word chrestos ('gracious'). The Christians were often misnamed 'Chrestians' from an idea that the founder of their religion was 'one Chrestos.' And this heathen blunder conveyed a happy and beautiful suggestion. It is possible that St. Peter himself is playing on the word 'Christ' when he writes (1 P 2³), 'If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious (chrestos).' And by and by we find Tertullian reminding the enemies of the Church that the very name 'Chrestians,' which they gave to Christ's people in error, is one that speaks of sweetness and benignity.

5. The historical significance of the name.—(1) It marked the distinct emergence of Christianity from Judaism, and the recognition of its right to a separate place among the religions of the world. Hitherto, to outsiders, Christianity had been only a Jewish sect (cf. the words of Gallio, Ac 18¹⁴⁻¹⁵), nor had the first Apostles themselves dreamt of breaking away from synagogue and Temple. But the Antiochenes saw that Christ's disciples must be distinguished from the Jews and put into a category of their own. They understood, however dimly, that a new religion had sprung up on the earth, and by giving its followers this new name, they helped to quicken in the mind of the Church itself the consciousness of a separate existence. (2) It marked the fact, not heretofore realized, that Christianity was a religion for the Gentiles. Probably it was because the missionaries to Antioch not only preached Christ, but preached Him 'unto the Greeks also' (Ac 11²⁰), that the inhabitants discerned in these men the heralds of a new faith. It was not the way of Jewish Rabbis to proffer Judaism to Greeks in the market-place. Christianity appeared in Antioch as a universal religion, making no distinction between Jew and Gentile. (3) It is not without significance that it was 'first in Antioch' that the Christians received this name. It shows how the Church's centre of gravity was shifting. Up to this time Christians as well as Jews looked to Jerusalem in everything as the mother of them all. But Jerusalem was not fitted to be the chief city of a universal faith. Paul saw this clearly—helped to it without doubt by his experiences at this very time. And so Antioch became the headquarters of his missionary labours, and through him the headquarters of aggressive Christianity in the early Apostolic age (13¹⁹, 14²⁶, 15⁴¹, 22³, 25¹, 18²²). It served as a stepping-stone for that movement, inevitable from the day when Christianity was first preached unto the Gentiles, which by and by made Rome, the metropolis of the world, the mother-city also of the universal Church. (4) The name marked the fact that Christianity was not the religion of a book or a dogma, an idea or an institution, but a faith that centred in a Person. The men of Antioch were mistaken when they supposed that Christ was a personal name, but they made no mistake in thinking that He whose name they took to be Christos was the foundation-stone of this new faith. By calling the disciples Christians they became unconscious prophets of the truth that Christianity, whether regarded from the side of historical revelation or of personal experience is all summed up in the Person of Jesus Christ.

J. C. LAMBERT.

CHRISTIANITY—When the name 'Christian' (see preceding art.) had come to be the specific designation of a follower of Jesus Christ, it was inevitable that the word 'Christianity' should sooner or later be used to denote the faith which Christians profess. The word does not occur in the NT, however, and first makes its appearance in the letters of Ignatius early in the 2nd century. But for 1800 years it has been the regular term for the religion which claims Jesus Christ as its founder, and recognizes in His Person and work the sum and substance of its beliefs.

Christianity presents itself to us under two aspects—objective and subjective, past and present, world-historical and personal. It is a great fact of universal history, but also a truth of personal experience. It is a revelation given from above, but also an appropriation effected from within. We must think of it therefore (1) as it was historically revealed to the world; (2) as it is realized in the life of the individual.

I. Christianity as a Historical Revelation.—In dealing with this part of the subject two opposite mistakes must be avoided. (1) First the mistake of those who confound history with dogma, principles with institutions, and read back into Christianity as a Divine revelation the later creeds and rites and orders of the Church. It was inevitable that the Christian religion in the course of its history should clothe itself in outward forms, but it is not to be identified with the forms it has assumed. In dealing with the subject, we are limited, of course, by the plan of this work, to the Biblical material. But apart from that, the view taken in the present article is that, in seeking to discover Christianity in its essential nature, we must accept the NT as our authority and norm, inasmuch as there alone we find the historical record of the life and self-witness of Jesus Christ, and also the writings of that Apostolic group which moved in the immediate light of His manifestation as that was given not only in His life on earth, but in His death and resurrection and their extraordinary spiritual results.

(2) On the other hand, we must avoid the error of those who, when they insist on going 'back to Christ,' and demand the substitution of the Christ of history for the Christ of dogma, assume that nothing that is supernatural can be historical, and that the Christ whom we find in the NT—the Christ of the Incarnation and the Resurrection and the Atonement, the Christ who wrought miracles and claimed to be the Son of God, and was so accepted by those who had known Him in the flesh and subsequently knew Him in the Spirit—is not the Jesus of history at all. To this it can only be said here that the reality of alleged supernatural facts, like the reality of any other alleged facts, depends upon the evidence, and is not to be ruled out by any presuppositions. Further, that while from the nature of the case there is a difference between the teaching of Jesus during His earthly ministry and the teaching of the Apostles regarding the risen Christ, the evidence of our Lord's own consciousness and history, even as we find it in the Synoptic Gospels, points to the correctness of the Apostolic conclusions about Him. We therefore hold that whatever Christianity is, it is not what certain modern writers describe as 'the religion of Jesus,' but something very different; and that as it is not to be confounded with churchly dogmas and institutions, it is just as little to be identified with an ethical theism based on the beauty of Christ's character and the pure precepts of His Sermon on the Mount. The men who were first called Christians (Ac 11²⁶) had never seen Jesus or listened to His teaching, and the gospel that laid its grasp upon them and won for them this distinctive name was neither a bare repetition of the Master's teaching nor a mere exhibition of His perfect life. On the contrary, it was such a gospel as meets us in the Epistles of St. Paul and the sermons reported in Acts—the gospel of One who not only lived a spotless life and spake as never man spake, but died for our sins and was raised again for our justification, and was thereby declared to be the Son of God with power. It is in accordance, therefore, with the original application of the name 'Christian' that in seeking for the meaning of the word 'Christianity' we should make full use of the Apostolic testimony regarding Christ.

1. As a religion appearing in history, Christianity had its historical relations and its historical roots. (a) It was related to all the old ethnic faiths, and to every religious experience of vision and longing, of striving and despair, that the soul of man had ever known. The modern study of Comparative Religion is enabling us to realize this as it has never been realized before; but the NT makes the general truth perfectly plain. God speaks to man in the visible world (Ro 1²⁰). He writes His law on the natural heart (2¹⁵). He never leaves Himself without witness (Ac 14¹⁷). And on their part men grope through the darkness after God (Ac 17²⁷), being dimly conscious of the truth that they are also His offspring (v. 28). And so when Christ comes, He comes not only as the Light of the world (Jn 8¹²), but as the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into it (1⁹)—a statement which implies that even apart from His historical manifestation in Judea, the heavenly Christ was the Light and Life of all men, and that there is a sense in which a soul may be 'naturally Christian' as Tertullian said.

(b) But while Christianity was and is related to all the ethnic faiths, it was deeply rooted in the soil of the OT. In the pagan religions we find many anticipations of Christianity, but in Judaism there is a definite and Divine preparation for it. Law and prophecy, priesthood and sacrifice all contributed directly to this result. St. Paul declares that 'the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ' (Gal 3²⁴). The Evangelists draw attention again and again to the fact, so evident to every discerning reader of Scripture, that the prophets were heralds of the Christ who was to come. The author of Hebrews shows us that the ministries of Tabernacle and Temple were examples and shadows of Christ's heavenly Priesthood. In the Fourth Gospel we find Jesus Himself affirming that 'salvation is of the Jews' (Jn 4²²); and in that very sermon in which He sets forth the manifesto of His own Kingdom, He proclaims that He came to fulfil and not to destroy the Law and the Prophets of Israel (Mt 5¹⁷).

2. But notwithstanding its historical connexions with the past, Christianity was a religion absolutely new. The pagan faiths, so far from explaining its origin, serve rather to reveal the world's great need of it. St. Paul seized on this truth when he saw in the altar at Athens inscribed 'To an Unknown God,' an unconscious appeal to the Christian missionary to declare the God and Father of Jesus Christ (Ac 17²³). And even Judaism no more accounts for Christianity than the soil accounts for the mighty tree which springs out of it. While carefully relating Himself to Judaism, Jesus no less carefully discriminated between the permanent and the passing in its institutions. He claimed the right not only to give a fresh reading of its ancient laws (Mt 5²¹, 27¹⁸), but even to abrogate certain laws altogether (vv. 32¹, 33¹, 43¹). He set Himself not merely above 'them of old time' (Mt 5 passim), but above Moses (19⁷, 22⁴), Jn 6³² and Solomon (Mt 12⁴¹), Abraham (Jn 8⁵⁶) and David (Mt 22⁴¹). It was this freedom of Jesus in dealing with the old religion that astonished His hearers: 'He taught them as having authority, and not as their scribes' (7²⁹). Moreover, His attitude of independence towards Judaism is illustrated by the opposition of the Jewish leaders to Himself. His condemnation and crucifixion is the standing proof that He and His religion did not grow out of Judaism by any process of natural evolution. St. Paul sets the immense difference between the two faiths in the clearest light by his contrast, so fully worked out in Rom. and Gal., between the Law of Moses and the grace of Christ. And very soon in the history of the early Church there came that inevitable crisis which decided that though Judaism had been the cradle of Christianity, it was not to be its nursing-mother (cf. Fairbairn, Christ in Modern Theology, p. 52); that Christianity was not a mere spiritualized Judaism, but a new and universal religion recognizing no distinction between Jew and Greek, circumcision and uncircumcision, and seeing in Christ Himself the 'all in all.'

3. When, with the NT as our guide, we seek for the essential features of objective Christianity, the following characteristics present themselves:—

(a) It is a revelation of God through the life and in the Person of Jesus Christ. Upon this the vast majority of those who call themselves Christians are practically agreed. 'God was in Christ' (2 Co 5¹); and in the human face of Jesus there so shone the brightness of the Eternal Glory (4⁶) that he that hath seen Him hath seen the Father (Jn 14⁹). In His teaching Jesus revealed God to us as our Father in heaven; in His own tenderness and pity and boundless love for men He showed us what the heavenly Fatherhood really means. And so, as we read the Gospels, the assurance grows that in looking on the face of Jesus Christ we are seeing right into the heart of the invisible God.

There are those, however, who, while fully admitting all this, yet hesitate to recognize in the historical Jesus a personal revelation of the Divine nature in human form. For them Jesus as the Revealer has the worth of God without being Himself God. But this is not the Christ who is presented to us in the NT; and if we fall short of the NT view of Christ, our Christianity will not be the Christianity of the NT. If, on the other hand, we take the Gospels and Epistles as our authorities, we must hold upon their evidence not only that 'God was in Christ,' but that He so dwelt in Christ that Christ Himself was God; and that historical Christianity is nothing less than an immediate revelation of the Divine nature through the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ.

(b) Christianity is the religion not only of the revelation of God but of the redemption of man. The paganism that reared altars to an unknown God proved impotent to redeem human life from the dominion of evil (see Ro 1st), while the visions of the Divine that came to true Israelites only made them more deeply conscious of their sin and need (cf. Is 6th). The purpose of Jesus is announced in His very name; He came 'to save his people from their sins' (Mt 1st). His own testimony runs: 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19th). St. Paul sets Christ before us as the Divine Reconciler and Redeemer. God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5th, cf. Ro 5th); He sent forth His Son that we might have redemption through His blood, and might receive the adoption of sons (Gal 4th, Eph 1st). And it is the witness of the whole NT that Christ accomplished His work of seeking and saving, of reconciling and redeeming, by taking our sins upon Him, by suffering with men and for them, by dying at last on the cross the Just for the unjust, by rising from the dead and sitting down at God's right hand to dispense those spiritual gifts and powers whereby we are enabled to overcome the world.

(c) It follows from what has just been said that Christianity is the religion of perfected character. Whatever may be the case with other faiths, Christianity permits of no divorce between religion and morality. It is not from the pains of sin merely that Jesus comes to redeem us, but from sin itself. In keeping with this He sets up an ideal standard of personal attainment:—'Ye shall be perfect,' He says, 'as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5th). Unlike the religions of the pagan world, Judaism was based upon a moral law of wonderful purity and breadth. But the law which Jesus gave and which His Apostles enforced is broader and loftier beyond comparison—a law for heart and mind as well as for the outward life, forbidding unreasonable anger equally with murder (v. 21st), and unholy desire no less than adultery (v. 27th). Moreover, Christ not only enjoined this heavenly standard of character, but exemplified it personally. It is not a theoretical ideal that He sets before us, but one that has been realized in a human life. The ethics of Jesus are the ethics of His own example; 'the mind of Christ' is the Christian's indwelling law (Ph 2nd).

(d) Christianity is the religion of a regenerated society. It has the promise not of personal perfection only, but of the establishment of a Society pure, blessed, and world-wide. 'The kingdom' was the characteristic word of Jesus in proclaiming His message; and so both Mt. and Mk. describe His gospel as 'the gospel of the kingdom' (Mt 4th 9th, Mk 1st). And as the rule of a Divine King is the first implication of the word, the second is the harmonious relation of the subjects of the Kingdom to one another. Love is the rule of the Kingdom (Mt 5th 44th, Jn 13th 15th 17th); and love from its very nature is the fulfilling of all social law (Ro 13th 10th, Gal 5th). The Church which Christ established is the organization of this social Kingdom for moral and religious ends (Mt 16th 18th). And when Christ's people shall have been joined together in a perfect harmony of brotherly love and mutual co-operation, even as they are severally joined to Him who is their Head (Ro 12th, 1 Co 12th, Eph 1st 4th 5th), there will come the realization of that perfect Society which is variously shadowed forth in the NT under the figures of a Kingdom from which there have been cast forth all things that cause stumbling (Mt 18th), a glorious Church without spot or wrinkle or any such thing (Eph 5th), a Holy City, the New Jerusalem, 'descending out of heaven from God' (Rev 21st).

II. Christianity as a Personal Experience.—Christianity is not only a revelation in history, but a reality of personal life. Without Christians there would be no Christianity. What is it then that constitutes men Christians, and so translates the historical fact of the revelation of Jesus Christ into the religion which has lived through the centuries and surrounds us to-day?

1. Here faith is the fundamental thing. Just as Christianity, regarded as a historical revelation, may all be summed up in the fact of Christ, so, when it is considered as a personal reality, it may all be included in the faith that lays hold of and appropriates Christ. The whole effort of Jesus during His earthly ministry was directed to this end—to secure faith in Himself. And when His death and resurrection and the experiences of Pentecost had revealed Him to His followers in His fuller glory, faith in Christ crucified and risen became the first demand of the Christian preacher (Ac 2nd 3rd, 8th 11th 13th etc.). So much was this the case, that before the disciples were called 'Christians' they were called 'believers' (Ac 5th 10th 18th, 1 Ti 4th), while others were distinguished from them as unbelievers (Ac 14th, 1 Co 6th and passim). And as Christ had shown Himself to be, not the revealer of the Father only, but the bringer of redemption to sinful men, faith in Him came to mean specifically trust in Him as One who was able to meet the sinner's greatest need—the need of redemption from sin. So St. Peter called upon the Jews in Jerusalem to repent and be baptized 'in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of sins' (Ac 2nd). So St. Paul in like manner, when the Philippian jailor cried out in the night, 'What must I do to be saved?' replied, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved' (Ac 16th 31st)—words which contain in brief the essence of the Apostolic testimony as to the way of salvation. And when we would learn from the NT how the Christianity of those who have trusted in Christ is to live and increase and be perfected, we find that it is faith again, still clinging to Christ, that is the vital principle of the life which faith has begun. Through faith Christ dwells in our hearts (Eph 3rd). This is the secret of that abiding in Christ which secures His abiding in us (Jn 15th), and results in the fruitfulness that makes us worthy to be called His disciples (v. 8).

2. The next principle of the Christian life is obedience. Between faith and obedience there is no opposition any more than between the roots of a tree and its fruits and flowers. And yet, in the one case as in the other, the secret spring of life and its outward manifestations may be distinguished and separately considered. The root of Christianity, as we have seen, is the religious principle of faith; but from that root there grows an ethical practice bringing life into conformity with all Divine laws. The actual conduct of professedly Christian people has always served as the world's rough test of Christianity. As applied by the world, it is a rude, imperfect test; for the obedience wrought by faith is a product far too fine and subtle to be fully judged by 'the world's coarse thumb and finger.' The law by which a Christian walks is a law that it needs a Christian mind to appreciate. But though often roughly applied, the test of obedience to God is an unfailing gauge of what claims to be Christianity. It was Christ Himself who said, 'Therefore by their fruits ye shall know them. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 7th 21st).

3. The third great principle is love. For Christianity is social as well as ethical and religious. It is a Divine Kingdom whose subjects stand in a definite relation not only to their King but to all their fellows. Now love is the proper attitude of every Christian to all those of whatsoever name for whom Christ died; and love binds men together as they are bound by nothing else. Even worldly kingdoms are beginning to learn, through the gradual infiltration of Christian ideas into the general mind, that neither force nor mutual self-

Interest is the true bond of society, but the brotherhood of love. How to produce and secure such brotherhood remains the difficulty for the statesmen of the world. But Jesus, who first gave clear utterance to this great social law, also furnished the sufficient motive for giving effect to it within His own Kingdom. His love to them inspires His disciples to love one another (Jn 13³⁴ 15¹²), and also to love all men after the example of the Divine 'philanthropy' (Mt 5⁴⁴; cf. Tit 3¹, Ro 5⁸). And so the faith in Christ which in the ethical sphere blossoms into obedience to God, fills the social sphere with the bloom and fragrance of a universal love to man. Thus once more we are brought back to Him who is at once the object of Christian faith and its 'leader and perfecter' (He 12²). And whether we think of Christianity as revealed or realized, as a historical manifestation of the Divine or a present human experience, we may justly say that it is all comprehended in Jesus Christ Himself.

CHRISTOLOGY.—See PERSON OF CHRIST.

CHRONICLES, I. AND II.—1. Position in Canon.—It is quite clear from linguistic and other considerations that Chron.-Ezr.-Neh. originally formed one book. As the first part of this large work dealt with a period which was already covered by Samuel and Kings, it was omitted, to begin with, in the formation of the Canon; while the latter part of the book, dealing with the ecclesiastical life of Jerusalem after the Exile, was granted a place. Only as the liturgical and ritual interest became more and more strong was it seen that Chron. contained matter of special importance from that point of view. Hence the book was included in the Canon after Ezr. and Neh., which had originally formed its second and concluding portion. In the English Bible, which follows the LXX, the original order has been restored, but Chron. is the last book in the Hebrew canon. Its Hebrew name is Dibhre Hayyim, i.e. 'the Annals.' The LXX entitled it the Paralipomena, or 'things left out,' a reference to the fact that Chron. contains much not found in the earlier narratives of Samuel and Kings. Our word 'Chronicles' is the Anglicized form of Chronicon, the name given to the book by Jerome in translating Dibhre Hayyim.

2. Aim.—The key to the understanding and estimation of Chron. lies in a clear grasp of its aim. It is not history, as we understand the term, but history rewritten from a late standpoint, with the intention of carrying back into a remote past the origin of customs which the writer considered to be vital for true faith. He is concerned with the history of Judah, and that history interests him only in so far as it has special reference to the worship and institutions of the second Temple. This determines his choice of matter, and the treatment of such facts as he selects. The Northern Kingdom, politically so much more important than the kingdom of Judah, hardly comes within his range of view, and is referred to only when the narrative absolutely necessitates it.

3. Contents.—With this clue the contents of the book are easily grouped.

(i) 1 Ch 1-9, Adam to the death of Saul. These chapters are filled mainly with genealogical tables, but even in these the ecclesiastical interest is supreme. Judah and Levi have the greatest space given to them (21-43 6).

(ii) 1 Ch 10-29, from the death of Saul to the accession of Solomon.

(iii) 2 Ch 1-9, the reign of Solomon.

(iv) 2 Ch 10-36, from the division of the kingdom down to the fall of Jerusalem, and the restoration edict of Cyrus.

The material is most carefully chosen, with the object of bringing out the importance of Judah, the greatness of the line of David, the religious value of Jerusalem, and the position of the Levites. A comparison of the narrative in Chron. with the earlier narratives of Samuel and Kings will do more than anything else to convince the reader of the pragmatism of the Chronicler.

(a) Omissions in Chronicles.—The whole career of Samuel; the reign of Saul, except its close; the struggle David had to establish himself on the throne; the story of Uriah and Bathsheba; the story of Amnon and Tamar; Absalom's rebellion and David's flight; the characteristically Oriental intrigues attending Solomon's accession; his alliances with foreign women and his idolatries in later life; his struggle against disaffection and rebellion; practically the entire history of the Northern Kingdom;—all these sections are omitted, with the view of suppressing what might be held to be discreditable to the religious heroes.

(b) The additions to the narrative show how the Chronicler's thoughts ran. He gives, as we should have expected, full statistical lists (1 Ch 12); he describes at length matters that have to do with the gradual elevation of the sanctuary at Jerusalem (1 Ch 13, 15, 16); he details the ordering of the Temple ministry and the genealogies of its members (1 Ch 22-29). There is a large class of additions connected with ritual, and especially with musical matters, a fact which has led to the suggestion that the writer was perhaps one of the musicians (2 Ch 5¹² 13 71 3. 6 13¹² 17¹ 20¹⁰ 21). He so handles historical events as to make them bear out his particular theory of the working of Providence. To love God is to be blessed; to sin against God is immediately to feel the pressure of His hand; the religious meaning of particular events is pointed out to the wrong-doers by prophets of the Lord (1 Ch 10¹³ 14, 2 Ch 12¹ 13¹⁻²¹ 15¹⁻¹⁸ 16¹⁻¹² 20¹⁷ 21¹⁰ 16-19). In 2 Ch 8¹¹ the removal of the daughter of Pharaoh, whom Solomon had married, from the city of David to the house that he had built for her, is said to have been occasioned by the house of David having become too holy because of the coming of the ark. The compiler of Kings assigns no such reason for the removal to the new house (1 K 3¹ 7⁹ 9³⁴). It was a stumbling-block to the later writer that so bad a king as Manasseh should have enjoyed so long a reign, and so he is described as latterly a penitent, although Kings has no thought of any such change (cf. 2 Ch 33¹¹⁻¹⁹ with 2 K 21 and Jer 15⁴).

(c) Alterations have been made in the narrative with the view of removing what seemed offensive to the later age. Kings distinctly says that Asa and Jehoshaphat did not abolish the high places, although they did what was right in the sight of the Lord (1 K 15⁴ 22⁴). Such a conjunction of well-doing with idolatry is incredible to the Chronicler, so he says that the high places were abolished by these kings (2 Ch 14¹⁷). He finds it necessary to change several narratives in the interests of the Levites, who were not assigned so important a place in matters of ritual under the monarchy as in the days when he was writing (cf. 1 Ch 13, 15 with 2 S 6; 2 Ch 5¹ with 1 K 8⁹). According to the original account (2 K 11), Jehoiada was assisted in his rebellion against Athaliah by the foreign bodyguard. In 2 Ch 23 the bodyguard is replaced by the Levites. The rule of the second Temple did not allow aliens to approach so near to the sacred things.

Occasionally there is a misunderstanding of the older narrative. 1 K 22⁴ tells how Jehoshaphat built 'Tarshish-ships,' i.e. large sea-going vessels such as were used by the Phœnicians for their trade on the Mediterranean, for the South Arabian gold trade. The Chronicler thinks that 'Tarshish-ships' means 'ships to go to Tarshish' (2 Ch 20¹⁷).

4. Historicity.—It is thus evident that Chron. is not to be considered as history, in the sense in which we now use the word. The events of the time with which the writer deals have been treated in a particular religious interest. Some facts have been stated not simply as

They were in themselves, but as they appeared to one whose vision was influenced by his theological viewpoint. Other facts have been suppressed when they interfered with the conveying of the impression that David and Solomon were almost immaculate kings. To a past age were attributed the customs and ceremonial of the days in which the writer lived. The Priests' Code was supposed to have been recognized and observed by David even before the Temple was built. Again and again an anachronism has been committed that the Levites might have the place of honour in the record. Some special features of this method of writing history are:

(a) Exaggerated numbers.—Every one has felt difficulty with regard to these numbers. Palestine to-day is by no means thinly populated, but the total number of its inhabitants is only about 600,000. At its greatest prosperity the number may have reached 2½ millions. But we read (2 Ch 13¹⁷) that Abijah with 400,000 men fought against Jeroboam with 800,000, and killed 500,000 of them. Asa (2 Ch 14⁹) takes the field against Zerah the Ethiopian, who has 1,000,000 men, with 300,000 men of Judah, and 280,000 of Benjamin, the smallest of the tribes, which had previously been practically wiped out by the slaying of 25,000 men (Jg 20⁶). When the numbers can be checked by the parallel passages in the older narrative, the tendency of the Chronicler to exaggerate is manifest. 1 Ch 18¹ 19¹⁸ make David capture 7000 horsemen and slay 7000 chariotmen, while 2 S 8¹ 10¹⁸ give 700 of each. According to 1 Ch 21²⁴, David pays 600 shekels of gold for Ornan's threshing-floor, while according to 2 S 24²⁴ he gives only 50 shekels of silver. David gathers together for the building of the Temple, according to 1 Ch 22¹⁴, 100,000 talents of gold and 1,000,000 talents of silver; but, according to 1 K 10¹⁴, the whole revenue in gold of the kingdom, in the much richer days of Solomon, was only 666 talents of gold.

(b) Anachronisms creep in to show that the writer was carrying back to that earlier day the customs and names of his own time. 1 Ch 26¹⁸ states that one of the gates of the Temple—the first Temple—was called Parbar. There is here the double mistake of supposing that the Temple existed in David's time, and that one of the gates of the first Temple had a Persian name. 1 Ch 29⁷ speaks of the coin 'daric' or 'dram' as being current in the time of David. This coin was Persian, and was current in Palestine only after the Captivity.

(c) The speeches put into the mouths of the personages have not been taken from any ancient document, but bear on every line the characteristics of the very peculiar Hebrew style of the Chronicler.

5. Date.—1 Ch 3¹⁷⁻²⁴ appears to give six generations of the descendants of Zerubbabel, and would thus bring the book down to about B.C. 350. The precise rendering of the passage is, however, a little uncertain. Evidence as to date is clearer from Neh., which, as we have seen, was originally part of Chronicles. Neh 12¹ speaks of Jaddua, who was, as we know from Josephus, a contemporary of Alexander the Great (B.C. 333). Neh 12²² mentions the reign of Darius the Persian, i.e. Darius III., who reigned B.C. 336-332. Chron. must therefore be dated about B.C. 300.

6. Sources.—Chron. contains several additions to the narrative of Samuel and Kings—additions that have not been inserted because of any special ecclesiastical interest (2 Ch 11¹³⁻¹⁷, 23 14⁹⁻¹⁵ 20, 25⁶⁻¹⁰, 33 26¹⁻¹⁵ 28¹⁻¹⁵). Does the Chronicler then preserve any fresh and original tradition, or does he merely work up older material? Apart from Samuel and Kings, his main authority was a work cited under a variety of different titles, 'the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah' (2 Ch 27⁷ 35⁷ 36³), 'the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel' (2 Ch 16¹ 25²⁸ 28²). This book must have contained genealogical tables (1 Ch 9¹), as well as other particulars not mentioned in any book that has come down to us (2 Ch 27⁷ 33¹⁴). Another source is the

'Midrash of the Book of Kings' (2 Ch 24²⁷). A midrash was an exposition of the religious lessons that could be drawn from a historical work; Chron. itself is an excellent instance of a midrash, and this earlier midrash may have been the writer's model. He frequently refers to writings quoted under the name of prophets: 1 Ch 29²⁹ (Samuel, Nathan, and Gad), 2 Ch 9²⁹ (Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo), 12¹⁵ (Shemaiah and Iddo), 13²² (Iddo), 26²² (Isaiah). As he never cites at the same time the 'Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah,' it is probable that these passages, connected with the various prophets, were only excerpts from that book. From the extracts that Chron. preserves of this book it is probable that it was post-exilic, unless indeed the Chronicler in using it has thoroughly transformed its style and diction into his own.

Chron., then, so far from being a fresh source for the period of which it treats, is a midrash of Jewish order. The history is treated in a particular religious interest, the customs and ritual of the later age are carried back into the earlier. The book is evidence not of the condition of things under the monarchy, but of the religious belief and ceremonial observances of a time when national life had ceased, and when the people's interest was confined to the worship of the Temple.

R. BRUCE TAYLOR.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The importance of a fixed era by which to date events was not discovered by the Hebrews until after their national existence came to an end. All the endeavours to fix such an era which we find in our OT—like the dating of the building of Solomon's Temple 480 years from the Exodus (1 K 6¹)—belong to the post-exilic period. During the existence of the monarchy all that was thought necessary was to date by the years of the reigning king. If we had a complete series of public documents for all the reigns, this would answer very well for historical purposes. But what has actually come down to us is at best only a fragmentary series of notices based in part on official records.

Numerical statements there are in plenty in the Bible, and among them all those in the Books of Kings most deserve attention as the basis for a scientific chronology. At first sight their accuracy seems to be guaranteed, because they check each other for the time covered by the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Not only does the author give us the length of the reigns in the two lines, but he has taken pains to work out a series of synchronisms, that is, he dates the accession of each king by the regnal year of his contemporary monarch in the other kingdom. But comparison of these figures with each other shows that they cannot all be accurate. For example, we learn that Jehoshaphat of Judah came to the throne in the fourth year of Ahab of Israel; also that Ahab reigned 22 years. Yet we are told that Ahaziah, who followed Ahab after his death, came to the throne in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat, and in addition that Ahaziah's brother Jehoram, who could be crowned only after the two years' reign assigned to the latter, succeeded in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22¹, 2, 2 K 3¹).

This example makes us give up the synchronisms and turn our attention to the length of reigns, where we have reason to suppose that the figures are drawn from earlier documents. The history gives a convenient point of division at the accession of Jehu in Israel and of Athaliah in Judah, for these two came to the throne in the same year. The two series of lengths of reigns ought to give the same sum for the period. But they do not. In one line we find 95 years and in the other 98.

It is possible that the discrepancy here is due to the mode of reckoning. The reigns are given as so many years without regard to fractions, yet it will be manifest that few if any reigns are an exact number of years with no months or days. Where the method of dating by regnal years is in vogue, the fractions may be treated in two ways. If a king dies in the tenth year of his reign, for example, the calendar year may continue to be called his tenth; and the next calendar year will be the first of his successor. But it will also be possible to begin at once to date by the first year of the new king, making the next calendar year his second. In this latter case the public records will show more years (judging by the dates) than there actually are, by one in each reign. According to this method, the number of years from Rehoboam to Athaliah would be 90, which cannot be far from correct. The next period, however,—from Athaliah to Hezekiah, and from Jehu to the fall of Samaria,—gives us greater difficulty. Here we find the sum of years in one line to be greater than in the other by more than twenty. The various hypotheses which have been advanced to overcome this discrepancy do not concern us in the present article. All that we need to note is that the figures of the Hebrew text do not give us a safe basis for a chronology.

If this is true in what we have reason to suppose is the most reliable of the OT dates, the case is even worse when we examine the earlier period of the history. No doubt the authors of the Pentateuchal narratives thought themselves able to give the length of time which had elapsed from the creation of the world. There is no other way to interpret their language. In the genealogy of the sons of Adam, for example (Gn 5), we read how Adam was 130 years old when he begat Seth, Seth 105 years old when he begat Enosh, and so on down to the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in which the Flood came. The summing up of the figures gives us 1656 years from the Creation to the Flood.

The unhistorical character of the numbers in this table is now generally conceded. The conclusions of natural science concerning the duration of man upon the earth are enough to invalidate the calculation. But this gives additional interest to the inquiry as to what the authors had in mind. It has been pointed out that if to the sum we have just obtained we add the years from the Flood to the Exodus of Israel from Egypt, we get 2666, that is, two-thirds of 4000. Now the interest that the writer had in this calculation was probably due to the theory which he had formed or which had come down to him by tradition, that the length of time from the Creation to the coming of the Messiah would be 4000 years.

Four thousand is 100 generations of 40 years each. Any one who is familiar with the OT figures will recall how common it is to find 40 years as a round number. The 40 years of the wilderness wandering, 40 years of peace in the time of several of the Judges, 40 years each for David and Solomon, are sufficiently marked. Then we recall the 480 years from the Exodus to the building of the Temple—12 generations of 40 years each. It is probable also that a similar term was counted from the building of the Temple to its rebuilding under Darius or to the end of the Exile, while it is not without significance that the duration of the Northern Kingdom was calculated to be 240 years.

All this shows that these late Biblical writers were dominated by a theory. It must be noticed also that more than one theory had an influence. The Greek translators, working in the second century before Christ, had a Hebrew text which differed considerably from ours in this matter of numbers. They reckoned nearly 600 years more from the Creation to the Flood than the sum in our Bible, while from the Flood to the Call of Abraham they make nearly 800 more. The copy of the Pentateuch which circulated among the Samaritans has a still different system. The question which of these systems is the earliest is still unsettled. It may be said to have only an academic interest, since we know that no one of them gives us authentic data for the antiquity of the world.

Fortunately our appreciation of the Bible does not depend upon the accuracy of its dates. In general the picture it gives of the sequence of events from the time of the Judges down to the Fall of Jerusalem is correct. Of late years we have received welcome light on the dates of certain Biblical events from the Assyrian and Babylonian inscriptions. These empires had made great advances in astronomy, and consequently in the regulation of the calendar. While they did not date from a fixed era, they had a reckoning of time which secured accuracy for their historical records. Each calendar year was named for an official whom we call an eponym, and records were kept showing the series of eponyms with brief notes of the events in each one's year. These lists have come down to us in fragmentary form, but we are able by them to correct some of the dates of our Hebrew history. The accuracy of the Babylonian system has been tested by its records of eclipses as far back as the year B.C. 763.

More than a hundred systems of Biblical Chronology have been invented or reckoned out—another testimony to the uncertain nature of the Biblical data. The received system, which has found a place in the margin of our reference Bibles, is well known to be that of the learned Archbishop Ussher. By the Babylonian canon we are now able to correct its figures. These are for the early period too high. Thus for David, Ussher gives us the date 1056. But reckoning back from the earliest Assyrian allusion to Israel, this should be about 1010. The amount of error is less as we come down to later times, and disappears at the Fall of Samaria. From David down to the capture of Babylon by Cyrus, therefore, we are able to give approximately correct dates for our history. Before the time of David there must be some uncertainty, which up to the present time has not been much mitigated by the Egyptian inscriptions. From the time of the rebuilding of the Temple under Darius we are also in uncertainty, though this period does not bulk largely in the received OT.

H. P. SMITH.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—

In this article it is proposed first to examine the books of the NT, so as to determine as far as possible their relative chronology,—that is, the length of time between the principal events narrated; and then to investigate the points of contact between the NT and secular history, and thus to arrive at the probable dates of the incidents in the former. It must, however, be remembered that the Gospels and Acts are not biographies or histories in the modern sense of the terms. The writers had a religious object; they wished to teach contemporary Christians to believe (Jn 20³¹), and were not careful to chronicle dates for the benefit of posterity. Sir W. Ramsay points out (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 18) that a want of the chronological sense was a fault of the age, and that Tacitus in his Agricola is no better (until the last paragraph) than the sacred writers. It must also be noted that reckoning in old times was inclusive. Thus 'three years after' (Gal 1¹⁸) means 'in the third year after' (cf. Ac 19^{8, 10} with 20³¹); 'three days and three nights' (Mt 12⁴⁰) means 'from to-day to the day after to-morrow' (Mt 17²³). Cf. also Gn 42¹⁷.

I. RELATIVE CHRONOLOGY.—1. Interval between our Lord's birth and baptism.—This is determined by Lk 3² to have been about 30 years, but the exact interval is uncertain. The RV translates: 'Jesus himself, when he began (lit. beginning) [to teach (cf. Mk 4¹)], was about thirty years of age,' and so most moderns, though the word 'beginning,' standing by itself, is awkward; it perhaps denotes the real commencement of the Gospel, the chapters on the Birth and Childhood being introductory (Plummer). The difficulty of the phrase was early felt, for the Old Syriac and the Peshitta Syriac omit the participle altogether, and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21) has merely 'Jesus was coming to his baptism, being about,' etc. The AV, following Irenaeus and also the Valentiniens whom he was opposing, renders: 'began to be about 30 years of age,' which can mean only that Jesus was 29 years old. Irenæus (Hæc. ii. xxii. 4 f.) says that Jesus was baptized 'being 30 years old,' having 'not yet completed his 30th year.' He 'then possessing the full age of a teacher.' The translation of AV is judged to be grammatically impossible, though it is odd that the Greek-speaking Irenæus did not discover the fact, unless we are to suppose that his Latin translator misrepresents him. Let us, then, take the RV translation; but what is the meaning of 'about 30 years'? Turner (art. 'Chronology of NT' in Hastings' DB—the most complete modern work on the subject in English) and Plummer (St. Luke, in loc.) think that any age from 28 to 32 would suit; but Ramsay, who remarks that St. Luke's authority for his early chapters was clearly a very good one, and that he could not have been ignorant of the real age, thinks that the phrase must mean 30 plus or minus a few months. There seems to be some doubt as to the age when a Levite began his ministry at this time, as the age had varied; but we may follow Irenæus in thinking that 30 was the full age when a public teacher began his work. On this point, then, internal evidence by itself leaves us a latitude of some little time, whether of a few months or even of a few years.

2. Duration of the ministry.—Very divergent views have been held on this subject. (a) Clement of Alexandria (loc. cit.), and other 2nd and 3rd cent. Fathers, the Clementine Homilies (xvii. 19, 'a whole year'), and the Valentinians (quoted by Irenæus, ii. xxii. 1), applying 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (Is 61; cf. Lk 4^{18f.}) literally to the ministry, made it last for one year only. The Valentinians believed that Jesus was baptized at the beginning, and died at the end, of His 30th year. A one-year ministry has also been advocated by von Soden (EBI, art. 'Chronology') and by Hort (see below). The latter excises 'the passover' from Jn 6⁴. This view is said to be that of the Synoptists, who, however, give hardly any indications of the passing of time. (b) The other extreme is found in Irenæus (loc. cit.), who held, as against the Valentinians, that the ministry lasted for more than ten years. He takes the feast of Jn 6⁴ to be a Passover, but does not mention that of Jn 6⁴. He considers, however, that the Passovers mentioned in Jn. are not exclusive; that Jesus was a little less than 30 years old at His baptism, and over 40 when He died. This appears (he says) from Jn 8⁴⁴, which indicates one who had passed the age of 40; and moreover, Jesus, who came to save all ages, must have 'passed through every age,' and in the decade from 40 to 50 'a man begins to decline towards old age.' He declares that this tradition came from 'John the disciple of the Lord' through 'those who were conversant in Asia with' him—i.e. probably Papias; and that the same account had been received from other disciples. But here Irenæus almost certainly makes a blunder. For a 3rd cent. tradition that Jesus was born A.D. 9, was baptized A.D. 46, and died A.D. 58 at the age of 49, see Chapman in JThSt viii. 590 (July, 1907). (c) Eusebius (HE i. 10), followed as to his results provisionally by Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, p. 212f.), makes the ministry last over three years ('not quite four full years'), and this till lately was the common view. Melito (c. A.D. 160) speaks of Jesus working miracles for three years after His baptism (Ante-Nic. Chr. Lib. xxii. p. 135). (d) Origen and others, followed by Turner (op. cit. p. 409 f.), Sanday (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB, p. 610 ff.), and Hitchcock (art. 'Dates' in Hastings' DOG, p. 415 f.), allow a little more than two years for the ministry ('Judas did not remain so much as three years with Jesus,' c. Cels. ii. 12).

Indications of a ministry of more than a single year are found in the Synoptics; e.g. Mk 2²³ (harvest) 6³⁹ (spring; 'green grass'), for the length of the journeys of 6³⁴–10³⁴ shows that the spring of 6³⁹ could not be that of the Crucifixion. Thus Mk. implies at least a two years' ministry. In Lk. also we see traces of three periods in the ministry: (1) 3²¹–4³⁰, preaching in the wilderness of Judæa and in Nazareth and Galilee, briefly recorded; (2) 4³¹–9⁵⁰, preaching in Galilee and the North, related at length; (3) 9⁵¹–end, preaching in Central Palestine as far as Jerusalem. Ramsay (op. cit. p. 212) takes each of these periods as corresponding roughly to one year. In Jn. we have several indications of time: 2¹³, 2²³ (Passover), 4³⁴ (four months before harvest; harvest near), 5¹ ('a feast' or 'the feast'), 6⁴ (Passover, but see below), 7² (Tabernacles, autumn), 10²² (Dedication, winter). In two cases (5¹ 6⁴) there is a question of text; in 5¹ the reading 'a feast' is somewhat better attested, and is preferable on internal grounds, for 'the feast' might mean either Passover or Tabernacles, and since there would be this doubt, the phrase 'the feast' is an unlikely one. If so, we cannot use 5¹ as an indication of time, as any minor feast would suit it. In 6⁴ Hort excises 'the passover' (Westcott-Hort, NT in Greek, App. p. 77 ff.). But this is against all MSS and VSS, and rests only on the omission by Irenæus (who, however, merely enumerates the Passovers when Jesus went up to Jerusalem; yet the mention of 6⁴ would have added to his argument), and probably on Origen (for him and for others adduced, see Turner op. cit. p. 408); on internal grounds the omission is very improbable, and does not in reality reconcile Jn. and the Synoptics, for the latter when closely examined do, as we have seen, imply more than a single year's ministry. The note of time in Jn 4³⁴ seems to point to (say) January ('there are yet four months and then cometh the harvest'), while the spiritual harvest was already ripe ('the fields . . . are white already unto harvest'), though Origen and others less probably take the former clause to refer to the spiritual, the latter to the material, harvest, which lasted from 15th April to 31st May (see Westcott, Com. in loc.). We may probably conclude then that in the ministry, as related in Jn., there were not fewer than three Passovers, and that it therefore lasted (at least) rather more than two years. But did the Fourth Evangelist mention all the Passovers of the ministry? Irenæus thought that he mentioned only some of them; and though his chronology is clearly wrong, and based (as was that of his opponents) on a fanciful exegesis, Lightfoot (Sup. Rel. p. 131) and Westcott (Com. p. lxxxi.) are inclined to think that in this respect he may to a very limited extent be right. Turner, on the other hand, considers that the enumeration in Jn. is exclusive, and that the notes of time there are intended to correct a false chronology deduced from the Synoptics. On the whole we can only say that the choice apparently lies between a ministry of rather over two years, and one of rather over three years; and that the probability of the former appears to be slightly the greater.

3. Interval between the Ascension and the conversion of St. Paul.—We have no certain internal evidence as to the length of this interval. Ac 2⁴¹ may imply a long or a short time. We have to include in this period the spread of the Church among the Hellenists, the election of the Seven, and the death of Stephen, followed closely by St. Paul's conversion. For this period Ramsay allows 2½ to 4 years, Harnack less than one year; but these conclusions come rather from external chronology (see II.) than from internal considerations. It is quite probable that in the early chapters of Acts St. Luke had not the same exact authority that he had for St. Paul's travels, or even for his Gospel (see Lk 1^{1f.}).

4. St. Paul's missionary career.—The relative chronology of St. Paul's Christian life may be determined by a study of Acts combined with Gal 1¹ 2¹. Indications of time are found in Ac 11³⁰ 18¹⁸ 19¹⁰ 20⁶ 10. 21¹⁻⁴ 27 24¹¹ 11. 27 25¹ 27¹ 28¹ 11-14. 17. 30. With these data we may reconstruct the chronology; but there is room for uncertainty (1) as to whether the visit to Jerusalem in Gal 2¹ was that of Ac 11³⁰ or that of Ac 15¹, and whether the 'three years' and 'fourteen years' of Gal 1¹⁸ 2¹ are consecutive (so Lightfoot, Rackham), or concurrent (so Ramsay, Turner, Harnack); (2) as to the length of the First Missionary Journey; and (3) as to the later journeys after the Roman imprisonment. If the 'three years' and 'fourteen years' are consecutive, a total of about 16 years (see above) is required for the interval between the conversion and the visit of Gal 2¹. But as the interval at Tarsus is indeterminate, and the First Journey may have been anything from one to three years, all systems of relative chronology can be made to agree, except in small details, by shortening or lengthening these periods. For a discussion of some of the doubtful points named see art. GALATIANS [EP. TO THE], § 3, and for the details of the events see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 5 ff.

The following table, in which the year of St. Paul's conversion is taken as 1, gives the various events. Ramsay's calculation is taken as a basis, and the differences of opinion are noted in brackets [H = Harnack, T = Turner, R = Ramsay, L = Lightfoot].

1. 2. Conversion near Damascus, Ac 9² 22⁶ 26¹²; retirement to Arabia, Gal 1¹⁷; preaching in Damascus, Ac 9²⁰⁻²² (7), Gal 1¹⁷.
3. First visit to Jerusalem, Ac 9²⁶, Gal 1¹⁸, 'three years after' his conversion.
- 4-11. At Tarsus and in Syria-Cilicia, Ac 9³⁰, Gal 1²¹ [so HR, but T gives two years less, L three years less].
12. To Antioch with Barnabas, Ac 11²⁷.
13. Second visit to Jerusalem, with alms 11³⁰ [= Gal 2¹, R].
- 14-16. First Missionary Journey, to Cyprus, 13¹; Pamphylia, and Southern Galatia (Pisidian Antioch, 13¹⁴; Iconium, 13¹⁶; Lystra, 14¹; Derbe, 14²⁰), and back by Attalia to Antioch, 14²⁶ [so HR; TL give one year less].
17. Apostolic Council and third visit to Jerusalem, 15¹ [= Gal 2¹, TL; so Sanday and most commentators].
- 18-20. Second Missionary Journey, from Antioch through Syria-Cilicia to Derbe and Lystra, Ac 15¹ 16¹; through the Phrygio-Galatia region of the province Galatia to Troas, 16⁸⁻⁹; to Macedonia, 16¹¹; Athens, 17¹; and Corinth, 18¹, where 18 months are spent; thence by sea to Ephesus, 18¹⁹; Jerusalem (fourth visit), 18²²; and Antioch, where 'some time' is spent, 18²³.
- 21-24. Third Missionary Journey, from Antioch by the 'Galatia region' and the 'Phrygian region,' 18²³, to Ephesus, 19¹, where two years and three months are spent, 19¹⁰; by Troas 2 Co 2¹³, to Macedonia, Ac 20¹; and Corinth, 20² (see 2 Co 13¹), where three months are spent; thence back by Macedonia to Troas, Miletus, and Caesarea, 20¹⁶; 21¹; fifth visit to Jerusalem, 21¹⁷; and arrest, 21¹⁸; imprisonment at Caesarea, 23¹.
25. In Caesarea, 24¹.
26. Departure for Rome, autumn, 27¹; shipwreck off Malta, 28¹.
27. Arrival at Rome, 28¹.
28. (end) or 29 (early). Acquittal.
- 29-34. Later journeys and death [so R; L gives one year less, T two years less].

II. POINTS OF CONTACT WITH GENERAL HISTORY.—It will be useful to give the dates of the earlier emperors, and those of the procurators of Judaea. Some of the latter dates are approximate only; information as to them is derived from Josephus' Antiquities, and to some extent from his Jewish Wars (BJ).

ROMAN EMPERORS.

Augustus	[B.C. 31 (a)]-A.D. 14 (Aug. 19)
Tiberius	14-37 (Mar. 16)
Caligula (Gaius)	37-41 (Jan. 24)
Claudius	41-54 (Oct. 13)
Nero	54-68
Galba	68-69
Otho	69
Vitellius	69
Vespasian	69-79
Titus	79-81
Domitian	81-96

(a) i.e. the battle of Actium; Julius Caesar died B.C. 44, and Eusebius dates Augustus' reign from that year (HE i. 5, 9), as does also Irenaeus (Haer. iii. xxi. 3).

Gessius Florus (q)	65-66

(a) He had been king de jure since B.C. 40. (b) Josephus, Ant. xvii. xi. 4, xii. 2; he reigned over nine years. (c) ib. xviii. i. 1; he arrived with Quirinius at the time of the taxing, Ac 6¹⁷. (d) ib. ii. 2. (e) ib.; in his time 'the second emperor of the Romans [Augustus] died.' (f) ib.; sent by Tiberius; he ruled eleven years. (g) ib. and iv. 2; he ruled ten years and was deposed and sent to Rome, arriving there just after Tiberius' death; Turner makes his accession to office A.D. 27. (h) ib. iv. 2; sent temporarily by Vitellius, governor of Syria. (i) ib. vi. 10; sent by Caligula on his accession. (j) ib. and xix. v. 1; made king by Claudius on his accession, having been previously given the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias by Caligula. (k) ib. xix. ix. 2; sent by Claudius on Agrippa's death. (l) ib. xx. v. 2. (m) ib. (n) ib. vii. 1, viii. 9; brother of Pallas; sent by Claudius; in his time was the rebellion of one Theudas; recalled by Nero, see below, § 12. (o) ib. viii. 9 ff. (p) ib. ix. 1; sent by Nero on Festus' death; while he was on his way to Judaea, 'the brother of Jesus who was called Christ, whose name was James,' was stoned by the Jews. (q) ib. xi. 1; the last procurator; he was appointed through the influence of Poppaea; his bad government precipitated the Jewish War.—For the procurators see also BJ ii. viii. 1, ix. 4, x. 6, xii. 1 f. 8, xiii. 7, xiv. 1 f., etc.

1. Date of the nativity.—Early chronology is in such confusion that it is very difficult to assign exact dates to the various events, and the early Fathers give us little or no guidance. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21) says that our Lord was born 194 years 1 month 13 days before the death of Commodus [A.D. 192], in the 28th year of Augustus; but his dating of Commodus is wrong (see 4 below). The calculation of our Christian era, due to Dionysius Exiguus in the 6th cent., is obviously wrong by several years. Even the dating by the regnal years of emperors is open to considerable doubt, as it is not always certain from what epoch calculation is made; e.g. whether from the death of the predecessor, or from the association with the predecessor as colleague. For the birth of Christ indications have been found in the death of Herod, the Lukan census, and the Star of the Magi.

(a) Death of Herod.—This probably took place B.C. 4, possibly B.C. 3. His son Archelaus (Mt 2²²), who succeeded him in part of his dominions with the title of ethnarch, was deposed (Dion Cassius, lv. 27) in the consulship of Lepidus and Arruntius (A.D. 6), either in his ninth (so Josephus BJ ii. vii. 3) or in his tenth year (so Ant. xvii. xii. 2; and the Luke, § 4, speaks of his tenth year). This would give the above dates for Herod's death; for various considerations which make B.C. 4 the preferable date see Turner, op. cit. p. 404. We must then place our Lord's birth one or two years before at least, for Herod slew the male children of two years old and under (Mt 2¹⁶), and we have to allow for the sojourn in Egypt.

(b) The Lukan census (Lk 2²⁶) would suit the result just reached; see art. LUKE [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 7.

(c) The Magi. Kepler calculated the date of the Nativity from a conjunction of planets, which he believed the 'stars in the east' to be (Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, p. 215 ff.). But it is impossible to build chronological results on such an uncertain basis.

The date arrived at by Ramsay from these considerations is B.C. 6 (summer), by Turner, B.C. 6 (spring) or B.C. 7. We must remain in ignorance of the day and month. The calculations which give Dec. 25 and Jan. 6 are both based on a fanciful exposition and a wrong date for the Crucifixion; see the present writer's art. 'Calendar' in Hastings' DCG i. 261 f.

2. The Baptism of our Lord.—According to St. Luke (31), the Baptist began to preach in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, Pilate being procurator. Eusebius (HE i. 10) says that Christ was baptized in the fourth year of Pilate's governorship, and (HE i. 9) that Pilate was appointed 'about the twelfth year of the reign of Tiberius'; the latter statement is quoted from Josephus (Ant. xviii. ii. 2), but the former seems to be Eusebius' own deduction from St. Luke. But Pilate cannot have reached Palestine before A.D. 26 or 27, as his ten years ended shortly before Tiberius' death in A.D. 37, and no date later than A.D. 27 is possible for our Lord's baptism, if we take into account the date of the Nativity and St. Luke's statement of our Lord's age. It is probable, therefore, that Pilate's accession to office and John's appearance as a preacher both belong to the same year, say A.D. 26. Does this, however, suit St. Luke's phrase, 'the 15th year of the rule (or hegemony) of Tiberius,' for that is the exact phrase? The 15th year from the death of Augustus would be Aug. A.D. 28 to Aug. A.D. 29. Ramsay supposes (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, p. 202) that 'the rule of Tiberius' is dated from the grant by Augustus of a share in the government of the provinces just before he celebrated his triumph over the people of Pannonia and Dalmatia, Jan. 16, A.D. 12; and this would bring us to c. A.D. 25–26. This system of counting years is not found elsewhere, but it is quite a possible one. Turner inclines to the same supposition.

3. The rebuilding of the Temple.—In Jn 2nd, at a Passover not long after the Baptism, the Jews say that the Temple was 46 years in building, which, since the Temple was hardly completed at the outbreak of the War (Joseph. Ant. xx. ix. 7), can only mean that the rebuilding had begun 46 years before the Passover in question. But this rebuilding began in Herod's 18th year de facto (ib. xv. xi. 1; for the computation of BJ i. xxi. i., see Turner, p. 405); i.e. the Passover of B.C. 19 would be that of the first year of the rebuilding, and therefore the Passover of A.D. 27 that of the 46th year. This would agree with the result already reached.

4. Date of the Crucifixion.—The Fathers seem to have known nothing certainly as to the exact year of our Lord's death. Clement of Alexandria (loc. cit.), who believed in a one-year ministry, gives the 16th year of Tiberius, 42½ years before the Destruction of Jerusalem (this would be A.D. 28), which was 128 years 10 months 3 days before the death of Commodus (this would make the latter 7 years too late). A common tradition (Tertullian [?], adv. Jud. 8 [Patr. Lat. ii. 656]; Lactantius, Div. Inst. iv. 10, de Mort. Pers. 2 [Patr. Lat. vi. 474, vii. 194]) assigns the Crucifixion to the consulship of L. Rubellius Geminus and C. Fifixus (?) Geminus—Hippolytus (in Dan. iv.) and the Acts of Pilate give the names as Rufus and Rubellio,—i.e. A.D. 29, or possibly A.D. 28. The latest possible year is A.D. 33 (so Eusebius, HE i. 10), for Josephus (Ant. xviii. iv. 3, 6) relates that Caiaphas was deposed just before he tells us of the death of Herod Philip, which occurred in the 20th year of Tiberius, i.e. A.D. 33–34, reckoning from Augustus' death; Josephus' order has every appearance of being chronological.

Now, it is not certain on which day of the month Nisan the Friday of the Passion fell. We must put aside Westcott's suggestion that our Lord died on a Thursday, as contradicting entirely the Eastern idea of 'the third day' and 'after three days' (see above). But the Synoptics would suggest that our Lord ate the Passover with the disciples on 14th Nisan, and died on the 15th, while Jn. would lead us to suppose that He died on 14th Nisan at the time of the killing of the lambs. The determination of this difficult question will only affect the chronological investigation if in a possible year of the Passion only Nisan 15 or only Nisan 14 can positively be said to have fallen on a Friday. But there is some uncertainty in the reckoning of Nisan.

The Jewish months were lunar, and (in early times at least) the first day of the month was not that of the true new moon, but that on which it was first visible. This would be some 30 hours later than the true new moon. But it seems certain that the Jews at the time of the Gospel narrative had some sort of calendrical rules or some rough cycle to determine the first day of a lunar month; otherwise the Jews of the Dispersion would never have been sure of observing the Passover all on the same day, and the difference of a cloudy or of a bright sky on a particular day would introduce confusion. Thus we have to exercise great caution. A table of the true new moons, and of the days when the moon may be presumed to have been first visible, from A.D. 27 to 36 inclusive, is given by Dr. Salmon (Introd., lect. xv.). His result is that in A.D. 27, 30, 33, 34, one or other of the two days Nisan 14 and 15 might have fallen on a Friday. We may omit the first and last of these years, and we have left A.D. 30 and 33. But A.D. 29, which has the best traditional support, is also calendrically possible. Taking the equinox as March 21, Nisan 14 that year would be Sunday, April 18; the moon would have been first visible on Monday, April 4. But the equinox was not then, as now, accurately determined, and Turner (op. cit. p. 411 f.) gives an argument for believing that Nisan in A.D. 29 was really the month before that supposed by Salmon. In that case Nisan 14 would fall on one of the three days March 17–19, of which March 18 was a Friday. Thus A.D. 29 is admissible and the choice almost certainly lies between it and A.D. 30; for A.D. 33 is hard to fit in with the calculation as to the Nativity, and no doubt that year was selected because of the dating of the 'fifteenth year' of I.k. 3rd from the death of Augustus. Of the two years, then, A.D. 30 is chosen by Lightfoot, Salmon, and Wieseler; A.D. 29 by Turner, and in this conclusion Ramsay now acquiesces (Was Christ born, etc.? p. 202), as does also Sanday (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB, p. 610). Of the days of the month, Nisan 14 is upheld by Claudius Apollinaris (c. 150), Clement of Alexandria, Hippolytus, Tertullian (?), Africanus; and by many moderns, e.g. Sanday (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB) and Westcott. Nisan 15 is supported by Origen, pseudo-Cyprian, Ambrose, Chrysostom; and in modern times by Edersheim (LT), Lewin (Fasti sacri), and McClellan (Com. on NT). But the choice between these days should be determined by internal evidence of the Gospels rather than by the chronological investigations, which are too uncertain to be trustworthy.

5. Aretas and the occupation of Damascus.—Turner deduces the earliest possible date for the conversion of St. Paul from the incident of 2 Co 11th, and accordingly gives A.D. 38 for the first visit to Jerusalem, A.D. 35 or 36 for the Conversion. But, in the opinion of the present writer, for reasons stated in art. ARETAS, the incident cannot be used in determining the chronology at all. If it is so used, the date is consistent with the view that the second visit synchronizes with the Apostolic Council (above, i. 4). Ramsay, however (St. Paul, p. xiv), adduces as an external support for his date (A.D. 33) for St. Paul's conversion, a 4th cent. oration found in St. Chrysostom's works, which says that Paul served God 35 years and died at the age of 68. If he died in A.D. 67, this would give A.D. 33 for the Conversion. But Patristic chronology is very erratic.

6. Herod Agrippa the Elder received Herod Philip's tetrarchy and the title of king early in A.D. 37 from Caligula, and somewhat later Antipas' tetrarchy (Josephus, BJ ii. ix. 6); and Claudius gave him the whole of his grandfather's kingdom, which he held for three years till his death, 'as he had governed his tetrarchies three other years' (ib. xi. 6). We see from his coins, which were issued up to his ninth year, that he died in A.D. 44 or 45; probably his 'second year' began with the Nisan next after his accession in A.D. 37.

Of these two dates, then, Josephus enables us to choose A.D. 44. This fixes Ac 12^{24f.}, though the events of Ac 12^{1ff.} need not have been immediately before Agrippa's death; and gives A.D. 41 for his accession to Herod the Great's dominions. It is therefore probable, but not certain, that the Cornelius episode (Ac 10) must be dated before A.D. 41, as it is not likely that a centurion of the Italic cohort would be stationed at Caesarea during Agrippa's semi-independent rule (see art. CORNELIUS).

7. The Famine.—This was predicted by Agabus, and happened in the reign of Claudius (Ac 11^{27f.}). If we can date the famine, it will help us to fix St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem, as this was occasioned by the sending of alms through him to the famine-stricken Christians there. In Claudius' reign there were many famines, and not in every country at the same time. We read of Helena, queen of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism, arriving at Jerusalem in the middle of the famine, apparently in the procuratorship of Tiberius Alexander, probably therefore after the summer of A.D. 46 (Joseph. Ant. xx. ii. 5, v. 2). Orosius, a Spanish writer who visited Palestine A.D. 415, puts the famine in Claudius' fourth year, i.e. in A.D. 44 (Hist. vii. 6), but Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 68) shows that his dates at this period are a year too early; thus we arrive at A.D. 45. It is probable that a bad harvest in A.D. 45 resulted in a famine in A.D. 46, and St. Paul's visit might then be either in the middle of the famine, or at any rate during the preceding winter, when the bad harvest showed that the famine was imminent.

8. Sergius Paulus.—The term of office of this proconsul cannot be dated (for the inscription referring to it, see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 12); but, as the proconsuls in A.D. 51, 52 are known, St. Paul's visit to Cyprus must have been before that.

9. Claudius' expulsion of the Jews.—The edict (Ac 18²) is mentioned by Suetonius. Tacitus, whose Annals are defective for the early years of Claudius, speaks only of the expulsion of astrologers in A.D. 52 (Ann. xii. 52). Suetonius (Claudius, § 25) says that the edict was due to Jewish tumults 'at the instigation of one Chrestus,' a confusion not unnatural in a heathen writer. Orosius (Hist. vii. 6) quotes Josephus as saying that the decree was made in the ninth year of Claudius, i.e. A.D. 49, but this should probably be (as above, 7) A.D. 50. Josephus, as a matter of fact, does not refer to the matter at all, so that Orosius' authority must have been some other writer. The arrival of Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth, if we accept Orosius' statement, must have been later than this, perhaps in A.D. 51 (so Ramsay; Turner puts it one year, Harnack three years earlier).

10. Gallio.—Achaia had been made a senatorial province by Claudius in A.D. 44, and the proconsulship of Gallio, who seems to have arrived at the end of St. Paul's stay at Corinth (Ac 18¹²), was no doubt several years later than this. Gallio was brother to Seneca, who was in disgrace A.D. 41-49, but was recalled and made praetor in A.D. 50. Pliny (HN xxxi. 33) says that Gallio became consul; this was probably after his proconsulship in Achaia. He is said by Seneca (Ep. 104) to have caught fever in Achaia, and this is the only indication outside Acts of his proconsulship. The probability is that he did not hold this office while Seneca was out of favour at Court, and therefore A.D. 50 would be the earliest year for the incident of Ac 18¹². It may have happened some few years later.

11. The Passover at Philippi.—Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 289 f.) considers that St. Paul left Philippi on a Friday (Ac 20⁶). He traces back the journey from the departure from Troas (v. 1), on the assumption that the sermon and Eucharistic celebration at Troas were on what we call Sunday night. But would any Eastern call this 'the first day of the week' (see art. 'Calendar,' I. 1 in Hastings' DCG)? If Ramsay's calculation be accepted, the further assumption is that St. Paul, who was in haste to reach Jerusalem, left Philippi on the morrow of the Passover, which therefore fell on Thursday. But in A.D. 57 it is calculated that it did so fall (April 7), and this therefore is Ramsay's date for St. Paul's fifth visit to Jerusalem and his arrest there. There is a triple element of doubt in this calculation—(a) as to the day on which Troas was left, (b) whether St. Paul started from Philippi on the day after the Passover, (c) as to the calculation of the Passover. We must therefore probably dismiss this element in calculating the years, though Ramsay's date is for other reasons quite probable.

12. Felix and Festus.—Felix married Drusilla, sister of Agrippa II., not long after the latter's accession to the tetrarchies of Herod Philip and Lysanias (c. A.D. 52-53); for she had married Azizus of Emesa on Agrippa's accession, and 'no long time afterward' deserted him for Felix (Joseph. Ant. xx. vii. 1, 2). Thus St. Paul's arrest could not have been before the summer of A.D. 54. Felix seems to have become procurator in A.D. 52, but previously he had held some office in Samaria (and possibly in Judaea) under, or concurrently with, Cumanus; and this accounts for the 'many years' of Ac 24¹⁰ (see art. FELIX). An apparent contradiction between Tacitus, Josephus, and Eusebius is resolved by Turner (op. cit. p. 418) as against Harnack (Chronologie, p. 233 f.), who interprets Eusebius as meaning that Felix came into office in A.D. 51.

The date of Festus' arrival is greatly disputed. Lightfoot, Wieseler, and Schürer conclude that it could not have been before A.D. 60 or 61, because of Ac 24¹⁰, and because Josephus' description of the events which happened under Felix implies the lapse of many years. But for these events five or six years are amply sufficient; and for the 'many years' see above. Eusebius (Chronicle), followed by Harnack, says that Festus arrived in the second year of Nero, i.e. Oct. A.D. 55 to Oct. A.D. 56. But Eusebius probably makes the first year of an emperor begin in the September after his accession (Turner, p. 418), and this would make the second year to be Sept. A.D. 56 to Sept. A.D. 57; accordingly Rackham (Acts, p. 454) gives A.D. 57 for Festus' arrival. Another argument for an early date for Festus' arrival is that Felix was acquitted, after his recall, through the influence of his brother Pallas (Joseph. Ant. xx. viii. 9), and this could only have been (it is said) while Pallas was still in office (Josephus says that Pallas 'was at that time held in the greatest honour by' Nero). But he was dismissed just before Britannicus' 14th birthday, in the spring of A.D. 55 (Tacitus, Ann. xiii. 14 f.). This, however, would make Festus' arrival in any case too early; it would be in the summer of A.D. 54, before Claudius' death, which contradicts Eusebius (Chron., and HE ii. 22). Harnack supposes that Tacitus wrote 'fourteenth birthday' in error for 'fifteenth.' It is, however, preferable to suppose that Pallas still retained influence even after he had left office. Turner suggests that at any rate the acquittal of Felix, when accused by the Jews, shows that Poppaea had not yet acquired her influence over Nero. This began in A.D. 58, though he did not marry her till A.D. 62, the year of Pallas' murder by him. This consideration, then, militates against Lightfoot's date (A.D. 60 or 61). Harnack's date (A.D. 56) comes from following Eusebius; and accordingly he dates the events of Acts two or three years at least before Ramsay and Turner. Even that early date, if Pallas was still in office when Felix was acquitted, is not easy to reconcile with Tacitus' statement. It does not seem safe to rely on Eusebius' chronology in this case, considering that in other cases it is so inaccurate.

13. Persecutions of Nero and Domitian.—(1) Death of St. Peter and of St. Paul.—There is no good reason for supposing that the two Apostles died on the same day or even in the same year, though we may probably conclude that they both were martyred under Nero. Their joint commemoration is due to their bodies having been transferred to the Catacombs together on June 29, A.D.

258 (so the Philocalian calendar, A.D. 354). Clement of Rome (Cor. 5) mentions them in the same connexion as examples of patience; Ignatius, writing to the Romans (§ 4), says: 'I do not enjoin you as Peter and Paul did'; Tertullian says that they were both martyred at Rome under Nero (Scorp. 15, de Præscr. 36 [Patr. Lat. ii. 174 f., 59]), and so Origen (Euseb. HE iii. 1); Dionysius of Corinth says 'about the same time' (Euseb. HE ii. 25); Caius (c. A.D. 200) describes their graves near Rome (Euseb. ib.). Prudentius (Peristeph. xii. 5), in the 4th cent., is the first to say that they died on the same day. Eusebius puts their death at the very end of Nero's reign, i.e. not long before A.D. 68. The determining considerations are: (a) the connexion of their deaths with the fire at Rome in July A.D. 64; (b) the necessary interval after St. Paul's acquittal for his later travels, which would take some three years; and this, if we took Lightfoot's chronology (Clement, i. 75 n.), would probably prevent us from fixing on A.D. 64 as the year of St. Paul's death; (c) the date of St. Peter's First Epistle, if a genuine work; and (d) the fact that St. Mark attended both Apostles, the suggestion being that he served St. Peter after St. Paul's death. The last consideration, if true, would make St. Peter's martyrdom the later of the two. The date of 1 Peter is a difficulty. It makes Christianity a crime (1 P. 4th, so in Rev.), and it is said by Pfeiderer not to have been so before the reign of Trajan. At first Christians were accused of ill doing; at a later period they were put to death as Christians. Ramsay gives reasons for believing that the change was made by Nero, and developed in the interval A.D. 68-96 under the Flavian emperors (Ch. in Rom. Emp. pp. 245, 252 ff., 280). The fact of persecutions being mentioned makes it unlikely that 1 Peter was written before A.D. 64 (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. 498 f.), and its indebtedness to some of St. Paul's Epistles implies some interval after they were written. Dr. Bigg, however (Internat. Crit. Com.), pleads for a much earlier date, in an argument that will not bear abbreviation; he thinks that the persecutions mentioned were not from the State at all, but from the Jews. Ramsay, on the other hand, thinks that the provinces of Asia Minor cannot have been so fully evangelized as 1 Peter implies before A.D. 65, and that the Epistle was written c. A.D. 80, soon after which date St. Peter died. But this is against all the Patristic testimony, which there is little reason to reject. Probably, then, we must date the death of both Apostles in Nero's reign. Two of the arguments mentioned above—on the one hand that the two martyrdoms must have been in close connexion with the Roman fire; and, on the other hand, that St. Mark can only have attended on the one Apostle after the other's death—appear to have little weight. If, as seems likely from what has already been said, the general scheme of chronology adopted by Lightfoot and Wieseler places the events of Acts a year or two too late all through, the argument for postponing the date of St. Paul's death, to allow for his travels, falls, although the later date for the death is in itself quite probable. On the whole, the conclusion seems to be that the martyrdoms may have taken place at any time between A.D. 64 and A.D. 68, more probably towards the end than towards the beginning of that period, though not necessarily in the same year.

(2) The Apocalypse.—This work gives us our last chronological indications in NT. Like 1 Peter, it implies persecution for the Name; but, unlike 1 Peter, it implies emperor-worship. The tone of antagonism to the Empire is entirely different from that of St. Paul's Epistles and the Acts. Rome-worship was greatly developed by Domitian, and was scarcely at all prominent in Nero's time. This feature in Rev., then, points to the scene being laid in the Domitianic persecution; and that date is argued for by Swete (Apocalypse, p. xcv. ff.—the most complete English commentary on the work) and Ramsay (Ch. in Rom. Emp. p. 295 ff.). It is accepted by Sanday (JThSt viii. 481 ff., July 1907), Lightfoot, however (Bibl. Ess. p. 51, Sup. Rel. p. 132), and Westcott (St. John, Introd. p. lxxxiv.) argue for a date during Nero's persecution, mainly because of the difference of style between Rev. and Jn., the latter being dated late in the century; this argument assumes identity of authorship, and makes little allowance for a possible difference of scribes. Other arguments for the Neronian date have been taken from the number of the Beast, which is supposed to spell, in Hebrew letters, the names Nero Cæsar, and from the indication as to the 'kings' (emperors) in 17th. The earlier date was in fashion a generation ago, but a reaction has lately set in, and the opinion of Irenæus is now largely supported, namely, that the book was written towards the end of the reign of Domitian, who died A.D. 96 (Iren. Haer. v. 30, 3; Euseb. HE iii. 18). The evidence seems to preponderate largely in favour of the supposition that the last decade of the 1st cent. is that illustrated by the last book of the NT Canon.

III. RESULTS.—The following table gives the dates arrived at by Harnack, Turner, Ramsay, and Lightfoot, respectively. The results of Lightfoot are in the main also those of Wieseler, Lewin, and Schürer. To the present writer the intermediate dates seem to be the only ones which fulfil all the necessary conditions; but Turner's year for St. Paul's conversion appears less probable than Ramsay's. In view, however, of the confusion in reckoning Imperial years, lunar months, and the like, it would be vain to expect anything like certainty in determining NT dates. [In the table w = winter, sp = spring, s = summer, a = autumn.]

CHURCH.—1. The word ecclesia, which in its Christian application is usually tr. 'church,' was applied in ordinary Greek usage to the duly constituted gathering of the citizens in a self-governing city, and it is so used of the Ephesian assembly in Ac 19th. It was adopted in the LXX to tr. a Heb. word, qahal, signifying the nation of Israel as assembled before God or considered in a religious aspect (Jg 21st, 1 Ch 29th, Dt 31st etc.). In this sense it is found twice in the NT (Ac 7th RV 'church,' He 2nd RV 'congregation'). The term is practically equivalent to the familiar 'synagogue' which, however, was more frequently used to translate another Heb. word, synagoga. This will probably explain our Lord's words in Mt 18th. For 'synagogue' was the name regularly applied after the Babylonian exile to local congregations of Jews formally gathered for common worship, and from them subsequently transferred to similar congregations of Hebrew Christians (Ja 2nd). 'Tell it to the ecclesia' can hardly refer directly to communities of Jesus' disciples, as these did not exist in the time of the Galilean ministry, but rather to the Jewish congregation, or its representative court, in the place to which the disputants might belong. The renewal of the promise concerning binding and loosing in v.¹⁰ (cf. 16¹⁹) makes against this interpretation. And the assurance of Christ's presence in v.²⁰ can have reference only to gatherings of disciples. But it may well be that we have these sayings brought together by Matthew in view of the Christian significance of ecclesia. There is no evidence that ecclesia, like 'synagogue', was transferred from the congregation of Israel to the religious assemblies which were its local embodiment. But, though not the technical term, there would be no difficulty in applying it, without fear of misunderstanding, to the synagogue. And this would be the more natural because the term is usually applied to Israel in its historical rather than in its ideal aspect (see Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 12).

2. Ecclesia is used constantly with its Christian meaning in the Pauline Epistles. Its earliest use chronologically is probably in 1 Th 1¹. But the growth of its use is best studied by beginning with Acts. Here the term first occurs in 5¹⁴, applied to the Christians of Jerusalem in their corporate capacity. In 1¹⁶ St. Peter is represented as standing up 'in the midst of the brethren.' Thus from the first Christians are a brotherhood or family, not a promiscuous gathering. That this family is considered capable of an ordered extension is evident (a) from the steps immediately taken to fill a vacant post of authority (1²⁵), and (b) from the way in which converts on receiving baptism are spoken of as added to a fellowship (2⁴¹ AV 'added to the church,' but see RV) which continues in the Apostles' teaching, and the bond of a common table and united prayer (2⁴², 4⁶). This community is now called 'the assemblage of them that believed' (4²³), the word used, as compared with its employment elsewhere, suggesting not a throng or crowd but the whole body of the disciples. In Ex 12⁶ we have the phrase 'the whole assembly of the congregation (Gr. synagōgē) of Israel.' When, therefore, 'it became necessary to find a collective name for 'the believers,' ecclesia, the alternative to 'synagogue,' was not unnaturally chosen. For the disciples meeting in Jerusalem were, as a matter of fact, the true Israel (Gal 6¹⁶), the little flock to whom was to be given the Messianic Kingdom (Lk 12³²). Moreover, they were a Christian synagogue, and, but for the risk of confusion, might have been so called. The name, therefore, as applied to the primitive community of Jesus, is on the one hand universal and ideal, on the other local and particular. In either case the associations are Jewish, and by these the subsequent history of the name is determined.

3. As Christianity spread, the local units of the brotherhood came to be called ecclesiae (Ac 9³¹ 13¹ 14²⁸ 15⁴¹ 20¹⁷ etc.), the original community being now distinguished as 'the ecclesia in Jerusalem' (8¹). Thus we reach the familiar use of the Pauline Epistles, e.g. the ecclesia of the Thessalonians (1 Th 1¹), of Laodicea (Col 4¹⁶), of Corinth (1 Co 12⁷; cf. 1 P 5¹⁴, Rev 2¹ etc.). They are summed up in the expression 'all the ecclesiae of Christ' (Ro 16¹⁸). This language has doubtless given rise to the modern conception of 'the churches'; but it must be observed that the Pauline idea is territorial, the only apparent departure from this usage being the application of the name to sections of a local ecclesia, which seem in some instances to have met for additional worship in the houses of prominent disciples (Ro 16⁵, 1 Co 16¹⁹ etc.). The existence of independent congregations of Christians within a single area, like the Hellenistic and Hebrew synagogues (see Ac 6⁹), does not appear to be contemplated in the NT.

4. The conception of a Catholic Church in the sense of a constitutional federation of local Christian organizations in a universal community is post-Apostolic. The phrase is first found in Ignatius (c. A.D. 115; see Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, Pt. 2. ii. p. 310). But in the 1st cent. the Church of Jerusalem, as the seat of Apostolic authority (Ac 8¹⁴), still exercises an influence upon the other communities, which continues during the period of transition to the world-wide society. At Jerusalem Saul receives the right hand of fellowship and recognition from the pillar Apostles (Gal 2⁹). Thence Apostles go forth to confirm and consolidate the work of evangelists (Ac 8¹⁴). Thither missionaries return with reports of newly-founded Gentile societies and contributions for the poor saints (Ac 15²² 24¹⁷, 1 Co 16¹⁻³). It is this community that promulgates decisions on problems created by the extension of Christianity (Ac 15²²⁻²⁹). Till after the destruction of the city in A.D. 71 this Church continued, under the presidency of James the Lord's brother (Gal 2¹², Ac 12¹⁷ 15¹³ 21¹⁸), and then of other members of the Christian 'royal family' (Eusebius, HE iii. 11, 19, 20), to be the typical society of Jesus' disciples.

5. But already in the NT that ideal element, which distinguished the primitive fellowship as the Kingdom of Messiah, is beginning to express itself in a conception of the ecclesia which, while it never loses touch with the actual concrete society or societies of Christians, has nevertheless no constitutional value. It is scarcely possible to suppose that the adoption of the name ecclesia for the Christian society was altogether unrelated to the celebrated use of the word by the Lord Himself in His conversation with the disciples at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16¹³⁻²⁰). Two suggestions with regard to this passage may be dismissed. The first is that it was interpolated to support the growth of ecclesiastical authority in the 2nd cent.; this rests solely on an assumption that begs the question. The second is that ecclesia has been substituted for 'kingdom' in our Lord's utterance through subsequent identification of ideas. But the occasion was one that Christ evidently intended to signalize by a unique deliverance, the full significance of which would not become apparent till interpreted by later experience (cf. Mt 10²³, Jn 6⁶³). The metaphor of building as applied to the nation of Israel is found in the OT (Jer 33⁷; cf. Am 9¹¹, Ps 102¹⁶). There is therefore little doubt that Jesus meant His disciples to understand the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom; and that the use of the less common word ecclesia, far from being unintentional, is designed to connect with the new and enlarged Israel only the spiritual associations of Jehovah's congregation, and to discourage the temporal aspirations which they were only too ready to derive from the promised Kingdom.

6. The Kingdom of God, or of Heaven, is a prominent conception in the Synoptic Gospels. It is rather the Kingdom than the King that Christ Himself proclaims (Mk 1¹⁴⁻¹⁵, cf. Mt 4¹⁷). The idea, partially understood by His contemporaries, was broadened and spiritualized by Jesus. It had been outlined by prophets and apocalyptic writers. It was to realize the hopes of that congregation of Israel which had been purchased and redeemed of old (Ps 74²), and of which the Davidic monarchy had been the pledge (Mic 4⁸, Is 55³ etc.). Typical passages are Dn 2⁴⁴ 7¹⁴. This was the Kingdom which the crowd hailed at the Triumphal Entry (Mt 21⁹). Christ begins from the point of Jewish expectation, but the Kingdom which He proclaims, though not less actual, surpasses any previous conception in the minds of His followers. It is already present (Lk 11²⁰ 17²¹ RVm) in His own Person and work. It is revealed as a historical institution in the parables of the Tares (Mt 13²⁴⁻³⁰) and the Drag-net (13⁴⁷⁻⁵⁰). Other parables present it as an ideal which no historical institution can satisfy, e.g. Treasure hid in a field (13⁴⁴), a merchantman seeking goodly Pearls (13⁴⁵), a grain of Mustard Seed (13³¹⁻³²). We cannot solve the problem involved in Christ's various presentations of the Kingdom by saying that He uses the word in different senses. He is dealing with a reality too vast to be submitted to the human understanding otherwise than in aspects and partial views which no powers of combination will enable us adequately to adjust. The twofold conception of the Kingdom as at once a reality and an ideal is finally brought home by those utterances of Jesus which refer its realization to the end of the age. Daniel's prophecy is to be realized only when the Son of Man shall come in His Kingdom (24³, 18 25³¹ 26⁶¹). It is then that the blessed are to inherit what nevertheless was prepared for them from the beginning of time (25³⁴). And all views of the Kingdom which would limit it to an externally organized community are proved to be insufficient by a declaration like that of Lk 17²⁰.²¹ But even when contemplated ideally, the Messianic Kingdom possesses those attributes of order and authority which are inseparable from a society (Mt 19²⁸).

It is hardly to be doubted, therefore, that the name ecclesia, as given to the primitive community of Christians at Jerusalem, even if suggested rather by the synagogue than by our Lord's declaration to St. Peter, could not be used without identifying that society with the Kingdom of God, so far as this was capable of realization in an institution, and endowing it with those ideal qualities which belong thereto. The descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples at Pentecost, fulfilling as it did the expectation of a baptism of fire that was to accompany the establishment of the Kingdom (Ac 1⁵, 2³, 4, Mt 3¹¹), connects the Church with the Kingdom, and the scattering of its members after Stephen's death (Ac 8¹) would begin to familiarize the disciples with the idea of the unity in Christ unbroken by local separation (cf. 8¹ and 9³¹).

7. But it is only in the theology of St. Paul that we find the Kingdom of the Gospels interpreted in terms of the actual experience of the Christian ecclesia. The extension of the fellowship beyond the limits of a single city has shown that the ideal Church cannot be identified simpliciter with any Christian community, while the idealization of the federated ecclesiae, natural enough in a later age, is, in the absence of a wider ecclesiastical organization, not yet possible. It is still further from the truth to assert that St. Paul had the conception of an invisible Church, of which the local communities were at best typical. 'We have no evidence that St. Paul regarded membership of the universal ecclesia as invisible' (Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 169). The method by which the Apostle reached his doctrine of the Church is best illustrated by his charge to the elders at Miletus to feed the flock of God over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers (Ac 20²⁸). Here the local Ephesian Church represents practically God's Church purchased with His precious blood (v. 28), a real community of which visibility is an essential characteristic, but which by the nature of the case is incapable of a complete manifestation in history. The passage combines in a remarkable degree the three elements in the Divine Society, namely, the redeemed congregation of Israel (Ps 74²), the Kingdom or ecclesia of Messiah (Mt 16¹⁸), and the body established upon the Atonement (Col 1²⁰⁻²², Eph 2¹²). All three notes are present in the teaching of the Epistles concerning the ecclesia. It is the historical fact of the inclusion of the Gentiles (Eph 2¹²) that is the starting-point. Those nations which under the old covenant were alien from the people of God (Eph 2¹²) are now included in the vast citizenship or polity (v. 12-13) which membership in a local ecclesia involves. The Church has existed from all eternity as an idea in the mind of God (3¹⁻¹¹), the heritage prepared for Christ (1¹⁰, 11). It is the people of possession (1¹⁴, cf. 1 P 2⁹, Tit 2¹⁴), identified with the commonwealth of Israel (Eph 2¹²), and as such the immediate object of redemption (5²); but through the reconciliation of the Cross extended (2¹⁴), and, as it were, reincorporated on a wider basis (v. 15), as the sphere of universal forgiveness (v. 16), the home of the Spirit (v. 18), and the one body of Christ (4¹² etc.), in which all have access to the Father (2¹⁸). The interlaced figures of growth and building (4¹², 15), under which it is presented, witness to its organic and therefore not exclusively spiritual character. Baptism, administered by the local ecclesia and resulting in rights and duties in respect of them, is yet primarily the method of entrance to the ideal community (Ro 6³, 4, 1 Co 12¹³, Gal 3²⁷, 28, Eph 4⁵), to which also belong those offices and functions which, whether universal like the Apostolate (1 Co 12²⁷, 28) or particular like the presbyterate (Ac 20¹⁷, 28; cf. 1 Co 12²⁸⁻³¹, Eph 4¹¹), are exercised only in relation to the local societies. It is the Church of God that suffers persecution in the persons of those who are of 'the Way' (1 Co 15⁹, Ac 8³ 9¹); is profaned by misuse of sacred ordinances at Corinth (1 Co 11²²); becomes at Ephesus the pillar and ground of the truth (1 Ti 3¹⁵).

That St. Paul, in speaking of the Church now in the local now in the universal sense, is not dealing with ideas connected only by analogy, is proved by the ease with which he passes from the one to the other use (Col 4¹⁵, 18; cf. 1¹⁸, 24 and Eph. passim). The Church is essentially visible, the shrine of God (1 Co 3¹⁶, 17), the body of Christ (Eph 1²² etc.); schism and party-strife involving a breach in the unity of the Spirit (4³). Under another figure the Church is the bride of Christ (5²⁵), His complement or fulness (1¹⁹), deriving its life from Him as He does from the Father (v. 22, 1 Co 11³).

8. Thus the Biblical view of the Church differs alike from the materialized conception of Augustine, which identifies it with the constitutionally incorporated and oecumenical society of the Roman Empire, with its canon law and hierarchical jurisdiction, and from that Kingdom of Christ which Luther, as interpreted by Ritschl, regarded as 'the inward spiritual union of believers with Christ' (Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr. p. 287). The principle of the Church's life is inward, so that 'the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' remains the object of Christian hope (Eph 4¹³). But its manifestation is outward, and includes those ministries which, though marred, as history shows, by human failure and sin, are set in the Church for the building up of the body (v. 11, 12). Just as members of the legal Israel are recognized by our Lord as sons of the Kingdom (Mt 8¹²), so the baptized are the called, the saints, the members of the body. There is no warrant in the NT for that sharp separation between membership in the legal worshipping Church and the Kingdom of God which is characteristic of Ritschlianism.

9. The Church in its corporate capacity is the primary object of redemption. This truth, besides being definitely asserted (Eph 5²⁵, 27, Ac 20²⁸, Tit 2¹⁴), is involved in the conception of Christ as the second Adam (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, 1 Co 15²⁰⁻²²), the federal head of a redeemed race; underlies the institutions of Baptism and the Eucharist; and is expressed in the Apostolic teaching concerning the two Sacraments (see above, also 1 Co 10¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 11²⁰⁻²⁴). The Church is thus not a voluntary association of justified persons for purposes of mutual edification and common worship, but the body in which the individual believer normally realizes his redemption. Christ's love for the Church, for which He gave Himself (Eph 5²⁵), constituting a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people of possession (1 P 2⁹) through His blood (Eph 2¹³), completes the parallel, or rather marks the identity, with the historical Israel. Membership in Abraham's covenanted race, of which circumcision was the sign (Gn 17²), brought the Israelite into relation with Jehovah. The sacrifices covered the whole 'church in the wilderness' (Ac 7³⁸), and each worshipper approached God in virtue of his inclusion in the holy people. No foreigner might eat of the Passover (Ex 12⁴). The propitiatory ritual of the Day of Atonement was expressly designed for the consecration of the whole nation (Lv 16). So the sacrifice of the Cross is our Passover (1 Co 5⁷). The worship of the Christian congregation is the Paschal feast (v. 4, cf. He 13¹⁰⁻¹⁶). In Christ those who are now fellow-citizens have a common access to the Father (Eph 2¹⁸, He 10²²). Through the Mediator of a new covenant (12²) those that are consecrated (10¹⁴. 22) are come to the Church of the first-born (12²²), which includes the spirits of the perfected saints (ib.) in the fellowship of God's household (Eph 2¹⁹, He 10²¹). See also following article.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT.—1. The general development seems fairly clear, though its later stages fall beyond NT times. The Apostles were founders of churches, and therefore regulated and supervised the first arrangements; then were added sundry local and unlocal rulers; then the unlocal died out, and the local settled down into the three permanent classes of bishops, elders, and deacons. The chief disputed questions concern the origin of the local ministry, its relation to the other, and the time and manner in which it settled down under the government of (monarchical) bishops.

2. Twice over St. Paul gives something like a list of the chief persons of the Church. In 1 Co 12²⁸ he counts up—'first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers; then powers; then gifts of healing, helps, governments, kinds of tongues.' It will be noticed that all the words after the first two plainly describe functions, not offices. A few years later (Eph 4¹¹) he tells us how the ascended Lord 'himself gave some as apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the work of service' (diakonia)—they are all of them 'deacons' (diakonoi), whatever more they may be.

3. At the head of both lists is the Apostle. The Apostles were not limited to the Eleven, or to the number twelve, though twelve was always the ideal number (1 Co 15⁵, Rev 21¹⁴; perhaps Ac 21⁶²). Whether Matthias remained an Apostle or not, Paul and Barnabas were certainly Apostles (e.g. Ac 14¹⁴), and so was James the Lord's brother (Gal 1¹⁹). The old disciples Andronicus and Junias (not Junia) were 'notable' Apostles (Ro 16⁷). On the other hand, Timothy seems excluded by the greetings of several Epistles (e.g. 2 Co.), and Apollos by the evidence of Clement of Rome, who most likely knew the truth of the matter.

The Apostle's first qualification was to have seen the risen Lord (Ac 1², 1 Co 9⁸), for his first duty was to bear witness of the Resurrection. This qualification seems never to have been relaxed in NT times. A direct call was also needed, for (1 Co 12²⁸, Gal 1¹, Eph 4¹¹) no human authority could choose an Apostle. The call of Barnabas and Saul was acknowledged (Ac 13³) by a commission from the church at Antioch; and if Matthias remained an Apostle, we must suppose that the direct call was represented by some later Divine recognition.

Therefore the Apostle was in no sense a local official. His work was not to serve tables, but to preach and to make disciples of all nations, so that he led a wandering life, settling down only in his old age, or in the sense of making, say, Ephesus or Corinth his centre for a while. The stories which divide the world among the Twelve are legends: the only division we know of was made (Gal 2²) at the Conference, when it was resolved that the Three should go to the Jews, Paul and Barnabas to the Gentiles. With this preaching went the founding and general care of churches, though not their ordinary government. St. Paul interferes only in cases of gross error or corporate disorder. His point is not that the Galatians are mistaken, but that they are altogether falling away from Christ; not that the Corinthian is a bad offender, but that the church sees no great harm in the matter. He does not advise the Corinthians on further questions without plain hints (1 Co 6⁸ 10¹⁴ 11¹⁴) that they ought to have settled most of them for themselves.

4. Next to the Apostle comes the shadowy figure of the Prophet. He too sustained the Church, and shared with him (Eph 2²⁰ 3⁵) the revelation of the mystery. He spoke 'in the spirit' words of warning, of comfort, or it might be of prediction. He too received his commission from God and not from men, and was no local officer of a church, even if he dwelt in the city. But he was not an eye-witness of the risen Lord, and 'the care of all the churches' did not rest on him. Women also might prophesy (1 Co 11⁵), like Philip's daughters (Ac 21⁹) at Caesarea, or perhaps the mystic Jezebel (Rev 2²⁰) at Thyatira. Yet even in the Apostolic age prophecy (1 Th 5²⁰) is beginning to fall into discredit, and false prophets are flourishing (1 Jn., 2 Pet., Jude). This may be the reason for the marked avoidance of the name 'Apostle' by and of St. John.

5. It will be seen that St. Paul's lists leave no place for a local ministry of office, unless it comes in under 'helps and governments' on 'pastors and teachers.' Yet such a ministry must have existed almost from the first. We have (1) the appointment of the Seven at Jerusalem (Ac 6); (2) elders at Jerusalem in the years 44, 50, 58 (11³⁰ 15². 22 21¹⁸), appointed by Paul and Barnabas in every church about 48 (14²⁰), mentioned Ja 5¹⁴; at Ephesus in 58 (Ac 20¹⁷), mentioned 1 P 5¹; (3) Phoebe a deaconess at Cenchreae in 58 (Ro 16¹), bishops and deacons at Philippi in 63 (Ph 1¹). Also in the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy at Ephesus about 66 is (1 Ti 3, 4) in charge of four orders: (1) bishops (or elders) (5¹); (2) deacons; (3) deaconesses (3¹¹) ('women' [in Gr. without the article] cannot be wives of deacons); (4) widows. With Titus in Crete only bishops are mentioned (Tit 1⁵). To these we add (5) the prominent quasi-episcopal positions of James at Jerusalem in 44 (Ac 12¹⁷), in 50, and in 58; and (6) of Timothy and Titus at Ephesus and in Crete.

To these we must not add (1) the 'young men' (neoteroi) who carried out Ananias (Ac 5³). [The tacit contrast with presbyteroi is of age, not office, for it is neaniskoi who bury Sapphira]; (2) the indefinite proistamenoi of 1 Th 5¹² and Ro 12⁸, and the equally indefinite hēgoumenoi of some unknown church shortly before 70 (11e 13⁷ 17). [If these are officials, we can say no more than that there are several of them]; (3) the angels of the seven churches in Asia. [These cannot safely be taken literally.]

6. The questions before us may be conveniently grouped round the three later offices of Bishop, Elder, and Deacon. But bishop and deacon seem at first to have denoted functions of oversight and service rather than definite offices. The elder carries over a more official character from the synagogue; but in any case there is always a good deal of give and take among officials of small societies. If so, we shall not be surprised if we find neither definite institution of offices nor sharp distinction of duties.

(1) Deacons. The traditional view, that the choice of the Seven in Ac 6 marks the institution of a permanent order of deacons, is open to serious doubt. The opinion of Cyprian and later writers is not worth much on a question of this kind, and even that of Irenaeus is far from decisive. The vague word diakonia (used too in the context of the Apostles themselves) is balanced by the avoidance of the word 'deacon' in the Acts (e.g. 21⁸ Philip the evangelist, one of the Seven). Since, however, Phoebe was a deaconess at Cenchreae in 58, there were probably deacons there and at Corinth, though St. Paul does not mention any; and at Philippi we have bishops and deacons in 63. In both cases, however, the doubt remains, how far the name has settled into a definite office. See art. DEACON.

(2) Elders. Elders at Jerusalem receive the offerings in 44 from Saul and Barnabas. They are joined with the Apostles at the Conference in 50, and with James in 58. As Paul and Barnabas appoint elders in every city on their first missionary journey, and we find elders at Ephesus in 58, we may infer that the churches generally had elders, though there is no further certain mention of them till the Pastoral Epistles and 1 Peter. Probably Ja 5¹⁴ is earlier, but there we cannot be sure that the word is official.

The difference of name between elders and bishops may point to some difference of origin or duties; but in NT (and in Clement of Rome) the terms are practically equivalent. Thus the elders of Ephesus are reminded (Ac 20²⁸) that they are bishops. In the Pastoral Epistles, Timothy appoints 'bishops and deacons': Titus, 'elders and deacons,' though Timothy also (1 Ti 5¹⁷) has elders under him. The qualifications of the elder, as described to Titus, are practically those of the bishop as given to Timothy, and it is added (Tit 1⁷) that the elders must be such 'because the bishop must be blameless,' etc.—which is decisive that the bishop's office was at least as wide as the elder's. Moreover, in both cases the duties implied are ministerial, not what we call episcopal. If the elder's duty is to rule (1 Ti 5¹⁷), he does it subject to Timothy, much as a modern elder rules subject to his bishop.

(3) Bishops. See BISHOP. H. M. GWATKIN.

CHURCHES, ROBBERS OF.—This is in Ac 19²⁷ an AV mistranslation (RV has 'robbers of temples'). Even the RV is inexact. The word ought to be translated simply 'sacriligious persons,' that is, persons acting disrespectfully to the goddess of Ephesus. In 2 Mac 4² (RV 'author of the sacrilege') the expression is applied to Lysimachus, brother of Menelaus the high priest, who perished in a riot caused by sacrilege (B.C. 170).

CHURCHES, SEVEN.—See ANGELS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES, REVELATION [BOOK OF], also the art. ON EPHEBUS, SMYRNA, etc.

CHUSI (Jth 7¹⁸), mentioned with Ekrebel ('Akrahah'), is possibly Kuzah, 5 miles S. of Shechem and 5 miles W. of 'Akrahah.

CHUZA (Amer. RV Chusas).—The steward of Herod Antipas. His wife Joanna (wh. see) was one of the women who ministered to our Lord and His disciples (Lk 8³).

CIELED, CIELING (Amer. RV 'celled,' 'celling'). The latter occurs only 1 K 6¹⁴, where it has its modern signification (reading, however, 'unto the beams [or rafters] of the ceiling'). The verb, on the other hand, should everywhere be rendered 'panelled' (2 Ch 3⁶, Jer 22¹⁴, Ezk 41¹⁴, Hag 1⁴ 'your panelled houses'), the reference being to the panels of cedar or other costly wood with which the inner walls were lined. See HOUSE, § 4.

CILICIA.—A district in the S.E. corner of Asia Minor, which in NT times was divided into two portions. The Roman province Cilicia, which is alone referred to in the NT, stretched from a little E. of Corycus to Mt. Amanus, and from the Cilician Gates and Anazarbus to the sea. For administrative purposes it was combined with Syria and Phoenicia. The sense of the unity of Syria and Cilicia is seen clearly in Gal 1³ (also in Ac 15^{2, 41}). The capital of the province Cilicia was Tarsus (Ac 21^{28, 22}). The other portion to which the name was applied was the client-kingdom of king Antiochus, which was under the suzerainty of Rome, and included Cilicia Tracheia (Rugged Cilicia) to the W., as well as a belt surrounding the Roman province on the N. and E. Neither district has as yet been thoroughly explored.

CINNAMON (Ex 30²³, Pr 17²², Ca 41⁴, Rev 18¹³).—Almost without doubt the product of Cinnamomum zeylanicum of Ceylon. The inner bark is the part chiefly used, but oil is also obtained from the fruit. Cinnamon is still a favourite perfume and flavouring substance in Palestine. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CIRCUIT occurs 4 times in AV: 1 S 7¹⁶ (a late and doubtful passage, acc. to which Samuel went on circuit to various high places), Job 22⁴ (RVm and Amer. RV 'vault,' i.e. the vault of heaven), Ps 19⁴ (of the sun's course in the heavens), Ec 1⁴ (of the circuits of the wind). Besides retaining these instances, RV substitutes 'made [make] a circuit' for AV 'fitch a compass' in 2 S 5²³, 2 K 3⁹, Ac 28¹³. See COMPASS.

CIRCUMCISION.—This rite is not of Israelite origin; there are some good grounds for the belief that it came to the Israelites from the Egyptians. The fact of a flint being used for its performance (Jos 5^{2, 3}) witnesses to the immense antiquity of the rite. Its original meaning and object are hidden in obscurity, though the theory that it was regarded as a necessary preliminary to marriage has much to commend it. Among the Israelites it became the sign of the Covenant People: whoever was uncircumcised could not partake of the hopes of the nation, nor could such join in the worship of Jahweh; he could not be reckoned an Israelite (Gn 17¹⁴). Not only was every Israelite required to undergo circumcision, but even every slave acquired by the Israelites from foreign lands had likewise to be circumcised (Gn 17^{12, 13}); according to Ex 12⁴⁸ 'even a stranger sojourning in the midst of Israel had to submit to the rite, at all events if he wished to join in the celebration of the Passover. Originally male children were not circumcised in Israel (cf. Jos 5²⁻⁹), but boys had to undergo it on arriving at the age of puberty; but in later days the Law commanded that every male child should be circumcised on the eighth day after birth (Lv 12³).

In the OT there are two accounts as to the occasion on which circumcision was first practised by the Israelites; according to Gn 17¹⁰⁻¹⁴ the command was given to Abraham to observe the rite as a sign of the covenant between God and him, as representing the nation that was to be; while according to Ex 4²⁴ its origin is connected with Moses. It was the former that, in later days, was always looked upon as its real origin; and thus the rite acquired a purely religious character, and it has been one of the distinguishing marks of Judaism ever since the Exile. The giving of a name at circumcision (Lk 1^{6, 24}) did not belong to the rite originally, but this has been the custom among Jews ever since the return from the Captivity, and probably even before.

In the early Church St. Paul had a vigorous warfare to wage against his Judaizing antagonists, and it became a vital question whether the Gentiles could be received into the Christian community without circumcision. As is well known, St. Paul gained the day, but it was this question of circumcision, which involved of course the observance of the entire Mosaic Law, that was the rock on which union between the early Christians and the Judaizing Christians split. Henceforth the Jewish and the Christian communities drifted further and further apart.

Circumcision in its symbolic meaning is found fairly frequently in the OT; an 'uncircumcised heart' is one from which disobedience to God has not been 'cut off' (see Lv 26⁴¹, Dt 10^{16, 30}); the expression 'uncircumcised lips' (Ex 6^{12, 30}) would be equivalent to what is said of Moses, as one who 'spoke unadvisedly with his lips' (Ps 106¹, cf. Is 6⁹); in Jer 6¹⁰ we have the expression 'their ear is uncircumcised' in reference to such as will not hearken to the word of the Lord. A like figurative use is found in the NT (e.g. Col 2^{11, 13}).

CISTERN.—In Palestine, the climate and geological formation of the country render the storage of water a prime necessity of existence. Hence cisterns, mostly hewn in the solid rock, were universal in Bible times, and even before the Hebrew conquest (Dt 6¹¹, Neh 9²⁸, both RV). Thus at Gezer it has been found that 'the rock was honeycombed with cisterns, one appropriated to each house [cf. 2 K 18¹⁸] or group of houses . . . (and) fairly uniform in character. A circular shaft, about 3 feet in diameter and 5 feet deep, cut through the rock, expands downwards into a chamber roughly square or circular in plan, about 13 to 25 feet in diameter and generally about 20 feet deep. . . . The wall is generally covered with coarse plaster' (PEFSI 1903, 111 f.).

A cistern might contain only rain water conveyed from the court or flat roof during the rainy season by gutters and pipes, or might be fed by a conduit led from a spring at a distance. The largest of the innumerable cisterns of Jerusalem, the 'great sea' in the Haram area, which is estimated to have held 3,000,000 gallons, derived its water-supply partly from surface drainage and partly from water brought by a conduit from Solomon's Pools near Bethlehem (Wilson).

The mouth of a cistern, through which the water was sometimes drawn by a wheel (Ec 12⁹), was legally required to have a cover (Ex 21³³, cf. Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 37). A disused or temporarily empty cistern formed a convenient place of detention, as in the case of Joseph (Gn 37³⁶) and of Jeremiah (Jer 38⁶).

CITY.—The surprisingly large number of places in the 'least of all lands' which receive in Scripture the honourable designation of 'city' is in itself evidence that the OT 'cities,' like the NT 'ships,' must not be measured by modern standards. The recent excavations in Palestine have confirmed this conclusion. In his recent work, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente (1907), the Dominican scholar, Father Vincent, has prepared plans on a uniform scale of the various sites excavated (see op. cit. 27 ff. with plate). From these the modest proportions of an ancient Canaanite or Hebrew city may be best realized. The area of Lachish, for example, did not exceed 15 acres; Taanach and Megiddo each occupied from 12 to 13 acres—an area about equal to the probable extent of the Jebusite city on Ophel captured by David (2 S 5⁶). Gezer, at the time of its greatest expansion, did not exceed 23 acres, or thereby, the circuit of its outer wall being only 1500 yards, about $\frac{1}{2}$ of the extent of the present wall of Jerusalem.

With the exception of cities on the sea-board, the situation of the Canaanite city was determined, as elsewhere in that old world, by two supreme considerations—the presence of an adequate water-supply and the capability of easy defence against the enemy. 'The cities of Canaan,' says Vincent, 'were almost invariably perched upon a projecting spur of a mountain slope, or upon an isolated eminence in the plain: Megiddo, Gezer, Tell-es-Safy [Gath?—not to mention the hill of the primitive Jerusalem—are characteristic examples of the former site, Taanach and Lachish of the latter.' With this well-known fact agrees the mention of the 'cities on their mounds' (Jos 11¹² RV, Jer 30¹⁸ RVm [Heb. ruḥm, the Arabic tell, now so common in the topographical nomenclature of Western Asia]).

The relation between the city and the dependent villages was regarded as that of a mother (2 S 20¹⁹ 'a mother in Israel') and her daughters, a point lost in our rendering 'villages' (e.g. Jos 15²² et passim), though noted in the margins. From these the city was outwardly distinguished by its massive walls (cf. Nu 13²⁸, Dt 1³⁸ 'walled up to heaven'), on the construction of which recent excavation has thrown a flood of new light (see FORTIFICATION). Close to, if not actually upon, the walls, houses were sometimes built, as we learn from Jos 2¹⁵ (cf. 2 Co 11²³).

The streets are now seen to have been exceedingly narrow and to have been laid out on no definite plan, 'a maze of narrow crooked causeways and blind alleys,' as at Gezer. Only at the intersection of the more important streets, and especially near the city gates, were broad places (Jer 5¹, Neh 8¹ 1¹⁰ RV—where AV, as often, has 'streets')—the markets (Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 11¹⁹) and market-places (Mt 20¹, Lk 7³⁶) of NT—where the citizens met to discuss public affairs, the children to play, and the elders to dispense justice. The importance of the gates, which were closed at nightfall (Jos 2⁶), is treated of in art. FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, § 5. During the night the watchmen mounted guard on the ramparts, or went 'about the city' (Ca 3¹, Is 62⁶; cf. Ps 127¹). A feature of an Eastern city in ancient as in modern times was the aggregation in a particular street or streets of representatives of the same craft or occupation, from which the name of the street or quarter was derived (see ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 10).

The houses were absurdly small to Western ideas (see HOUSE), for the city folk lived their life in the courts and streets, retiring to their houses mainly to eat and sleep. Every city of any importance, and in particular every royal city, had its castle, citadel, or acropolis, as the excavations show, to which the inhabitants might flee as a last defence. Such was the 'strong tower within the city' of Thebez (Jg 9⁵¹). Indeed the common term for city ('ir) is often used in this restricted sense; thus the 'stronghold of Zion' is re-named 'David's castle' or citadel (2 S 5⁷, AV 'city of David'), and the 'city of waters' (12²⁷) at Rabbath-ammon is really the 'water fort.'

As regards the water-supply, it was essential, as we have seen, to have one or more springs in the immediate vicinity, to which 'at the time of evening' (Gn 24¹¹) the city maidens went forth to draw (see WELL). Against the long rainless summer, and especially against the oft-recurring cases of siege, it was not less necessary that the city should be provided with open pools and covered cisterns for the storage of water. Mesha, king of Moab, tells in his famous inscription how, as there was 'no cistern in the midst of' a certain city, he 'said to all the people: make you each a cistern in his house' (cf. CISTERN).

In the internal affairs of the city the king in Canaanite days was supreme. Under the Hebrew monarchy and later, law and justice were in the hands of 'the elders of the city' (Dt 19¹⁸ 21¹⁹, Ru 4² etc.). In addition to freemen, possessing the full rights of citizenship—the 'men of the city' par excellence—with their wives and children, the population will have included many slaves, mostly captives of war, and a sprinkling of sojourners and passing strangers (see STRANGER).

No city, finally, was without its sanctuary or high place, either within its own precincts, as in most cities of note (see HIGH PLACE), or on an adjoining height (1 S 9¹²). With due religious rites, too, the city had been founded in far-off Canaanite, or even, as we now know, in pre-Canaanite days, when the foundation sacrifice claimed its human victim (see HOUSE, § 3). A survival of this wide-spread custom is almost certainly to be recognized in connexion with the rebuilding of Jericho, the foundation of which was laid by Hiel the Bethelite, 'with the loss of Abiram his first born,' and whose gates were set up 'with the loss of' his youngest son, Segub (1 K 16³⁴ RV). CLASPS.—See TACHES.

CLAUDA.—See CAUDA.

CLAUDIA.—A Roman Christian, perhaps wife of Pudens and mother of Linus (2 Ti 4¹¹); but Lightfoot (Clement, 1. 76) shows that this is improbable. The two former names are found in a sepulchral inscription near Rome, and a Claudia was wife of Aulus Pudens, friend of Martial. If these are identified, Claudia was a British lady of high birth; but this is very unlikely.

A. J. MACLEAN.

CLAUDIUS.—Claudius, the fourth Roman emperor, who bore the names Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, reigned from (24th) 25th Jan. 41 till his murder on 13th Oct. 54 A.D. He was a son of Nero Claudius Drusus (the brother of the emperor Tiberius) and Antonia minor (a daughter of the triumvir Mark Antony and Octavia, sister of the emperor Augustus), and was born on 1st August 10 B.C. at Lyons. From childhood he was weakly, and a prey to disease, which affected his mind as well as his body. This caused him to be neglected and despised. He was, however, a man of considerable ability, both literary and administrative, as he showed when he was called to succeed his own nephew Gaius (Caligula) as emperor. He has been compared with James I. (vi. of Scotland) in both his weak and his strong points. It was in his reign that the first real occupation of Britain by the Romans took place. He is twice mentioned in Acts (11²⁸ and 18²). The great famine over the whole of the Roman world which Agabus foretold took place in his reign. The expulsion of Jews from Rome, due to dissensions amongst them, occurred in the year 50. This latter date is one of the few fixed points of chronology in the Book of Acts. The reign of Claudius was satisfactory to the Empire beyond the average. The government of the provinces was excellent, and a marked feature was the large number of public works executed under the emperor's supervision. A. SOUTER.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.—Introductory.—The words 'clean,' 'unclean,' 'purity,' 'purification,' have acquired in the process of religious development a spiritual connotation which obscures their original meaning. Their primitive significance is wholly ceremonial; the conceptions they represent date back to a very early stage of religious practice, so early indeed that it may be called pre-religious, in so far as any useful delimitation can be established between the epoch in which spell and magic predominated, and that at which germs of a rudimentary religious consciousness can be detected.—In a conspectus of primitive custom, one of the most wide-spread phenomena is the existence of 'taboo.' Anthropology has yet to say the last word about it, and its general characteristics can be differently summarized. But, broadly speaking, taboo springs from the religion of fear. The savage met with much which he could not understand, which was supra-normal to his experience. Such phenomena appeared to him charged with a potency which was secret and uncanny, and highly energetic. They were therefore to be avoided with great care; they were 'taboo' to him. It would be rash to dogmatize about the origin of this notion; it most probably dates back to days prior to any conscious animistic beliefs, and may even be traceable ultimately to instincts which mankind shares with the higher animals. No doubt in later times the idea was artificially exploited in deference to the exigencies of ambition and avarice on the part of chiefs and priests, to the distrust of innovations (cf. Ex 20²⁵, Dt 27⁸, Jos 8³¹), to the recommendations of elementary sanitation, etc. But originally the savage regarded as taboo certain persons, material substances, and bodily acts or states which he considered to possess a kind of transmissible electric energy with which it was very dangerous to meddle; and these taboos were jealously guarded by the sanctions of civil authority, and later of religious belief.

It seems probable that even at such an early epoch taboos could be viewed from two distinct points of view. A taboo might be either a blessing or a curse, according as it was handled by an expert or a layman. Thus blood produced defilement, but, properly treated, it might remove impurity. A chief or king was taboo, and to touch him produced the primitive equivalent of 'king's evil'; and yet his touch could remove the disease it created. The reasons for this twofold point of view are very obscure, and do not come within the scope of this article. But the differentiation seems to have existed in a confused way at the earliest era. Afterwards this notion crystallized into a very vital distinction. On the one hand we find the conception of holiness as expressing an official consecration and dedication to the Divine beings. A sanctuary, a season, a priest or chief, were set apart from common life and placed in a peculiar relation of intimacy to God or the gods; they were tabooed as holy. On the other hand, certain taboos were held to arise from the intrinsic repulsiveness of the object or condition, a repulsiveness which affected both God and man with dislike. Such taboos were due to the essential uncleanness of their object.

With the rise of animistic beliefs and practices this differentiation was reinforced by the dualism of benevolent and malignant spirits. Uncanny energy varied according as it arose from the one or the other class, and much care must be taken to propitiate the one and avert the power of the other. Thus on the one side we find sacrificial ritual, which has as its object to please the good demons, and on the other side we have a cathartic ritual, which aims at expelling evil demons from the vicinity (cf. Lv 16, where the two notions are united in one ceremony). But even after the growth of such refinements, ideas and rules survived which can be explained only as relics of primitive and even primeval taboo customs. A still later stage is seen when rules of purity are attributed to the conscious command of God, and their motive is found in His own personal character (Lv 11⁴). The Jewish sacred books teem with references which demonstrate the survival of primitive taboos. Thus Frazer draws especial attention to the Nazirite vows (Nu 6¹⁻²¹), to the Sabbath regulations (Ex 35²⁻³), to the views as to death (Nu 19¹⁰⁻¹¹), and childbirth (Lv 12). Similarly the origin of the conception of holiness may be seen in the idea that it is transmissible by contact (Ex 20³⁷ 30²³, Lv 6²⁷, Ezk 44¹⁹), or in the penalty for meddling with a holy object (1 S 6¹⁹, 2 S 6⁷); whilst allusions to ritual uncleanness occur frequently in Ezekiel, and the legislation on the subject forms a large part of Leviticus and Deuteronomy. In some cases these ideas may have arisen in protest against historical developments of Hebrew custom. Thus it has been supposed that the Nazirite vows originated in the desire for a return to primitive simplicity by way of contrast to the habits of Palestinian Canaanites. But many of the regulations about uncleanness can be explained only by a reference to primitive ritualism, with its conceptions of objects charged with a secret energy which the ordinary man does well to shun.

The word 'clean,' it may be remarked, conveyed originally no positive idea. A clean object was one which was not under a taboo, which had contracted no ceremonial taint. And so again 'purification' meant the removal of a ceremonial taint by ceremonial means, the unclean object being thus restored to a normal condition. Fire and liquids were the best media of purification. Similarly 'common,' the opposite of 'holy,' merely meant 'undicated to God,' and expressed no ethical or spiritual notion. In fact, when the conceptions of holiness and uncleanness had been definitely differentiated, the rule would be that, though the holy must be clean, the clean need in no way be holy. Later thought, however, confused the two ideas (cf. Ac 10¹⁴).

I. UNCLEANNESS IN THE OT.—The consequences of uncleanness and the methods of purification naturally differed in different races. But in the Jewish religion uncleanness was always held to disqualify a man for Divine worship and sacrifice. In practice a certain amount of laxity seems to have been tolerated (Ezk 22²⁶ 44⁷), though this did not pass without protest (Ezk 44⁹, Is 52¹). But, strictly, an unclean man was debarred from religious offices (Lv 7¹⁹ 20⁹); and nobody could perform them in an unclean place, e.g. in any land but Palestine (2 K 5¹⁷, Hos 9³).

The Jewish rules about uncleanness can be roughly classified under five main heads: sexual impurity, uncleanness due to blood, uncleanness connected with food, with death, and with leprosy. This division is not scientific; some rules are equally in place in more than one class; but at present none but a rough classification is possible.

1. Sexual impurity.—All primitive religions display great terror of any functions connected, however remotely, with the organs of reproduction. Sexual intercourse produced uncleanness; and later animism taught that demons watched over such periods and must be averted with scrupulous care. The time when marriage is consummated was especially dangerous, and this idea is clearly seen in To 8¹⁻³, though this instance is unique in Jewish sacred literature. But, apart from this, the Jews considered all intercourse to defile till evening, and to necessitate a purificatory bath (Lv 15¹⁸). Under certain circumstances, when cleanness was especially important, complete abstinence from women was required (Ex 19¹⁵). Thus, too, from 1 S 21⁴ it appears as if soldiers on a campaign came under this regulation; perhaps because war was a sacred function, duly opened with religious rites (cf. 2 S 11¹¹), and this may also be the cause for a bridegroom's exemption from military service for a year after marriage (Dt 24⁵).

Uncircumcision was regarded as unclean. The reason for this is not obvious; rites of circumcision were performed by many primitive nations at the time of puberty (whether for decorative purposes, or in order to prepare a young man or woman for marriage, or for some other reason), and it is possible that among the Jews this custom had been thrown back to an earlier period of life. Or it may be that they regarded circumcision as imposing a distinct tribe-mark on the infant. The condition of uncircumcision might be held as unclean because it implied foreign nationality. Taboos on strangers are very common in savage nations.

Seminal emission made a man unclean till the evening, and necessitated bathing and washing of clothes (Lv 15^{16, 17}).

Childbirth was universally regarded as a special centre of impurity, though among the Jews we find no evidence that the new-born child was subject to it as well as the mother. The mother was completely unclean for seven days; after that she was in a condition of modified impurity for 33 days, disqualified from entering the sanctuary or touching any hallowed thing. (These periods were doubled when the baby was a girl.) After this, in order to complete her purification, she must offer a lamb of the first year and a pigeon or turtle dove, though poorer people might substitute another pigeon or dove for the lamb (Lv 12, cf. Lk 22³).

Analogous notions may perhaps be traced in the prohibition of any sexual impersonation (Dt 22⁵), any mingling of different species (Dt 22⁹⁻¹¹, Lv 19¹⁹), and in the disqualifications on eunuchs, bastards, and the Ammonites and Moabites, the offspring of an incestuous union (Dt 23¹⁻⁴); though some of these rules look like the product of later refinement.

Human excreta were sources of uncleanness (Dt 23¹³⁻¹⁴); but the directions on this subject very possibly date from the epoch of magical spells, and arose from the fear lest a man's excrement might fall into an enemy's hands and be used to work magic against him.

The prohibition to priests of woollen garments which caused sweat, is possibly an extension of a similar notion (Ezk 44¹⁷⁻¹⁹). Finally, the abstinence from eating the sinew of the thigh, which in Gn 32² is explained by a reference to the story of Jacob, may have originated in the idea that the thigh was the centre of the reproductive functions.

2. Uncleanness due to blood.—The fear of blood dates back in all probability to the most primeval times, and may be in part instinctive. Among the Jews it was a most stringent taboo and their aversion from it was reinforced by the theory that it was the seat of life (Dt 12²³). A clear instance of the all-embracing nature of its polluting power is seen in Dt 22⁴. The same idea would probably cause the abstinence from eating beasts of prey, carrion birds, and animals which had died without being bled (Ezk 4¹³, Ex 22³, Lv 17^{15, 22}). To break this rule caused defilement (1 S 14¹³, Ezk 33²). Such a taboo is so universal and ancient that it cannot reasonably be accounted for by the Jewish hatred for heathen offerings of blood.

The taboos on menstrual blood and abnormal issues must come under this category or that of sexual impurity. Menstruation was terribly feared. It was exceedingly dangerous for a man even to see the blood. The woman in such a condition was unclean for seven days, and her impurity was highly contagious (Lv 15¹⁹⁻²⁴). Similarly, abnormal issues produced contagious uncleanness for seven days after they had stopped. The purification required was the offering of two turtle doves and two young pigeons. A man had also to bathe and wash his clothes, but we are not told that a woman was under the same necessity, though it is hardly credible that she was exempt (Lv 15^{25-28, 30}).

3. Uncleanness connected with food.—Anthropology no longer explains all food taboos as survivals of totemism, though no doubt this explanation may account for some. It appears rather that 'theriolar' was the more general phenomenon. For reasons which cannot even be conjectured in many cases, certain animals were treated as sacred, and tabooed accordingly; it might be that the animal was very useful or very dangerous or very strange; the savage had no consistent theory of taboo. Some animals may be cases of sympathetic taboo; they were not eaten from the fear lest their qualities should be imparted to the consumer. In later times some animals might be tabooed from more elaborate motives. But food taboos cover so wide a range, and appear in many cases so inexplicable, that no single derivation of them can be adequate.

The Jews themselves dated the distinction between clean and unclean animals from an early antiquity (cf. Gn 7² and 8²⁰); Gn 9³, however, appears to embody a theory of antediluvian vegetarianism.

The lists of clean and unclean beasts are given in Lv 11 and Dt 14⁶. It is impossible to give any certain explanation of the separate items. Clean animals are there classified as those which part the hoof, are cloven-footed, and chew the cud. But this looks like an attempt of later speculation to generalize regulations already existent. The criterion would exclude the ass, horse, dog, and beasts of prey, which are nowhere mentioned as unclean. The last class, as we have seen, would probably be so on different grounds. The horse and dog seem to have been connected with idolatrous rites (2 K 23¹¹, Is 66³), and so perhaps were forbidden. But Jg 6⁴ appears to treat the ass as an ordinary article of diet. (The circumstances in 2 K 6²⁵ are exceptional.) The rule that a kid must not be seethed in its mother's milk (Ex 23¹⁹ 34²⁶, Dt 14²¹) is difficult to account for. A magical conception appears to underlie the prohibition, and it has been suggested that some nations used to sprinkle the broth on the ground for some such purposes. In that case the taboo would be of great antiquity. But the matter is not at present satisfactorily explained. The taboo on the tree in Eden (Gn 3³) hardly calls for discussion. So far as we know, it had no subsequent history; and the general colouring of the story makes it improbable that the prohibition had any origin in Jewish custom.

4. Uncleanness connected with death.—Death, as well as birth, was a source of great terror to the savage. The animistic horror of ghosts and theories of a continued existence after death, gave a rationale for such terror; but it probably existed in pre-animistic days, and the precautions exercised with regard to dead bodies were derived partly from the intrinsic mysterious-ness of death, partly from the value of a corpse for magical purposes. Among the Jews a corpse was regarded as exceptionally defiling (Hag 2¹²). Even a bone or a grave caused infectious uncleanness, and graves were whitened in order to be easily recognizable. He who touched a corpse was unclean for seven days (Nu 19¹⁵). Purification was necessary on the third and seventh days; and on the latter the unclean person also washed his clothes and bathed. A corpse defiled a tent and all open vessels in it. For similar reasons warriors needed purification after a battle (Nu 31¹⁹⁻²⁴); a murderer defiled the land and had to flee to a city of refuge, where he must remain till the death of the high priest (Nu 35). It has been suggested that this provision was due to the notion that the high priest, the temporary representative of Jahweh, was regarded as suffering from the defilement of murder as God suffered, and as the land suffered (Dt 21¹). It is singular that apparently a person who was unclean from touching a corpse might yet eat the Passover (Nu 9⁹⁻¹²).

The kinsmen of a dead man were usually also unclean; Hos 9⁴ points to a similar idea among the Jews. Indeed, mourning customs were in origin probably warnings of such impurity. Some of the most common are prohibited in Dt 14¹ and Lv 19²⁸, perhaps because of their heathenish associations.

The ritual of purification from corpse-defilement, described in Nu 19, must be of high antiquity. The purifying medium was water, the blood and ashes of a red heifer, with cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. This was sprinkled over the unclean person on the third and seventh days, and the priest and attendants who performed the ceremony were themselves defiled by it till evening, and needed purification (cf. Dt 21). The ritual thus unites the three great cathartic media, fire, water, and aromatic woods and plants. The last, perhaps, were originally considered to be efficacious in expelling the death-demons by their scent.

5. Uncleanness connected with leprosy.—Orientals considered leprosy the one specially unclean disease, which required not healing but cleansing (cf. Nu 12¹³). It appears to have been a kind of elephantiasis, and Lv 13 gives directions for its diagnosis. If pronounced unclean, the leper was excluded from the community (cf. 2 K 7³). He could not attend a synagogue service in a walled town, though in open towns a special part of the synagogue was often reserved for lepers. If he was cured, he must undergo an elaborate process of purificatory ritual (Lv 14), including (a) the sacrifice of one bird and the release of another, perhaps regarded as carrying away the demon; fragrant plants, water, and the blood of the dead bird were used at this stage; (b) the washing of clothes, shaving of the hair, and bathing of the body; then (c) after seven days' interval this second process was repeated; and finally (d) on the eighth day sacrifices were offered, and the man ceremonially cleansed with the blood and oil of the sacrifice.

II. UNCLEANNES IN THE NT.—Legal casuistry carried the cathartic ritual to a high pitch of complexity, and Jesus came into frequent conflict with the Jewish lawyers over the point (cf. Mk 7⁴). He denounced it energetically (Lk 11⁴, Mt 15¹⁰), and, by insisting on the supreme importance of moral purity, threw ceremonial ideas into a subordinate position. The full force of this teaching was not at once realized (cf. Ac 10¹⁴). The decree in Ac 15²⁹ still recommends certain taboos. But St. Paul had no illusions on the subject (cf. Ro 14¹⁴, 1 Co 6¹⁴, Col 2¹⁶, 20-22, Tit 1¹⁴). In practice he made concessions to the scruples of others (Ac 21²⁴, Ro 14²⁰) as Jesus had done (Mk 14³⁴); and it was recognized that a man who had scruples must not be encouraged to violate them. But it was inevitable that with the process of time and reflexion, ceremonial prohibitions and ritualistic notions of cleanness should disappear before the Christian insistence on the internal elements in religion. There are certain survivals of such notions even now, and ceremonialism is not extirpated. But its scope is very narrow, and it is the custom to explain such ritual regulations as survive, on grounds that accord better with the spirit of Christianity and the ideas of civilized society. A. W. F. BLUNT.

CLEMENT.—The name of a fellow-worker with St. Paul (Ph 4³). There are no sufficient grounds for identifying him with Clement, bishop of Rome, the writer of the Epistle to the Church of Corinth.

J. G. TASKER.

CLEOPAS.—Only Lk 24¹⁸; whether to be identified with Cleopas of Jn 19²⁶ and Alphaeus of Mt 10³ etc., is a matter of dispute.

CLEOPATRA.—1. A daughter of Ptolemy Epiphanes. She married in B.C. 173 her own brother Ptolemy Philometor (Ad. Est 11¹), and afterwards her second brother Ptolemy Physcon (Liv. xlv. 13, Epit. 59; Justin, xxxviii. 8). She greatly favoured the Jews in Egypt (Jos. c. Apion, ii. 5), and encouraged Onias iv. in the erection of the temple at Leontopolis (Jos. Ant. xiii. iii. 2). 2. A daughter of Ptolemy Philometor. In B.C. 150 she was given in marriage by her father to Alexander Balas (1 Mac 10⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 1). When Balas was driven into Arabia, she became (B.C. 146), at her father's bidding, the wife of his rival, Demetrius Nikator (1 Mac 11¹³; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 7; Liv. Epit. 52).

CLOKE (AV and RV, but Amer. RV 'cloak').—See DRESS, § 4.

CLOPAS (AV Cleophas) is named only in Jn 19²⁶. See ALPHÆUS and BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

CLOSET.—The Gr. word so rendered in NT properly denotes 'a store-chamber' as Lk 12²⁹ RV, then any inner or more private room as opposed to the living-room; so Mt 6⁶, Lk 12³ RV 'inner-chamber.' Cf. 1 K 20²⁰ 22², lit. 'a chamber within a chamber,' and HOUSE, § 2. For Jl 2¹⁸ see Driver, Joel and Amos, in loc.

CLOTHES, CLOTHING.—See DRESS.

CLOUD.—In Scripture, as with us, the clouds are the visible masses of aqueous vapour, darkening the heavens, sources of rain and fertility, telling the present state of the weather or indicating a coming change. They serve also for figures of instability and transitoriness (Hos 6⁴), calamity (La 2¹), the gloom of old age (Ec 12³), great height (Job 20⁶), immense numbers (He 12¹). The following points should be noted. 1. The poetic treatment in Job. The waters are bound up securely in the clouds, so that the rain does not break through (26⁴); when the ocean issues from chaos like a new-born child, God wraps it in the swaddling-bands of clouds (38⁹); the laws of their movements are impenetrable mysteries (36³⁵ 37¹⁸ 38²⁷). 2. The cloud indicates the presence of God, and at the same time veils the insufferable brightness of His glory (Ex 16¹⁰ 19⁹ etc.). Similarly the bright cloud betokens the Father's presence, and His voice is heard speaking from it (Mt 17⁵). But a dark cloud would effectually hide Him, and thus furnishes a figure for displeasure (La 3⁴). At Rev 10¹ the cloud is an angel's glorious robe. 3. The pillar of cloud and fire directs and protects the journeyings of the Exodus (Ex 13²¹, Ps 105³⁹). This corresponds with the fact that armies and caravans have frequently been directed by signals of fire and smoke. 4. The cloud alternates with the cherub as Jahweh's chariot (Ps 18¹⁰, Is 19¹). Indeed, the cherub is a personification of the thunder-cloud. The Messianic people and the Messiah Himself sweep through the heaven with clouds (Dn 7¹⁸, Mk 14², Rev 17³), or on the clouds (Mt 26⁶⁴); hence the later Jews identified Anani (—'He of the clouds,' 1 Ch 3³⁴) with the Messiah. The saints are to be caught up in the clouds (1 Th 4¹⁷). The Messiah's throne is a white cloud (Rev 14¹⁴). 5. In the 'Cloud Vision' of Apoc. Bar 53-73, the cloud from which the twelve streams of water pour is 'the wide world which the Almighty created'—a very peculiar piece of imagery.

CLOUT.—Jer 38¹¹⁻¹² 'old cast clouts.' The word is still used in Scotland for cloths (as in 'dish-clout'), but for clothes only contemptuously. Formerly there was no contempt in the word. Sir John Mandeville (Travels, Macmillan's ed. p. 75) says, 'And in that well she washed often-time the clouts of her son Jesu Christ.' The verb 'to clout' occurs in Jos 9⁴, of shoes (Amer. RV 'patched').

CLUB.—Only Job 41¹³ RV, for AV 'dart.' The stout shepherd's club, with its thick end probably studded with nails, with which he defended his flock against wild beasts, is rendered by 'rod' in Ps 23⁴ and elsewhere.

ONIDUS.—A city of Caria, in S.W. of Asia Minor. It was the dividing point between the S. and W. coasts of Asia Minor, and at this point St. Paul's ship changed its course in the voyage to Rome (Ac 27⁷). It contained Jewish inhabitants as early as the 2nd cent. B.C. (1 Mac 15²²), and had the rank of a free city. A. SOUTER.

COAL.—Mineral coal was unknown in Bible times. Wherever 'coal' (or 'coals') is mentioned, therefore, we must in the great majority of cases understand wood or charcoal. Several species of wood used for heating purposes are named in Is 44¹⁴⁻¹⁶, to which Ps 120⁴ adds 'coals of broom' (RVm). In two cases, however, the 'live coal' of Isaiah's vision (Is 6⁶) and the 'coals' on which was 'a cake baked' for Elijah (1 K 19⁶), the Heb. word denotes a hot stone (so RVm—see BREAD). The charcoal was generally burned in a brasier (Jer 36²² RV, AV 'hearth') or chafing-dish, the 'pan of fire' of Zec 12¹⁰ RV. See, further, HOUSE, § 7.

Coal, or rather charcoal, supplies several Scripture metaphors, the most interesting of which is illustrated by the expression of the wise woman of Tekoa, 'thus shall they quench my coal that is left' (2 S 14⁷). By this she means, as shown by the following words, the death of her son and the extinction of her family, an idea elsewhere expressed as a putting out of one's lamp (Pr 13¹).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

COAST.—Coast, now confined to the shore of the sea, was formerly used of the border between two countries, or the neighbourhood of any place. When St. Paul 'passed through the upper coasts' (Ac 19¹), he was in the interior of Asia Minor. Herod 'slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof' (Mt 2¹⁶).

COAT.—See DRESS, §§ 2 (d), 4.

COAT OF MAIL.—See ARMOUR, ARMS, § 2 (c).

COCK.—Mt 26³¹, Mk 13³⁵ 14³⁰ 72, Lk 22³⁴ 60, 61, Jn 13²⁰ 18²⁷. Cocks and hens were probably unknown in Palestine until from two to three centuries before Christ's time. In the famous painted tomb at Marissa (see MARESHAH), a work of about B.C. 200, we have the cock depicted. Cocks and hens were introduced from Persia. The absence of express mention of them from the Law, and the fact that it is a 'clean' bird, have made it possible for the Jews for many centuries to sacrifice these birds on the eve of the Day of Atonement—a cock for each male and a hen for each female in the household. Talmudic tradition finds references to the cock in Is 22¹⁷, Job 38³⁸, and Pr 30¹, but all these are very doubtful. The 'cock-crowing' was the name of the 3rd watch of the night, just before the dawn, in the time of our Lord. During this time the cocks crow at irregular intervals.

COCKATRICE.—See SERPENT.

COCKER.—Sir 30⁹ 'Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid,' that is 'pamper.' Cf. Shaks. King John v. 1. 70—

'Shall a beardless boy,

A cocker'd silken wanton, brave our fields?
and Hull (1611), 'No creatures more cocker their young than the Asse and the Ape.' The word is not found earlier than the 15th century. Its origin is obscure.

COCKLE (bo'shah, Job 31¹⁰).—AVm 'stinking weeds' or RVm 'noisome weeds' are both more correct. Sir J. Hooper has suggested 'stinking arums,' which are common Palestine plants, but the more general rendering is safer.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

COELE-SYRIA. 'Hollow Syria,' is properly the great hollow running N. and S. between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges (1 Es 4¹⁸; Strabo, xvi. 2). It corresponds to the Bi'ath ha-Lebanon of Jos 11¹⁷ etc.; possibly also to Bi'ath Aven of Am 1⁵. The first element of the name persists in the modern name of the valley S. of Baalbek, el-Buqa'. The Orontes drains the valley northward, and the Litāni southward, both rivers rising near Baalbek. The soil is rich, producing splendid crops of wheat, etc., while some of the finest vineyards in Syria clothe the adjoining slopes.

'Coele-Syria' came to have a wider significance, covering indeed, with Phœnicia, all the Seleucid territory S. of the River Eleutherus (2 Mac 3⁸ etc.; Strabo, xvi. 753). In 1 Es 2¹⁷ etc., Coele-Syria and Phœnicia denote the whole Persian province, stretching from the Euphrates to the borders of Egypt. Josephus reckons the country E. of Jordan to Coele-Syria (Ant. i. xi. 5, xiii. xiii. 2 f., etc.), including in it Scythopolis, the only member of the Decapolis west of the river.

W. EWING.

COFFER occurs only in 1 S 6⁸ 11, 12, and the Heb. term 'argāz, of which it is the tr., is also found nowhere else. It appears to have been a small chest which contained (?) the golden figures sent by the Philistines as a guilt-offering.

COFFIN.—Gn 50²⁶ only (of the disposal of Joseph's body in Egypt). Israelitish burial rites (see MOURNING CUSTOMS, TOMBS) did not include the use of coffins.

COHORT.—See BAND, LEGION.

COINS.—See MONEY.

COL-HOZEH ('seeing all').—A Judahite ('eh 3¹¹ 11²).

COLUS (1 Es 9²²).—See CALITAS, KELAIAH.

COLLAR.—See ORNAMENTS, § 2.

COLLEGE.—This stands in AV (2 K 22⁴, 2 Ch 34²²) for the Heb. mišneh, which RV correctly renders 'second quarter,'—a quarter of the city lying to the north (Zeph 1¹⁰), and possibly referred to in Neh 11¹, where our versions have 'second over the city.' The idea of a 'college' came from the Targ. on 2 K 22⁴, 'house of instruction.'

J. TAYLOR.

COLONY.—The word colonia is a pure Latin word, which is written in Greek letters in the only place where it occurs in the Bible (Ac 16¹²), and expresses a purely Roman institution. It is a piece of Rome transported bodily out of Rome itself and planted somewhere in the Roman Empire. In other words, it is a collection of Roman citizen-soldiers settled on a military road to keep the enemies of the Empire in check. These retained their citizenship of Rome and constituted the aristocracy of every town in which they were situated. Their constitution was on the model of Rome and the Italian States. A number of places are mentioned in the NT which were really colonia, but only one, Philippi, is so named, and the reason for this naming is no doubt that the author of Acts was proud of this city, with which he had some connexion. Ptolemaios, not to mention others, were colonia. Sometimes these colonia were merely settlements of veterans for whom their generals had to find a home.

A. SOUTER.

COLOSSÆ was an ancient city of Phrygia (Roman province Asia), at one time of great importance, but dwindling later as its neighbour Laodicea prospered. It was situated in the upper part of the valley of the Lycus, a tributary of the Mæander, about 10 miles from Laodicea, and 13 from Hierapolis. The three cities naturally formed a sphere of missionary labour for Epaphras (Epaphroditus), an inhabitant of Colossæ (Col 4^{12, 13}), Timothy (Col 1¹), and others. St. Paul himself never visited any of them (Col 2¹). It has been suggested with great probability that in Rev 1¹¹ 3¹⁴ the single church of Laodicea must represent the other churches of the Lycus valley also. The church in Colossæ had developed Judaizing tendencies which St. Paul found it necessary to combat in the Epistle which has come down to us. If, as seems certain, 'the epistle from Laodicea' (Col 4¹⁶) is our 'Epistle to the Ephesians,' it also was read in the church at Colossæ. Both letters were carried from Rome by Tychicus, who was accompanied by Onesimus, whose master Philemon was an inhabitant of Colossæ. See also following article.

A. SOUTER.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Authenticity.—This Epistle is one of the ten Epistles of St. Paul included in Marcion's collection (A.D. 140). It appears to have been accepted without question as genuine both by Churchmen and by heretics, and is referred to by the Muratorian Fragment, by Irenæus, and by Clement of Alexandria. Its authenticity remained undisputed till the early part of last century, and was then contested only on internal grounds of style and subject-matter.

As to the first objection, the Epistle is marked, to a greater degree than St. Paul's earlier writings, by 'a certain ruggedness of expression, a want of finish that borders on obscurity.' The vocabulary also differs in some respects from that of the earlier writings, but this is amply accounted for by the difference of subject. As a matter of fact, the resemblances in style to St. Paul's other writings are as marked as the differences; and in any case arguments from style in disproof of authenticity are very unreliable. The later plays of Shakespeare, as compared with those of his middle period, show just the same condensation of thought and want of fluency and finish.

The argument from subject-matter is more important. The Epistle was regarded by earlier German critics as presupposing a fully developed system of Gnostic teaching, such as belongs to the middle of the 2nd cent., and a correspondingly developed Christology. But a more careful study of the Epistle has shown that what St. Paul has in view is not a system of teaching, but rather a tendency. Words like plērōma, to which later Gnosticism gave a technical sense, are used in this Epistle with their usual non-technical signification. And our study of early Christian and Jewish thought has shown that Gnostic tendencies date from a much earlier time than the great Gnostic teachers of the 2nd cent., and are, indeed, older than Christianity. The Christology of the Epistle certainly shows an advance on that of St. Paul's earlier Epistles, especially in the emphasis laid on the cosmical activity of the pre-incarnate Christ. This may be accounted for in part by the special purpose of the Epistle (see below), and in part by a development in St. Paul's own Christological ideas. It is irrational to deny the authenticity of an Epistle claiming to be St. Paul's, merely because it shows that the mind of the Apostle had not remained stagnant during a period of imprisonment that must have given him special opportunities for thought. (See EPHESIANS.)

Many German critics, such as Harnack and Jülicher, are now in agreement with the leading British scholars in accepting the Epistle as St. Paul's. The authenticity of the Epistle is sustained by its close relation to the Epistle to Philemon, the Pauline authorship of which is hardly seriously disputed. (On the relation of our Epistle to the Epistle to the Ephesians see EPHESIANS.)

2. Integrity and Text.—The integrity of the Epistle is now generally admitted, though certain obscurities in the text have given rise to some conjectural emendations. Holtzmann attempted to prove that this Epistle and the Epistle to the Ephesians are recensions of one original Epistle of St. Paul's, which he tried to reconstruct by extracting a Pauline nucleus of about forty verses; but his conclusions have not been accepted by later scholars. More recently, von Soden has proposed the rejection of about nine verses, but not on any adequate grounds. It would have been no easy task to interpolate a genuine Epistle of St. Paul's, jealously guarded as it would have been by the Church to which it was sent.

3. Time and Place of Writing.—The Epistle to the Colossians belongs to the group of four Epistles written by St. Paul in captivity (4^{12, 13}). Of this group three—the Epistles to 'the Ephesians,' to the Colossians, and to Philemon—were written at the same time and sent by the same messenger, Tychicus. The remaining Epistle of the group—that to the Philippians—was almost certainly written from Rome towards the end of St. Paul's two years' imprisonment there. The other three Epistles were most probably written from Rome, though some critics have dated them from the period of St. Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea.

4. Occasion and Purpose.—Most of St. Paul's Epistles were written under some definite external stimulus. In the case of this Epistle two events seem to have led to its composition. (1) Epaphras, who had been the first evangelist of the Colossians, and who seems to have held at Colossæ a position somewhat similar to that which Timothy is represented in the Pastoral Epistles as holding in Ephesus, had come to Rome bringing information as to the special needs and dangers of the Colossian Church. As he elected to remain at Rome, and apparently shared for a time the Apostle's imprisonment (Philem 23), Tychicus was sent to Asia, taking with him this letter. (2) Onesimus, a runaway slave from Colossæ, had found his way to Rome and had there come under the influence of St. Paul. The Apostle took advantage of Tychicus' journey to send Onesimus back to his master at Colossæ, with a letter of commendation (see PHILEMON).

The special purpose of the Epistle, as distinct from its general purpose as a message of goodwill, was to warn the Colossian Christians against a danger of which Epaphras had no doubt informed St. Paul. The exact nature of the so-called Colossian heresy is a matter of some uncertainty. On its doctrinal side it was probably a blend of Jewish Kabbalistic ideas with floating Oriental speculations. It appears to have denied the direct agency of God in the work of creation, and to have inculcated the worship of angels and other mysterious powers of the unseen world (2¹⁸). On its practical side it combined rigorous asceticism (2²³) and strict observance of Jewish ceremonial (2¹⁶) with an arrogant claim to special enlightenment in spiritual things (2¹⁸). Its special danger lay in the fact that it tended to obscure, or even to deny, the unique grandeur of the ascended Lord, the one Mediator, through faith in whom the life of the Christian was lifted into the new atmosphere of liberty. On one side, therefore, this Epistle may be compared with He 1, where the supremacy of the Son over all angels is strongly insisted on, while on the other side it takes up the line of thought of the Epistle to the Galatians—the relation of the Christian life to external ordinances. The way in which St. Paul deals with the question can best be seen by a short summary of the Epistle.

5. Summary.—After the usual salutation, thanksgiving, and prayer, in which St. Paul associates Timothy with himself (perhaps because he was known personally to the Colossian Church), he plunges at once into a doctrinal statement (1¹²⁻²³) of the Person and Work of Christ, who is the image of the invisible God, the origin and goal of all created things, in whom all the fulness (plērōma) of the Godhead abides. After a personal reference to his own commission and to his sufferings for the Church, he passes to the directly controversial part of the Epistle (2¹⁻³⁴), warning the Colossians against being led astray by strange philosophies. The fulness of the Godhead is in Christ; He is over all principalities and powers; the life of externally imposed ordinances—'Touch not, taste not, handle not'—is a life to which the Christian has died in Christ. He has risen to a new life whose centre and secret are in heaven. He must still mortify the deeds of the flesh, but from a new motive and in the power of a new life. The third section of the Epistle (3^a-4^a) applies this principle to various relations of life—the mutual relation of Christians, husbands and wives, children and fathers, slaves and masters; and lastly, to the relation of St. Paul to them, and to their relation with the world. The closing section (4⁷⁻¹⁸) deals with personal matters—with the mission of Tychicus, with whom St. Paul tactfully associates Onesimus; with St. Mark's proposed visit, in connexion with which St. Paul writes a word of special commendation, showing how completely the former discord has been healed. Then follow a warm commendation of Tychicus, greetings from Luke and Demas, instructions for exchanging letters with the neighbouring Church of Laodicea, and a final message for Archippus, who had apparently succeeded, in Epaphras' absence, to the supervision of the Colossian Church.

COLOURS.—The colours named in OT and NT, as in other ancient literatures, are few in number, and of these several are used with considerable latitude.

1. White as the colour of snow in Is 1¹⁸, of the teeth described as milk-white (Gn 49¹²), and of horses (Zec 1⁸ 6³ 6); also of wool (Rev 1¹⁴)—the prevailing colour of the Palestinian sheep being white (see Ca 4² 6⁹)—and of garments (Ec 9⁸, Mk 9³). Gray (and grey) occurs only in the expression 'gray hairs,' while grisled (lit. 'grey,' from French gris) apparently means black with white spots (Gn 31¹⁰, Zec 6² 6; cf. 6 below). Green is not a colour adjective (in Est 1⁸ read as RVm), but a noun signifying green plants and herbs, as e.g. in Gn 1³⁰ and Mk 6³⁹. A kindred word rendered greenish (Lv 13¹⁹ 14³⁷) is probably a greenish yellow, since it is also used in Ps 68¹³ of 'yellow gold.'

2. The darker colours likewise merge into each other, black and brown, for example, not being clearly distinguished. Black is the colour of hair (Ca 5¹¹ 'black as a raven'), of horses (Zec 6² 6, Rev 6⁴), and of ink (2 Co 3³). In Ca 1⁸ the same Heb. word signifies dark-complexioned (AV 'black'). Laban's black sheep (Gn 30³² RV) were probably dark brown (AV brown).

3. Red is the colour of blood (2 K 3²²), and of grape juice (Is 63²). The same word is used of the reddish-brown colour of the 'red heifer' of Nu 19, and of the chestnut horse of Zechariah's vision (1⁸, AV 'red'), although the precise colour distinction between the latter and his companion, the sorrel (AVm bay; in Zec 6³ EV 'bay' should prob. be 'strong,' and in v. 7 [by a slight change of text] perh. 'red') horse, is not clear. 'Red' is used also of the sky (Mt 16²¹—lit. 'of the colour of fire').

4. Crimson and scarlet are shades of the same colour, and were both derived from the same insect, the coccus ilicis or cochineal, which 'attaches itself to the leaves and twigs of the querqus coccifera' (Post), and is termed in Hebrew 'the scarlet worm.' Scarlet-coloured garments were regarded as a mark of distinction and prosperity (2 S 1²⁴, Pr 31²¹), but in OT scarlet is most frequently mentioned as one of the four liturgical, or, as we should say, ecclesiastical colours (see below). Vermilion is mentioned as a pigment (Jer 22¹⁴, Ezk 23¹⁴).

5. Associated with scarlet in the Priests' Code of the Pentateuch are found two colours, 'argāmān rendered purple, and 'tēkkēleth rendered blue. In reality these are two shades of purple, the red tone predominating in the former, the blue tone in the latter. Since blue predominates in our modern purple, it would be well to drop the cumbersome terms red-purple or purple-red, and blue-purple or purple-blue, in favour of the simpler names purple and violet, as in the margin of Est 1⁸ 1⁸ (AV). Both shades were obtained by the use, as a dye, of a colourless fluid secreted by the gland of a shell-fish, the murex trunculus, which was found in great quantities on the Phœnician coast. Hence Tyre became the chief seat of the manufacture of the purple cloth for which Phœnicia was famous throughout the ancient world (cf. Ezk 27¹⁶). Purple raiment is repeatedly mentioned in Scripture as worn by kings and nobles. It was as 'King of the Jews' that our Lord was derisively robed in purple (Mk 15¹⁷, Jn 19²).

In the Priests' Code, as has been noted, from Ex 25 onwards, 'violet' (AV 'blue'), 'purple,' and 'scarlet' are used—and always in this order—to denote the fine linen thread, spun from yarn that had been dyed these colours (see esp. Ex 35²⁵), which, with the natural white thread, was employed in weaving the rich material for the various hangings of the Tabernacle, and for certain parts of the priests' dress.

6. Jacob's small cattle, 'ring-straked, speckled, and spotted' (Gn 30³⁹ etc.), showed white mixed with black or brown in the case of the sheep, and black mixed with white in the case of the goats. For Joseph's 'coat of many colours' see Dress, 2 (d).

It may be added that the art of dyeing was one in which the Jews of later times excelled. According to tradition, as we have just seen, purple and scarlet—also red (Ex 26¹⁴)—dyes were known as early as the Exodus time (cf. Jg 5³⁰ RVm). In NT times, as may be seen from the Mishna, dyeing was a flourishing branch of native industry. The true Tyrian purple was always a monopoly, and consequently imported; but many less costly dyes were known, such as the cochineal insect for scarlet, dyer's woad (isatis) for true blue, madder (Heb. pūah, cf. Tola ben-Puah, i.e. 'Cochineal, son of Madder,' Jg 10¹⁷), and others. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

COLT is applied in the Bible not to the young horse, but to the young ass, and once (Gn 32¹⁴) to the young camel. Outside the Bible it is not applied to the young of any animal but the horse.

COMFORT, from late Lat. confortare, 'to strengthen,' 'reinforce,' denoted in old Eng. (a) physical, or (b) mental refreshment of an active kind (invigoration, encouragement)—obsolete meanings. In modern use it denotes (c) mental refreshment of the softer kind (consolation). Sense (a) appears in Gn 18⁸, Jg 19⁸ 8, Ca 2⁵; (c) elsewhere in OT. In NT, 'comfort' usually represents a Gr. verb and noun, common in Paul, which include any kind of animating address; in this connexion the sense (b) prevails, as in Ac 9⁴¹ 16¹⁰, Ro 1² 15⁴, 2 Co 13¹¹ etc.; the tenderer signification (c) appears in Mt 5⁴, 2 Co 1² etc. For the above Gr. noun, however, AV fourteen times writes 'consolation' (interchanging 'comfort' and 'consolation' in 2 Co 1²⁻⁷), alike in senses (b) and (c); this RV replaces seven times (in Paul) by 'comfort.' 'Comfort' is also in AV the rendering of a second and rarer group of Gr. words denoting consolation (in sorrow); so in Jn 11¹⁹ 31, 1 Co 14³, and Ph 2¹ (cf. AV and RV), 1 Th 2¹¹ 5⁴; the original of 'comfort' (soothing) in Col 4¹¹ is an isolated expression kindred to the last. 'Of good comfort' in Ph 2¹⁹ renders a fourth Gr. word = in good heart, cheerful; while 'of good comfort' in Mt 9²² = of good cheer in v. 2 and elsewhere (so RV here, and in Mk 10²⁴).

For OT and NT, comfort has its source in the tender love of God for His people, and for the individual soul; it is mediated (in the NT) by the sympathy of Christ, the visitings of the Holy Spirit, the help of brethren, and the hope of glory; it counteracts the troubles of life, and the discouragement of work for God: see esp. Jn 16²², Ro 5²⁻⁴, 2 Co 1³⁻⁷. G. G. FINDLAY.

COMMENTARY (2 Ch 13²² 24²⁷ RV).—The Heb. (midrash) has been adopted into English. But the Midrash is not exactly what we understand by a commentary: it is 'an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, especially a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story' (Driver).

COMMERCE.—See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

COMMON.—In Ac 10¹¹, synonymous with 'ceremonially unclean' (cf. Mk 7², and see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN).

COMMUNICATION.—While 'conversation' in AV means manner of life, conduct, 'communication' means conversation, talk. So Col 3⁸ 'filthy communication' (RV 'shameful speaking') and elsewhere. The verb 'to communicate' is now used in a restricted sense, so that its occurrences in AV, where it has the general meaning of making common cause with one, may be misunderstood. Cf. the Rhemish tr. of Jn 4⁹: 'For the Jewes do not communicate with the Samaritanes' (AV 'have no dealings with').

COMMUNION (Gr. koinōnia).—In EV koinōnia is tr. 'communion' in only 3 passages (1 Co 10¹⁶, 2 Co 6¹⁴ 13¹⁴), while it is frequently rendered 'fellowship' (AV 12, RV 15 times), and twice 'contribution' or 'distribution' (Ro 15²⁷, 2 Co 9¹³) [RV has 'contrib.' in both cases; AV 'contrib.' in the first passage, 'distrib.' in the second]. But it is 'communion' that brings us nearest to the original, and sets us in the path of the right interpretation of the word on every occasion when it is used in the NT.

Koinōnia comes from an adj. which means 'common,' and, like 'communion,' its literal meaning is a common participation or sharing in anything. Similarly, in the NT the concrete noun koinōnos is used of a partner in the ownership of a fishing-boat (Lk 5¹⁰); the verb koinōnein of sharing something with another, whether by way of giving (Ro 12¹³, Gal 6¹⁰) or of receiving (Ro 15²⁷, 1 Ti 5²²); and the adj. koinōnikos (1 Ti 6¹⁸) is rendered 'willing to communicate.'

1. Koinōnia meets us first in Ac 2⁴, where RV as well as AV obscures the meaning not only by using the word 'fellowship,' but by omitting the def. article. The verse ought to read, 'And they continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and the communion, in the breaking of bread and the prayers.' And the meaning of 'communion' in this case can hardly be doubtful. The reference evidently is to that 'having all things common' which is referred to immediately after (v. 4⁴), and the nature and extent of which St. Luke explains more fully at a later stage (4³²⁻⁵). It appears that 'the communion' was the regular expression for that 'community of goods' which was so marked a feature of the Christianity of the first days, and which owed its origin not only to the unselfish enthusiasm of that Pentecostal period and the expectation of the Lord's immediate return, but to the actual needs of the poorer Christians in Jerusalem, cut off from the means of self-support by the social ostracism attendant on excommunication from the synagogue (Jn 9²², * 12¹² 16²).

2. The type of koinōnia in Jerusalem described in Ac 2 seems to have disappeared very soon, but its place was taken by an organized diakonia, a daily 'ministration' to the poor (6¹⁻³). And when the Church spread into a larger world free from the hostile influences of the synagogue, those social conditions were absent which in Jerusalem had seemed to make it necessary that Christ's followers should have all things common. But it was a special feature of St. Paul's teaching that Christians everywhere were members one of another, sharers in each other's wealth whether material or spiritual. And in particular he pressed constantly upon the wealthier Gentile churches the duty of taking part in the diakonia carried on in Jerusalem on behalf of the poor saints. In this connexion we find him in 2 Co 8⁴ using the striking expression 'the koinōnia of the diakonia ['the communion of the ministration'] to the saints.' The Christians of Corinth might have communion with their brethren in Jerusalem by imparting to them out of their own abundance. Hence, by a natural process in the development of speech, the koinōnia, from meaning a common participation, came to be applied to the gifts which enabled that participation to be realized. In Ro 15²⁶ and 2 Co 9¹³, accordingly the word is properly enough rendered 'contribution.' And yet in the Apostolic Church it could never be forgotten that a contribution or collection for the poor brethren was a form of Christian communion.

3. From the first, however, 'communion' undoubtedly had a larger and deeper sense than those technical ones on which we have been dwelling. It was out of the consciousness of a common participation in certain great spiritual blessings that Christians were impelled to manifest their partnership in these specific ways. According to St. Paul's teaching, those who believed in Christ enjoyed a common participation in Christ Himself which bound them to one another in a holy unity (1 Co 1⁹, cf. v. 10¹⁶). In the great central rite of their faith this common participation in Christ, and above all in His death and its fruits, was visibly set forth: the cup of blessing was a communion of the blood of Christ; the broken bread a communion of the body of Christ (1 Co 10¹⁶). Flowing again from this common participation in Christ there was a common participation in the Holy Spirit, for it is from the love of God as manifested in the grace of Christ that there results that 'communion of the Holy Ghost' which is the strongest bond of unity and peace (2 Co 13¹⁴; cf. v. 11, Ph 2¹). Thus the communion of the Christian Church came to mean a fund of spiritual privilege which was common to all the members but also peculiar to them, so that the admission of a man to the communion or his exclusion from it was his admission to, or exclusion from, the Church of Christ itself. When the Jerusalem Apostles gave 'the right hands of communion' to Paul and Barnabas (Gal 2⁹), that was a symbolic recognition on their part that these missionaries to the uncircumcision were true disciples and Apostles of Christ, sharers with themselves in all the blessings of the Christian faith.

4. We have seen that in its root-meaning koinōnia is a partnership either in giving or in receiving. Hence it was applied to Christian duties and obligations as well as to Christian privileges. The right hands of communion given to Paul and Barnabas were not only a recognition of grace received in common, but mutual pledges of an Apostolic service to the circumcision on the one hand and the heathen on the other (Gal 2⁹). St. Paul thanks God for the 'communion' of the Philipians in the furtherance of the gospel (Ph 1⁵), and prays on behalf of Philemon that the 'communion' of his faith may become effectual (Philem 4), i.e. that the Christian sympathies and charities inspired by his faith may come into full operation. It is the same use of koinōnia that we find in He 13¹⁶, where the proper rendering is 'forget not the well-doing and the communion.' Here also the communion means the acts of charity that spring from Christian faith, with a special reference perhaps to the technical sense of koinōnia referred to above, as a sharing of one's material wealth with the poorer brethren.

5. In all the foregoing passages the koinōnia seems to denote a mutual sharing, whether in privilege or in duty, of Christians with one another. But there are some cases where the communion evidently denotes a more exalted partnership, the partnership of a Christian with Christ or with God. This is what meets us when St. Paul speaks in Ph 3¹⁰ of the communion of Christ's sufferings. He means a drinking of the cup of which Christ drank (cf. Mt 20²⁸), a moral partnership with the Redeemer in His pains and tears (cf. Ro 8¹⁷). But it is St. John who brings this higher koinōnia before us in the most absolute way when he writes, 'Our communion is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1³, cf. v. 9), and makes our communion one with another depend upon this previous communion with God Himself (v. 7, cf. v. 4). Yet, though the koinōnia or communion is now raised to a higher power, it has still the same meaning as before. It is a mutual sharing, a reciprocal giving and receiving. And in his Gospel St.

John sets the law of this communion clearly before us when he records the words of the Lord Himself, 'Abide in me, and I in you' (Jn 15⁴). The communion of the human and the Divine is a mutual activity, which may be summed up in the two words grace and faith. For grace is the spontaneous and unstinted Divine giving as revealed and mediated by Jesus Christ, while faith in its ideal form is the action of a soul which, receiving the Divine grace, surrenders itself without any reserve unto the Lord. COMMUNITY OF GOODS.—See COMMUNION.

COMPASS.—A 'compass' is the space occupied by a circle, or the circle itself: Pr 8³⁷ 'he set a compass upon the face of the deep' (AVm and RV 'a circle') usually explained of the horizon, which seems to be a circle resting on the ocean. To 'fetch a compass' (Nu 34⁸, Jos 15² 2 S 5², 2 K 3³) is to make a circuit or simply 'go round'. The tool for making a circle is a compass (Is 44¹²).—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1.

COMPASSION.—See PITY.

CONANIAH.—1. A Levite who had charge of the 'tithes and offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹² 13). 2. A chief of the Levites in Josiah's reign (2 Ch 35⁹); called in 1 Es 1⁸ Jeconia.

CONCISION.—A name applied contemptuously by S. Paul (Ph 3²) to the merely fleshly circumcision (Gr. katatomē; the ordinary word for 'circumcision' is peritomē).

CONCORDANCES.—The Latin word concordantia, for an alphabetical list of the words of Scripture drawn up for purposes of reference to the places where they occur, was first used by Hugo de Sancto Caro, who compiled a Concordance to the Vulgate in 1244. This was revised by Arbottus (1290), and became the basis of a Hebrew Concordance by Isaac Nathan (1437-45). Nathan's work was revised and enlarged by John Buxtorf, the elder, whose Concordantia Bibliorum Hebraica (1632) held the place of standard Concordance for two centuries, and served as the model for many others. John Taylor's Hebrew Concordance adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf (2 vols. folio, Norwich, 1754-57), is another link in the succession. The first Concordance to the English Bible is that of John Marbeck (folio, London, 1550). The earliest Concordance to the Septuagint is Conrad Kircher's (1607). The first Greek NT Concordance was published at Basle anonymously in 1546. In the use of the following lists it will be understood that, while the most recent works, other things being equal, are to be preferred, there is so much common material that many of the older works are by no means obsolete.

1. Hebrew.—Fuerst, Libr. Sacrorum Vel. Test. Concordantia Heb. atque Chald. (1840); The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldean Concordance of OT (2 vols., Bagster); B. Davidson, A Concordance of the Heb. and Chaldean Scriptures (Bagster, 1876); Bagster's Handy Hebrew Concordance (an invaluable work); Mandelkern, Vel. Test. Concordantia (folio, Leipzig, 1896), and a smaller edition without quotations (Leipzig, 1897).

2. Greek.—(a) THE SEPTUAGINT.—Bagster's Handy Concordance of the Septuagint; Hatch-Redpath's Concordance of the Septuagint and other Greek Versions of the OT, with two supplemental fasciculi (Clarendon Press, 1892-97). This is the standard work, replacing Trommler's Concordantia Græca Versionis vulgo dictæ LXX Interpretum (2 vols. Amst. 1718).

(b) THE NT.—The Englishman's Greek Concordance of the NT (Bagster); C. F. Hudson, Greek Concordance to NT, revised by Ezra Abbot (do.); Schmoller, Concordantia manuales NT græci (1890); Bruch, Concordantia omnium vocum NT græci (1888). All these works are now superseded by Moulton-Geden's Concordance to the Greek Testament (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1897).

3. English.—Until recent times the standard work was Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1st ed. 1738. Cruden's is truly a marvellous work, and was frequently copied, without acknowledgment, in subsequent productions. It was even issued in abridgment—the most useless and provoking of all literary products). More recent works are Eadie's Analytical Concordance; Young's Analytical Bible Concordance (Edin. 1879-84), with supplement. vol. by W. B. Stevenson; Strong's Exhaustive Concordance (Hodder & Stoughton, 1894); Thoms's Concordance to RV of NT (1882). W. F. ADENEY and J. S. BANKS.

CONCOUBINE.—See FAMILY, MARRIAGE, § 6.

CONCUPISCENCE.—Concupiscence is intense desire, always in a bad sense, so that it is unnecessary to say 'evil concupiscence' as in Col 3⁵. The reference is nearly always to sexual lust.

CONDUIT.—See JERUSALEM.

CONY (EV tr. of shāphān, RVm rock badger).—The Hyrax syriacus, called by the Arabs wabr, also the ghanam beni Israel (the sheep of the children of Israel). The coney is a small rabbit-like animal, with short ears and a mere stump of a tail. It has stiff greyish-brown hair, with softer, lighter-coloured hair on the belly; it is nocturnal in its habits, and lives in holes in the rocks. Conies are very plentiful along the rocky shores of the Dead Sea, and also in the Lebanon, especially above Sidon; they can, however, be seen as a rule only between sunset and sunrise. They are gregarious in their habits, and disappear into their rocky fastnesses (Ps 104¹⁸, Pr 30²⁶ 27) with the greatest rapidity on the slightest approach of danger. The Bedouin, when hunting them, lie hidden for many hours during the night close to their holes. They feed on grass and sweet-smelling herbs, and their flesh is esteemed for eating by the Bedouin; they do not actually 'chew the cud' (Lv 11⁴, Dt 14⁷), though they work their jaws in a way that resembles a ruminant. Structurally the coney is so peculiar as to have an order, the Hyracoidæ, to itself. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CONFECTION.—This word in AV means perfume (Ex 30²³), and 'confectionary' (1 S 8¹²), means perfumer.

CONFESSION.—In Eng. the words 'confess,' 'confession' denote either a profession of faith or an acknowledgment of sin; and they are used in EV in both of these meanings.

1. Confession of faith.—(1) In the OT the word 'confess' is found in this sense only in 1 K 8²² 26—2 Ch 6²⁸ 28. But the acknowledgment of God as God and the proclamation of personal trust in Him meet us continually in the lives or on the lips of patriarchs, prophets, and psalmists. The Book of Psalms in particular is a storehouse of confessional utterances in prayer and song (see 7¹ 48¹⁴ etc.).

(2) Coming to the NT, we find that 'confess' is of frequent occurrence in the sense we are considering, and that confession now gathers expressly round the Person and the Name of Jesus Christ. Moreover, the idea of confession has been elaborated, its immediate relation to faith and vital importance for salvation being clearly brought out.

(a) The meaning of confession.—In the earlier period of our Lord's ministry, confession meant no more than the expression of belief that Jesus was the expected Messiah (Jn 1⁴¹). Even the title 'Son of God' (Mt 8²⁹||, cf. Jn 1³⁴ 49) at this stage can be used only in its recognized Messianic sense (Ps 2⁷). A great advance in faith and insight is marked by St. Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16¹⁶||). This was the highest point reached by Apostolic belief and profession during the Lord's earthly ministry, and it anticipated those later views of Christ's true nature which found embodiment in the Creeds of the Church. After the Resurrection, confession of Christ carried with it readiness to bear witness to that supreme fact (Jn 20²⁸, 29, Ro 10⁹); and this of course implied an acceptance of the historical tradition as to His marvellous life and character which made it impossible for death to hold Him (cf. Ac 2²⁴). All that was at first demanded of converts, however, may have been the confession 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Co 12³; cf. Ph 2¹¹, 2 Ti 1¹⁰), a view that is confirmed by the fact of their being baptized 'into (or in) the name of the Lord' (Ac 8¹⁶, 10⁴⁸, 19⁵). At a later period the growth of heresy made a more precise confession necessary. In the Johannine Epistles it is essential to confess, on the one hand, that 'Jesus Christ is come in the flesh' (1 Jn 4², 3, 2 Jn 7), and, on the other, that 'Jesus is the Son of God' (1 Jn 4¹⁵). With this developed type of confession may be compared the gloss that has been attached to the narrative of the Ethiopian eunuch's baptism (Ac 8³⁷, see RVM), probably representing a formula that had come to be employed as a baptismal confession. It was out of baptismal formulas like this that there gradually grew those formal 'Confessions' of the early Church which are known as the Apostles' and the Nicene Creeds.

(b) The value of confession.—Upon this Jesus Himself lays great stress. If we confess Him before men, He will confess us before His Father in heaven; if we deny Him, He will also deny us (Mt 10²², 33, cf. Mk 8³⁸). The glorious blessing He gave to St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi was the reward of the Apostle's splendid profession of faith; and it contained the assurance that against the Church built on the rock of believing confession the gates of Hades should not prevail (Mt 16¹⁸⁻¹⁹). In the Epp. the value of confession is emphasized not less strongly. According to St. Paul, the spirit of faith must speak (2 Co 4¹³), and confession is necessary to salvation (Ro 10⁸⁻¹⁰). And St. John regards a true confession of Christ as a sign of the presence of the Divine Spirit (1 Jn 4⁹), a proof of the mutual indwelling of God in man and man in God (v. 15).

2. Confession of sin.—(1) This holds a prominent place in the OT. The Mosaic ritual makes provision for the confession of both individual (Lv 5¹⁶, 26¹⁰) and national (16²¹) transgressions; and many examples may be found of humble acknowledgment of both classes of sin, for instance in the Penitential Psalms and in such prayers as those of Ezra (10³), Nehemiah (1⁴, 7), and Daniel (9¹⁹, 20). It is fully recognized in the OT that confession is not only the natural expression of penitent feeling, but the condition of the Divine pardon (Lv 5, 6, Ps 32⁵, Pr 28¹³).

(2) In the NT 'confess' occurs but seldom to express acknowledgment of sin (Mt 3⁶ = Mk 1⁵, Ja 5¹⁶, 1 Jn 1⁹). But the duty of confessing sin both to God and to man is constantly referred to, and the indispensableness of confession in order to forgiveness is made very plain (Lk 18¹⁰, 1 Jn 1⁹).

(a) Confession to God.—This meets us at many points in our Lord's teaching—in His calls to repentance, in which confession is involved (Mt 4¹⁷ = Mk 1¹⁵, Lk 11²⁰, 24⁴⁷), in the petition for forgiveness in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6¹², Lk 11⁴), in the parables of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15¹⁷, 18, 21) and the Pharisee and the Publican (18¹⁰). It is very noteworthy that while He recognizes confession as a universal human need (Lk 11⁴), He never confesses sin on His own account or shares in the confessions of others.

(b) Confession to man.—Besides confession to God, Christ enjoins confession to the brother we have wronged (Mt 5²³, 24), and He makes it plain that human as well as Divine forgiveness must depend upon readiness to confess (Lk 17⁴). In Ja 5¹⁶ (RV) we are told to confess our sins one to another. The sins here spoken of are undoubtedly sins against God as well as sins against man. But the confession referred to is plainly not to any official of the Church, much less to an official with the power of granting absolution, but a mutual unburdening of Christian hearts with a view to prayer 'one for another.'

J. C. LAMBERT.

CONFIRMATION.—The noun 'confirmation' is used only twice in AV (Ph 1⁷, He 6¹⁶), the reference in the first case being to the establishment of the truth of the gospel, and in the second to the ratification of a statement by an oath. The verb 'confirm,' however, is found frequently in both OT and NT, in various shades of meaning, but with the general sense of strengthening and establishing. The only questions of interest are (1) whether 'confirm' is used in NT to denote the ecclesiastical rite of Confirmation; and (2) whether that rite is referred to under the 'laying on of hands.'

1. There are 3 passages in Acts (14²², 15³², 41) in which Paul and Barnabas, or Judas and Silas, or Paul by himself, are said to have confirmed 'the souls of the disciples,' 'the brethren,' 'the churches.' In none of these is there any indication of the performance of a rite, and the natural suggestion is that the word is used simply of a spiritual strengthening.

2. In the 'Order of Confirmation' in the Book of Common Prayer, 'the laying on of hands upon those that are baptized and come to years of discretion,' as performed by the bishop, is said to be done 'after the example of Thy holy Apostles.' Presumably the reference is to such passages as Ac 8¹⁶⁻¹⁷, 19⁶, He 6¹. In the passages in Acts, however, the imposition of hands is associated with the impartation of extraordinary spiritual gifts, while of He 6² no more can be said than that in the early Church the act appears to have been closely associated with baptism. That it might precede baptism instead of following it is shown by Ac 9¹⁷, 18; which further shows that it might be performed by one who was not an Apostle or even an official of the Church. In all likelihood it was simply a natural and beautiful symbol accompanying prayer (Ac 8¹⁶), which had come down from OT times (Gn 48¹⁴), and had been used by Christ Himself in the act of blessing (Mt 19¹³⁻¹⁵). See, further, LAYING ON OF HANDS.

CONFISCATION.—See BAN, § 2, EXCOMMUNICATION.

CONFUSION OF TONGUES.—See TONGUES [CON-FUSION OF].

CONGREGATION, ASSEMBLY.—In AV these terms are both employed to render either of the two important Heb. words 'edah' and 'qahal', with a decided preference, however, in favour of 'congregation' for the former, and 'assembly' for the latter. In RV, as we read in the Revisers' preface, an effort has been made to secure greater uniformity on these lines. Of the two, 'qahal' is the more widely distributed, although neither is frequent in pre-exilic literature; 'edah', which is not used in the prophetic or Deuteronomical sources of the Pentateuch, is found at least 115 times in the Priests' Code alone, where it denotes the theocratic community of Israel as a whole, the church-nation in its relation to J^h. The full designation, as found in Nu 1² and a score of times elsewhere, is 'the (sum of) all the congregation of the children of Israel,' which is the equivalent of the Deuteronomical phrase 'all the assembly (qahal) of Israel' (Dt 31³⁰, RV and AV 'congregation'). In the older and more secular writers the same idea would have been expressed by 'the sum of the people' of Israel, as in 2 S 24².

It is extremely doubtful if there is any valid ground for the attempts to find a distinction between the two expressions 'congregation' and 'assembly,' even within P itself, as if 'assembly' represented either 'picked members of the congregation' (EBi col. 345), or the latter in its capacity as an assembly of worshippers. For in one and the same verse P employs 'congregation' and 'assembly' as synonymous terms, as in Lv 4¹⁵, Nu 16² RV, and in the priestly redaction of Jg 20¹⁴, the whole body of the people being intended in every case. The only two passages which seem to imply that the 'assembly' was a limited section of the 'congregation,' viz. Ex 12^a, Nu 14^a 'all the assembly of the congregation,' etc., clearly show conflate readings (cf. LXX.). What difference, finally, can be detected between the 'assembly of J'' of Nu 16^a 20^a (cf. Dt 23^a 4) and the 'congregation of J'' of 27¹⁷ 31¹⁰—all P passages?

In the LXX ἑκκλησία is in most cases rendered by synagōgē, qāhāl by ecclesia, both being used, according to Schürer, without essential distinction to signify the religious community of Israel, in this agreeing, as has been argued above, with the original and with our AV. The subsequent history of these terms in the Jewish and early Christian Churches is of considerable interest. Later Judaism, as Schürer has shown, began to distinguish between synagōgē and ecclesia in the direction of applying the former in an empirical, the latter in an ideal, sense, the one to signify the religious community in a particular place, the other 'the community of those called by God to salvation,' the ideal Israel. This Jewish usage explains how, while synagōgē is occasionally found in early Patristic literature in the sense of 'the Christian congregation,' its rival finally gained the day. The Christian synagogue became 'the Church,' while the Jewish Church remains 'the synagogue' (see under CHURCH, SYNAGOGUE).

The expression solemn assembly, in which 'solemn' has its etymological, but now obsolete, sense of 'stated,' 'appointed' (lit. 'yearly,' sollennis), represents a third Heb. word applied originally to any religious gathering (Am 5^a, Is 1^a, 2 K 10²⁰), but afterwards limited to those appointed for the seventh day of the Feast of Unleavened Cakes (Mazzoth, Mt 16^a), and the eighth of the Feast of Booths (Lv 23^a, Nu 29^a).

'Holy convocation' occurs frequently in the Priestly sections of the Pentateuch (esp. Lv. 17-26 [H]).

The 'mount of the congregation,' in the uttermost parts of the north' (Is 14¹³ RV), to which the king of Babylon aspired, was the Babylonian Olympus or abode of the gods. An echo of this mythological conception is probably to be found in the similar phrase Ps 48^a.

CONIAH (Jer 22^a 2^a) = Jehoiachin (wh. see).

CONSCIENCE.—The term occurs 30 times in the NT; it signifies joint knowledge. The two things known together may be two motives, two deeds, etc.; or the comparison instituted may be between a standard and a volition, etc. Self or others may be judged, and approval (Ac 23^a 24¹⁶, Ro 9^a, 2 Co 1^a, 1 Ti 1^a, 19 3^a, 2 Ti 1^a, He 13^a, 1 P 3^a 2^a) or disapproval (Jn 8^a, He 9^a 10^a 2^a) may be the issue. The conviction that a certain course of conduct is right is accompanied by a sense of obligation, whether that course receives (Ro 13^a) or fails to secure (1 P 2^a, Ac 4^a 2^a) legal confirmation. The belief on which the consciousness of duty depends is not necessarily wise (1 Co 8^a 10 12, Ac 26^a), though the holders of the belief should receive careful consideration on the part of more enlightened men (Ro 15^a, 1 Co 8, 10^a 2^a). Unfaithfulness to moral claims leads to fearful deterioration, resulting in confusion (Mt 6^a 2^a) and insensitiveness (1 Ti 4^a, Tit 1^a).

1. Sphere.—The sphere of conscience is volition in all its manifestations. That which merely happens and offers to us no alternative movement lies outside morality. Let there be a possibility of choice, and conscience appears. Appetites, so far as they can be controlled; incentives of action admitting preference; purposes and desires,—all deeds and institutions that embody and give effect to human choice; all relationships that allow variations in our attitude give scope for ethical investigation, and in them conscience is directly or indirectly implicated. Conscience makes a valuation. It is concerned with right, wrong; worthiness, unworthiness; good, bad; better, worse. This appraisal is ultimately occupied with the incentives that present themselves to the will, in regard to some of which (envy and malice, for instance) there is an immediate verdict of badness, and in regard to others a verdict of better or worse. The dispositions that are commended by the Saviour's conduct and teachings—purity of heart, meekness, mercifulness, desire for righteousness, etc.—are recognized as worthy of honour. The conscience censures the selfishness of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18^a), and assents to the injunction of consideration and justice (Ph 2^a). The rightness of many general statements is discerned intuitively, and is carried over to the deeds that agree therewith. Sidgwick considers that the statement 'I ought not to prefer my own lesser good to the greater good of another' is axiomatic, and that some such intuitively discerned principle is a necessary foundation of morals. We do not question the baseness of some pleasures; their curse is graven on their foreheads. Both mediately and immediately we arrive at ethical convictions. The appearance in one's life of a person of distinguished excellence will cause many virtues to shine in our estimation. The mind surveying a course of conduct can judge it as bad or good on the whole. A precept to seek to raise the whole tone of one's life (Mt 5^a, Col 4^a) is felt to be reasonable, and as the capacity for improvement is greater in man than in any other creature, better motives, deeds, habits, aims, characters may righteously be demanded.

2. Obligation.—In the recognition of any conduct as right there is involved an authoritative prescription to do it. This feeling of oughtness—which is the core of conscience—can be exhibited but not analyzed. It is an ultimate. It is unique. It is an evidence within the soul that we are under government. There is a 'categorical imperative' to aim at that which we have admitted to be right. From the duty discerned there issues a command which cannot be silenced so long as the duty is present to the mind. Likings or dislikings, hopes or fears, popularity or unpopularity—no matter what may be advanced,—the dictatorial mandate is unaltered:

'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the truth he ought to die.'

When Jesus Christ asserts His supremacy and demands deference to Himself at all costs, He does so as the incarnation of the moral law. To be His friend is to be under His orders (Jn 15^a), and one is bound to follow Him without regard to any claims that can be urged by self or kindred (Mt 10^a 37, 38, Lk 14^a). Let it be ascertained that this is the way and the command is at once heard, 'Walk ye in it.' The peremptory claim made by conscience is eminently reasonable, because it rests upon what we have admitted to be right. It is a provision in our nature that links—or that would link if we were loyal—belief and practice, and would cause us to be builders as well as architects. 'Had it strength as it has right; had it power as it has manifest authority, it would absolutely govern the world' (Butler, Serm. ii.).

3. The ethical feeling.—The perception of oughtness has its own emotional tone. There is, of course, a sense of relief when the mind has arrived at a decision; but is there not an additional element? Is there not an inclination—at least a faint one—in favour of the behest? And in men habitually conscientious, is not the inclination immediate and strong? All men are clearly aware that they are wrong in case of refusal to obey. Man is a born judge of himself, and the verdict that results from self-examination brings peace or uneasiness. Herod is ill at ease by reason of self-judgment (Mk 6^a), and so is Felix (Ac 24^a). Peter sees himself as one who has broken the law, and the light hurts him (Lk 5^a). All the best men have had some experience like that of Isaiah (6^a) and that of Job (42^a), for with them the moral susceptibility has been great. All the emotional accompaniments of penitence and remorse, as well as the glow incident to the hearing of noble deeds—all anticipations of the Lord's 'Well done!' are instances of moral feeling. These pleasures and pains are a class by themselves. They are as distinct from those of sensation and intellect as colours are distinct from sound. That pleasures are qualitatively different was rightly maintained by J. S. Mill, though his general theory was not helped by the opinion. In consciousness we know that sorrow for sin is not of the same order as any physical distress, nor is it to be ranked with the feeling of disappointment when we are baffled in a scientific inquiry. The difference between the moral and the unmoral emotions is one of kind and not of quantity, of worth and not of amount: some pleasures low in the scale of value are very intense, while the moral satisfactions may have small intensity and yet are preferred by good men to any physical or intellectual delights. It should be noticed that the pleasure attendant upon a choice of conduct known to be right may be not unmixed; for the feelings, clinging for a while to that which has been discarded, interfere with the satisfaction due to the change that has been made. Converts are haunted by renounced beliefs, and their peace is disturbed; beside the main current of emotion there is a stream which comes from past associations and habits.

4. Education of conscience.—(1) No training can impart the idea of right: it is constitutional. (2) Malevolent feelings (as vindictiveness, the desire to give pain gratuitously) are known by all to be wrong; immediately they are perceived at work, they are unconditionally condemned. (3) The inward look makes no mistake as to our meaning, gets no wavering reply to such questions as, 'Do you desire to have full light? to know all the facts? to be impartial? to act as a good man should act in this particular?' For this accurate self-knowledge provision is made in our nature. (4) Some general moral principles are accepted as soon as the terms are understood. (5) When two competing incentives are to be judged, we know, and cannot be taught, which is the higher. (6) The imperative lodged in a moral conviction is intuitively discerned. 'I do not know how to impart the notion of moral obligation to any one who is entirely devoid of it' (Sidgwick). (7) The feeling of dishonour comes to us without tuition when we have refused compliance with known duty. Belonging to a moral order, we are made to react in certain definite ways to truths, social relations, etc. The touch of experience is enough to quicken into action certain moral states, just as the feelings of cold and heat are ours because of the physical environment, and because we are what we are. We can evoke while we cannot create the elementary moral qualities. 'An erring conscience is a chimera' (Kant). 'Conscience intuitively recognizes moral law; it is supreme in its authority; it cannot be educated' (Calderwood). These sentences are not intended to deny that in the application of principles there is difficulty. One may readily admit the axioms of geometry, and yet find much perplexity when asked to establish a geometrical theorem the truth of which directly or indirectly flows from the axioms. The Apostle Paul prayed that his friends might improve in moral discrimination (Ph 1¹⁰, Col 1⁹). We have to learn what to do, and often the problems set by our domestic, civic, and church relationships are hard even for the best and wisest to solve. The scheme of things to which we belong has not been constructed with a view to saving us the trouble of patient, strenuous, and sometimes very painful investigation and thought.

5. Implications.—Of the many implications the following are specially noteworthy. The feeling of responsibility suggests the question, to Whom? Being under government, we feel after the Ruler if haply we may find Him. Jesus tells us of the 'Righteous Father.'

The solemn voice of command is His. The preferences which we know to be right are His. The pain felt when righteous demands are resisted, and the joy accompanying obedience, are they not His frown and smile? Neither our higher self nor society can be the source of an authority so august as that of which we are conscious. To the best minds we look for guidance; but there are limits to their rights over us, and how ready they are to refer us to Him before whom they bow! We are made to be subjects of the Holy One. Admitting that we are in contact with Divine Authority, and that His behests are heard within, the encouraging persuasion is justified that He sympathizes with the soul in its battles and renders aid (Ph 2¹³⁻¹⁴). The inference that it is God with whom we have to do makes it fitting for us to say that conscience is man's capacity to receive progressively a revelation of the righteousness of God. But is law the last word? May there not be mercy and an atonement? Cannot the accusing voices be hushed? May the man who admits the sentence of conscience be pardoned? Conscience is a John the Baptist preparing the way for the Saviour, who has a reply to the question 'What must I do to be saved?' W. J. HENDERSON.

CONSECRATION.—See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. NAZIRITE.

CONSOLATION.—See COMFORT.

CONSUMPTION.—The Heb. word (kalah) which is translated 'consummation' in Dn 9²⁷ is rendered 'consumption' in Is 10²⁴ 28², these Eng. words having then the same meaning. Cf. Foxe, Actes and Mon., 'Christ shall sit . . . at the right hand of God till the consumption of the world.' Consumption occurs also with the same meaning in Is 10²⁴ (Heb. kilyōn). But in Lv 26¹⁶, Dt 28²² it is used of a disease of the body. See MEDICINE.

CONTENTMENT.—1. The word does not occur in the OT, but the duty is implied in the Tenth Commandment (Ex 20¹⁷), and the wisdom of contentment is enforced in Pr 15¹⁷ 17¹ by the consideration that those who seem most enviable may be worse off than ourselves. But the bare commandment 'Thou shalt not covet' may only stir up all manner of coveting (Ro 7⁷); and though a man may sometimes be reconciled to his lot by recognizing a principle of compensation in human life, that principle is far from applying to every case. It is not by measuring ourselves with one another, but only by consciously setting ourselves in the Divine presence, that true contentment can ever be attained. Faith in God is its living root (cf. Ps 16⁵ with v. 5; also Hab 3¹⁷).

2. In the NT the grace of contentment is expressly brought before us. Our Lord inculcated it negatively by His warnings against covetousness (Lk 12¹⁵⁻²¹), positively by His teaching as to the Fatherhood of God (Mt 6²³⁻²⁴) and the Kingdom of God (v. 33, cf. v. 10¹). St. Paul (Ph 4¹¹⁻¹²) claims to have 'learned the secret' of being content in whatsoever state he was. The word he uses is autarkhē, lit. 'self-sufficient.' It was a characteristic word of the Stoic philosophy, implying an independence of everything outside of oneself. The Apostle's self-sufficiency was of a very different kind (see v. 13), for it rested on that great promise of Christ, 'My grace is sufficient (arkei) for thee' (2 Co 12⁹). Christian contentment comes not from a Stoic narrowing of our desires, but from the sense of being filled with the riches of Christ's grace. For other NT utterances see 1 Ti 6⁸, He 13⁵. J. C. LAMBERT.

CONVENIENT.—This Eng. word often has in AV its primary meaning of befitting, as Ro 12¹⁸ 'God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient' (RV 'fitting'). So in the trans. of Agrippa's Van Artes (1684) 'She sang and danced more exquisitely than was convenient for an honest woman.'

CONVERSATION.—In EV the word is always used in the archaic sense of 'behaviour,' 'conduct.' In the OT, AV gives it twice (Ps 37¹⁴ 50²³), representing Heb. derek = 'way' (cf. RV and RVm). In the NT it is used in AV to render three sets of words. (1) The noun anastrophe = 'behaviour' (Gal 1¹³, Eph 4²², 1 Ti 4¹², He 13⁷, Ja 3¹⁴, 1 P 1¹⁵, 18 2¹² 3¹; 2 P 2⁷ 3¹¹), RV substituting in each case 'manner of life,' 'manner of living,' 'life,' 'living,' or 'behaviour'; the vb. anastrophesthai = 'to behave oneself' (2 Co 1¹², Eph 2³). (2) The noun politeuma = 'citizenship' or 'commonwealth' (Ph 3²⁰); the vb. politeuesthai = 'to act as a citizen' (Ph 1²⁷). (3) tropos = 'manner,' 'character,' lit. 'turning' (He 13¹). Cf. RV and RVm throughout. The main point to notice is that in every case 'conversation' in the Bible refers not to speech merely, but to conduct.

J. C. LAMBERT.

CONVERSION.—The noun occurs only in Ac 15¹ (epistrophē), but in AV 'convert' is found several times both in OT (Heb. shūbh) and NT (Gr. epistrophē, strephō) to denote a spiritual turning. RV in most cases substituting 'turn.' 'Turn' is to be preferred because (1) in the Eng. of AV 'convert' meant no more than 'turn'; (2) 'conversion' has come to be employed in a sense that often goes beyond the meaning of the originals. RV has further corrected AV by giving act. 'turn' for pass. 'be converted' in Mt 13¹⁸ 18¹, Mk 4¹², Lk 22³², Jn 12⁴⁰, Ac 3¹⁸ 28¹, where the Gr. vbs. are reflexive in meaning. In OT shūbh is used to denote a turning, whether of the nation (Dt 30⁶, 2 K 17¹⁸ etc.) or of the individual (Ps 51¹³, Is 55⁷ etc.). In NT epistrophē, strephō are used esp. of individuals, but sometimes in a sense that falls short of 'conversion' as the conscious change implied in becoming a Christian. Mt 18¹ was spoken to true disciples, and the 'conversion' demanded of them was a renunciation of their foolish ambitions (cf. v. 1). Lk 22³² was addressed to the leader of the Apostles, and his 'conversion' was his return to his Master's service after his fall. In Acts and Epp., however, 'convert' or 'turn' is employed to denote conversion in the full Christian sense (Ac 3¹⁹ 9³⁵ 11²¹ 14¹⁴ [cf. 15¹ 'conversion'], 2 Co 3¹⁴, 1 Th 1⁹). Conversion as a spiritual fact comes before us repeatedly in the Gospels (Lk 7¹⁷, 15¹⁷, 19¹⁰, 23⁴² etc.) and in the history of the Apostolic Church (Ac 2⁴¹, 4¹, 8¹, 12 9³⁵, 16³⁴ etc.). RV brings out the fact that in the NT conversion (as distinguished from regeneration [wh. see]) is an activity of the soul itself, and not an experience imposed from above. This view of its nature is confirmed when we find repentance (Ac 3¹⁹ 26²⁰; cf. Ezk 14⁶ 18³⁰) and faith (Ac 11²¹; cf. 20³¹) associated with it as the elements that make up the moral act of turning from sin and self to God in Christ.

J. C. LAMBERT.

CONVINCE.—Adams (Serm. ii. 38) says: 'Whatever is written is written either for our instruction or destruction; to convert us if we embrace it, to convince us if we despise it.' This is the meaning of 'convince' in the AV. It is what we now express by convict. Thus Jude 15 'to convince all that are ungodly among them of their ungodly deeds.'

CORBAN.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

CORD, ROPE.—Hebrew possesses a considerable number of words rendered, without any attempt at uniformity, by 'cord,' 'rope,' and a variety of other terms. It is difficult for the English reader to recognize the same original in the Psalmist's bow 'string' (Ps 11²) and the 'green withs' (RVm 'new bowstrings') with which Samson was bound; or again in the tent ropes of Is 33²⁰ (EV 'cords') and the ships' 'tacklings' of v. 22. The former set were probably of animal sinews or gut, the latter of twisted flax. The stronger ropes were of three strands (Ec 4¹²). No doubt the fibres of the palm and, as at the present day, goats' hair were spun into ropes. The process of rope-making from leather thongs is illustrated on an Egyptian tomb, the 'wreathen work' (lit. 'rope-work') of Ex 28¹⁴ (see RV), where, however, gold wire is the material used. Ec 12⁸ speaks also of a silver cord, and Job 41² of a 'rope of rushes' (see RVm). The Gr. word for the cords of our Saviour's scourge (Jn 2¹⁴) and the ropes of Ac 27³⁰ also denoted originally such a rope.

The everyday use of cords for binding evil-doers suggested the metaphor of the wicked man 'holden with the cords of his sin' (Pr 5⁷), while from the hunter's snares comes the figure of Ps 140⁶; also 'the cords of death' of Ps 116³ RV.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CORINTH was the capital of the Roman province Achaia, and, in every respect except educationally (see ATHENS), the most important city in Greece in Roman times. It was also a most important station on the route between E. and W., the next station to it on the E. being Ephesus, with which it was in close and continual connexion. Its situation made it a leading centre of Christianity. The city occupied a powerful position at the S. extremity of the narrow isthmus which connected the mainland of Greece with the Peloponnese. Its citadel rises 1800 feet above sea-level, and it was in addition defended by its high walls, which not only surrounded the city but also reached to the harbour Lechæum, on the W. (1½ miles away). The other harbour, Cenchreæ, on the E., on the Saronic Gulf, was about 8½ miles away. The view from the citadel is splendid. The poverty of the stony soil and the neighbourhood of two quiet seas made the Corinthians a maritime people. It was customary to haul ships across from the one sea to the other on a made track called the Diolkos. This method at once saved time and protected the sailors from the dangers of a voyage round Cape Malea (S. of the Peloponnese). Larger ships could not, of course, be conveyed in this way, and in their case the goods must have been conveyed across and transhipped at the other harbour. The place was always crowded with traders and other travellers, and we find St. Paul speaking of Galus of Corinth as 'my host and of the whole Church' (Ro 16²³).

The city had been destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C., but exactly a hundred years afterwards it was refounded by Julius Cæsar as a colonia, under the name Laus Julia Corinthus (see COLONY). A number of Roman names in the NT are found in connexion with Corinth: Crispus, Titius Justus (Ac 18⁷ 9), Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Quartus (Ro 16²³⁻²⁵), Fortunatus (1 Co 16¹⁷). The population would consist of (1) descendants of the Roman colonists of 46 B.C., the local aristocracy; (2) resident Romans, government officials and business men; (3) a large Greek population; (4) other resident strangers, of whom Jews would form a large number (their synagogue Ac 18⁴). Of these some joined St. Paul (Ac 18⁴, Ro 16¹, 1 Co 9³⁰), and the hatred against him in consequence led to a plot against his life. The church, however, consisted chiefly of non-Jews (see 1 Co 12¹²).

St. Paul did not at first intend to make Corinth a centre of work (Ac 18¹), but a special revelation altered his plans (Ac 18⁹⁻¹⁰), and he remained there at least 18 months. The opposition he met in the Jewish synagogue made him turn to the Gentiles. St. Paul left the baptism of his converts almost entirely to his subordinates, and himself baptized only Stephanas (1 Co 16¹⁵), Gaius (Ro 16²³), and Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue (1 Co 1¹⁴⁻¹⁶). Some weeks after his arrival in Corinth, St. Paul was joined by Silas and Timothy, returning from Macedonia. News brought by Timothy caused him to write there the First Ep. to the Thess. (1 Th 3⁶), and the Second was probably written there also, immediately after the receipt of an answer to the First. While St. Paul was in Corinth, Gallio came there as proconsul of the second grade to govern Achaia, probably in the summer of the year 52 A.D. The Jews brought an action before him against St. Paul, but Gallio, rightly recognizing that his court could take no cognizance of a charge of the sort they brought, dismissed the action. St. Paul's preaching was thus declared to be in no way an offence against Roman law, and in future he relied more on his relation to the State, against the enmity of the Jews. After the examination Gallio permitted the populace to show their hatred to the Jews (Ac 18¹⁷). It was in Corinth that St. Paul became acquainted with Prisca and Aquila (Ac 18^{2-3, 18, 26}), and he lived in their house during all his stay. They worked at the same industry as himself, and no doubt influenced his plans for later work. They also left for Ephesus with him.

Christianity grew fast in Corinth, but the inevitable dissensions occurred. Apollos had crossed from Ephesus to Corinth (Ac 18²⁷, 2 Co 3¹) and done valuable work there (Ac 18²⁷⁻²⁸, 1 Co 1¹²). He unconsciously helped to bring about this dissension, as did also Cephas, if (but see next art. § 3) he visited Corinth. The subject of these dissensions is, however, more appropriately dealt with under the following two articles. The Apostle wrote at least three letters to the church: the first, which is lost (1 Co 5⁹); the second, which we call First Corinthians, and which was probably carried by Titus (Timothy also visited Corinth at the instance of St. Paul, 1 Co 4¹⁷); the third, our Second Corinthians, which was taken by Titus and Luke (2 Co 8¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 12¹⁸). St. Paul spent three months in Greece, chiefly no doubt at Corinth, in the winter of 56-57. Whether the Corinthians actually contributed or not to St. Paul's collection for the poor Christians at Jerusalem must remain uncertain (but see p. 159^b, § 2 ad fin.). A. SOUTER.

CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Occasion of the Epistle.

—Some four or five years had elapsed since St. Paul's first evangelization of Corinth when he addressed the present Epistle to the Christians in that great centre of commerce. No doubt there had been frequent communications, especially during the Apostle's stay in Asia, for the journey between Corinth and Ephesus was a very easy one; but the communications were probably by letter only. A former epistle is mentioned in 1 Co 5⁹, in which St. Paul had bidden his disciples 'to have no company with fornicators'—advice which was no doubt considered hard to obey in the most vicious and pleasure-loving city of the world, and which to some extent is modified in the present Epistle (5¹⁰⁻¹¹); and a letter from the Corinthians to St. Paul is the immediate object of the Apostle's writing on the present occasion (7¹). But before answering it, he reproves the Corinthians for certain abuses which he had heard of from 'the [household] of Chloe' (1¹¹), namely, schism and party spirit, a bad case of incest, and litigiousness; for 'they of Chloe' seem to have been St. Paul's informants on all these matters. Chloe was perhaps a woman of importance who carried on a trade in Corinth, as Lydia of Thyatira did at Philippi (Ac 16¹⁴). She therefore not improbably belonged to Asia Minor—the reference to her seems to imply that she was not a Corinthian,—and 'they of Chloe' would be her agents who passed to and fro between Ephesus and Corinth. Having reproved the Corinthians for these abuses, the Apostle answers the questions put in their letter to him, as to marriage and other social questions; perhaps also as to Christian worship, the doctrine of the Resurrection, and the collection for the poor of Judæa. We may consider these topics in order.

2. The state of the Corinthian Church.—It will be remembered that the majority of the Christians at Corinth were Gentiles, though there were some Jews among them (Ro 16²¹, 1 Co 7¹⁸ 9²⁰ 12¹³), including such influential men as Crispus (Ac 18⁸) and (probably) Sosthenes (Ac 18¹⁷, 1 Co 1¹). It was the heathen antecedents of the Corinthians that led to most of the evils for which St. Paul rebukes them (6¹¹ 12²). The Apostle, though he had not intended to stay long in Corinth when he first went there, desiring to return to Macedonia (1 Th 2¹⁸), yet, when his wish was found to be impracticable, threw himself with all his heart into the task of making heathen Corinth, the famous trade centre which lay on one of the greatest routes of communication in the Empire, into a religious centre for the spread of the gospel (cf. Ac 18³). But the difficulties were not those with which he had met in Athens, where the philosophic inhabitants derided him. At Corinth the vices of the city had lowered the tone of public opinion; and when St. Paul preached Christ crucified with all plainness of speech (1 Co 1¹⁷), many heard him gladly, but retained with their nominal Christianity their old heathen ideas on morals. He preached no longer 'wisdom' to the Jewish lawyer or the Greek sophist (1²⁰), but salvation to the plain man; the Gentiles had no sense of sin, and the preaching of a personal Saviour was to them 'folly' (1²³). We need not indeed suppose, as Sir W. Ramsay (Expositor vi. [i.] 98) points out, that the passage 1²⁰ describes Corinthian Christians as distinguished from those in other places; the disciples at Corinth were not merely the 'dregs of society,' separated from the rest of the population, as the negro from the white man in some countries to-day. Ramsay thinks that the special work of the Church was to raise the thoughtful and educated middle classes. It certainly included men of means (11²⁰). Still, the upper classes and the learned were everywhere less attracted by Christianity than were the poor, with certain conspicuous exceptions, such as St. Paul himself.

It has been debated how far the Church was organised at Corinth at this time. The ministry is seldom referred to in these two Epistles; the 'bishops and deacons' of Ph 1¹ are not mentioned; but we read of apostles, prophets, and teachers (12²⁸). It would, however, be unsafe to conclude that there was not a settled local ministry at Corinth. St. Paul had certainly established presbyters in every Church on his First Journey (Ac 14²³), and so apparently in Asia on his Second (20¹⁷). In this Epistle the regular ministers are perhaps not explicitly mentioned, because they were the very persons who were most responsible for the disorders (Goudge, Westminster Com. p. xxxvi), while in ch. 12 the possession of 'spiritual gifts' is the subject of discussion, and the mention of the regular ministry would not be germane to it. A settled order of clergy is implied in 9⁷ 14¹⁴.

3. Party Spirit at Corinth.—It is more correct to say that there were parties in the Church than that the Corinthians had made schisms. We read, not of rival organizations, but of factions in the one organization. It is noteworthy that Clement of Rome (Cor. 1, 47), writing less than 50 years later, refers to the factions prevalent at Corinth in his time. The Greeks were famous for factions; their cities could never combine together for long. In St. Paul's time there was a Paul-party, and also an Apollos-party, a Cephas-party, and a Christ-party (1¹²), though the words 'but I [am] of Christ' are interpreted by Estlin (Com. ed. Sausen, M.

CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO

110) and many Greek and Latin commentators, and also perhaps by Clement of Rome (see below, § 10), as being St. Paul's own observation: 'You make parties, taking Paul, Apollos, Cephas as leaders, but I, Paul, am no party man, I am Christ's' (cf. 3²³). If, however, we take the more usual interpretation that there were four parties, we may ask what lines of thought they severally represented. The Apollos-party would probably consist of those who disparaged St. Paul as not being sufficiently eloquent and philosophical (cf. 2¹⁻¹³, Ac 18²⁴, 2 Co 10¹⁰ 11⁵). The Cephas-party would be the party of the circumcision, as in Galatia. At Corinth the great dispute about the Law was as yet in its infancy; it seems to have grown when 2 Corinthians was written (see § 7 (c) below). The Christ-party, it has been conjectured, was the ultra-latitudinarian party, which caricatured St. Paul's teaching about liberty (cf. Ro 6¹); or (Alford) consisted of those who made a merit of not being attached to any human teacher, and who therefore slighted the Apostleship of St. Paul. Another view is that the Christ-party consisted of the Judaizers mentioned in 2 Co. and Gal. as denying St. Paul's Apostleship (Goudge, p. xxi.: cf. 2 Co 10⁷ where St. Paul's opponents claim to be peculiarly Christ's); but it is not easy in that case to distinguish them from the Cephas-party. There is no sufficient reason for deducing from 1 Co 1¹² 9⁴ that St. Peter had visited Corinth, and that this party consisted of his personal disciples.—St. Paul, then, reproves all these parties, and most emphatically those who called themselves by his name. They were united by baptism with Christ, not with him (1¹³).

4. Moral Scandals (ch. 5).—A Christian had married his (probably heathen) step-mother. Perhaps his father had been separated from her on his becoming a Christian, but (if 2 Co 7¹² refers to this incident) was still alive; and the son thereupon married her. The Corinthian Church, in the low state of public opinion, did not condemn this, and did not even mention it in their letter to St. Paul. St. Paul reproves them for tolerating 'such fornication as is not even among the Gentiles' [the word 'named' of the AV text has no sufficient authority]. There is a difficulty here, for the heathen tolerated even more incestuous connexions, as between a man and his half-sister. Ramsay (Exp. vi. [i.] 110) supposes the Apostle to mean that the Roman law forbade such marriage. The Roman law of affinity was undoubtedly very strict, and Corinth, as a colony, would be familiar with Roman law; though the law was not usually put in force. The Jews strongly denounced such connexions (Am 2⁷). The Apostle says nothing of the punishment of the heathen step-mother (cf. 1 Co 5³), but the man is to be 'delivered unto Satan' (5⁵, cf. 1 Ti 1¹⁰).

This phrase probably means simple excommunication, including the renouncing of all intercourse with the offender (cf. 5¹³), though many take it to denote the infliction of some miraculous punishment, disease, or death, and deny that the offender of 2 Co 2 and 7 is the incestuous Corinthian of 1 Co 5. Ramsay conjectures that the phrase is a Christian adaptation of a pagan idiom, that a person wronged by another but unable to retaliate should consign the offender to the gods and leave punishment to be inflicted by Divine power; Satan would be looked on as God's instrument in punishing the offender; and the latter, being cast out of the Christian community, would be left as a prey to the devil.

5. Legal Scandals.—St. Paul rebukes the Corinthians for litigiousness, 6¹⁻⁸. This passage is usually interpreted as superseding heathen imperial tribunals by voluntary Christian courts for all cases, such as the Jews often had. Ramsay (Exp. vi. [i.] 274) suggests that the Apostle, who usually treats Roman institutions with respect, is not here considering serious questions of crime and fraud at all, nor yet law courts whether heathen or Christian, but those smaller matters which Greeks were accustomed to submit to arbitration. In Roman times, as this procedure developed, the arbiters became really judges of an inferior court, recognized by the law, and the magistrates appointed them. In this view St. Paul reproves the Corinthians for taking their umphres from among the heathen instead of from among their Christian brethren.

CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO

6. Questions of Moral Sin and of Marriage (6^{12-7⁴⁰}).—Probably the passage 6¹²⁻²⁰ is part of the answer to the Corinthian letter. The correspondent had said, 'All things are lawful for me.' But all things (the Apostle replies) are not expedient. 'Meats are for the belly, and the belly for meats' (i.e. just as food is natural to the body, so is impurity). But both are transitory, and the body as a whole is for the Lord; in virtue of the Resurrection fornication is a serious sin, for it destroys the spiritual character of the body. True marriage is the most perfect symbol of the relation between Christ and the Church (6¹²; cf. Eph 5²³). In ch. 7 the Apostle answers the Corinthians' questions about marriage. It is usually thought that they wished to extol asceticism, basing their view on our Lord's words in Mt 19¹¹, that they suggested that celibacy was to be strongly encouraged in all, and that the Apostle, though agreeing as an abstract principle, yet, because of imminent persecution and Jesus' immediate return (7²⁶, 29), replied that in many cases celibacy was undesirable. But Ramsay points out that such a question is unnatural to both Jews and Gentiles of that time. The better heathen tried to enforce marriage as a cure for immorality; while the Jews looked on it as an universal duty. Ramsay supposes, therefore, that the Corinthians wished to make marriage compulsory, and that St. Paul pleads for a voluntary celibacy. Against this it is urged that the Essenes (a Jewish sect) upheld non-marriage. But it is difficult to think, in view of 11¹¹ and Eph 5²², that St. Paul held the celibate life to be essentially the higher one, and the married life only a matter of permission, a concession to weakness.—After positive commands as to divorce (7¹⁰) the Apostle answers in 7²⁶ another question: which would be either (see above) a suggestion that fathers should be discouraged from finding husbands for their daughters, or that they should be compelled to do so. On the latter supposition, St. Paul says that there is no obligation, and that the daughter may well remain unmarried. The subject is concluded with advice as to widows' re-marriage.

7. Social Questions (8^{1-11¹}).—(a) Food.—Another question was whether Christians may eat meats which had previously been offered to idols, as most of the meat sold in Corinth would have been. St. Paul's answer is a running commentary on the Corinthians' words (so Lock, Exp. v. [vi.] 65; Ramsay agrees): 'We know that we all have knowledge; we are not bound by absurd ceremonial restrictions.' Yes, but knowledge puffeth up; without love and humility it is nothing; besides not all have knowledge. 'The false gods are really non-existent; we have but one God; as there is no such thing really as an idol we are free to eat meats offered in idol temples.' But there are weaker brethren who would be scandalized. 'Meat will not commend us to God; it is indifferent.' But do not let your liberty cause others to fall (note the change of pronoun in v. 8¹).

Why is the decree of Ac 15²⁸ not quoted? Lock suggests that it is because at Corinth there was no question between Jew and Gentile, but only between Gentile and Gentile, and Jewish opinion might be neglected. Ramsay (Exp. vi. [ii.] 375) thinks that the decree is not mentioned because it was the very subject of discussion. The Corinthians had said (he supposes): 'Why should we be tied down by the Council's decree here at Corinth, so long after? We know better than to suppose that a non-existent idol can taint food.' St. Paul replies, maintaining the spirit of the decree, that offence must not be given to the weaker brethren (so Hort).

(b) Idol Feasts (8¹⁰⁻¹² 10^{14-11¹}).—St. Paul absolutely forbids eating at idol feasts. Probably many of the Corinthians had retained their connexion with pagan clubs. The pagan feast meant a brotherhood or special bond of union; but the two kinds of brotherhood were incompatible. A Christian who, out of complaisance, attends an idol feast, is really entering a hostile brotherhood.

(c) Digression on Forbearance (9^{1-10¹⁰}).—St. Paul says that he habitually considers the rights of others and does not press his own rights as an Apostle to the full; he implies that the Corinthians should not press their liberty so as to scandalize others. This passage shows how little as yet the Judaizers had been at work in Corinth. St. Paul announces his position as an Apostle, and the right of the Christian minister to live of the gospel, but he will not use his rights to the full (9¹⁸ RV). He teaches self-denial and earnestness from the example of the Isthmian games (9^{24ff.}), and shows that the Israelites, in spite of all their privileges, fell from lack of this self-discipline. It is noteworthy that he speaks of 'our fathers' (10¹). Perhaps, having addressed the Gentiles in particular in ch. 9, he now turns to the Jewish section of the Corinthian Church; he refers to a Rabbinical legend in 10⁴. Or he may be considering the whole Church as being the spiritual descendants of Israel.

8. Christian Worship (11^{1-14⁴⁰}).—(a) Veiling of Women.—In reply (as it seems) to another question, St. Paul says that it is the Christian custom for men 'praying or prophesying' to have their heads uncovered, but for women to have theirs covered. This apparently trivial matter is an instance of the application of Christian principles to Christian ceremonial. The Jews of both sexes prayed with head covered and with a veil before the face (cf. 2 Co 3¹⁶); therefore St. Paul's injunction does not follow Jewish custom. It is based on the subordination of the woman to the man, and is illustrated by the existence of regulated ranks among the angels; for this seems to be the meaning of 11¹⁰.

(b) The Eucharist.—The Corinthians joined together in a social meal—somewhat later called an Agape or Love-feast—and the Eucharist, probably in imitation both of the Last Supper and of the Jewish and heathen meals taken in common. To this combination the name 'Lord's Supper' (here only in NT) is given. But the party-spirit, already spoken of, showed itself in this custom; the Corinthians did not eat the Lord's supper, but their own, because of their factions. St. Paul therefore gives the narrative of our Lord's Institution as he himself had received it, strongly condemns those who make an unworthy communion as 'guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord,' and inculcates preparation by self-probation.

It is chiefly this passage that has led some to think that the writer of the Epistle is quoting the Synoptic Gospels (see below, § 10); the Lukan account, as we have it in our Bibles, is very like the Pauline. But the deduction is very improbable. Even if our Lukan text is right, the result is only what we should have expected, that the companion of St. Paul has taken his master's form of the narrative, which he would doubtless have frequently heard him use liturgically, and has incorporated it in his Gospel. As a matter of fact, however, it is not improbable that the Lukan form was really much shorter than the Pauline, and that some early scribe has lengthened it to make it fit in with 1 Co 11²². (Westcott-Hort, NT in Greek, ii. Append. p. 64).

(c) Spiritual Gifts (chs. 12-14).—The public manifestation of the presence of the Spirit known as 'speaking with tongues' (see art. TONGUES [GIFT OF]), seems to have been very common at Corinth. After the magnificent digression of ch. 13, which shows that of all spiritual gifts love is the greatest, that it alone is eternal, that without it all other gifts are useless, St. Paul applies the principle that spiritual gifts are means to an end, not an end in themselves; and he therefore upholds 'prophecy' (i.e., in this connexion, the interpretation of Scripture and of Christian doctrine) as superior to speaking with tongues, because it edifies all present. He says, further, that women are to keep silence (i.e. not to prophesy?) in the public assemblies (14³⁴, cf. 1 Ti 2¹³). In 11⁵ (cf. Ac 21⁹) some women are said to have had the gift of prophecy; so that we must understand that they were allowed to exercise it only among women, or in their own households. But possibly the Apostle has chiefly in his mind questions asked by women in the public assemblies (cf. 14³⁴).

9. The Resurrection of the Body (ch. 15).—This, the only doctrinal chapter of the Epistle, contains also the earliest evidence for our Lord's resurrection. Apparently the Gentile converts at Corinth felt a great difficulty in accepting the doctrine of the resurrection of the body; it appeared to them too material a doctrine to be true (15¹², cf. 2 Ti 2¹⁸). St. Paul replies that Christ has risen, as many still alive can testify, and that therefore the dead will rise. For his treatment of the subject see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, iii. 10. The Corinthian scepticism does not seem to have died out at the end of the century, for Clement of Rome, writing to Corinth, strongly emphasizes the doctrine (Cor. 24f.).

St. Paul concludes the Epistle with directions about the regular collecting of alms for the poor Christians of Judæa, and with personal notices and salutations.

10. Date and genuineness of the Epistle.—It is referred to as St. Paul's by Clement of Rome, c. A.D. 95 (Cor. 47), who speaks of the parties of Paul, Cephas, and Apollos, but omits the Christ-party (see above § 3); we cannot infer from his phrase 'the Epistle of the blessed Paul' that he knew only one Epistle to the Corinthians, as early usage shows (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. 143). There are other clear allusions in Clement. Ignatius (Eph. 18f.) refers to 1 Co 1²⁰, 2¹, 4¹³ and probably 2²; Polycarp (§ 11) quotes 1 Co 6¹ as Paul's; references are found in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, in Justin Martyr, and in the Epistle to Diognetus; while Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian at the end of the 2nd cent. quote the Epistle fully. Of the 2nd cent. heretics the Ophites and Basilides certainly knew it. Internal evidence fully bears out the external; no Epistle shows more clearly the mark of originality; and the undesigned coincidences between it and Acts, which Paley draws out, point in the same direction. It is in fact one of the four 'generally accepted' Epistles of St. Paul. See art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, i. 2, for the general arguments adduced against their genuineness. Against that of our Epistle in particular it has been alleged that it is dependent on Romans—thus, 4¹ ('the things which are written') is said to be a quotation of Ro 12², surely a most fanciful idea—and on the Synoptic Gospels, especially in two particulars, the account of the Last Supper (see § 8 (b) above), and that of the Resurrection appearances of our Lord (15⁴). The real problem of the latter passage, however (as Goudge remarks, p. xxvii.), is not to account for the extent to which it runs parallel with the Gospels, but to explain why it does not run more nearly parallel with them. Few will be convinced by a criticism which practically assumes that a Christian writer of the 1st cent. could only know the facts of our Lord's earthly life from our Gospels. We may then take the genuineness of the Epistle as being unassailable.

If so, what is its date? Relatively to the rest of the Pauline chronology, it may be approximately fixed. In the year of his arrest at Jerusalem, St. Paul left Corinth in the early spring, after spending three months there (Ac 20², 6). He must therefore have arrived there in late autumn or early winter. This seems to have been the visit to Corinth promised in 2 Co 13¹, which was the third visit. Two visits in all must have therefore preceded 2 Cor. (some think also 1 Cor.), and in any case an interval of some months between the two Epistles must be allowed for. In 1 Co 16⁹ the Apostle had announced his intention of wintering in Corinth, and it is possible that the visit of Ac 20² is the fulfilment of this intention, though St. Paul certainly did not carry out all his plans at this time (2 Co 1¹⁶, 23). If so, 1 Cor. would have been written from Ephesus in the spring of the year before St. Paul's arrest at Jerusalem.

This date is favoured by the allusion of 5⁷, which suggests to many commentators that the Easter festival was being, or about to be, celebrated when St. Paul wrote. It is a little doubtful, however, whether the Gentile churches kept the annuals as well as the weekly feast of the Resurrection at this early date; see art. 'Calendar, The Christian,' in Hastings' DCG i. 256.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. p. 275) thinks that we must date our Epistle some six months earlier, in the second autumn before St. Paul's arrest. The events alluded to in 2 Cor. require a long interval between the Epistles. Moreover, the Corinthians had begun the collection for the poor Jews 'a year ago' when St. Paul wrote 2 Cor. (8¹⁰ 9²), and it seems, therefore, that at least a year must have elapsed since the injunction of 1 Co 16¹. It is suggested, however, that we should rather translate the phrase 'last year,' and that to one who used the Macedonian calendar, and who wrote in the autumn, 'last spring' would also be 'last year,' for the new year began in September. On the whole, however, the argument about the Easter festival seems to be precarious, and the conditions are probably better satisfied if a longer interval be allowed, and the First Epistle put about 18 months before St. Paul's arrest. The absolute, as opposed to the relative, date will depend on our view of the rival schemes given in art. CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT, § iii. A. J. MACLEAN.

CORINTHIANS, SECOND EPISTLE TO.—1. Circumstances of the Epistle.—The circumstances of this Epistle are more difficult to discover than those of any other of St. Paul's Epistles. The historical situation has been well described as a 'trackless forest,' and as a consequence the views of writers are very varied. We may best start by noticing that the Epistle was clearly written when the Apostle was burdened by some great anxiety, perhaps physical, but assuredly spiritual (11³). This anxiety seems to have been connected with at least three things: (a) a mission of Titus; (b) a letter St. Paul had written to Corinth, either our 1 Cor., or an Epistle now lost (7²); (c) the treatment of some offender at Corinth, either the guilty one of 1 Co 5¹, or some resolute opponent of St. Paul's authority. In 13¹ we read of a projected third visit (for such seems the most natural interpretation of the words), and this presupposes a second visit of which we have no record. Four questions then need to be answered. (1) Why Titus' mission should have caused anxiety? (2) What was the letter that led to St. Paul's concern as to its effect? (3) Who was the offender referred to? (4) When did the second visit take place?

2. St. Paul and Corinth.—The Church was founded in 53 or 54 on the Second Missionary Journey (Ac 18¹). St. Paul remained there two years. After leaving, he kept up communications (2 Co 12¹⁷), though it was only at Ephesus on the Third Missionary Journey in 56 (Ac 19¹) that he could resume personal intercourse. While there, he heard of the terrible immorality, and wrote a short letter (1 Co 5⁴), ordering them to have no intercourse with fornicators. This letter, now lost, may be referred to in 2 Co 1¹³; and if so, it may have contained a statement that he would come to Corinth before going to Macedonia. This project, however, was altered (1 Co 16⁵). About the same time (A.D. 56) he possibly paid a second visit from Ephesus to Corinth, which caused him great pain and grief (2 Co 2¹ 12¹⁴ 21 13¹). Then in the spring of 57 he wrote 1 Cor., and on the strength of his Apostolic authority ordered the punishment of the incestuous person (1 Co 5¹⁻⁴). At the same time he sent Timothy on a mission (1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁰) to support and supplement his letter. It is possible that Timothy returned with the sad news that the Church refused to carry out St. Paul's orders, or possibly that there was a growing opposition to his authority under some Judaizing ringleader. Then followed the mission of Titus, carrying with him a letter, our 1 Cor., or another now lost (2 Co 2¹ 7⁴), in which St. Paul insisted on Church discipline. Paul leaves Ephesus owing to riot (Ac 19), expects to see Titus in Troas, but does not meet him until they reach Macedonia in the summer or autumn of 57 (2 Co 2¹² 13¹). The news Titus brought from Corinth is mixed. The majority of the Church had obeyed his orders and punished the offender (2 Co 2⁶⁻¹¹), but the Judaizers had grown stronger in opposition to the Apostle, charging him with inconsistency, false Apostleship, boasting, and money-making. They were also probably endeavouring to thwart his collections for Jerusalem (1 Co 16¹, 2 Co 8⁹). Not least of all was the still existing danger for Gentile converts of relapsing into heathen worship and impurity (2 Co 6¹⁴ 7¹ 12¹⁹⁻²¹). As a result of this news, St. Paul writes our 2 Cor., in which (1) he expresses great satisfaction at the good news of discipline exercised against evildoers, (2) justifies the collection for Jerusalem, and (3) vindicates his Apostolic authority. Then followed a visit (the third) to Corinth, and a stay of three months (Ac 20³).

The most uncertain point is the place of the second visit. As above stated, it is thought by some to have taken place before our 1 Cor. was written, though others suggest it should come soon after Timothy's mission and as a result of his failure. On this view, however, it is difficult, if not impossible, to account for Titus' mission. It is also urged (Robertson in Hastings' DB) that a place for the second visit cannot be found anterior to our 1 Cor., and it must therefore be removed altogether from the sphere and circumstances of our two Epistles. It is also uncertain whether the offender is the one of 1 Cor., as seems more probable, or some entirely different person who was a virulent opponent of St. Paul's Apostolic authority. Godet makes out a strong and almost convincing case for a different set of circumstances in 2 Cor. from those in 1 Corinthians. There is equal uncertainty as to the letter about which St. Paul was anxious. Most probably it is one now lost, and not our 1 Corinthians. Denney (Expos. Bible) considers the connexion between 1 and 2 Cor. so close as to need no hypotheses of additional Epistles now lost. He would explain 2 Cor. entirely out of 1 Corinthians. Bernard favours this view (so formerly Plummer). On the other hand, Godet places the second visit between our 1 and 2 Cor., which visit is thought to be the painful and recent one in 2 Co 1¹³ 12¹. The following, modified from Robertson (Hastings' DB i. 495), is perhaps the best scheme of events:—(1) Foundation of Church at Corinth (Ac 18¹⁻⁴). (2) Apollos at Corinth (Ac 19¹, 1 Co 1¹²). (3) St. Paul at Ephesus (Ac 19¹). [The second visit to Corinth if before our 1 Cor.] (4) Lost letter of 1 Co 5⁴ (perhaps announcing the plan of 2 Co 1¹³). (5) Some would put second visit to Corinth here. (6) Visit of Stephanas and others from Corinth to St. Paul at Ephesus (1 Co 16¹⁷ 18¹), asking for advice on certain matters (1 Co 7¹⁻³). (7) 1 Cor. sent by Titus and the 'brother' (2 Co 12¹⁸). (8) St. Paul determines to pay a double visit to Corinth (2 Co 1¹⁴). (9) Painful news from Corinth through Titus leads to a change of plan. (10) A severe letter sent. (11) Titus sent to Corinth (2 Co 7¹⁻¹³), with, on the whole, favourable results. (12) Titus returns and meets St. Paul in Macedonia. (13) Titus sent to Corinth with 2 Corinthians. (14) St. Paul's visit to Corinth and three months' stay (Ac 20³).

It is interesting to note the happy results of this letter. Not only did the Apostle go again to Corinth, but actually wintered there. Still more, it was during these three months that he wrote his great Epistle to the Romans, the quiet tone and massive strength of which bear witness to the restfulness of the Apostle's mind and heart, as well as to the complete victory over the Judaizers. Not least of all, his favourite project—the collection for Jerusalem—was brought to a successful completion, and the Church of Corinth had some of its members included in the delegation to Jerusalem (Ac 20⁴). His vigorous Epistle was therefore not in vain, and Corinth and the whole Church have been the gainers by it in the overruling providence of God.

3. Date.—1 Cor. was written in the spring of 57, and 2 Cor. probably in the same year, though it is impossible to say definitely what was the exact interval between them. The all-engrossing topic of the collection for Jerusalem (chs. 8 and 9) indicates the date as during the time of the Third Missionary Journey. St. Paul had left Asia (1⁹), and had passed through Troas (2¹³), and was in Macedonia (2¹⁴ 9¹). From Ac 20³ we know that he wintered at Corinth, and so 2 Cor. fits in exact-with Ac 20². Waite (Speaker's Com.) therefore suggests October 57 and not earlier. This would suit the circumstances of Timothy's and Titus' visits, and account for the great change at Corinth towards St. Paul. Godet would put just over a year between the two Epistles, arguing that such a change of circumstances and tone could not have arisen within a few months.

4. Integrity.—There is no ground for supposing that the letter is not now in its original form. Recent attempts to separate it into two letters and to identify one of them (chs. 10-13) with the supposed lost painful Epistle, are not only not convincing in their arguments, but also have the great weight of textual criticism and Church tradition against them. It is impossible to suppose that all trace of such textual changes could have been entirely removed. Our authorities for the text are early enough to make us question the possibility of a sufficient time elapsing for so serious a modification of the original text. The subject-matter entirely agrees with the situation described above. The strong feelings under which the Epistle was written, and the conflicting emotions which swayed the Apostle, amply account for its ruggedness and abruptness.

5. Character.—Not even Galatians gives so full a revelation of the Apostle's mind and soul as does 2 Corinthians. It has been rightly called 'Paul's Apologia,' and as 1 Cor. is the first chapter of Ecclesiastical History, so 2 Cor. is the first chapter of Ecclesiastical Biography. It reveals the personal character of the great Apostle of the Gentiles in its twofold aspect of tenderness and strength, gentleness and severity, meekness and indignation. In questioning his Apostolic authority, the Judaizers were really questioning the gospel he preached, and indirectly the Master he loved and served. We are not surprised, therefore, to notice the vehemence of his vindication and the torrent of irony and denunciation with which he overwhelms his opponents. Here as nowhere else we see the man he was, stern yet tender, with a will of steel and yet a heart of wax. The iron hand and the velvet glove are combined in no common degree. His spiritual experiences are also brought out here as nowhere else; his visions (12¹), his 'thorn' (v. 7), his conflicts (2¹⁰ 12⁷), his physical weakness (4⁷), his constant sufferings (11²³⁻²⁷). We see something of what he had to endure from his unscrupulous Judaizing foes in their remarks about his personal appearance (10⁹), his fickleness (11⁷), his pretended Apostleship and Jewish birth (11²), and his doubtful, if not dishonest, motives about the collection (6³). But if we see what he endured, we see also what he enjoyed in union with his Master. We have not a few indications of his personal relation to Christ and his oneness with his Master in suffering (1³ 4¹⁰), fellowship (12⁸ 9), and the hope of glory (5¹). The keynote of chs. 1-9 is 'comfort in tribulation,' and of chs. 10-13 'boasting in weakness.' The Epistle is thus noteworthy for its remarkable revelation of the inner life of the Apostle as he faced his enemies, pleaded with his friends, bore the burden of the care of all the Churches, and lived in fellowship and communion with His unseen Lord and Master.

The doctrinal element of the Epistle is necessarily not prominent, but the foundations of the characteristic Pauline position are both assumed and seen. The comparison between the two dispensations (ch. 3), the teaching about Christ's death (5¹⁴⁻²¹), the eschatology (4^{18-5¹}), the Christology (8¹⁹), and the Trinitarian expression of the concluding Benediction (13¹⁴), are among the leading Apostolic thoughts.

6. Authenticity.—There are but slight traces of the Epistle in the writers of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, though this is not to be wondered at, because of its personal rather than doctrinal character. The evidence for the text of the Epistle is, of course, practically on the same basis as that of 1 Corinthians. The real proofs of authenticity are internal, and are found in the character of the Epistle. It is too manifestly Pauline in its intensely individual character to be other than genuine, and hence it has long been one of the four undisputed Epistles of Paul.

7. Analysis.—The personal and emotional nature of the contents makes analysis far less easy than that of Epistles which were written under very different, because quieter, circumstances. Perhaps we may best understand and master the contents of the Epistle if, generally following Godet, we analyze it under its three main sections. Their connexion is mainly chronological: 11^{2-7¹⁰} dealing with the past in relation to himself and Corinth, 8^{1-9¹⁸} dealing with a special and important matter of present duty, and 10^{1-13¹⁰} taking up a question that affected the entire future of his relations to them and the whole Church.

- (1) Personal Introduction, 11¹⁻¹¹.
- (2) 11^{2-7¹⁰}. Himself and his ministry with special reference to Corinth. The Past.
 - (a) 11²⁻²¹. Explanation of his change of plans.
 - (b) 21^{2-7¹⁰}. After personal references he passes to discuss the Christian ministry.
 - i. Its power, 21^{4-4⁸}.
 - ii. Its tribulations and hopes, 4^{7-5¹⁰}.
 - iii. Its object and source, 5¹¹⁻²¹.
 - iv. Its fulfilment by himself, 5^{1-7¹⁰}.
 - (c) 7¹⁴⁻¹⁶. The return of Titus and its glad results.
- (3) 8^{1-9¹⁸}. His efforts on behalf of the poor saints in Jerusalem. The Present.
 - (a) 8¹⁻⁸. The example of Macedonia.
 - (b) 8^{9-9¹⁸}. The new mission of Titus.
 - (c) 9⁹⁻¹⁵. The Corinthian Church encouraged to give.
- (4) 10^{1-13¹⁰}. His approaching visit to Corinth, and the consequent need of a personal vindication in the face of enemies. The Future.
 - (a) 10¹⁻¹⁸. His claim to Apostolic authority.
 - (b) 11^{1-12¹⁸}. His claim to superiority of Apostleship.
 - (c) 12^{12-13¹⁰}. His contemplated visit and mode of procedure.
- (5) Personal conclusion, 13¹¹⁻¹³.

[NOTE.—The chronology given above follows Lightfoot. According to Turner (Hastings' DB, art. 'Chronology of the NT') the dates would all be two years earlier.]

CORMORANT (Lv 11¹⁷, Dt 14¹⁷, shālāk).—The shālāk, as the meaning of the word implies, was some kind of plunging bird. Two varieties of cormorant, Phalacrocorax carbo and P. pygmaeus, occur in Palestine both on the sea coasts and on inland waters, e.g. the Dead Sea. It was an 'unclean' bird. See also PELICAN.

CORN.—This term may be taken to include—(1) Barley, (2) Wheat, (3) Fitches, (4) Lentils, (5) Beans, (6) Millet, (7) Rye, wrong translation for 'Vetches,' (8) Pulse—for most of which see separate articles. Rye and oats are not cultivated in Palestine.

E. W. G. MANSTERMAN.

CORNELIUS.—A 'proselyte of the gate' or 'devout man' (Ac 10¹, see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 6), whose baptism was a step forward towards admitting the Gentiles into the Church. He was a Roman centurion of the Italic cohort (see art. BANI). An inscription recently discovered near Vicenza shows that an Italic cohort was stationed in Syria c. A.D. 69, and this makes St. Luke's statement (once said to be an anachronism) quite probable. If the presence of such an officer in Caesarea was not possible during the semi-independent rule of Agrippa (A.D. 41-44), we must date the episode before that; but we cannot assert such an impossibility.

A. J. MACLEAN.

CORNER, CORNER-STONE.—1. The special sanctity which in the Hebrew mind attached to corners is to be regarded as an inheritance from certain primitive and widely-spread animistic conceptions. Several of these were taken up and, so to say, 'regularized' in the later legislation (cf. the remarks on Azazel under ATONEMENT [DAY OF]). Examples will be found in the ideas associated with the corners of the altar (Zec 9¹⁴), usually termed the 'horns' (ALTAR, § 7), the unraised corners of the field (Lv 19⁹; AGRICULTURE, § 3), the corners of the beard and head-hair (v.²⁷) and of the upper garment or cloak (FRINGES).

2. Another illustration is found in the importance attached among many peoples to the corner-stone in the foundation course of every important building, which was laid with religious rites, including, in early times, the burial beneath it of a human victim (see HOUSE, § 3). The corrected text of Is 28¹⁶ speaks of 'a precious foundation corner-stone,' which is neither Zion (as usually interpreted), nor the future Messiah, but a calm trust in J^h; hence the prophet adds 'he that trusts shall not be moved' or 'put to shame' (LXX, cf. 1 P 2⁸ and Kittel, Bib. Heb.). Jer 51²⁸ and Job 38⁶ both associate the corner-stone with the foundations. Hence the figurative use of the word for the chief men of the State, as its 'corners,' i.e. supports and defences (Jg 20², 1 S 14³⁸ [cf. marg.], Is 19¹³ RV, Zec 10⁴). On the other hand, the stone of Ps 118²² which became 'the head of the corner' (RV)—the reference is to Zion—is understood by many to be the corner-stone of the topmost course (cf. the head stone of Zec 4⁷, which is different from the 'foundation' of v.⁹). In NT this passage and Is 28¹⁶ receive a Messianic application, Jesus Christ being both the foundation and the head of His Church (Mt 21⁴², Ac 4¹¹, 1 P 2⁶).

CORNET.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

CORRUPTION.—Jewish anthropology conceived of man as composed of two elements, the physical body and the soul. At death the soul went to Sheol, and the body decayed. The term 'corruption' came, therefore, to stand for the physical aspects of that state which followed death and preceded the resurrection. In this sense it is used in Ac 2²⁷, 21 13³⁴⁻³⁷, 1 Co 15⁴², 50; cf. also 1 Co 15⁵³⁻⁵⁴. There is no evidence that it had a moral force, although some have found such an implication in Gal 6⁸, where the reference is rather to a belief that the wicked will not share in the glories of the resurrection. Neither is it a term to indicate annihilation, which idea does not seem to have been held by the Palestinian Jews. Jesus through His resurrection is represented (2 Ti 1¹⁰) as having brought life and incorruption to light. The resurrection as a part of salvation is thus placed in sharpest contrast with the condition of the personality following physical death, since, as St. Paul says (2 Co 5¹), for a man who is saved, the decomposition of the physical body is but an occasion for the assumption of an incorruptible heavenly body.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

COS.—An island off the coast of Caria, S.W. of Asia Minor, famous for its fertility and beauty. It was a Dorian colony, and a great seat of the worship of Æsculapius and of the study of medicine. Its position made it also an important place from a trade point of view, as it lay on the cross lines of traffic between Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. It is uncertain whether Cos, which had been a faithful ally of the Romans, was incorporated in the province of Asia in B.C. 139 (see CARIA), but it certainly was a part of it in the time of Augustus. Its trade connexion made it one of the Jewish centres of the Ægean. The Jews there were favoured by the Romans in A.C. 139-138 (1 Mac 15²²). It was a place on the route of the Jewish pilgrims to Jerusalem (cf. Ac 21¹). Herod the Great was a benefactor of the people of Cos.

A. SOUTER.

COSAM.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³⁸).

COSMOGONY.—See CREATION.

COSSEANS.—A name adapted from the Greek form of Bab. Kasshe, a semi-barbarous people inhabiting the mountain region between Elam and Media proper. They answer to Cush (wh. see) in Gn 10⁸ (and 21²⁷) as distinguished from the African Cush. They were a powerful people between the 18th and the 12th centuries B.C., during which time Babylonia was ruled by a Cossean dynasty. J. F. MCCURDY.

COTTON is the better tr. (so RVm) of karpas, which in AV and RV is tr. 'green,' Est 1⁶. It was either muslin or calico. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

COUCH.—See HOUSE, § 8. The verb 'to couch' occurs in Dt 33¹³ 'the deep that coucheth beneath.' The word means simply to lie down, but it is used almost exclusively of animals, as is the Heb. word also. The subterranean deep, says Driver, is perhaps pictured as a gigantic monster.

COULTER.—Only 1 S 13^{26f}. for the word elsewhere rendered 'plow-share,' and so it should be here, as the Hebrew plough, like its Syrian representative to-day, had no coulter. See AGRICULTURE, § 1.

COUNCIL.—See SANHEDRIN. For the Council o. Ac 15, Gal 2, see PAUL, GALATIANS [EP. 70], § 3.

COUNSELLOR.—This is the spelling in modern editions of the AV. In the ed. of 1611 it is 'counselor,' except in Ezr 8²⁴, Pr 12²⁰ 15², where the spelling is 'counselour.' The word is used mostly of a king's counsellor, or more generally of one who gives counsel. But in Dn 3² it means a justice; and in Mk 15², Lk 23⁵⁰, it is used of Joseph of Arimathea as a member of the Sanhedrin. In Dn 3²⁴ 27 4³⁶ 6⁷ the peculiar word rendered 'counsellor' in AV is hesitatingly translated by Driver 'minister'; RV retains 'counsellor.'

COUNTERVAIL.—To countervail (Est 7⁴, Sir 6¹⁵) is to make up for, give an equivalent, as in More's Utopia: 'All the goodes in the worlde are not liable to countervayle man's life.'

COURAGE.—In Dn 11²⁵ 'courage' is the rendering of the Heb. word for 'heart'; in Am 2¹⁶ 'courageous' is literally 'stoutest of heart.' Elsewhere in the OT the root-ideas of the words generally used are 'to be firm' (āmēts) and 'to be strong' (chāzaq). Courage, being a quality of mind, has manifold manifestations, as, e.g. in the sufferer's endurance, the reformer's boldness, and the saint's 'wrestling' (Eph 6¹²), as well as in the soldier's valour. Professor Sorley says that moral courage is 'the control of the fear of social evils (disgrace or ridicule from those who determine the opinion of the community), whereas the ordinary application of courage is to the fear of physical evils' (Baldwin, Dict. of Philosophy, i. 239).

In the NT the Gr. noun for 'courage' is found only in Ac 28¹⁸. The corresponding verb is rendered uniformly in the RV 'be of good cheer'; but a later form of the same verb occurs six times, and is tr. in RV 'be of good courage.' The comparative rarity of the word 'courage' implies no disparagement of the virtue, for exhortations to 'be strong,' and to 'fear not' are frequent. T. H. Green, comparing Greek and Christian ideals of virtue (Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 277 ff.), shows how greatly the conception of moral heroism has been widened. Courage or fortitude is defined as 'the will to endure even unto death for a worthy end'; therefore the Christian may be courageous 'in obscure labours of love as well as in the splendid heroism at which a world might wonder.'

J. G. TASKER.

COURSE.—See PRIESTS AND LEVITES, III. 2 (b).

COURT.—See HOUSE, § 2; JUSTICE; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

COUSIN.—Elisabeth is called Mary's 'cousin' in Lk 1³⁶, and the relationship is often understood in the modern sense of that word. But 'cousin' in the English of 1611 meant no more than kinsman or kinswoman. The relationship between Mary and Elisabeth is not known.

COVENANT.—The term is of frequent occurrence in the Bible, and is used in the general sense of a compact or agreement between parties, and also in the more technical and legal sense of an arrangement entered into by God, and confirmed or sealed with the due formalities. The Hebrew word (berith) has a similarly wide signification; whilst the Greek (diathēkē) is used alike in the classics and on the papyri in the further sense of 'testament' or 'will,' though Aristophanes (Av. 439) is a good witness for the meaning of mutual agreement. The rendering 'testament' is retained by the RV in two places only (He 9¹⁶, 17; cf. margin of Gal 3¹⁵), and is perpetuated in the titles given to the two main parts of the Bible (see TESTAMENT).

As for the formalities in concluding a covenant, the primitive way seems to have been for the two parties to swallow each a drop of the other's blood, thus becoming covenant-brothers. This actual mingling of blood soon became distasteful, and substitutes were found, such as the cutting of sacrificial animals into two parts, between which the contracting parties passed (Gn 15¹⁰, 17, Jer 34¹⁸), the meat probably being eaten afterwards in a joint meal. This ritual appears to have been inherited from the nomadic period, and it afterwards generally gave way to a solemn oath or invocation of God, combining a pledge to observe the covenant (Gn 26³, He 6¹⁷) and the imprecation of a curse on non-observance (Dt 27¹⁶). Sometimes a handshake took the place of the oath (Ezr 10³, Pr 6¹ 17¹⁴ 22²⁴, 1 Ch 29²⁴ marg., 1 Mac 6⁵⁴), or was added to it (Ezr 17¹⁴). In very early times an agreement between two men was sometimes confirmed by setting up a pillar or a heap of stones (Gn 31⁴⁴⁻⁴⁸), the religious sanction being added (Gn 31⁴⁶, 48). When God was Himself directly one of the parties, and an obligation was thought to be assumed by Him rather than by both, a token was substituted (Gn 9¹²); but in these cases the transaction takes the form chiefly of a pledge or assurance, though the idea of some obligation upon the other party is often implicit. Compacts would often be made or confirmed at a shrine; and the god was invoked as a witness (Gn 31⁴⁶, Jos 24²⁷, 2 K 11⁴ 23³), or a sacrificial meal accompanied the act (Gn 24³⁰ 31¹⁴, 2 S 3²⁰). Sprinkling of sacrificial blood (Ex 24⁸, Zec 9¹¹, He 9²⁰) was a specially solemn indication of God's approving presence and of the obligations undertaken; and its significance survives and is deepened in the death of Christ (He 10²⁹ 13²⁰) and in the Eucharist (Mt 26²⁸, Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰, 1 Co 11²⁶).

Of the covenants referred to in Scripture, there are two classes. 1. Covenants between men.—These, again, are of several kinds, the most frequent being international alliances (e.g. Gn 21²⁷, Jos 9⁶, Ps 83³, Am 1⁹), judicial decisions and codes (Sir 38²³, possibly Ex 24⁷), agreements between a ruler and the people (2 S 5², Dn 9²⁷), and civil and domestic compacts of every variety. The word was used for alliances of friendship (1 S 18³, Ps 55²⁰), and of marriage (Pr 2¹⁷, Mal 2¹⁴). By an easy metaphor, a covenant in the sense of an imposed will may be made with the eyes (Job 31¹); or, in the other sense of agreement, with the stones (Job 5²), but not with Leviathan (Job 41⁴), because of his greatness and intractability, nor wisely with death either in scorn of God (Is 28¹⁵) or in yearning (Wis 1⁴). In Dn 11²² 'the prince of the covenant' is sometimes rendered 'a prince in league with him'; but if the other translation stands, 'covenant' will represent the nation as a religious community (cf. Dn 11²⁸, 30, Ps 74²⁰), and the prince will be the high priest, Onias III., who was deposed by Antiochus about B.C. 174. Similarly in Mal 3¹ 'the messenger of the covenant' may be the attendant of God, His instrument in dealing with the nation (cf. RVm).

2. Covenants between God and men.—The idea of a covenant with Adam, beyond the simple injunction of Gn 2¹⁶, 17, has been found by some writers in Sir 17¹³, which is more easily interpreted of the transactions on Horeb (Dt 5⁴). In Ps 25¹⁴, as in 55²⁰, the word has its fundamental meaning of an alliance of friendship, with a specific allusion in the former case to the Deuteronomistic covenant of the tenth verse. In other cases the technical meaning of an agreement with signs and pledges is more conspicuous. The Noachian covenant (Gn 6¹⁸ 9¹¹⁻¹⁷, Is 54⁹, Jer 33²⁰, 26) guarantees the stability of natural law. The covenant with Abraham (Gn 15¹⁸ 17¹⁻²) was confirmed in its promise to Isaac and Jacob (Ex 2²⁴, Lv 26⁴², Ps 105⁴²), and ensured a blessing through their seed to all nations, circumcision being adopted as the token (cf. Ac 7⁵, 1 Mac 1¹⁵). Of still greater significance was the covenant at Horeb or Sinai (Ex 19⁸ 34¹⁰, 27¹, et al.), which was renewed in the plains of Moab (Dt 29¹), and is frequently referred to in the OT. It was really a constitution given to Israel by God, with appointed promise and penalty, duly inscribed on the tables of the covenant (Dt 9⁹, 11, 19), which were deposited in the ark (Dt 10⁵, 1 K 8⁹, 2, 2 Ch 5⁶, He 9⁴). Elsewhere the covenant is described as set forth in words (Ex 34²⁸, Dt 29⁹) and written in a book (Ex 24⁷, 2 K 23³). Amongst other covenants of minor importance are that with Phinehas establishing an everlasting priesthood in his line (Nu 25¹²), and that with David establishing an everlasting kingdom (Ps 89³, Jer 33³; cf. 2 S 7). Joshua and the people covenant to serve Jehovah only (Jos 24²); so Jehoiada and the people (2 K 11¹⁷). Hezekiah and the people solemnly agree to reform the worship (2 Ch 29¹⁰); Josiah (2 K 23³) and Ezra (10³) lead the people into a covenant to observe the Law.

Whilst the Sinaitic covenant is rightly regarded as the charter of the Jewish dispensation, the establishment by God of a new constitution was contemplated by a series of prophets (Jer 31³¹, 33 32⁴⁰ 50⁵, Is 55³ 59²¹ 61¹, Ezk 16⁶⁰, 37 20³⁷ 34³⁵). Some of the pledges were new, and not confined in their range to Israel, whilst the Messianic Servant becomes 'for a covenant of the people' (Is 42⁶, 49⁶; cf. 'messenger of the covenant,' Mal 3¹). The Sinaitic covenant is thus transformed, and, whilst continuing as a note of racial separation until the period for the Incarnation was come, gave way then to a new dispensation with increased emphasis on personal religion and the provision of means adequate to ensure it (He 8¹⁻¹³). Yet the ancient covenant, even that with Abraham, was everlasting (Gn 17⁷), and still stands in its supreme purpose (Lv 26⁴⁴, Ac 3², Ro 11²⁷) of making men the people of God, the new elements consisting mainly in the adoption of more effective influences and inspiration. The Exile is sometimes thought of as marking the dissolution of the Old Covenant (Jer 31³²), though the new one was not fully introduced until some centuries later. The act of making the New Covenant is compared with the transactions in the wilderness (Ezk 20³⁶). On God's part there is forgiveness with the quickening of the inner life of man (Ezk 36²⁶). And both the activity and the blessedness are associated with the Messianic expectations (Jer 33¹⁴, Ezk 37²¹⁻²², Lk 1²⁰).

In the later OT writings the word 'covenant,' as appears from the previous citations, has lost much of its technical signification, and does not always denote even a formal act of agreement, but becomes almost a synonym, and that without much precision, for the conditions of religion (Ps 103¹⁸). St. Paul recognizes a series of covenants (Ro 9⁴, Eph 2¹³) on an ascending scale of adequacy (2 Co 3⁶, Gal 4²⁴; cf. He 7²² 8²); and Sinai is but a stage (Gal 3¹²) in the course from Abraham to Christ.

Of special phrases, two or three may present some difficulty. 'A covenant of salt' (Nu 18¹⁹, 2 Ch 13³) is a perpetual covenant, the eating of salt together being a token of friendship as sealed by sacred hospitality. 'The salt of the covenant' (Lv 2¹³) has probably the same primary suggestion, as a natural accompaniment of the sacrificial meal, and with it constituting an inviolable bond. Sometimes the two great divisions of Scripture are called the books of the Old and of the New Covenant respectively. The name 'Book of the Covenant' (see next article) is given to Ex 20²²⁻²³; that of 'Little Book of the Covenant' to Ex 34¹¹⁻²⁸. A distinction is often drawn between the Covenant of Works, assumed to have been made by God with Adam (Gn 2⁷), and that of Grace or Redemption (2 Ti 1¹), whereby Christ becomes to man the medium of all spiritual blessings. R. W. MOSS.

COVENANT, BOOK OF THE.—The oldest code of Hebrew law which has come down to us is contained in Ex 20²²⁻²³. It receives its name from the expression in Ex 24⁷, while its character as a covenant is demonstrated by the promises attached to the keeping of it (23²⁰⁻²³). Owing to the confused form in which the Book of Exodus has been transmitted, doubt has been expressed as to the limits of the Book of the Covenant. Some maintain that the words in 24⁷ refer only to ch. 23; others would make them include 21-23; Driver holds with the generally accepted opinion that the code begins with 20²². The close proximity of the Decalogue (20¹⁻¹⁷) might lead to the inference that both codes were given at the same time. But the Book of the Covenant is certainly not a law that was 'delivered'; it is a series of decisions gradually gathered together. It has been incorporated by the compiler at this particular place in the Book of Exodus, with the intention of bringing the ancient codes together.

1. Contents.—These fall into two broad divisions:—

(1) mishpātim, or 'judicial decisions.' In early Semitic life justice was administered according to a series of urōth, or judicial and priestly decisions, originally transmitted orally, but gradually written down for more exact use as precedents. The Book of the Covenant was such a series, and was probably committed to writing, in the first instance, to serve as a hand-book for those who had to administer the law. Hypothetical cases are put in the regular form, 'If . . . then . . .': e.g. 21²⁸ 'If a man smite the eye of his servant or the eye of his maid that it perish; (then) he shall let him go free for his eye's sake.' Sometimes the form changes slightly; the crime and the punishment attached to it are stated in the briefest possible way: e.g. 21¹² 'He that smiteth a man so that he die shall be surely put to death.' This collection of mishpātim reflects an extremely simple state of society. It deals with the rights of the male and female slave (21¹⁻¹¹); murder and homicide (vv. 12-18); injuries to the body, not resulting in death (vv. 16-23); injuries to cattle (vv. 22-26); theft (22¹⁻⁹); arson (v. 5); breach of trust (vv. 7-12); loans (vv. 14, 16, 20-27); seduction (vv. 16, 17). The injunctions put in the shorter form cover murder, abduction, the cursing of parents, bestiality (21^{12, 16, 18, 17, 22}). The prominence given in this code to the ox, ass, and sheep (21²⁸⁻²²) shows that it was originally drawn up for a society that was predominantly agricultural. In several respects, however, the code indicates a considerable measure of progress. A limitation is imposed on the lex talionis, in the drawing of a distinction between premeditated murder and accidental homicide. The service of a slave cannot last beyond six years unless with his own consent, and then his determination to remain in slavery is sealed by a solemn act. Apart from retaliation there is no punishment, except a pecuniary compensation. The thief who will not make restitution is the only wrong-doer who loses his liberty. The position of women is that the daughter is the property of her father, who receives money for her when he gives her in marriage, and also exacts from any who should dishonour her the price she would have brought as a bride; the injury is thought of as being done not to the daughter, who is only a chattel, but to the father.

(2) dehārim, or 'commands.' In form, these are akin to the commands of the Decalogue, being introduced with 'Thou shalt,' or 'Thou shalt not.' In substance, they are concerned with religious observances to a much greater extent than the mishpātim, and do not give the same prominence to agricultural life. 20²⁴⁻²⁸ deals with the construction of an altar. (Stade, Bibl. Theol. § 57, thinks that this command is the product of a period of reaction in the time of the later monarchy, and that it was aimed at the brazen altar which Solomon had made, and at the centralization of worship in Jerusalem.) Other matters dealt with are witchcraft (22¹⁸); the treatment of strangers (v. 21); the reviling of God (or judges) and rulers (vv. 28, 29); the offering of the first fruits and firstlings (vv. 29, 30); the eating of animals found torn in the field (v. 31); just judgment (23^{1-3, 6-8}); the year of rest, and the Sabbath (vv. 10-12); feasts (vv. 14-16). The three feasts mark points in the agricultural year, the beginning and the end of harvest and the end of the vintage. Leaven is not to be eaten in connexion with the blood of the sacrifice, and the fat of the sacrifice is to be burned the same night (23¹⁶⁻¹⁹); but apart from these there are no matters of sacrificial ritual insisted on. Whoever sacrifices to any other god than Jehovah is to be placed under the ban (22²⁰). 23²⁰⁻²² seems to be the work of the compiler. The familiar style of Deut. appears in v. 22; but in this section there would appear to be vestiges of an older text (23²⁸⁻³¹).

2. Date.—As to the date of the Book of the Covenant, there is no evidence save what the document itself affords us. But the state of society reflected in it is primitive. Agriculture is the industry of the people. The law of blood-revenge is just beginning to be modified; woman has as yet no property in herself; sacrifice is emerging from its primitive domestic character; there is as yet no clear conception of a State. The code would thus seem to date from the days of the desert wandering, and to be older than the Decalogue itself. See, further, artt. EXODUS and HEXATEUCH.

R. BRUCE TAYLOR.

COVETOUSNESS.—In the Bible, covetousness is a crime. In the Ten Commandments it is put under the ban along with murder, adultery, theft, and slander (Ex 20¹⁷, Dt 5²¹). Achan was guilty of this crime, and was stoned to death (Jos 7¹⁶⁻²⁵). Every occurrence of the word or the thing in the OT is connected with a prohibition or a curse (Ps 10⁸ 119³⁶, Pr 21²⁸ 28¹⁰, Is 57¹⁷, Hab 2⁹). In the NT adultery and covetousness are usually classed together (1 Co 5¹¹ 6¹⁰, Col 3⁴, 2 P 2¹⁴). This conjunction of sensual sin and love of money probably rests upon the authority of Jesus (Mk 7²¹, 22). Jesus and the Apostles declared that the worshipper of Bacchus and the worshipper of Venus and the worshipper of Mammon belong to one and the same class. Grasping avarice is as incompatible with the spirit of self-sacrifice taught in the NT as is the selfish indulgence in drink or the grosser indulgence in vice. The Bible puts the covetous man in the same category with the murderer and the thief. The Christian Church needs to study anew the Bible teaching concerning covetousness, as found in Jer 22¹⁷, Mic 2², Lk 12¹⁵, Ro 7⁷, Eph 5^{2, 4}, 1 Ti 6¹⁰, He 13⁴, and other passages. No covetous man has any inheritance in the Kingdom of God. D. A. HAYES.

COZBI.—The Midianitess slain by Phinehas (Nu 25^{14, 15}).

CRACKNELS.—See BREAD.

CRAFT, in the sense of 'trade,' survives in RV only in Rev 18²² 'no craftsman of whatever craft.' In Ac 18³ 19²⁵, 'trade' or 'business' has been substituted for AV 'craft.' 'Craftsman' and 'craftsmen,' however, are retained. See list under ARTS AND CRAFTS.

CRANE.—In Is 38⁴ and Jer 8⁷ sūs or sīs is rendered in AV 'crane,' RV correctly 'swallow' [wh. see]. In the same passages agār is rendered in AV 'swallow,' RV 'crane.' The crane (Grus communis) is the largest bird which visits W. Palestine; its length is four feet. They arrive in large flocks in the winter (Jer 8⁷). Its trumpet-ing note is strangely described (in Is 38¹⁴ EV) as 'chattering,' and this makes the translation somewhat doubtful.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CRATES.—A deputy left in charge of the citadel at Jerusalem (Acra) when the regular governor, Sostratus, was summoned to Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of a dispute with the high priest Menelaus (2 Mac 4²¹). Crates was 'over the Cyprians': probably he was sent to Cyprus shortly afterwards, when, in B.C. 168, Antiochus obtained possession of the island.

CREATION.—One of the most convincing proofs of the composite authorship of the Pentateuch has always been found in the existence side by side of two independent and mutually irreconcilable accounts of the creation of the world. The first, Gn 1^{1-21a}, forms the introduction of the Priestly Code (P), which was compiled, as is now generally acknowledged, in the 5th cent. B.C. The second, Gn 2^{4-25a}, opens the Jahwistic document (J), whose latest portions must be dated at least a century and a half earlier than the compilation of P. These two narratives, while expressing the same fundamental religious ideas, differ profoundly in their concrete conceptions of the process of creation. The account of P starts with a description (v. 2) of the primeval chaos—a dark formless watery abyss, out of which the world of light and order was to be evolved. Whether this chaotic matter owed its origin to a prior creative act of God is a question depending on a delicate point of grammatical construction which cannot be adequately explained here; but, looking to the analogy of the Babylonian Creation-story (see below), it seems probable that the chaos is conceived as pre-existent, and that the representation of the chapter falls short of the full dogmatic idea of creation as production out of nothing,—an idea first unambiguously expressed in 2 Mac 7²⁸. The work of creation then proceeds in a series of eight Divine fiat, viz.: (1) Creation of light and separation of light from the primeval darkness, vv. 3-4; (2) division of the chaotic waters by the firmament, vv. 5-8; (3) separation of land and sea, vv. 9-10; (4) clothing of the earth with vegetation, vv. 11-13; (5) formation of the heavenly bodies, vv. 14-19; (6) production of fishes and birds, vv. 20-23; (7) land animals, v. 24; and (8) the creation of man in the image of God with dominion over the creatures, v. 25^a. The most remarkable formal feature of the record is a somewhat artificial but carefully planned and symmetrical arrangement of the eight works under a scheme of six days. The creative process is thus divided into two parallel stages, each embracing four works and occupying three days, the last day in each division having two works assigned to it. There is an obviously designed, though not quite complete, correspondence between the two series: (1) light || (5) luminaries; (2) waters and firmament || (6) fishes and 'lowly'; (3) dry land || (7, 8) terrestrial animals; (4) trees and grasses, and (on the sixth day) the appointment of these as the food of men and animals. The significance of the six days' scheme is revealed in the closing verses (21-4), where the resting of the Creator on the seventh day is regarded as the antitype and sanction of the Jewish Sabbath-rest. It is not improbable that the scheme of days is a modification of the original cosmogony, introduced in the interest of the Sabbath law; and this adaptation may account for some anomalies of arrangement which seem to mar the consistency of the scheme.

In the narrative of J (2^{4-25a}), the earth as originally made by Jahweh was an arid lifeless waste, in which no plant could grow for lack of moisture, and where there was no man to till the ground (vv. 4-6). The idea of man's superiority to the other creatures is here expressed by placing his creation, not at the end as in P, but at the beginning (v. 7); followed by the planting of the garden in which he was to dwell and from whose trees he was to derive his food (vv. 8, 9, 15-17); the forming of beasts and birds to relieve his solitude and awake his craving for a nobler companionship (vv. 18-20); and lastly of the woman, in whom he recognizes a part of himself and a helpmeet for him (vv. 21-24). The express reference to the welfare of man in each act of creation makes it doubtful whether a systematic account of the origin of things was contemplated by the writer, or whether the passage is not rather to be regarded as a poetic clothing of ideas generated by reflexion on fundamental facts of human life and society. It is probable, however, that it contains fragments of a fuller cosmogony which has been abridged and utilized as a prologue to the story of Paradise and the Fall. On either view, the divergence from the account of P is so obvious as to preclude the attempt to harmonize the two, or to treat the second as merely supplementary to the first.

Much ingenuity has been expended in the effort to bring the Biblical record of creation into accord with the facts disclosed by the modern sciences of Geology and Astronomy. Naturally such constructions confine their operations to the systematic and semi-scientific account of Gn 1; for it has probably never occurred to any one to vindicate the scientific accuracy of the more imaginative narrative of J. But even if we were to admit the unique claim of the first chapter to be a revealed cosmogony, the difficulty of harmonizing it with the teachings of science is seen to be insurmountable as soon as the real nature of the problem to be solved is fairly apprehended. It is not sufficient to emphasize the general idea of gradation and upward progress as common to science and Scripture, or to point to isolated coincidences, such as the creation of fishes before mammals, or the late appearance of man on the earth: the narrative must be taken as a whole, and it must be shown that there is a genuine parallelism between the order of days and works in Gn 1 and the stages of development recognized by science as those through which the universe has reached its present form. This has never been done; and after making every allowance for the imperfection of the geological record, and the general insecurity of scientific hypothesis as distinguished from ascertained fact, enough is known to make it certain that the required correspondence can never be made out. Thus the formation of the sun and moon after the earth, after the alternation of day and night, and even after the emergence of plant-life, is a scientific impossibility. Again, the rough popular classifications of Genesis (plants, aquatic animals, birds, land animals, etc.) are, for scientific purposes, hopelessly inadequate; and the idea that these groups originated as wholes, and in the order here specified, is entirely contrary to the 'testimony of the rocks.' But, indeed, the whole conception of the universe on which the cosmogony of Genesis rests opposes a fatal barrier to any valid reconciliation with scientific theory. The world whose origin is here described is a solid expanse of earth, surrounded by and resting on a world-ocean, and surmounted by a rigid vault called the firmament, above which the waters of a heavenly ocean are spread. Such a world is unknown to science; and the manner in which such a world was conceived to have come into being cannot truly represent the process by which the very different world of science and fact has been evolved. This fact alone would amply justify the emphatic verdict of Professor Driver: 'Read without prejudice or bias, the narrative of Gn 1 creates an impression of variance with the facts revealed by science: the efforts at reconciliation . . . are but different modes of obliterating its characteristic features, and of reading into it a view which it does not express' (Westm. Com. Genesis, p. 26).

To form a correct estimate of the character and religious value of the first chapter of Genesis, it has to be borne in mind that speculative theories of the origin of the universe were an important element of all the higher religions of antiquity. Many of these cosmogonies (as they are called) are known to us; and amidst all the diversity of representation which characterizes them, we cannot fail to detect certain underlying affinities which suggest a common source, either in the natural tendencies of early thought, or in some dominant type of cosmological tradition. That the Hebrew cosmogony is influenced by such a tradition is proved by its striking likeness to the Babylonian story of creation as contained in cuneiform tablets from Ashurbanipal's library, first unearthed in 1872. From these Assyriologists have deciphered a highly coloured mythological epic, describing the origin of the world in the form of a conflict between Marduk, god of light and supreme deity of the pantheon of Babylon, and the power of Chaos personified as a female monster named Ti'amat (Heb. Tēhōm). Wide as is the difference between the polytheistic assumptions and fantastic imagery of the Babylonian narrative and the sober dignity and elevated monotheism of Genesis, there are yet coincidences in general outline and in detail which are too marked and too numerous to be ascribed to chance. In both we have the conception of chaos as a watery abyss, in both the separation of the waters into an upper and a lower ocean; the formation of the heavenly bodies and their function in regulating time are described with remarkable similarity; special prominence is given to the creation of man; and it may be added that, while the order of creation differs in the two documents, yet the separate works themselves are practically identical. In view of this pervading parallelism, it is clear that the Hebrew and Babylonian cosmogonies are very closely related; and the only question open to discussion is which of them represents more faithfully the primary tradition on which each is based. Looking, however, to the vastly higher antiquity of the Babylonian narrative, to its conformity (even in points which affect the Biblical record) to the climatic conditions of the Euphrates Valley, and to the general indebtedness of Israel to the civilization of Babylon, it cannot reasonably be doubted that the Hebrew narrative is dependent on Babylonian models; though it is of course not certain that the particular version preserved in the tablets referred to is the exact original by which the Biblical writers were influenced.

From this point of view we are able to state the significance of the Scripture account of creation in a way which does justice at once to its unrivalled religious value and to its lack of scientific corroboration. The material is derived from some form of the Babylonian cosmogony, and shares the imperfection and error incident to all pre-scientific speculation regarding the past history of the world. The Scripture writers make no pretension to supernatural illumination on matters which it is the province of physical investigation to ascertain. Their theology, on the other hand, is the product of a revelation which placed them far in advance of their heathen contemporaries, and imparted to all their thinking a sanity of imagination and a sublimity of conception that instinctively rejected the grosser features of paganism, and transformed what was retained into a vehicle of Divine truth. Thus the cosmogony became a classical expression of the monotheistic principle of the OT, which is here embodied in a detailed description of the genesis of the universe that lays hold of the mind as no abstract statement of the principle could do. In opposition to the heathen theogonies, the world is affirmed to have been created, i.e. to have originated in the will of God, whose Personality transcends the universe and exists independently of it. The spirituality of the First Cause of all things, and His absolute sovereignty over the material He employs, are further emphasized in the idea of the word of God as the agency through which the various orders of existence were produced; and the repeated assertion that the world in all its parts was 'good,' and as a whole 'very good,' suggests that it perfectly reflected the Divine thought which called it into being. When to these doctrines we add the view of man, as made in the likeness of God, and marked out as the crown and goal of creation, we have a body of spiritual truth which distinguishes the cosmogony of Gn 1 from all similar compositions, and entitles it to rank amongst the most important documents of revealed religion.

JOHN SKINNER.

CREATURE.—In AV 'creature' is used in the general (and original) sense of 'what is created.' Thus 2 Co 5¹⁷ 'if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature'; 1 Ti 4¹ 'for every creature of God is good.' In Ro 8¹⁹⁻²⁰ it is not merely living creatures in the modern use of the word that wait for deliverance, but the whole creation of God (as AV itself has it in v.²).

CREDITOR.—See DEBT.

CREED (or Credo [AS. creda], taken from the first word of the Latin confession of faith—Greek 'symbol' [symbolon, symbolum]).—An ecclesiastical (non-Biblical) term, signifying 'the faith' objectively and as explicitly declared, 'the articles of' Christian 'belief' drawn up in systematic and authoritative form. 'The Creeds' denote the three great historical Confessions of the early Church—the Apostles', the Nicene or Constantinopolitan (325, 381 A.D.), and the Athanasian (of Latin origin, 6th century); 'the Creed' commonly means the Apostles' Creed alone. This last can be traced, in its simplest form, to the 2nd century; see Lumby's Hist. of the Creeds, or Swete's Apostles' Creed. Shaped in their developed form by doctrinal controversy and Conciliar definition, the Creeds owe their origin to the necessities of worship and the instinct of public confession in the Church, felt at baptism to begin with. Christian believers formed the habit, when they met, of reciting their common faith, and this recitation assumed a fixed rhythmical form; so that the creed is akin to the hymn and the doxology. Its beginnings are visible in the NT—see Mt 16¹⁸ 28¹⁹, Ro 10⁹, 1 Co 8⁶ 12³ (RV), Eph 4⁴⁻⁶, 1 Ti 3¹⁶, 1 Jn 4²; and further back, for the OT and the Synagogue, in the Shema of Dt 6⁴.

G. G. FINDLAY.

CREeping THINGS.—In the EV this term is the tr. of two distinct words, which have no etymological connexion, and in usage are not synonymous. The Hebrew words are remes and sherets. It is unfortunate that the latter term is tr. 'creeping thing,' for the root means to swarm. It includes both terrestrial and aquatic animals which appear in great swarms; in Gn 1²⁰ it refers to the creatures that teem in the waters, while in other passages it includes insects, as locusts, crickets, and grasshoppers (Lv 11²⁰⁻²³), together with the smaller quadrupeds as the weasel and mouse, as well as reptiles proper (Lv 11²⁹⁻³²). The verb is used of frogs (Ex 8³). Etymologically remes signifies that which glides or creeps, and for its usage the two crucial passages are Gn 1²⁴ and 1 K 4³². In the latter the entire animal kingdom is popularly divided into four classes: beasts, birds, creeping things, and fishes (cf. Hos 2¹⁶). In Gn 1²⁴ the land animals are put into three groups: cattle, creeping things, and beasts of the earth. By eliminating the first and third classes, which respectively include domesticated quadrupeds, and the wild animals, we see that the expression 'creeping things' is, roughly speaking, equivalent to our term 'reptiles,' exclusive of those which are aquatic. Delitzsch defines remes as 'the smaller creeping animals that keep close to the earth'; Dillmann as creatures 'which move along the ground either without feet or with imperceptible feet.' From this discussion it is evident that the two are not interchangeable terms. Remes has also a wider signification: in Ps 104²⁵ it is used of marine animals, in Gn 9² (EV 'moving thing') it includes all living creatures. See, further, the careful discussion by Professor Driver in Hastings' DB i. 517 f.

JAMES A. KELSO.

CRESCENS.—A companion of St. Paul in his final imprisonment, sent by him to Galatia (2 Ti 4¹⁰), i.e. either to Asiatic Galatia, or possibly to Gaul. A late Western tradition treats him as the founder of the Churches of Vienne and of Mayence. His memory is honoured in the Roman Martyrology on June 27, in the Greek Menologion on May 30, and there he is treated as one of the seventy disciples, and a bishop of Chalcedon.

CRESCENTS.—See AMULETS, § 4, and ORNAMENTS, § 3.

CRETE, CRETANS.—Crete, the modern Candia, is an island 60 miles S. of Greece proper, about 150 miles long, and varying in breadth from 30 to 7 miles, with mountains as high as 7000 feet. It is about equidistant from Europe, Asia, and Africa, and was inhabited from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge. The researches of Mr. Arthur J. Evans and others have revealed traces of a very ancient civilization, including an alphabet hitherto unknown. In historical times it was famed for its archers, who were valued in the armies of Europe. It was conquered by Rome in B.C. 67, and became, in conjunction with the district Cyrenaica on the N. of Africa, a Roman senatorial province, governed by a proconsul. Jews were early to be found there, and were very numerous. Some were present at Pentecost in the year of the crucifixion (Ac 2¹¹). St. Paul's ship, on the voyage to Rome, sailed along the Cretan coast close in (Ac 27⁷), and came to Fair Havens near Lasea. These places were on the S. coast, which had few harbours.

The epithets which a native of the island, the poet Epimenides (flourished B.C. 600), flung at the Cretans, are quoted in a somewhat un-apostolic manner in the Epistle to Titus (1¹²). Epimenides styled them 'always liars, evil beasts of prey, lazy gluttons.' Such vituperation, though countenanced by others also, must not be taken too seriously. The ancients were much given to it, and it probably reveals as much of the natures of the persons who used it as of those to whom it was applied. Greeks in general are not, and were not, famous for truthfulness, for instance. When and by whom Christianity was planted in Crete cannot be said. It is probable that it was well established there in the 1st century. In the Epistle to Titus we find Titus introduced as having been left by St. Paul in charge of the churches. A. SOUTER.

ORIB is the modern manger (Lk 2⁷), which contained the fodder for oxen (Pr 14⁴), asses (Is 1³), and doubtless other live stock as well.

CRICKET.—Lv 11²² (AV 'beetle'). See LOCUST.

CRIME.—In 1611 the word 'crime' had not lost its early meaning of accusation, whence Ac 25¹⁶ 'the crime laid against him' (RV 'matter,' but in Ac 23²⁹ the same Gr. word is translated 'charge' in both AV and RV). It is possible, that in Job 31¹¹ 'crime' is used in the more modern sense; elsewhere it means 'charge.'

CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.—The term 'crimes' is here used loosely in the sense of punishable offences, including not merely crimes (crimina) in the sense of breaches of the criminal law in the modern sense, and torts (delicta) or breaches of the civil law, but also those offences in the sphere of religion and worship to which definite penalties were attached. Within the limits of this article it is possible to present only a summary of the more important and typical punishable offences recognized in the various Hebrew law-codes. The latter, indicated by the usual symbols, are: (1) BC, the oldest code, known as the Book of the Covenant, Ex 20²²⁻²³, with which for convenience sake is joined the Decalogue of Ex 20¹⁻¹⁷; (2) D, the Deuteronomic Code, Dt 12-28; (3) H, the Holiness Code, Lv 17-26; and (4) P, the great collection of laws known as the Priests' Code, and comprising the rest of the legislative material of the Pentateuch. In the case of P alone will it be necessary to name the books (Ex., Lv., or Nu.) to which reference is made.

The penal offences of the Pentateuch may be conveniently grouped under the three heads of crimes against J^r, against society (including property), and against the individual.

1. A. CRIMES AGAINST J^r, or offences in the sphere of religion and worship.—Although it is true that misdemeanours of every kind were in the last resort offences against J^r, who was regarded as the only fountain of law and justice, it will be convenient to group under this head those belonging to the special sphere of religious belief and its outward expression in worship. Among these the first place must be given to the worship of heathen deities—condemned in the strongest terms in BC (from 20³ onwards) and D—and of the heavenly bodies, D 17² (cf. 4¹²). The penalty is death under the ban (BC 22²⁰, D 13¹², [see BAN]), or by stoning (D 17¹⁰). Inseparable from this form of apostasy is the crime of idolatry, entailing the curse of God (D 27¹⁶). Blasphemy, or profanation of the Divine name, is forbidden in all the codes; the penalty is death by stoning (H 24¹⁶). The practice of magic, wizardry, and similar black arts, exposes their adepts and those who resort to them to the same penalty (H 20²⁷).

2. The punishment for doing 'any work on the Sabbath day' is death, but only in the later legislation (Ex 31¹⁵ [probably H 35² P]; cf. the very late Haggadic section, Nu 15³²). For neglect of ordinances, to use a familiar phrase, such as failing to observe the fast of the Day of Atonement (H 23²²), or to keep the Passover (Nu 9¹³ [P], an offender was liable to be 'cut off from his people'; see below). This was also the punishment prescribed for a number of offences that may be grouped under the head of sacrilege, such as partaking of blood (Lv 7²⁷ [P]), and the unauthorized manufacture and use of the holy anointing oil (Ex 30²⁴ [P]).

3. B. CRIMES AGAINST SOCIETY.—As the family, according to Hebrew ideas, was the unit of society, the crimes that mar the sanctities of family life may be taken first. Such pre-eminently was adultery, severely condemned in all the codes, the punishment for both parties being death (D 22²², H 20¹⁰). In a case of seduction the man was required to marry her whom he had wronged, if her father gave consent (BC 22¹⁶), paying the latter a 'dowry,' i.e. the usual purchase price (see MARRIAGE), estimated in D 22²⁹ at 50 shekels of silver. On the other hand, the penalty for rape, if the victim was betrothed, was death (D 22²⁸), as it was for unnatural crimes like sodomy (H 18²² 20¹³ 'thou shalt not lie with mankind as with womankind') and bestiality (BC 22¹⁹, H 20¹⁶). The marriage of near kin is forbidden in H 18⁶⁻¹⁸ under seventeen heads (see MARRIAGE). Incest with a step-mother or a daughter-in-law was punishable by the death of both parties (H 20¹¹), while for a man to marry 'a wife and her mother' was a crime that could be expiated only by the death of all three, and that, as many hold (see below), by being burnt alive (ib. v. 14). Ordinary prostitution is condemned by H 19²⁹ (cf. D 22²¹)—for a priest's daughter the punishment was even death by burning (21⁹)—while the wide-spread heathen practice of establishing religious prostitutes, male and female, at the local sanctuaries is specially reprobated in D 23¹⁷, where the male prostitute is to be recognized under the inexact term 'sodomite,' and the contemptuous 'dog.'

4. To carry disrespect for one's parents to the extent of smiting (BC 21¹⁵), or cursing them (BC 21¹⁷, H 20⁹), or even of showing persistent contumacy (D 21¹⁸), entailed the extreme penalty of death at the hands of the local authorities.

5. Everything that would tend to impair the impartial and effective administration of justice is emphatically condemned in the Hebrew codes, the giving and receiving of bribes, in particular, being forbidden even in the oldest legislation (BC 23^a 'for a gift blindeth them that have sight'). Against those who would defeat the ends of justice by perjury and false witness, the law is rightly severe (D 19^{1st}). Tale-bearing (H 19^{1c}), and the spreading of a report known to be false (BC 23¹), are condemned, while in the more heinous case of a man slandering his newly-wedded wife, the elders of the city are to amerce him in an hundred shekels (D 22^{1a-21}).

6. Property had also to be protected against theft (BC 20^{1a}) and burglary (22²), with which may be classed the crime of removing the boundary-stones of a neighbour's property to increase one's own (D 19^{1a}), and the use of false weights and measures (D 25^{1st}, H 19^{2nd}). The earliest code likewise deals with trespass (BC 22³), and arson or wilful fire-raising (ib. v. 4), for which the penalty in either case was restitution.

7. CRIMES AGAINST THE INDIVIDUAL.—BC 21^{1a-20} deals with various forms of assault, a crime to which the pre-Mosaic jus talionis (see below) was specially applicable. Kidnapping a freeman was a criminal offence involving the death penalty (BC 21^{1a}, D 24¹⁷). Murder naturally has a place in the penal legislation of all the codes from BC 20^{1a} onwards. The legislators, as is well known, were careful to distinguish between murder deliberately planned and executed (BC 21^{1a}, D 19^{1st}) and unpremeditated homicide or manslaughter (BC 21^{1a}, D 19^{1st}, and esp. P. Nu 35^{1st}). The former, with certain exceptions (BC 21²⁰ 22²), entailed capital punishment in accordance with the fundamental principle laid down in Gn 9⁶: in the case of 'the man-slayer' special provision was made for the mitigation of the ancient right of blood revenge (see REFUGE [CITIES OF]).

8. PUNISHMENTS.—From the earliest period of which we have any record two forms of punishment prevailed among the Hebrews and their Semitic kinsfolk, viz. retaliation and restitution. Retaliation, the jus talionis of Roman law, received its classical expression in the oldest Hebrew code: 'thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe' (BC 21^{1st}). The talis, as has already been mentioned, was specially applicable in cases of injury from assault. When life had been taken, whether intentionally or unintentionally, the right of enforcing the jus talionis lay with the dead man's next of kin (see KIN [NEXT OF]).

In BC restitution varies from fivefold for an ox, and fourfold for a sheep that has been stolen and thereafter killed or sold, to twofold if the animal is still in the thief's possession (BC 22¹⁻⁴), and finally to a simple equivalent in the case of wilful damage to a neighbour's property (ib. v. 3¹). Compensation by a money payment was admitted for loss of time through bodily injury (BC 21¹⁹), for loss of property (vv. 24-25), but not, in Hebrew law, for loss of life, except in the cases mentioned BC 21¹⁰. The payments of 100 shekels and 50 shekels respectively ordained in D 22¹⁹ 22²⁰ appear to the modern eye as finis, but fall in reality under the head of compensation paid to the father of the woman in question.

9. In the penal code of the Hebrews there is a comparative lack of what may be termed intermediate penalties. Imprisonment, for example, has no place in the Pentateuch codes as an authorized form of punishment, although frequent cases occur in later times and apparently with legal sanction (see Ezr 7²⁶). The use of the stocks also was known to the Jewish (Jer 20²¹) as well as to the Roman authorities (Ac 16²⁴). Beating with rods and scouring with the lash were also practised. The former seems intended in D 25^{1st}, but later Jewish practice substituted a lash of three thongs, thirteen strokes of which were administered (cf. 2 Co 11³). Many, however, would identify the punishment of this passage of D with the favourite Egyptian punishment of the bastinado. Mutilation, apart from the talis, appears only as the penalty for indecent assault (D 25¹¹).

10. The regular form of capital punishment was death by stoning, which is prescribed in the Pentateuch as the penalty for eighteen different crimes, including Sabbath-breaking. 'For only one crime—murder—is it the penalty in all the codes.' The execution of the criminal took place outside the city (H 24¹⁴), and according to D 17⁷ the witnesses in the case cast the first stone (cf. Jn 8⁷). In certain cases the dead body of the malefactor was impaled upon a stake; this, it can hardly be doubted, is the true rendering of D 21²¹. (AV 'hang him on a tree'), and of the same expression elsewhere. Hanging or strangulation is mentioned only as a manner of suicide (2 S 17²³, Mt 27⁵). Crucifixion, it need hardly be said, was a Roman, not a Jewish, institution. Beheading appears in Mt 14¹⁰, Ac 12⁷, Rev 20⁴.

11. The meaning of the expression frequently found in P, 'to be cut off from his people, from Israel,' etc., is uncertain; most probably it denotes a form of excommunication, with the implication that the offender is handed over to the judgment of God, which also seems to be intended by the banishment of Ezr 7²⁶ (note margin). A similar division of opinion exists as to the penalty of burning, which is reserved for aggravated cases of prostitution (H 21⁹) and incest (20¹⁹). Here the probability seems in favour of the guilty parties being burned alive (cf. Gn 38²⁴), although many scholars hold that they were first stoned to death. The most extreme form of punishment known to the codes, in that a whole community was involved, is that of total destruction under the ban of the first degree (see BAN) prescribed for the crime of apostasy (BC 22²⁰, more fully D 13¹⁸⁻¹⁷).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

CRIMSON.—The word lila, tr. in Is 1¹⁸ 'crimson' and in La 4⁵ 'scarlet,' is usually tr. 'worm' (wh. see), exactly as the Arab. dādeh, the common word for 'worm,' is to-day also used in Palestine for the imported cochineal insect. The Palestine insect is the female Coccus ilicis of the same Natural Order as the American C. cacti; it feeds on the holm-oak.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CRISPING PINS.—Is 3²⁴ AV; RV satchel (see BAG).

CRISPUS.—The chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Ac 18⁵). Convinced by the reasonings of St. Paul that Jesus was the Messiah, he believed with all his house. The Apostle mentions him (1 Co 1¹⁴) as one of the few persons whom he himself had baptized.

CRITICISM.—Biblical criticism is divided into two branches: (1) Lower Criticism, which is concerned with the original text of Scripture—the Hebrew of the OT and the Greek of the NT, by reference to (a) the external evidence of MSS, versions, and citations in ancient literature, and (b) the intrinsic evidence of the inherent probability of one reading as compared with a rival reading, judged by such rules as that preference should be given to the more difficult reading, the shorter reading, the most characteristic reading, and the reading which accounts for the alternative readings (see TEXT OF THE NT); (2) Higher Criticism, which is concerned with the authorship, dates, and circumstances of origin, doctrinal character and tendency, historicity, and other such questions concerning the books of Scripture, as far as these matters can be determined by a careful examination of their contents, comparing the various sections of each one with another, or comparing the books in their entirety with one another, and bringing all possible light to bear upon them from history, literature, antiquities, monuments, etc.

The title of the second branch of criticism is often misunderstood in popular usage. The Lower Criticism being little heard of except among experts, while the Higher Criticism is often mentioned in public, the true comparison suggested is not perceived, and the latter phrase is taken to indicate a certain arrogance on the part of advanced critics, and contempt for the older scholarship. Then the word 'criticism' is also taken in its popular sense as implying captiousness and faultfinding. Further, the most startling, and therefore the most generally observed, results of criticism being destructive of preconceived notions, criticism itself has been regarded as a negative process, and even as an attack on the Bible. It is not to be denied that there are Higher Critics whose arguments may be construed in this way; but these are a minority, and there are also Higher Critics who are not only loyal to the Divine revelation in Scripture, but whose work may be described as largely constructive. Higher criticism itself is neutral; it has no bias; it is a scientific process. The champions of accepted views are compelled to use this process when arguing with scholars who take up positions with which they disagree. But, strictly speaking, it is not a controversial weapon. It is a powerful instrument for ascertaining facts about the history of the Bible. Seeing, however, that a certain amount of odium has been attached to the title—however unwarrantably—perhaps it would be better to substitute a phrase less liable to misinterpretation—such as the expression 'Historical method.' For in point of fact it is in the application of this method, which has been found so fruitful in other regions of study, to the Bible, that the actual work of the Higher Criticism is carried on. The several parts of Scripture are viewed in their places in the total development of the literature to which they belong, with regard to the spirit of the times in which they were produced, and as themselves throwing light on the problem of their own origin and purpose. In place of the external evidence of testimony conjoined to mere tradition, attention is now given more carefully to the internal evidence of literary and doctrinal characteristics.

Traces of the 'Higher' Criticism are to be discovered among the Fathers, e.g. in Origen with his discussion of the authorship of Hebrews, in Dionysius of Alexandria's critical objections to the ascription of the Revelation to the author of the Fourth Gospel, etc. It was revived at the Renaissance by Reuchlin and Erasmus, and it was fearlessly pursued by Martin Luther. But the scientific development of the method begins with Michaelis (1750) and Semler (1771), especially the latter, for Michaelis did not fully develop his critical views till he issued the 4th ed. of his Introduction to the NT (1788). Eichhorn went further in raising a criticism of the NT Canon (1804), and was opposed by Hug, a Roman Catholic writer, in a very scholarly work. A little later came de Wette (1826), who pursued the new critical method with moderation and great precision of scholarship. Credner followed on similar lines (1836). Meanwhile Guericke, Olshausen, and Neander opposed the contemporary trend of criticism. A new departure was taken by Ferdinand Christian Baur in 1831, who introduced the 'tendency' criticism, the result of which has come to be known as the 'Tübingen hypothesis,' according to which there was a sharp division in the early Church between St. Paul and the twelve Apostles, and which regarded the several NT books as in some cases inspired by the tendency of one or other of these parties, and as in other cases written with a view to effect a reconciliation between them in the interest of a subsequent Catholic unity. Zeller (1842) and Schweigler (1846) followed on the same lines. A little later (1850) one of Baur's disciples, Albrecht Ritschl, threw a bomb-shell into the Tübingen camp by starting from the same position as his master, but advancing to very different conclusions. The Tübingen hypothesis was advocated in England by S. Davidson; but its extreme positions have been given up by most scholars, although it had a later representative in Hilgenfeld, and its spirit has been continued in Pfleiderer.

Meanwhile new problems have emerged, represented in a free critical manner by the Holtzmanns, Welzäcker, Wernle, etc., while the Ritschlian school has been brought down to recent times in Harnack, Jülicher, etc. A line of negative criticism, first seen in Bruno Bauer (1850), who gave up all historicity in the Gospels, and denied the genuineness of any of St. Paul's Epistles, was revived during the latter part of the 19th cent. in Holland, by Loman and Steck. Schmiedel took up an extreme negative position with regard to the Gospels, but he has since modified it, and Van Manen has argued against the genuineness of all St. Paul's Epistles. In the second half of the last cent. the historicity of the Gospels and the genuineness of all the Pauline Epistles were maintained by Lightfoot, Westcott, Hort, and others in the first rank of scholarship. Zahn, with great learning, argues for a conservative position, and the tendency of the mediating school represented by Harnack and Jülicher is to admit the genuineness of much the greater part of the NT, the exceptions with this school being especially Eph., 2 Thess., the Pastorals, 1 and 2 Peter, James. There is a tendency to connect the Fourth Gospel more closely with St. John, even among those who do not attribute it immediately to the pen of the Apostle.

Criticism came later into contact with the OT; but here it has been much more revolutionary, and not only extremists but nearly all scholars of eminence have now come to agreement with regard to the main points of the new position. It may be said to have commenced with Lessing and Herder in their literary treatment of Scripture; but this did not seriously affect the historical position. That was first attacked on modern critical lines by Vatke early in the 19th cent., but his work met with universal disapproval, due in a great measure to its difficult Hegelianism. We come to more intelligible positions in Ewald, the first edition of whose History of Israel appeared in 1843-52, and contained criticism of authorities, four of which he distinguished in the Pentateuch. Then K. H. Graf (1866), following hints of Reuss, dropped in the lecture-room, but never published by that cautious scholar, put forth the hypothesis which became the basis of the subsequently developed theory of the early history of Israel, and thus gave rise to the phrase 'the Grafian hypothesis,' according to which the Priestly legislation of the Pentateuch came later than Deuteronomy, and was only incorporated with the earlier work of the Deuteronomist after the Exile. Meanwhile Colenso was working at the historical difficulties of the Pentateuch, and he was followed by Kuenen, whose Religion of Israel (1869-70) drew attention to the great 8th cent. prophets as affording the true basis of that religion, rather than the Pentateuch which is later in date, and the references of which to earlier times can be best appreciated after a study of the prophets. This study of the prophets, as the key to the OT, was greatly promoted in England by Robertson Smith, who also introduced the newer views of the OT generally to English readers. Wellhausen's History of Israel (1878) worked out a view of the early history, on the basis of the analysis of the documents along the lines laid down by Graf, with such clearness and force that his positions have come to be accepted by most OT scholars, especially as they were subsequently more fully developed (1884). Reuss, after keeping silence on the subject for half a century, published his own views on the OT (1879), and these also tended to confirm the Grafian theory. Even Franz Delitzsch, after long maintaining a conservative standpoint, moved at last a good way towards the accepted theory, and thus proved his openness of mind and loyalty to truth. Less radical positions than that of Kuenen and Wellhausen have been defended by Dillmann, Schrader, Nöldeke, Strack, Ryssel, Kittel. On the other hand, we see in Duhm, among the more recent critics, an advance of disintegrating criticism, especially with regard to the prophets; and a quite unique attitude is taken up by Cheyne. But English scholars are more in agreement with the views of Driver and G. Adam Smith, who accept the main positions of Wellhausen and assign a primary place to the prophets as the chief exponents of the higher religion of Israel, in which the world possesses a genuine revelation of the mind and will of God of the highest value for all ages.

CROCODILE.—(1) Iteyathān, Ps 74¹⁴, Is 27¹, Job 41¹⁴. The last reference is almost certainly to the crocodile.

which is adopted in RVm. See LEVIATHAN. (2) hayyath qāneh, 'the wild beast of the reeds,' Ps 68³⁰ RV, is thought by many to be the crocodile or the hippopotamus as symbolizing Egypt. (3) In Jer 14⁶ tannīm is in RVm 'crocodiles.' See DRAGON. For 'land crocodile' see LIZARD. The crocodile probably still exists in the Nahr ez-Zerka, S. of Mount Carmel, called by Pliny the Crocodile River. It is supposed to have been brought there by some Egyptian settlers. A dead crocodile was brought from there to the late Rev. J. Zeller of Nazareth. Herr Schumacher reports that he saw one there, and quite recently a number of crocodile's eggs were brought from this river and sold in Jerusalem. A stuffed specimen is in the PEF museum, London.

CROSS.—The cross in its literal sense is dealt with under CRUCIFIXION, but there are certain spiritual uses of the word in the NT that call for separate consideration. (1) It is a symbol of self-sacrifice.—According to the Gospels, Jesus on at least three occasions affirmed the necessity for those who would follow Him of taking up the cross (Mt 10³⁸; Mk 8³⁴=Mt 16²⁴=Lk 9²³; [Mk 10³¹ only in AV]; Lk 14²⁷). The words imply a prophetic anticipation of His own experience on Calvary; but even although on Christ's earliest use of them this special application was hidden from His disciples (cf. Mt 16²³ 20¹⁹), the figure of bearing one's cross would convey a quite intelligible meaning. In Galilee multitudes had been crucified after the rebellion under Judas the Gaulonite (Jos. Ant. xvii. x. 10, BJ ii. v. 2); in Jerusalem, as we see from the execution of two robbers side by side with Jesus, a crucifixion must have been an ordinary incident of the administration of Roman law. And as it was usual to compel a cruciatarius to carry to the place of execution the transverse beam (patibulum) of his own cross, Christ's figure would have a meaning as plain as it was vivid. But, unlike the wretched cruciatarius, His disciples of their own free will were to take up the cross and follow Him.

(2) It is a thing of shame.—The author of Hebrews tells us how Jesus 'endured the cross, despising shame' (12²). Both to the Roman and to the Jew the death of the cross was the most shameful death a man could die—to the former because reserved by Roman usage for slaves, foreigners, or desperate criminals; to the latter because it came under the curse denounced by the Jewish Law upon any one whose dead body hung upon a tree (Dt 21²²; cf. Gal 3¹³). To Jew and Gentile alike this was the great 'stumbling-block of the cross' (Gal 5¹¹, 1 Co 1²³). And even St. Paul himself regards 'the death of the cross' as the very lowest point in Christ's long pathway of humiliation (Ph 2⁸).

(3) There are certain theological uses of the word peculiar to the Pauline writings. St. Paul makes the cross a summary of the gospel. Thus for 'the preaching of the gospel' in 1 Co 1¹⁷ he substitutes in v. 18 'the word of the cross,' and in v. 23 'the preaching of Christ crucified' (cf. 2²). Again in Gal 6¹² he speaks of suffering persecution 'for the cross of Christ,' where the meaning evidently is 'for the confession of faith in the Christian gospel.' And when he glories in 'the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 14), the cross is used, as the clauses following show, to epitomize the saving work of Jesus both for us and in us.

(4) Further, in the Pauline theology the cross is set forth as the great instrument of reconciliation. It is 'through the blood of his cross' that Christ has effected a reconciliation between God and man (Col 1²⁰). He took out of the way the bond written in ordinances that was against us, 'nailing it to the cross' (2¹⁴). It is 'through the cross' that He has reconciled the Gentile and the Jew, abolishing that 'law of commandments' which rose between them like a middle wall of partition (Eph 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶). And there are glimpses of a still wider reconciliation accomplished by Jesus through His cross—a reconciliation of all things unto God the Father, whether they be things upon the earth or things in the heavens (Col 1²⁰, cf. Eph 1¹⁰).

(5) Once more, the cross is to St. Paul the symbol of a mystical union with Christ Himself. In the great figure of the Gospels (Mt 10³⁸!) cross-bearing stands for the imitation of Christ. St. Paul goes deeper, and sees in the cross a crucifixion with Christ from which there springs a possession of the indwelling life of Christ (Gal 2²⁰). The old man is crucified (Ro 6⁶), that a new man may rise from the dead (cf. v. 4). The flesh is crucified, with its passions and lusts (Gal 5²⁴), that the Christian may live and walk by the Spirit (v. 25). And yet this mysticism of the cross never causes the Apostle to lose sight of the cross as the means of an objective redemption. On the contrary, he regards the two ideas as inseparably connected; and, glorying in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, does so because through it (a) the world—the sphere of external ordinances—is crucified unto him; and (b) he himself is crucified unto the world (Gal 6¹⁴).

J. C. LAMBERT.

CROW occurs once in Apocr. (Bar 6⁴⁴), where the helplessness of idols is illustrated by the remark that 'they are as crows between heaven and earth.' See also RAVEN.

CROWN.—1. In the OT.—The word represents several Heb. terms with distinct meanings. (1) zār, properly an edge or border, with the suggestion of a twisted or wreathed appearance. It occurs only in Ex (25¹¹ and frequently). It is always of gold, and in the furniture of the Tabernacle surrounds the ark, the table of shew-bread and its border, the altar of incense. RVm gives as alternative renderings 'rim,' 'moulding.' Its purpose seems to have been ornamental merely. —(2) nēzer, properly 'mark of separation or consecration' (fr. nāzar 'to separate, consecrate'; whence nāzir=Nazirite). Originally it was no more than a fillet to confine hair that was worn long (W. R. Smith, RS p. 483). It is used of the crown set upon the forehead of the high priest (Ex 29⁶ etc.)—a plate of pure gold with the engraving 'Holy to J' (39³⁰, cf. Lv 8⁹), and also of the crown worn by Heb. kings (2 S 1¹⁰, 2 K 11¹²). In both cases it was the symbol of consecration. —(3) kether, similar in meaning to (2) but without the idea of consecration, is used in Est. (1¹¹ 2¹⁷ 6⁸) to denote the diadem of a Persian king or queen. —(4) atārah, the word that is most frequent and of the most general significance. It is applied to the crown worn by kings, whether Jewish (2 S 12²⁹ etc.) or foreign (1 Ch 20², Est 8¹⁵ [cf. 6⁸]), to the wreath worn at banquets (Is 28¹⁻³, Ezk 23⁴²); but also in a fig. sense, as when, e.g. a virtuous woman is called her husband's crown (Pr 12⁴), a hoary head the crown of old age (16²¹), the Lord of hosts the crown of His people (Is 28⁵). —(5) qodh qōdh is the crown or top of the head, as in the expression 'from the sole of his foot even unto his crown' (Job 2⁷); cf. Gn 49²⁶, Dt 33²⁰ etc.—The vb. 'to crown' is comparatively rare in the OT: ḏtar (corresponding to (4) above) is found in Ps 8⁶ 65¹¹ 103⁴, Ca 3¹¹, Is 23³; kathar (corresp. to (3)) in Pr 14¹³; nāzar (corresponding to (2)) in Nah 3¹⁷.

2. In the NT.—In AV 'crown' represents two Gr. words: (1) stephanos (whence stephanos, 'to crown'), (2) diadema; the former being the badge of merit or victory, the latter (found only in Rev 12³ 13¹ 19¹²) the mark of royalty. This distinction, though not strictly observed in LXX, is properly maintained in RV, where (2) is in each case rendered 'diadem.' The stephanos (properly 'wreath'=Lat. corona) was the garland given as a prize to the victors in the games (1 Co 9²⁵; cf. 2 Ti 2⁵). It is the word applied to our Lord's 'crown of thorns' (Mt 27²⁹, Mk 15¹⁷, Jn 19²⁻⁵). It is used figuratively of the 'crown of righteousness' (2 Ti 4⁸), 'of life' (Ja 1¹², Rev 2¹⁰), 'of glory' (1 P 5⁴). St. Paul applies it to his converts as being his joy and reward (Ph 4¹ 1 Th 2¹⁹); and in Rev. it is employed in various symbolical connexions (44. 10 63 97 12^a 14^a). J. C. LAMBERT.

CRUCIFIXION.—1. Its nature.—Crucifixion denotes a form of execution in which the condemned person was affixed in one way or another to a cross (Lat. crux) and there left to die. The Gr. term rendered 'cross' in the Eng. NT is stauros (stauroō = 'crucify'), which has a wider application than we ordinarily give to 'cross,' being used of a single stake or beam as well as of a cross composed of two beams. The crucifixion of living persons does not meet us on OT ground (unless it be in Ezr 6¹¹; see RV), though death by hanging does (Est 7¹⁰). The stauroō of LXX here renders the Heb. talah = 'to hang'; but the hanging up of a dead body, especially on a tree, is familiar (Jos 10²⁶; cf. 1 S 31¹⁰, 2 S 4¹² 21¹²), and is sanctioned by the Law (Dt 21²²), with the proviso that a body thus hung, as something accursed, must be removed and buried before nightfall (v. 23). This enactment explains Jn 19³¹, Gal 3¹³, as well as the ref. in the NT to the cross as a tree (Ac 5³⁰ 10³⁹ 13²⁹, 1 P 2²⁴).

2. Its origin and use.—The origin of crucifixion is traced to the Phœnicians, from whom it passed to many other nations, including both Greeks and Romans. Among the latter it was exceedingly common, but was confined almost exclusively to the punishment of slaves, foreigners, or criminals of the lowest class, being regarded as incompatible with the dignity of any Roman citizen (cf. Cic. in Verr. i. 5, v. 61, 66). This explains why, as tradition affirms, St. Paul was beheaded, while St. Peter and other Apostles, like the Master Himself, were put to death on the cross.

3. Forms of the cross.—The primitive form was the crux simplex—a single post set upright in the earth, to which the victim was fastened; or a sharp stake on which he was impaled. The Roman cross was more elaborate, consisting of two beams, which, however, might be put together in different ways. Three shapes are distinguished: (1) The crux commissa (T), shaped like a capital T, and commonly known as St. Anthony's cross; (2) the crux immissa (†), the form with which we are most familiar; (3) the crux decussata (X), shaped like the letter X, and known as St. Andrew's cross. Early Christian tradition affirms that it was on (2) that Jesus died (e.g. Iren. Hær. ii. 24, § 4; Justin, Trypho. 91); and this is confirmed by the statements of the Gospels as to the 'title' that was set above His head (Mt 27³⁷, Mk 15²⁶, Lk 23³⁸, Jn 19¹⁹).

4. Method and accompaniments of crucifixion.—These are very fully illustrated in the Gospel narratives of the death of Jesus, to which we shall now especially refer. Immediately after being condemned to the cross, a prisoner was brutally scourged. [In the case of Jesus the scourging appears to have taken place before His condemnation (Jn 19¹), and to have been intended by Pilate as a compromise with the Jews between the death sentence and a verdict of acquittal (Lk 23²²).] The cross-beam (patibulum), not the whole cross, was then laid on his shoulders, and borne by him to the place of execution, while his titulus (Jn 19¹³, Gr. tillos, Eng. 'title') or tablet of accusation hung around his neck, or was carried before him by a herald. If it was only the patibulum that Jesus carried, the probable failure of His strength by the way, leading to the incident of Simon the Cyrenian (Mt 27³²), must be attributed not to the weight of His burden, but to sheer physical exhaustion aggravated by loss of blood through scourging, as well as to the anguish that pressed upon His soul.

Arrived at the place of execution, which both with the Romans and the Jews was outside of the city (see art. GOLGOTHA), the condemned was stripped of his clothing by the soldiers detailed to carry out the sentence, who immediately appropriated it as their lawful booty (Mt 27³⁵). He was then laid on the ground, the cross-beam was thrust beneath his shoulders, and his hands were fastened to the extremities, sometimes with cords, but more usually, as in the case of Jesus (Jn 20²⁶, Lk 24³⁹; cf. Col 2¹⁴), with nails. The beam was next raised into position and securely fixed to the upright already planted in the ground. On the upright was a projecting peg (sedile) astride of which the victim was made to sit, thereby relieving the strain on the pierced hands, which might otherwise have been torn away from the nails. Finally the feet were fastened to the lower part of the upright, either with nails (Lk 24³⁹) or with cords.

The cross was not a lofty erection—much lower than it is usually represented in Christian art (cf. Mt 27³¹). Hanging thus quite near the ground, Jesus, in the midst of His last agonies, was all the more exposed to the jeers and insults of the bystanders and passers-by. It was a custom in Jerusalem to provide some alleviation for the physical tortures and mental sufferings of the crucified by giving him a stupefying draught. This was offered to Jesus before He was nailed to the cross; but He refused to take it (Mt 27³⁴). He would drink every drop of the cup that His Father had given Him, and go on to death with an unclouded consciousness. But for this we could hardly have had those 'Seven Words from the Cross' which come to us like the glorious rays that shoot from a sun sinking in awful splendour.

In crucifixion the pains of death were protracted long—sometimes for days. Even when the victims were nailed and not merely tied to the cross, it was hunger and exhaustion, not loss of blood, that was the direct cause of death. Sometimes an end was put to their sufferings by the crurifragium—the breaking of their legs by hammer-strokes. It is not likely that in ordinary circumstances the Jews would induce a Roman governor to pay any attention to the law of Dt 21²¹. But, as the day following our Lord's crucifixion was not only a Sabbath, but the Sabbath of Passover week, Pilate was persuaded to give orders that Jesus and the two robbers crucified along with Him should be despatched by the crurifragium and their bodies removed (Jn 19³¹). The soldiers broke the legs of the robbers first, but when they came to Jesus they found that He was already dead. One of them, either in sheer brutality or to make sure of His death, ran a spear into His side. The blood and water that gushed out (Jn 19³⁴, cf. 1 Jn 5⁸) have been held by some medical authorities to justify the opinion that the Saviour died of a broken heart. His death being certified, Joseph of Arimathea, who had begged the body from Pilate, removed it from the cross and laid it in his own sepulchre (Mt 27⁵⁸).

CRUELTY.—The word 'cruelty' has nearly disappeared from our Bibles. The RV has introduced 'rigour' and 'violence' in its stead. However, many instances of cruelty remain in the OT records, and some of these seem to have the sanction of Scripture. Such passages as Dt 20¹⁷, Jos 6²¹, 2 S 12³¹ no longer trouble the devout student of the Bible as they once did. He now recognizes the fact that in the Bible we have a faithful record of the slow evolution of spiritual ideals, and that the revelation of the NT brands as un-Christian and inhuman many things that were written by the ancient scribes and some things that were done by ancient saints. The spirit of Elijah may not be the spirit of Christ (Lk 9⁵⁵). Cruelty is un-Christian: kindness is the law of the Christian life.

CRUSE.—See HOUSE, § 9.

CRYSTAL.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

CUB in Ezk 30⁴ is almost certainly a corruption of Lub (i.e. Lybia), as was read by LXX. The 'Libya' of AV is a mistranslation of Put (see RV). Cf. Nah 3² where Lybians are mentioned along with Cush (Ethiopia) Egypt, and Put, as here; also 2 Ch 12² 16⁴.

CUBIT.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CUCKOW (shachaph, Lv 11¹⁶, Dt 14¹⁵, RV 'seamew,' following LXX).—Although cuckoos are common in Palestine, and their voices may be heard all over the land in the spring, yet there is good reason for rejecting this translation. The Heb. root implies 'leanness,' and the 'unclean' bird referred to must have been some kind of gull. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CUCUMBERS.—Two varieties of cucumber are very common in Palestine. The Cucumis sativus (Arab. khyḍr), a smooth-skinned, whitish cucumber of delicate flavour, is a prime favourite with the Arabs. It is cool and juicy, but for cultivation requires abundant water. The second (C. chate, Arab. [in Jerusalem] faqqās, [in Syria] qūḥḥā) is a long slender cucumber, less juicy than the former. The reference in Nu 11⁵ is probably to the latter, which is an Egyptian plant. The 'lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (Is 1⁸) is the rough booth erected by the owner, raised, as a rule, high upon poles, from which he may keep guard over his ripening vegetables. When the harvest is over, the 'lodge' is not taken down but is allowed to drop to pieces. It is a dreary ruin of poles and dried branches during more than half the year. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CUMI.—See TALITHA CUMI.

CUMMIN.—The seed of an umbelliferous plant, the (Uminum cyminum (syriacum), widely cultivated in and around Palestine. It is used to flavour dishes, and, more particularly, bread; in flavour and appearance it resembles caraway; it has long been credited with medicinal properties; it certainly is a carminative. It is even now beaten out with rods (Is 28³⁷). Tithes of cummin were paid by the Jews (Mt 23²³). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

CUN.—See BEROOTHAI.

CUNNING.—As a subst. 'cunning' in AV means either skill or knowledge; as an adj. either skilful or wise (we cannot say knowing, for that adj. has also degenerated). It is the pres. participle of the Anglo-Sax. verb cunnan, which meant both 'to know' and 'to be able.' In the Preface to the Wycliffe version of 1388 we read of 'the Holy Spyrīt, author of all wisdom and cunnynge and truth.'

CUP.—1. In OT the rendering of various words, the precise distinction between which, either as to form or use, is unknown to us. The usual word is kōs, the ordinary drinking-vessel of rich (Gn 40¹¹, 13, 21) and poor (2 S 12³) alike, the material of which varied, no doubt, with the rank and wealth of the owner. Joseph's divining cup (gābhītā, Gn 44²) was of silver, and, we may infer, of elaborate workmanship, since the same word is used for the bowls (AV) or *cup*s (RV), i.e. the flower-shaped ornamentation, on the candlestick of the Tabernacle. That the gābhītā was larger than the kōs is clear from Jer 35⁵. The kēṣāvōt of 1 Ch 28¹⁷ were more probably flagons, as RV in Ex 25³⁹ 37¹⁶ (but Nu 4¹ RV 'cups'). The aggān (Is 22⁴) was rather a basin, as Ex 24⁶, than a cup (EV).

In NT potērion is the corresponding name of the ordinary drinking-cup (water Mt 10⁴ etc., wine 23³⁵ etc.). The 'cup of blessing' (1 Co 10¹⁶) is so named from the kōs habberākhah of the Jewish Passover (wh. see, also EUCHARIST).

2. The word 'cup' has received an extended figurative application in both OT and NT. (a) As in various other literatures, 'cup' stands, esp. in Psalms, for the happy fortune or experience of one's earthly lot, mankind being thought of as receiving this lot from the hand of God, as the guest receives the wine-cup from the hand of his host (Ps 16⁵ 23⁵ 73¹⁰ etc.). But also, conversely, for the bitter lot of the wicked, Ps 11⁸ (cf (c) below), and in particular for the sufferings of Jesus Christ, Mt 20²², Mk 10³⁸, 39 14³⁶, Lk 22⁴¹, Jn 18¹¹. (b) Another figure is the 'cup of salvation' (lit. 'of deliverances'), Ps 116¹³. The reference is to the wine of the thank-offerings, part of the ritual of which was the festal meal before Jⁿ (cf. vv. 14⁸, 17¹³). (c) By a still bolder figure the punitive wrath of the offering Deity is spoken of as a cup which the guilty, Israelites and heathen alike, must drain to the dregs. So Jer 25¹⁶ (the wine-cup [of] fury), Ezk 23³²⁻³⁴, Is 51¹⁷ ('the cup of trembling', RV 'staggering'), Zec 12³ (RV 'cup of reeling'), Ps 75⁸, Rev 14¹⁰ 16¹⁹ 18⁶, for all which see the commentaries. (d) Lastly, we have 'the cup of consolation' offered to the mourners after the funeral-rites, Jer 16⁷ (cf. Pr 31¹⁵).

CUPBEARER.—An officer of considerable importance at Oriental courts, whose duty it was to serve the wine at the table of the king. The first mention of this officer is in the story of Joseph (Gn 40¹⁻¹⁴), where the term rendered butler in EV is the Heb. word which is rendered in other passages 'cupbearer.' The holder of this office was brought into confidential relations with the king, and must have been thoroughly trustworthy, as part of his duty was to guard against poison in the king's cup. In some cases he was required to taste the wine before presenting it. The position of Nehemiah as cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus was evidently high. Herodotus (iii. 34) speaks of the office at the court of Cambyses, king of Persia, as 'an honour of no small account,' and the narrative of Nehemiah shows the high esteem of the king, who is so solicitous for his welfare that he asks the cause of his sadness (2³). The cupbearers among the officers of king Solomon's household (1 K 10⁸) impressed the queen of Sheba, and they are mentioned among other indications of the grandeur of his court, which was modelled upon courts of other Oriental kings.

CUPBOARD (1 Mac 15²²).—A sideboard used for the display of gold and silver plate. This is the earliest meaning of 'cupboard'; cf. Greene (1592), 'Her mistress . . . set all her plate on the cubboorde for skew.'

CURSE.—See BAN and EXCOMMUNICATION.

CURTAIN.—See TABERNACLE.

CUSH in OT designates Ethiopia, and is the only name used there for that region. It is the same as the Egyptian Kash or Kesh. Broadly speaking, it answers to the modern Nubia. More specifically, the Egyptian Kash extended southwards from the first Cataract at Syene (Ezk 29¹⁰), and in the periods of widest extension of the empire it embraced a portion of the Sudan. It was conquered and annexed by Egypt under the 12th Dynasty (c. b.c. 2000) and remained normally a subject country. After the decline of the 22nd (Libyan) Dynasty, the Cushites became powerful and gradually encroached on northern Egypt, so that at length an Ethiopian dynasty was established (the 25th, 728-663), which was overthrown by the Assyrians. Within this period falls the attempt of Tirhakah, king of Cush, to defeat Sennacherib of Assyria in Palestine (2 K 19⁹).

In Gn 10⁶ Cush is a son of Ham, though his descendants as given in v. 7 are mostly Arabian. Surprising also is the statement in 2 Ch 14²² that Zerah the Cushite invaded Judah in the days of Asa, at a time when the Cushites had no power in Egypt. An attempt has been made to solve these and other difficulties by the assumption of a second Cush in Arabia (cf. 2 Ch 21¹⁶). Instructive references to the Cushite country and people are found in Am 9⁷, Is 18¹⁻⁴, Jer 13². Cushites were frequent in Palestine, probably descendants of slaves; see 2 S 18¹⁸, Jer 36¹⁴ 38²². These were, however, possibly Arabian Cushites. For the explanation of the Cush of Gn 10⁶, and possibly of 21³, see COSSÆANS. J. F. McCURDY.

CUSH as a personal name occurs only in the title of Ps 7. He is described as a Benjamite, and was probably a follower of Saul who opposed David.

CUSHAN (Hab 3⁷)—Arabian (?) Cush (wh. see).

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.—King of Mesopotamia, of Aram-naharaim, first of the oppressors of Israel, from whom Othniel, son of Kenaz, delivered them after eight years (Jg 3⁹⁻¹⁰). It has been conjectured that he was a king of the Mitanni, whose territory once covered the district between the Euphrates and Habor, or that 'Aram' is a mistake for Edom, 'Rishathaim' for Resh-hattemani, 'chief of the Temanites.' The name has not yet received any monumental explanation, and its nationality is unknown. C. H. W. JOHNS.

CUSHI, CUSHITE.—The word Cāsh occurs with the article in Nu 12¹, 2 S 18²¹; without the article in Jer 36¹⁴, Zeph 1¹. 1. With the article it is probably merely an expression of nationality, 'the Cushite' (see CUSH). It was looked upon as a disgrace that Moses should have married a Cushite. 2. Without the article the word is used merely as a proper name. It is borne by (1) the great-grandfather of Jehudi, the latter one of Jehoikim's courtiers (Jer 36¹⁴); (2) the father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1¹).

CUSHION.—See PILLOW.

CUSTOM(S) (Mt 17²⁵, Ro 13⁷): 'receipt of custom' (Mt 9¹, Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷).—This is to be carefully distinguished from 'tribute' (wh. see). The customs were paid on the value of goods, in Galilee and Peræa to the Herods, but in the Roman province of Judæa to the procurator as agent of the Roman government. The 'receipt of custom' was the collector's office.

CUTH, CUTHAH.—One of the cities from which Sargon brought colonists to take the place of the Israelites whom he had deported from Samaria, B.C. 722 (2 K 17^{24, 30}). These colonists intermingled with the Israelite inhabitants who were left by Sargon; and their descendants, the Samaritans, were in consequence termed by the Jews 'Cuthæans.' According to the old Arabic geographers, Cuthah was situated not far from Babylon. This view is borne out by the Assyrian inscriptions, from which we learn that Kuti (or Kutu) was a city of Middle-Babylonia. It has now been identified with the modern Tell Ibrāhīm, N.E. of Babylon, where remains of the temple of Nergal (cf. v. 30) have been discovered.

CUTHA (1 Es 5²³).—His sons were among the Temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel.

CUTTING OFF FROM THE PEOPLE.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 11.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH.—This expression occurs only in Lv 19²⁸ 21⁵. The former passage runs thus: 'Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead. . . I am the Lord.' The same prohibition, otherwise expressed in the original, is found in the earlier Deuteronomic legislation (Dt 14¹). The reference is to the practice, not confined to the Hebrews or even to their Semitic kinsfolk, of making incisions in the face, hands (Jer 48³⁷), and other parts of the body to the effusion of blood, as part of the rites of mourning for the dead (see MARKS, § 4), and by a natural transition, to which the wearing of sackcloth forms a parallel, in times of national calamity. The custom is referred to without condemnation by the pre-Deuteronomic prophets, see Hos 7¹⁴ (corrected text, as RVm), and esp. Jer 16⁴ 41⁵ 47⁴.

The underlying motive of this practice and the reasons for its legislative prohibition have been variously stated. It may be regarded as certain, however, that the practice had its root in primitive animistic conceptions regarding the spirits of the departed. The object in view may have been either so to disfigure the living that they should be unrecognizable by the malignant spirits of the dead, or, more probably, by means of the effusion of blood—which originally, perhaps, was brought into contact with the corpse—to maintain or renew the bond of union between the living and the dead.

The explanation just given is confirmed by the allied practice, springing from similar motives, of shaving off the whole (Ezk 44²⁰, cf. Bar 6³¹) or part of the head hair or of the beard in token of mourning (Is 15² 22¹², Ezk 7¹⁴, Am 8¹⁰ etc.). Both practices, the incisions and the shaving, are named together in the legislative passages above cited. Thus Dt 14¹ forbids 'baldness between the eyes,' i.e. the shaving of the front of the scalp, 'for the dead'; in Lv 19²⁷ it is forbidden to 'round the corners' of the head, i.e. to shave the temples (cf. Jer 9³⁶ 25²³, where certain desert tribes are named 'the corners clipt,' from their habit of shaving the temples, see HAIR), and to 'mar the corners of the beard' (cf. Jer 48³⁷). These references recall the wide-spread heathen practice of hair-offerings, which goes back to the antique conception that the hair, like the blood, is the seat of life.

The reason of the twofold prohibition now becomes apparent. With the growth of loftier conceptions of J^h and His worship, these practices, with their animistic background and heathen associations, were seen to be unworthy of a people who owed exclusive devotion to their covenant God, a thought implied in the concluding words of Lv 19²⁸ 'I am Jahweh.' The practice of gashing the body till the blood ran, as part of the ritual of Baal worship, is attested by 1 K 18²⁸.

The further prohibition of Lv 19²⁸ 'nor print any marks upon you,' refers to another widely prevalent custom in antiquity, that of tattooing and even branding (3 Mac 2²⁹) the body with the name or symbol of one's special deity, a practice to which there is a reference in Is 44⁵, to be rendered as in RVm, 'another shall write on his hand, Unto the LORD,' or, better, as one word, 'Jahweh's.'

CYAMON, Jth 7³ = Jokneam (wh. see).

CYLINDER.—Ca 5¹⁴ RVm for EV 'ring.' See RING.

CYMBAL.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

CYPRESS.—(1) tirzah (Is 44¹⁴, RV 'holm oak') stands for some tree with very hard wood, the meaning of the root (in Arabic) being to be hard. 'Holm oak' is the rendering of the oldest Latin translation. This is the Quercus ilex, a tree now rare W. of the Jordan, but still found in Gilead and Bashan; (2) te'ashahur (Is 41¹⁹ RVm). Both AV and RV have 'box tree' (wh. see); (3) berdsh (2 S 6⁸ RVm). Both AV and RV have 'fir wood' (see also Is 55¹³). In Palestine to-day cypresses are extensively planted, especially in cemeteries.

CYPRUS.—An island in the N.E. corner of the Levant, within sight of the Syrian and Cilician coasts. Its greatest length is 140 miles, breadth 80 miles. In configuration it consists of a long plain shut in on the N. and the S.W. by mountain ranges.

In the OT the name Cyprus does not occur, but undoubtedly the island is referred to under the name Kittim, which is the same as the name of the Phœnician town Kitton, now Larnaka. In Gn 10⁴ Kittim is spoken of as a son of Javan, together with Tarshish and Elishah. This probably implies that the earliest population of Cyprus was akin to the pre-Hellenic population of Greece. In Ezk 27⁷ the isles of Kittim are spoken of as supplying Tyre with boxwood. But the name Kittim is used also of the West generally, as in Dn 11¹⁰ of the Romans (cf. Nu 24²⁴).

The early importance of Cyprus was due to its forests and its copper. Its copper has long ago been exhausted, and owing to neglect its forests have perished. But throughout the 'bronze age,' which for Ægean countries may roughly be reckoned as B.C. 2000 to B.C. 1000, its copper was exported not only to Syria but to Egypt and to Europe, and mixed with the tin brought by Phœnicians from Cornwall and the West, it provided the metal from which both weapons and ornaments were made. Hence the name copper is derived from Cyprus. When the iron age began, this metal also was obtained from Cyprus.

CYPRUS

Leadless the copper was first exported by Phœnicians, who early founded Kition and other towns in Cyprus, and introduced the worship of the Syrian Aphrodite who became known to the Greeks as the 'Cyprian goddess.' But the Greeks themselves were not long behind the Phœnicians in the island,—the settlers were doubtless Peloponnesians disturbed by the Dorian invasions, and they used what the Greeks called the Arcadian dialect. They brought with them the Ægean civilization, as relics found in the island prove conclusively. Paphos, Soli, Salamis were Greek settlements, the last being named from the island off the coast of Attica. But the Greeks soon combined with the Phœnicians. They adopted what was probably in origin a Hittite alphabet, in which every syllable is represented by a separate sign, and this lasted till the 4th century.

Cyprus did not develop as an independent power. Before b.c. 1450 it was made tributary to Egypt. About b.c. 1000 it was subject to Tyre, and with Phœnicia it passed into the hands of Sargon, the Assyrian, about b.c. 700. Sargon left an inscription at Kition, and later Assyrian kings record tribute received from Cyprus. About b.c. 560 Amasis of Egypt reduced the island, and it passed with Egypt to Cambyses of Persia in b.c. 525. It took part in the Ionian revolt of b.c. 501, but was quickly reduced, and supplied Xerxes with fleet in b.c. 480. Athens made repeated attempts to secure the island, but the mixed population prevented any strong Hellenic movement, and it only passed definitely into Greek hands by submission to Alexander the Great after the battle of Issus in b.c. 333. On the division of his empire it fell to the Ptolemys of Egypt, until it was annexed by Rome in b.c. 57. It was made a separate province after the battle of Actium in b.c. 31, becoming at first an 'imperial' province, but being afterwards transferred to 'senatorial' government, so that in Ac 13St Luke rightly describes the governor as a proconsul.

Jews first settled in Cyprus under the Ptolemys, and their numbers there were considerable before the time of the Apostles. Barnabas is described as a Cypriot Jew, and when he and St. Paul started from Antioch on the First Missionary Journey, they first of all passed through Cyprus (Ac 13¹⁻¹²). They landed at Salamis, then a Greek port flourishing with Syrian trade, now deserted—with its harbour silted up—three miles from Famagusta. Here they preached in the synagogue, where their message was probably not entirely new (Ac 11¹⁹), and then journeyed through 'the whole island' (RV) to New Paphos in the W.—a three or four days' journey, even if they preached nowhere on the way. New Paphos, like Old Paphos, was the seat of the worship of Aphrodite (see PAPHOS), and was at this time the Roman capital. (For the incidents connected with the proconsul and the magus, see artt. SERGIUS PAULUS and BAI-JESUS.)

Besides Barnabas we have mention of Mnason, an 'original convert,' as coming from Cyprus (Ac 21⁹), but we have no knowledge of how the Church grew in the island until it included 15 bishoprics. The Jews of Cyprus took part in the great rising of their race which took place in A.D. 117 (when Trajan was busy with Parthia), and they are said to have massacred 240,000 of the Gentile population. The revolt was suppressed without mercy, and all Jews were expelled from the island.

Under the Byzantine emperors Cyprus suffered much from their misrule, and from the Saracens. Seized in 1191 by Richard Cœur de Lion, it was sold to the Knights Templars. From 1479 to 1570 it was held by the Venetians. After three centuries of Turkish rule it passed under British rule in 1878, by a convention which still requires it to pay tribute to the Sultan. But it has scarcely recovered prosperity. Various causes have lessened the rainfall, it is troubled with malaria, its mineral resources were long ago worked out and its forests destroyed. There are no good roads, and communication is kept up by bullock-carts and mules. Its best ports (Larnaka and Limasol) are open roadsteads.

CYRENE.—Capital of Libya (Tripoli) in N. Africa (Ac 2¹⁰), the home of numerous Jews who with the 'Libertines' (freedmen from Rome?) and Alexandrians had a synagogue of their own at Jerusalem (Ac 6⁹). Many of these became Christians, as Simon and his sons (doubtless), Mk 15²¹; Lucius, Ac 13¹; and those in Ac 11²⁰ who preached to the 'Greeks' (v.l. 'Hellenists').

A. J. MACLEAN.

CYRENIUS.—See QUITRINIUS.

CYRUS.—Referred to as 'king of the Persians,' 2 Ch 36²², Ezr 1¹, Dn 10¹, and often; 'the Persian,' Dn 6²⁸; 'king of Babylon,' Ezr 5¹². He is regarded in Is 40–48 as specially destined by Jahweh to redeem Israel and execute Divine judgment upon Babylon, to set free the captives and restore Jerusalem and its Temple. He had not known Jahweh before his call, but carried out his mission in Jahweh's name, and is styled 'the friend of Jahweh' and 'Jahweh's anointed.' The Cyrus of whom these high expectations were formed was the founder of the Persian Empire. His grandfather was also called Cyrus (Kurush, Bab. Kurash, Heb. Korash). He was an Aryan and descended from Achæmenes (Hakhamanish). At first he was king of Persia and Anshan or Anzan, an Elamite province, capital at Susa (Shushan), and vassal of Media. The contemporary cuneiform inscriptions are—(1) a cylinder inscription of Nabonidus, last king of Babylonia, from Sippara; (2) an annalistic tablet of Cyrus written shortly after his conquest of Babylonia; (3) a proclamation of Cyrus of the same date. Nabonidus' account was written soon after Cyrus, 'a petty vassal' of Astyages (Istuvegu), king of the Manda, with his small army had conquered Astyages (b.c. 549). This led to the withdrawal of the Manda from Harran, and left Nabonidus free to restore the temple of Sin there. Cyrus soon made himself master of the whole Median empire, but was faced by an alliance of Croesus, king of Lydia, Nabonidus of Babylon, and Amasis of Egypt. On the fall of Croesus, Cyrus turned to Babylonia, where Nabonidus had long estranged the inhabitants of the capital by his neglect of the sacred feasts and worship of Marduk. Belshazzar, his son, defended the land, but was defeated at Opis, and on 14th Tammuz, Sippara fell 'without fighting.' On the 16th, Gobryas (Gubaru, Ugbaru) entered Babylon without resistance, and Cyrus followed on the 3rd of Marcheshvan, b.c. 539–8, and was received, according to his own account, by all classes, especially by priests and nobles, as a liberator. He claims to have restored to their homes the exiles from Babylonia and their gods, and prays that these gods may daily intercede for him with Marduk and Nabu, whose worshipper he professes to be. Cyrus reigned about nine years from this time, and in the last year handed over the sovereignty of Babylon to his son Cambyses.

The career of Cyrus so impressed the popular imagination, that the classical writers adorn his story with a variety of legendary incidents for which no confirmation can be produced. The policy which Cyrus pursued towards the Jews is variously estimated, but all accounts agree in stating that the restoration of the Temple was started by him, and in claiming him as a worshipper of Jahweh.

DABBESHETH.—A town in the westward border of Zebulun (Jos 19¹¹), identified with Dabsheh, E. of 'Acca.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DABERATH.—A city said in Jos 19¹² to belong to Zebulun, but in Jos 21²³ and 1 Ch 6⁷² to be a Levitical city in Issachar. Probably it was on the border between the two tribes. It has been identified with Daburieh at the foot of Tabor.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DABRIA.—One of the five scribes who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14²⁰).

DACUBI, 1 Es 5²⁸ = Akkub, Ezr 2⁴², Neh 7⁴⁵.

DAGGER.—See ARMOUR, ARMS, § 1 (c).

DAGON.—A god whose worship was general among the Philistines (at Gaza, Jg 16²², 1 Mac 10⁶², 11⁴; at Ashkelon, 1 S 5⁷; prob. at Beth-dagon [wh. see], which may at one time have been under Philistine rule). Indeed, the name Baal-dagon inscribed in Phœnician characters upon a cylinder now in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, and the modern place-name Beit Dajan (S.E. of Nablus), indicate an existence of his cult in Phœnicia and Canaan. An endeavour to identify the god with Atargatis (wh. see) is responsible for the explanation of the name as a diminutive (term of endearment) of dag ('fish'), and also for the rendering of 'only Dagon was left' (1 S 5⁴) as 'only the fishy part was left.' Though there is nothing to contradict the supposition that Dagon was a fish-god, it is more probable that originally he was an agricultural deity (named from dagan = 'grain', cf. 1 S 6⁴, 5), from which position he developed into a war-god (1 Ch 10¹⁰) and apparently even into a national deity (1 S 5²–6¹⁴). An identification of this god with the Babylonian Dagan is doubtful (see Jensen, Kosmologie, 449 ff.; and Jastrow, Rel. of Bab. and Assyri., Index). N. KOENIG.

DAISAN, 1 Es 5³¹ = Rezin, Ezr 2⁴⁶, Neh 7⁶⁰. The form in 1 Es. is due to confusion of Heb. r and z.

DALAN, 1 Es 5³⁷ = Delaiah, Ezr 2⁴⁰.

DALETH.—Fourth letter of Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 4th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

DALMANUTHA.—Hither Christ sailed after feeding the four thousand (Mk 8¹⁰). In Mt 15³⁹ Magadan is substituted. No satisfactory conjecture has yet been offered as to the explanation of either name, or the identification of either place. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DALMATIA.—A mountainous district on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea. More exactly used, it is the southern half of the Roman province Illyricum (wh. see). The writer of the Second Epistle to Timothy makes Titus journey there (2 Ti 4¹⁰). A. SOUTER.

DALPHON (Est 9⁷).—The second son of Haman, put to death by the Jews.

DAMARIS.—A convert at Athens (Ac 17³⁴). As women of the upper classes were kept more in the background there than in Macedonia or Asia Minor, she was probably not of noble birth (cf. 17⁴, 12). The name is perhaps a corruption of Damalis, 'a heifer.' The Bezan MS omits it. A. J. MACLEAN.

DAMASCUS.—1. Situation, etc.—The chief city of N. Syria, situated in lat. 33° 30' N. and long. 36° 18' E. It lies in a plain east of the Anti-Lebanon, famous for its beauty and fertility, and watered by the Barada River, the Abanah (wh. see) of the Bible. The luxuriance of its gardens has long been renowned: the English traveller W. G. Browne in 1797 noted that the fruit-trees were so numerous that those which died and were cut down were sufficient to supply the town with firewood. Its population is estimated at from 150,000 to 220,000. It derives its modern importance from local manufactures (woodwork, furniture, artistic metal and textile work), from its situation and convenience as a market for the desert tribes, and from its religious significance as the starting-point of the annual Syrian pilgrim caravan to Mecca. Railways run from Damascus to Haifa, Beyrout, and Mezerib, and the important line to Mecca, begun in 1901, is expected to be finished in 1910. The writer of Canticles, in his appreciation of the sensuous beauty of scenery, has not forgotten Damascus: the nose of the Shulammitte is compared to the 'tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus' (Ca 7⁴).

The history of Damascus begins in remote antiquity: the time of its foundation is quite unknown; but that a settlement should have been founded in so desirable a locality was inevitable from the very beginning of human association. It was probably already an ancient city at the time of the Tell el-Amarna tablets, on which we meet with its name more than once. It also appears in the tribute lists of Thothmes III. as Demesku.

2. OT references.—In the Biblical history we first meet with the name of Damascus as a territorial indication in defining the line of Abram's pursuit of the five kings (Gn 14¹⁵). In Gn 15² the name of Abram's steward is given in the MT as Dammesk Eliezer (so RV)—a name probably corrupt. It is explained in the Aram., Targum, and Syr. as 'Eliezer the Damascene,' which gives sense, though it presupposes a most improbable corruption in the Hebrew text. We must therefore pass this passage by with the remark that it is not unlikely that Abram's servant was a native of Damascus. We hear nothing more of Damascus till 2 S 8⁶, which describes David's capture of the city as a reprisal for its assistance given to Hadadezer, king of Zobah; David garrisoned it and reduced it to a tributary condition (cf. 1 Ch 18⁸). The general of Hadadezer, however, Rezon by name, succeeded in establishing himself as king in Damascus in the time of Solomon, and made himself continuously a very troublesome neighbour (1 K 11²³, 24). In the wars between Asa and Baasha (1 K 15¹⁷, 2 Ch 16²²) the king of Judah invoked the aid of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, whose royal city was Damascus, against his Israelite enemy. By gifts he persuaded him to break the truce already existing between Ben-hadad and Israel, and to join partnership with Judah. Accordingly Ben-hadad proceeded to harass Baasha on his northern borders, and so induced him to desert from his plan of erecting border fortifications between the two Hebrew kingdoms. Hostilities continued between Syria and Israel till the days of Ahab: Ahab's sparing of Ben-hadad after the battle of Aphek and his making a truce with him, were the cause of a prophetic denunciation (1 K 20²). In the reign of Jehoram, the Syrian general Naaman came to be cleansed of leprosy (2 K 5), and Elisha's directions led to his famous depreciating comparison of the muddy Jordan with the clear-flowing Abanah and Pharpar (v. 12). The Chronicler (2 Ch 24²²) reports a victorious invasion of Judah by Damascus in the days of Joash. The city of Damascus was re-taken by Jeroboam II. (2 K 14²⁸), though the circumstances are not related; but must have been lost again immediately, for we find the Syrian king Rezin there (2 K 16) oppressing Ahaz, so that he was led to the policy, which (as Isaiah foresaw, 7. 10^{8–11}) proved suicidal, of calling in the aid of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and submitting himself as a vassal of that great king. Prophetic denunciations of Damascus, as of the other enemies of the Hebrews, are found in Is 17, Jer 49²⁴, Am 1⁴, and Zec 9¹. Damascus as a commercial centre was always of great importance, and Ezekiel (27¹⁸) alludes to its trade in vines and wool. It is, of course, included in the imaginary restoration of the kingdom (Ezk 47¹⁷).

3. NT references.—Damascus appears only in connexion with St. Paul. Here took place his miraculous conversion (Ac 9. 22. 26) with the well-known attendant circumstances, and his escape from Aretas (wh. see), the governor, by being lowered in a basket over the wall (Ac 9²², 2 Co 11³²⁻³⁴), and thither he returned after his Arabian retirement (Gal 1¹⁷).

4. Later history.—The late extra-Biblical history is very complicated. In 333 B.C., after the battle of Issus, the city was surrendered to Parmenio, the general of Alexander the Great, and during the subsequent Greco-Egyptian wars it fell more than once into the hands of the Ptolemys. In 111 B.C., on the partition of Syria between Antiochus Grypus and A. Cyzicenus, the latter obtained possession of the city. His successor, Demetrius Eucerus, invaded Palestine in 88 B.C. and defeated Alexander Jannæus at Shechem. His brother, who succeeded him, was driven out by the Arabian Haritha (Aretas). For a while it remained in Arab hands, then, after a temporary occupation by Tigranes, king of Armenia, it was conquered by Metellus, the Roman general. It was a city of the Decapolis. The great temple of the city was by one of the early Christian emperors—probably Theodosius—transformed into a church. It is now the principal mosque of the city, but was partly destroyed by fire in 1803. Since 635 Damascus has been a Muslim city, though governed from time to time by different tribes and dynasties of that faith. It was conquered by the Seljuks in 1075. The Crusaders never succeeded in making a strong position for themselves in the city. In 1860 about 6000 Christians were massacred by the Muslim population of the city. Few remains of antiquity are to be seen in the modern city, which is attractive principally for its undiluted Oriental life and its extensive markets and bazaars. The mosque just mentioned, a mediæval castle, and part of the ancient walls, are the principal relics. Of course, there are the usual traditional sites of historical events, but these are not more trustworthy at Damascus than anywhere else in Syria and Palestine.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DAMNATION.—The words 'damn,' 'damnable,' and 'damnation' have, through their use in the literature of theology, come to express condemnation to everlasting punishment. But in the English Bible they mean no more than is now expressed by 'condemn' or 'condemnation.' In some places a better translation than 'condemnation' is 'judgment,' as in Jn 5²⁹ 'the resurrection of damnation' (Gr. krisis, RV 'judgment'). See JUDGMENT.

DAN.—According to the popular tradition, Dan was the fifth son of Jacob, and full brother of Naphtali, by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid (Gn 30⁶⁻⁸). Rachel, who had no children, exclaimed 'dananni' ('God hath judged me'), and, therefore, he was called Dan. As in the case of so many names, this is clearly a 'popular etymology.' It is probable that Dan was an appellative, or titular attribute, of some deity whose name has not come down to us in connexion with it, or it may even be the name of a god as Gad was (cf. the Assyrian proper names Ashur-dân 'Ashur is judge', Aku-dâna 'the moon-god is judge' of the period of Hammurabi). Its feminine counterpart is Dinah (Jacob's daughter by Leah), which as the name of the half-sister of Dan is probably reminiscent of some related clan that early lost its identity.

Of this eponymous ancestor of the tribe tradition has preserved no details, but some of the most interesting stories of the Book of Judges tell of the exploits of the Danite Samson, who, single-handed, wrought discomfiture in the ranks of the Philistines. These are heroic rather than historical tales, yet suggestive of the conditions that prevailed when the tribes were establishing themselves.

P makes Dan a large tribe. With his characteristic love of large numbers he gives the fighting strength of Dan in the Wilderness census as 62,700, more than that of any other except Judah (Nu 1³⁸; cf. 26⁴, Moab census). All the other data point in the opposite direction. J (Jg 18¹⁴) speaks of it as a 'family'; elsewhere Dan is said to have had only one son, Hushim or Shuham (Gn 46²³, Nu 26⁴). The tribe at first occupied the hill-country in the S.W. of Ephraim, and thence attempted to spread out into the valleys of Aijalon and Sorek. That it ever reached the sea, either here or in its later northern home, is unlikely, notwithstanding the usual interpretation of Jg 5¹⁷, a passage which yields no wholly satisfactory meaning. (But see Moore, Judges, ad loc.). In this region the Danites were severely pressed by the 'Amorites'—(Canaanites). The major portion were compelled to emigrate northward, where they found at the foot of Mt. Hermon an isolated city, Laish or Leshem, situated in a fertile tract of country (Jos 19⁴⁷, Jg 18). This city with its unsuspecting inhabitants the Danites ruthlessly destroyed. A new city was built, to which they gave the name of Dan. In this colony there were only 600 armed men with their families. On their way thither they induced the domestic priest of an Ephraimite, Micah, to accompany them with his sacred paraphernalia, an ephod, a graven and a molten image, and the teraphim. These were duly installed in a permanent sanctuary, in which the descendants of Moses are said to have ministered until the Captivity (Jg 18³⁰). That the remnant of the family left in the South was either destroyed by its enemies, or, more likely, absorbed by the neighbouring tribes, is made probable by Jg 1³, which ascribes the victory over their enemies to the 'house of Joseph.' Gn 49¹⁷ says 'Dan shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path'; and Dt 33², 'Dan is a lion's whelp,' etc. These characterizations are more applicable to a small tribe of guerilla fighters, versed in cunning strategy, wont to strike a quick blow from ambush at a passing troop, than they are to the more sustained measures of warfare of a large and powerful body. See also TRIBES.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

DAN.—A city in northern Palestine, once called Laish (Jg 18²⁹) or Leshem (Jos 19⁴⁷), though the ancient record of the battle of four kings against five gives the later name (Gn 14¹⁴). It was a city remote from assistance, and therefore fell an easy prey to a band of marauding Danites, searching for a dwelling-place. It was in the north boundary of Palestine. The story of the Danites stealing the shrine of Micah is told to account for its sanctity, which Jeroboam I. recognized by setting up here one of his calf-shrines (1 K 12²⁹). It was perhaps the same as Dan-jaan, one of the borders of Joab's census district (2 S 24⁶). It was captured by Ben-hadad (1 K 15²⁰). It is identified with Tell el-Kadi on account of the similarity of meaning of the names (Arabic kadi = Hebrew dan = 'judge')—a very dangerous ground for such speculations. The site, however, would suit the geographical context of the narratives.

DANIEL.—1. Two passages in the Book of Ezekiel (14¹⁴⁻²⁰ 28³), written respectively about B.C. 592 and 587, mention a certain Daniel as an extraordinarily righteous and wise man, belonging to the same class as Noah and Job, whose piety availed with God on behalf of their unworthy contemporaries. All three evidently belonged to the far-distant past: Ezekiel's readers were familiar with their history and character. Daniel, occupying the middle place, cannot be conceived of as the latest of them. He certainly was not a younger man than the prophet who refers to him, as the hero of the Book of Daniel would have been. For Dn 1¹⁻² makes the latter to have been carried into captivity in B.C. 606, a mere decade prior to Ezk 14. 2. See ABIGAIL. 3. A priest who accompanied Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr 8², Neh 10⁶). He was head of his father's house, and traced his descent from Ithamar. At 1 Es 8²⁹ the name is spelled Gamelus or Gamael, which probably rests on a corrupt Heb. text. Driver (Daniel, p. xviii.) notes that amongst his contemporaries were 'a Hananiah (Neh 10²³), a Mishael (8⁴), and an Azariah (10³); but the coincidence is probably accidental.' It is, however, quite as likely that the author of Dn. borrowed the three names from Nehemiah.

DANIEL, BOOK OF.—1. Authorship and Date.—The first six chapters of this book contain a series of narratives which tell of (a) the fidelity of Daniel and his friends to their religion, and (b) the incomparable superiority of their God to the deities of Babylon. The remaining six chapters relate four visions seen by Daniel and the interpretation of them. Chs. 1-6 speak of Daniel in the third person; in 7-12 he is the speaker (yet see 7¹ 10¹). But both parts are from the same pen, and the prima facie impression is that of an autobiography. Porphyry argued against this in the 3rd cent. A.D., and it is now generally abandoned, for such reasons as the following: (1) In the Jewish Canon Dn. stands in the third division, 'the Writings.' Had it been the production of a prophet of the 6th cent. it would have been put in the second division, 'the Prophets.' (2) Neither the man nor the book is mentioned in the list of Sir 44-50 (c. B.C. 200); and Sir 49¹⁵ seems to have been written by one who was not acquainted with the story. (3) There is no reason for believing that a collection of sacred writings, including Jer., had been formed in the reign of Darius, as is implied in Dn 9². (4) The Heb. of Dn. is of a later type than even that of Chronicles. The Aramaic is a West-Syrian dialect, not in use at the Bab. court in the 6th century. More Persian words are employed than a Heb. author would be familiar with at the close of the Bab. empire. In a document composed prior to the Macedonian conquest we should not have found the three Greek words which are here used. (5) There are inaccuracies which a contemporary would have avoided. It is doubtful whether Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem in B.C. 606 (1¹ 2¹). The name 'Chaldeans' as designating the learned class is a later usage (2²). Belshazzar was not 'the king' (5¹), nor was Neb. his ancestor (5² 11). Darius the Mede never 'received the kingdom' (5³¹). Xerxes did not follow Artaxerxes (11²) but preceded him. (6) The relations between Syria and Egypt, from the 4th to the 2nd cents. B.C., are described with a fulness of detail which differentiates Dn 7. 11 from all OT prophecy: see the precision with which the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes is related in ch. 11; the events from 323-175 occupy 16 verses: those from 175-164 take up 25; at v.³⁴ the lines become less definite, because this is the point at which the book was written; at v.⁴⁰ prediction begins, and the language no longer corresponds with the facts of history. There can be little doubt that Dn. appeared about B.C. 166. Its object was to encourage the faithful Jews to adhere to their religion, in the assurance that God would intervene. The unknown writer was intensely sure of the truths in which he believed: to him and to his readers the historical setting was but a framework. Not that he invented the stories. We saw in the preceding article that the exiled Jews knew of a Daniel, famous for piety and wisdom. Round his name, in the course of the ages, stories illustrative of these qualities had gathered, and the author of our book worked up the material afresh with much skill.

2. Language, Unity, Theology.—(1) From 2⁴ to 7²⁸ is in Aramaic. Four explanations have been offered: (a) This section was originally written in Aramaic, about B.C. 300, and incorporated, with additions, into the work of 166. (b) The corresponding portion of a Heb. original was lost and its place filled by an already current Aram. translation. (c) The author introduced the 'Chaldees' as speaking what he supposed was their language, and then continued to write it because it was more familiar than Heb. to himself and his readers. (d) The likeliest suggestion is that the entire book was Aramaic, but would not have found admission into the Canon if it had not been enclosed, so to speak, in a frame of Heb., the sacred language.

(2) The unity of the book has been impugned by many critics, but it is now generally agreed that the question is settled by the harmony of view and consistency of plan which bind the two halves together. The text has suffered more or less in 1²⁰. 21 6²⁰ 7⁵ 9⁴⁻²⁰ 10⁴. 8. 9 10²⁰. 11² 12¹¹.

(3) The theological features are what might be expected in the 2nd cent. B.C. Eschatology is prominent. The visions and their interpretations all culminate in the final establishment of the Kingdom of God. And in this connexion it should be mentioned that Dn. is the earliest example of a fully developed Apocalypse. The doctrine of the Resurrection is also distinctly asserted: individuals are to rise again; not all men, or even all Israelites, but the martyrs and the apostates. At no earlier period is there such an angelology. Watchers and holy ones determine the destinies of an arrogant king. Two angels have proper names, Gabriel and Michael. To each nation a heavenly patron has been assigned, and its fortunes here depend on the struggle waged by its representative above.

3. Text.—The early Church set aside the LXX in favour of the less paraphrastic version of Theodotion. In both translations are found the Additions to Daniel. (1) 67 verses are inserted after 3²², consisting of (a) the Prayer of Azarias, (β) details concerning the heating of the furnace, (γ) the Benedicite. These teach the proper frame of mind for all confessors, and dilate on the miraculous element in the Divine deliverance. (2) The History of Susanna, which demonstrates God's protection of the unjustly accused and illustrates the sagacity in judgment of the youth who is rightly named Daniel. 'El is my judge.' (3) Bel and the Dragon, two tracts which expose the imbecility of idolatry, and bring out Daniel's cleverness and God's care for His servant in peril. Swete (Introd. to OT in Greek, p. 260) rightly remarks that internal evidence appears to show that (1) and (2) originally had a separate circulation.

DAN-JAAN.—Joab and his officers in taking the census came 'to Dan-jaan and round about to Zidon' (2 S 24⁶). No such place is mentioned anywhere else in OT, and it is generally assumed that the text is corrupt. It has indeed been proposed to locate Dan-jaan at a ruin N. of Achzib which is said to bear the name Khan Dāniān; but this identification, although accepted by Conder, has not made headway. The reference is more probably to the city of Dan which appears so frequently as the northern limit of the kingdom.

DANNAH (Jos 15⁴⁹).—A town of Judah mentioned next to Debir and Socoh. It was clearly in the mountains S.W. of Hebron, probably the present Idhnah.

DAPHNE.—A place mentioned in 2 Mac 4²⁸ to which Onias withdrew for refuge, but from which he was decoyed by Andronicus and treacherously slain. It is the mod. Beit el-Ma ('House of Waters') about 5 miles from Antioch. Daphne was famous for its fountains, its temple in honour of Apollo and Diana, its oracle, and its right of asylum. (See Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxiii.)

DARA (1 Ch 2⁸).—See DARDA.

DARDA.—Mentioned with Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, and Calcol as a son of Mahol, and a proverbial type of wisdom, but yet surpassed by Solomon (1 K 4³¹). In 1 Ch 2⁸ apparently the same four (Dara is probably an error for Darda) are mentioned with Zimri as sons of Zerah, the son of Judah by Tamar (Gn 38³⁰). See also MAHOL.

DARIO.—See MONEY, § 3.

DARIUS.—1. Son of Hystaspes, king of Persia (B.C. 521-485), well known from the classical historian Herodotus, and, for the early part of his reign, from his own tri-lingual inscription on the rocks at Behistun.

He allowed the Jews to rebuild the Temple. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah encouraged the people to go on with the work, and when Tattenai, the Persian governor of Syria, demanded their authority, they alleged a decree of Cyrus. On reference being made to Darius and the decree being found, the king confirmed it, and ordered facilities to be afforded for the building. It was completed in the 6th year of his reign (Ezr 4. 5, 6, Hag 1st 24, Zec 1st 7). 2. Darius the Persian (Neh 12th). Possibly Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia (B.C. 336-330), 1 Mac 1st. 3. 'Darius' in 1 Mac 12th (AV) is an error for the Spartan 'Arius' (wh. see). 4. 'Darius the Mede' (Dn 11th), son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes (9th), is said (5th) to have succeeded to the kingdom of Babylon after Belshazzar's death, and to have been sixty-two years old when he received the kingdom. This account does not answer to what we know of any king called Darius. Gobryas was he who actually received the kingdom for Cyrus, entering Babylon on the 16th of Tammuz, four months before Cyrus made his triumphal entry. He too appointed governors in Babylon (cf. Dn 6th), and seems from the Babylonian Chronicle to have been in the attack which resulted in Belshazzar's death. Whether Gobryas is intended, whether Darius was another name of his, or whether some mistake has crept into the text, cannot be decided without fresh evidence. It is certain that no king of Babylon called Darius succeeded Belshazzar or preceded Cyrus.

DAVID ('beloved').—The second and greatest of the kings of Israel; the youngest of the eight sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite; he belonged to the tribe of Judah. The details of his life are gathered from 1 S 16th-1 K 2nd, 1 Ch 11th-29th (besides some scattered notices in the earlier chapters of 1 Ch.), the Psalms which bear on this period, and Bk. VII of the Antiquities of Josephus, though this latter adds but little to our knowledge. It is necessary to bear in mind two points of importance in dealing with the records of the life of David: firstly, the Hebrew text is, in a number of cases, very corrupt (notably in the books of Samuel), and in not a few passages the Alexandrian (Greek) version is to be preferred; secondly, our records have been gathered together from a variety of sources, and therefore they do not present a connected whole; that they are for this reason sometimes at variance with each other stands in the natural order of things.

1. Early years.—David was a shepherd by calling, and he continued this occupation until he had reached full manhood; the courage and strength sometimes required for the protection of flocks make it clear that he was more than a mere youth when he first appeared upon the scene of public life (1 S 17th, 30th). There are altogether three different accounts of David's entry upon the stage of life.

(i) 1 S 16th-18. David is here represented as having been designated by Jahweh as Saul's successor; Samuel is sent to Bethlehem to anoint him; all the seven sons of Jesse pass before the prophet, but the Spirit does not move him to anoint any of them; in perplexity he asks the father if he has any more children, whereupon the youngest is produced, and Samuel anoints him. Graphic as the story is, it strikes one as incomplete. Samuel does not even know of the existence of Jesse's youngest son; the future king of Israel is introduced as a mere stripling whom nobody seems to know or care about, and he is left as abruptly as he is introduced. From all we know of Israel's early heroes, a man was not raised to be a leader of the people unless or until he had first proved himself in some way to be the superior of his fellows. It was, of course, different when the monarchy had been securely established and the hereditary succession had come into vogue; though even then there were exceptions, e.g. in the case of Jehu. This was clearly so in the case of Saul, who had the reputation of being a 'mighty man of valour' (1 S 9th); and in the parallel case of the anointing of one to be king while the throne was still occupied, viz. Jehu, it is not an unknown man who is anointed (see 1 K 19th, 2 K 9th). The story, therefore, of David's anointing by Samuel strikes one as being an incomplete fragment.

(ii) 1 S 16th-22. In this second account, the servants of Saul recommend that the king should send for someone who is a 'cunning player on the harp,' in order that by means of music the mental disorder from which he is suffering may be allayed. The son of Jesse is proposed, and forthwith sent for; when Saul is again attacked by the malady—said to be occasioned by 'an evil spirit from the Lord'—David plays upon the harp, and Saul 'is refreshed' in spirit. In this account David is represented as a grown man, for it is said that Saul made him his armour-bearer.

(iii) 1 S 17. The Greek version omits a large part of this account (vv. 12-31, 48-58), which seems itself to have been put together from different sources. According to it, David's first appearance was on the eve of a battle between the Israelites and the Philistines. His father is in the habit of sending him to the Israelite camp with provisions for his three eldest brothers, who are among the warriors of the Israelite army; on one such occasion he finds the camp in consternation on account of the defiance of a Philistine hero, the giant Goliath. This man offers to fight in single combat with any Israelite who will come out and face him, but in spite of the high reward offered by the king to any one who will slay him—namely, great riches and the king's daughter in marriage—nobody appears to answer the challenge. David gathers these details from different people in the camp, and, feeling sure of the help of Jahweh, determines to fight the giant. He communicates his purpose to Saul, who at first discourages him, but on seeing his firmness and confidence arms him and bids him go forth in the name of Jahweh. David, however, finds the armour too cumbersome, and discards it, taking instead nothing but five smooth stones and a sling. After mutual defiance, David slings one of his stones; the giant is hit, and falls down dead; David rushes up, draws the sword of the dead warrior, and cuts off his head. Thereupon panic takes hold of the Philistine host, and they flee, pursued by the Israelites, who thus gain a complete victory (see ELHANAN).

It is worthy of note that each of these three accounts which introduce David to history connects with him just those three characteristics which subsequent ages loved to dwell upon. The first presents him as the beloved of Jahweh (cf. his name, 'beloved'), who was specially chosen, the man after God's own heart, the son of Jesse; the second presents him as the harpist, who was known in later ages as the 'sweet psalmist of Israel'; while the third, which is probably the nearest to actual history, presents him as the warrior hero, just as, in days to come, men would have pictured him whose whole reign from beginning to end was characterized by war.

David's victory over Goliath had a twofold result; firstly, the heroic deed called forth the admiration, which soon became love, of the king's son Jonathan; a covenant of friendship was made between the two, in token of which, and in ratification of which, Jonathan took off his apparel and armour and presented David with them. This friendship lasted till the death of Jonathan, and David's pathetic lamentation over him (2 S 1²⁷) points to the reality of their love. But secondly, it had the effect of arousing Saul's envy; a not wholly unnatural feeling, considering the estimation in which David was held by the people in consequence of his victory; the adage—assuredly one of the most ancient authentic fragments of the history of the time—

'Saul hath slain his thousands,
And David his ten thousands'

was not flattering to one who had, in days gone by, been Israel's foremost warrior. For the present, however, Saul conceals his real feelings (1 S 18¹⁰). He is evidently out of place, intending to rid himself of David in such a way that no blame would seem to attach itself to him. In fulfilment of his promise to the slayer of Goliath, he expresses his intention of giving his daughter Michal to David for his wife; but as David brings no dowry,—according to Hebrew custom,—Saul lays upon him conditions of a scandalous character (1 S 18²⁵⁻²⁹), hoping that, in attempting to fulfil them, David may lose his life. The scheme fails, and David receives Michal to wife. A further attempt to be rid of David is frustrated by Jonathan (19¹⁻⁷), and at last Saul himself tries to kill him by throwing a javelin at him whilst playing on his harp; again he fails, for David nimbly avoids the javelin, and escapes to his own house. Thither Saul sends men to kill him, but with the help of his wife he again escapes, and flees to Ramah to seek counsel from Samuel. On Samuel's advice, apparently, he goes to Jonathan by stealth to see if there is any possibility of a reconciliation with the king; Jonathan does his best, but in vain (20¹⁻⁴), and David realizes that his life will be in danger so long as he is anywhere within reach of Saul or his emissaries.

2. David as an outlaw.—As in the case of the earlier period of David's life, the records of this second period consist of a number of fragments from different sources, not very skillfully put together. We can do no more here than enumerate briefly the various localities in which David sought refuge from Saul's vindictiveness, pointing out at the same time the more important episodes of his outlaw life.

David flies first of all to Nob, the priestly city; his stay here is, however, of short duration, for he is seen by Doeg, one of Saul's followers. Taking the sword of his late antagonist, Goliath, which was wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod, he makes for Gath, hoping to find refuge on foreign soil; but he is recognized by the Philistines, and fearing that they would take vengeance on him for killing their hero Goliath, he simulates madness (cf. Ps 34 title)—a disease which by the Oriental (even to-day by the Bedouin) is looked upon as something sacrosanct. By this means he finds it easy enough to make his escape, and comes to the 'cave of Adullam.' Here his relations come to him, and he gathers together a band of desperadoes, who make him their captain. Finding that this kind of life is unfit for his parents, he takes them to Mizpeh and confides them to the care of the king of Moab. On his return he is advised by the prophet Gad (doubtless because he had found out that Saul had received information of David's whereabouts) to leave the stronghold; he therefore takes refuge in the forest of Hereth. While hiding here, news is brought to him that the Philistines are fighting against Kellah; he hastens to succour the inhabitants by attacking the Philistines; these he overcomes with great slaughter, and thereupon he takes up his abode in Kellah. In the meantime Saul's spies discover the whereabouts of the fugitive, and David, fearing that the men of Kellah will deliver him up to his enemy, escapes with his followers to the hill-country in the wilderness of Ziph. A very vigorous pursuit is now undertaken by Saul, who seems determined to catch the elusive fugitive, and the chase is carried on among the wilds of Ziph, Maon, and Engedi. [Some portions of the narrative here seem to be told twice over with varying detail (cf. 1 S 23¹⁻³ with 26¹⁻⁵, and 24¹⁻⁶ with 26⁶⁻¹⁰).] It is during these wanderings that Saul falls into the power of David, but is magnanimously spared. The episode connected with David's dealings with Nabal, and his taking Abigail and Ahinoam for his wives, also falls within this period (1 S 24, 25, 26). At one time there seemed to be some hope of reconciliation between Saul and David (26²⁴⁻²⁵), but evidently this was short-lived, for soon afterwards David escapes once more, and comes with six hundred followers to the court of Achish, king of Gath. This time Achish welcomes him as an ally and gives him the city of Ziklag. David settles in Ziklag, and stays there for a year and four months (27¹), occupying the time by fighting against the enemies of his country, the Geshurites, Amalekites, etc. At the end of this time, war again breaks out between the Israelites and the Philistines. The question arises whether David shall join with the forces of Achish against the Israelites; David himself seems willing to fight on the side of the Philistines (29¹), but the princes of the Philistines, rightly or wrongly, suspect treachery on his part, and at the request of Achish he returns to Ziklag. On his arrival here he finds that the place has been sacked by the Amalekites, and forthwith he sets out to take revenge. This is ample and complete; part of the spoil which he acquires he sends as a present to the elders of Judah and to his friends (30²⁴⁻³¹), a fact which shows that there was a party favourable to him in Judah; and this was possibly the reason and justification of the mistrust of the Philistine princes just mentioned. In the meantime the war between Israel and the Philistines ends disastrously for the former, and Saul and Jonathan are slain. David receives news of this during his sojourn in Ziklag. With this ends the outlaw life of David, for, leaving Ziklag, he comes to Hebron, where the men of Judah anoint him king (2 S 2¹).

3. David as king.—(a) Internal affairs.—For the first seven years of his reign David made Hebron his capital. In spite of his evident desire to make peace with the followers of Saul (2 S 9), it was but natural that a vigorous attempt should be made to uphold the dynasty of the late king, at all events in Israel, as distinct from Judah (see ИЗВОНЕНІЯ). It is therefore just what we should expect when we read that 'there was long war between the house of Saul and the house of David' (3¹). The final victory lay with David, and in due time the elders of Israel came to him in Hebron and anointed him their king. As ruler over the whole land David realized the need of a more central capital; he fixed on Jerusalem, which he conquered from the Jebusites, and founded the royal city on Mt. Zion, 'the city of David' (5⁷). Thither he brought up the ark with great ceremony (6¹⁷⁻¹⁹), intending to build a permanent temple for it (7¹), but the prophet Nathan declares to him that this is not Jahweh's will. David's disappointment is, however, soothed, for the prophet goes on to tell him that though he may not build this house, Jahweh will establish the house of David (i.e. in the sense of lineage) for ever (v. 11). David then enters in before Jahweh and offers up his thanksgiving (vv. 18-29).

One of the darker traits of David's character is frustrated by the detailed account of the Bathsheba episode (11¹ 12²⁰); so far from seeking to curb his passion for her on hearing that she is married, he finds ways and means of ridding himself of the husband, after whose death Bathsheba becomes his queen. The marriage was destined to influence materially the history of Israel (see ADONIJAH). But the most serious event in the history of the reign of David, so far as the internal affairs of the kingdom were concerned, was the rebellion of his son Absalom. Of an ambitious nature, Absalom sought the succession, even at the expense of dethroning his father. How he set about preparing the ground for the final coup is graphically described in 2 S 15¹⁻⁴. After four [forty] years in the EV should be read 'four'] years of suchlike crafty preparation, the rebellion broke out; a feast at Hebron, the old capital, given by Absalom to the conspirators, was the signal for the outbreak. At first Absalom was successful; he attacked Jerusalem, from which David had to flee; here, following the advice of Ahithophel, he took possession of the royal harem, a sign (in the eyes of the people of those days) of the right of heritage. The most obvious thing to do now would have been for Absalom to pursue David before he had time to gather an army; but, against the advice of Ahithophel, he follows that of Hushai—a secret friend of David—who succeeds in inducing Absalom to waste time by lingering in Jerusalem. Ahithophel, enraged at the failure of his plans, and probably foreseeing what the final result must be, leaves Absalom and goes to his home in Giloh and hangs himself (2 S 17²³). In the meantime David, hearing what is going on in Jerusalem, withdraws across the Jordan, and halts at Mahanaim; here he gathers his forces together under the leadership of Joab. The decisive battle follows not long after, in the 'forest of Ephraim'; Absalom is completely defeated, and loses his life by being caught in a tree by the head whilst fleeing. Whilst thus hanging he is pierced by Joab, in spite of David's urgent command that he should not be harmed. The touching account of David's sorrow, on hearing of Absalom's death, is given in 2 S 18²¹⁻²³. A second rebellion, of a much less serious character, was that of Sheba, who sought to draw the northern tribes from their allegiance; it was, however, easily quelled by Joab (ch. 20).

The rebellion (if such it can be called) of Adonijah occurred at the very end of David's reign. This episode is dealt with elsewhere (see ADONIJAH), and need not, therefore, be described here.

(b) External affairs.—Unlike most of his dealings with foreigners, David's first contact, as king, with those outside of his kingdom, viz. with the Syrians, was of a peaceful character. Hiram, king of Tyre, sent (according to 2 S 5¹¹, 1 Ch 14¹) artificers of different kinds to assist David in building. But this was the exception. One of the characteristics of David's reign was its large number of foreign wars. It is, however, necessary to bear in mind that in the case of a newly-established dynasty this is only to be expected. The following is, very briefly, a list of David's foreign wars; they are put in the order found in 2 Sam., but this order is not strictly chronological; moreover, it seems probable that in one or two cases duplicate, but varying, accounts appear: Philistines (51¹⁷⁻²⁰), Moabites (8¹), Zobah (8³⁻⁴), Syrians (8⁵⁻¹²), Edomites (8¹⁴), Ammonites, Syrians (10¹ 11¹ 12²¹⁻²³), and Philistines (21¹⁰⁻²³). David was victorious over all these peoples, the result being a great extension of his kingdom, which reached right up to the Euphrates (cf. Ex 23¹⁻³, Dt 11²²⁻²³). Wars of this kind presuppose the existence of a, comparatively speaking, large army; that David had a constant supply of troops may be gathered from the details given in 1 Ch 27.

While it is impossible to deny that the rôle of musician in which we are accustomed to picture David is largely the product of later ages, there can be no doubt that this rôle assigned to him is based on fact (cf. e.g. 1 S 11⁷⁻¹⁷, 2 S 22²⁻⁴¹—Ps 18, Am 6⁴), and he must evidently be regarded as one of the main sources of inspiration which guided the nation's musicians of succeeding generations (see art. PSALMS).

The character of David offers an intensely interesting complex of good and bad, in which the former largely predominates. As a ruler, warrior, and organizer, he stands pre-eminent among the heroes of Israel. His importance in the domain of the national religion lies mainly in his founding of the sanctuary of Zion, with all that that denotes. While his virtues of open-heartedness, generosity, and valour, besides those already referred to, stand out as clear as the day, his faults are to a large extent due to the age in which he lived, and must be discounted accordingly.

DAVID, CITY OF.—See JERUSALEM.

DAY.—See TIME.

DAY OF ATONEMENT.—See ATONEMENT [DAY OF].

DAY OF THE LORD.—The day in which Jehovah was expected to punish sinful Hebrews and the enemies of Israel, and to establish at least the righteous remnant of His people in political supremacy. The Hebrews believed implicitly that their God Jehovah was certain to defeat all rivals. Before Amos this view had not reached a definite eschatology, and probably involved only a general expectation of the triumph of Israel and Israel's God. With Amos, however, the conception of punishment became less ethnic and more moral. The sins of Israel itself deserved punishment, and Amos declared that the luxury of the nation, with all its economic oppression, had grown hateful to Jehovah, and unless abandoned would bring fearful punishment (Am 2⁶⁻⁸ 3⁹⁻¹⁵ 5¹⁰⁻¹³ 6¹⁻³). The righteousness of Jehovah demanded that the sins of His people as well as those of the heathen should be punished. After Amos the thought of an awful day of Divine punishment was extended from Israel to a world of sinners. According to Zephaniah (1¹⁻¹⁸ 2¹⁻¹⁵), punishment was now to come upon all wicked persons, both Jews and Gentiles, because of wrong. So, too, the unknown prophet who wrote under the name of Malachi, Ezekiel (30²² 34¹² 39¹⁻⁷), however, reverted to the same national thought of a 'day of battle,' in which Jehovah would conquer all Israel's foes; and to some extent this same national idea is represented by Joel (2¹⁸⁻²⁷). With the later prophets there is to be seen an element of reconstruction as well as punishment in Jehovah's action. Sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, are to be punished, but a pious remnant is to be saved, the beginnings of a new Israel.

It is clear that this conception of a great Day of Jehovah underlies much of the Messianic expectation of apocryphal literature. The establishment of a remnant of a pious Israel was the germ of the hope of the Messianic kingdom; and the Day of Jehovah itself became the Day of Judgment, which figures so largely in both Jewish and Christian Messianism. It fact, it is not too much to say that the eschatology of Judaism is really a development of the implications of the prophetic teaching as to the Day of Jehovah.

SHAILER MATTHEWS.

DAY'S JOURNEY.—A 'day's journey' (Nu 11³¹, 1 K 19⁴, Jon 3⁴, Lk 24⁴: cf. three days' journey, Gn 30²³, Ex 31⁸ etc.; seven days, Gn 31²) was not, like the 'sabbath day's journey' (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES), a definite measure of length, but, like our 'stone's throw,' 'bow-shot,' etc., a popular and somewhat indefinite indication of distance. This would naturally vary with the urgency and impedimenta of the traveller or the caravan. Laban in hot pursuit of Jacob, and the Hebrew host in the wilderness, may be taken to represent the extremes in this matter of a 'day's journey' (reft. above), although it is scarcely possible to take literally the 'seven days' journey' of the former (Gn 31²³)—from Haran to Gilead, circa 350 miles in 7 days. From 20 to 30 miles is probably a fair estimate of an average day's journey with baggage animals. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

DAYSMAN.—A daysman is an arbiter. The compound arose from the use of the word 'day' in a technical sense, to signify a day for dispensing justice. The same use is found in Gr.; thus 1 Co 4¹ 'man's judgment' is literally 'man's day.' The word occurs in Job 9³³ 'Neither is there any daysman betwixt us' (AV and RV margin 'umpire'). Tindale translates Ex 21¹², 'he shall paye as the dayesmen appoynte him' (AV 'as the judges determine').

DAYSPRING.—An old English expression denoting the dawn ('the day sprynge or dawninge of the daye gyveth a certeyne lyght before the rysynge of the sonne,' Eden, Decades, 1555, p. 264). It occurs in Job 38¹² 'Hast thou . . . caused the dayspring to know his place?'; Wis 16²⁸ 'at the dayspring pray unto thee' (RV 'at the dawning of the day'). Virtually the same expression occurs in Jg 19²⁸ and 1 S 9²⁸; cf. also Gn 32²⁴ and Ps 65⁸ (east and west called 'the outgoings of the morning and evening'). In Lk 1⁷⁸ the expression 'dayspring from on high' probably goes back to a Heb. original which was a well-understood personal designation of the Messiah (combining the ideas of 'light' and 'sprout'); it would then be a poetical equivalent for 'Messiah from heaven.'

DAY STAR.—See LUCIFER.

DEACON.—The Gr. word diakonos, as well as the corresponding verb and abstract noun, is of very frequent occurrence in the text of the NT, but in EV is always translated 'servant' or 'minister' except in Ph 1¹, 1 Ti 3⁸⁻¹², where it is rendered 'deacon,' these being the only two passages where it is evidently used in a technical sense.

In the Gospels the word has the general meaning of 'servant' (cf. Mt 20²⁸|| 23¹¹, Jn 2⁹, 9). St. Paul employs it constantly of one who is engaged in Christian service, the service of God or Christ or the Church (e.g. 2 Co 6¹¹, Col 1²³⁻²⁵), but without any trace as yet of an official signification. Once in Romans we find him distinguishing diakonia ('ministry') from prophecy and teaching and exhortation (12⁷⁻⁸); but it seems evident that he is speaking here of differences in function, not in office, so that the passage does not do more than foreshadow the coming of the diaconate as a regular order.

In Acts the word diakonos is never once employed, but 6¹⁻⁴, where we read of the appointment of the Seven, sheds a ray of light on its history, and probably serves to explain how from the general sense of one who renders Christian service it came to be applied to a special officer of the Church. The Seven are nowhere called deacons, nor is there any real justification in the NT for the traditional description of them by that title. The qualifications demanded of them (v. 3, cf. v. 5) are higher than those laid down in 1 Timothy for the office of the deacon; and Stephen and Philip, the only two of their number of whom we know anything, exercise functions far above those of the later diaconate (6¹⁰, 8³⁻¹³, 28¹). But the fact that the special duty to which they were appointed is called a diakonia or ministration (v. 1) and that this ministration was a definite part of the work of the Church in Jerusalem, so that 'the diakonia' came to be used as a specific term in this reference (cf. Ac. 11²⁹, 12²⁸, Ro 15²⁸, 31, 2 Co 8⁴ 9¹, 12, 13), makes it natural to find in their appointment the germ of the institution of the diaconate as it meets us at Philippi and Ephesus, in two Epp. that belong to the closing years of St. Paul's life.

It is in these Greek cities, then, that we first find the deacon as a regular official, called to office after probation (1 Ti 3¹⁰), and standing alongside the bishop in the ministry of the Church (Ph 1¹, 1 Ti 3⁸⁻¹²). As to his functions nothing is said precisely. We can only infer that the diakonia of the deacons in Philippi and Ephesus, like the diakonia of the Seven in Jerusalem, was in the first place a ministry to the poor. The forms of this ministry would of course be different in the two cases, as the social conditions were (see art. COMMUNION), but in the Gentile as in the Jewish world it would naturally be a service of a responsible, delicate, and often private kind—an inference that is borne out by what is said in 1 Tim. as to the deacon's qualifications.

Comparing these qualifications with those of the bishop, we observe that the difference is just what would be suggested by the names bishop or 'overseer' and deacon or 'servant' respectively. Bishops must be to rule and take charge of the Church (1 Ti 3⁸); deacons were to 'serve well' (v. 13). Bishops must be 'apt to teach' (v. 2); deacons were only called to 'hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience' (v. 9). That the work of the deacon and his fellow-servant the deaconess (wh. see) was of a house-to-house kind is suggested by the warnings given against talebearing (v. 8) and backbiting (v. 11). That it had to do with the distribution of Church moneys, and so brought temptations to pilfering, is further suggested by the demand that the deacon should not be greedy of filthy lucre (v. 8) and that his female counterpart should be 'faithful (i.e. trustworthy) in all things' (v. 11).

J. C. LAMBERT.

DEACONESS.—The word does not occur in EV except as a RVm reading in Ro 16¹. In this verse Phœbe is described as 'a diakonos of the church that is at Cenchreæ.' AV and RV render 'servant,' RVm 'deaconess.' Against the latter must be noted: (1) There is no evidence of the deacon (wh. see) in the NT till we come to the Ep. to the Philippians, and it is most unlikely that when Romans was written there would be an official deaconess. (2) Cenchreæ was one of the ports of Corinth; and in St. Paul's letters to the Corinthian Church there is a notable absence of any signs of a definite ecclesiastical organization in that city. The conclusion is that the diakonia of Phœbe in Cenchreæ, like the diakonia ('ministry') of Stephanas and his household in Corinth (1 Co 16¹⁴), was a gracious but unofficial ministry to the saints (cf. Ro 16^{2b}).

In 1 Ti 3¹¹, however, although the word 'deaconess' is not used, it is almost certain that female deacons are referred to. AV misleads us by making it appear that the wives of deacons are spoken of; RV corrects this by rendering 'Women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things.' And when the whole passage (vv. 8-13) is read, it seems evident that the women referred to in v. 11 are diakonoi 'in like manner' as the men described both before and after. We know from Pliny, writing early in the 2nd cent., that by that time there were deaconesses in the Christian Churches of Bithynia (Ep. x. 96). And in the ancient world the need must have been early felt for a class of women who could perform some at least of the duties of the diaconate for their own sex in particular.

DEAD.—See DEATH.

DEAD SEA.—An inland lake 47 miles long and from 2½ to 9 miles in breadth, which receives the waters of the Jordan. Its level is 1293 ft. below that of the Mediterranean, being the lowest body of water on the surface of the earth. It has no outlet, and the water received by it is all carried off by evaporation. In consequence, the waters of the Lake are impregnated with mineral substances to a remarkable degree; they yield 25 per cent. of salt, whereas the ocean yields but 4 to 6 per cent.

The modern name is of late origin (first used apparently by Pausanias) and refers to the total absence of life in its waters. It has no Scripture warrant; Hebrew writers speak of it as the 'Salt Sea' (Gn 14³, Nu 34⁴, Jos 15⁵ etc.), the 'sea of the Arabah' (Dt 31⁷ 4⁹), the east or eastern sea' (Ezk 47¹⁸, Jl 2²⁰). In Arabic it is known as Bahr Lut, 'the sea of Lot,' a name which, however, is more probably due to the direct influence of the history as related in the Koran than to a survival of local tradition. Somewhere near the sea were Sodom and Gomorrah, but whether north or south of it is not settled; the one certain fact about their sites is that the popular belief that they are covered by the waters of the Lake is quite inadmissible.

DEAFNESS

The Dead Sea owes its origin to a fault or fracture produced in the surface of the region by the earth-movements whereby the land was here raised above the sea-level. This fault took place towards the end of the Eocene period; it extends along the whole Jordan valley from the Gulf of Akabah to Hermon; and it may be taken as fairly certain that the general appearance of the Lake has not radically altered during the whole time that the human race has existed in the world.

Round the border of the Lake are numerous small springs, some bursting actually under its waters, others forming lagoons of comparatively brackish water (as at 'Ain Feshkhah on the western side). In these lagoons various specimens of small fish are to be found; but in the main body of the water itself life of any kind is impossible.

Recent observations tend to show that the surface of the Lake is slowly rising. An island that was a conspicuous feature at the N. end disappeared under the surface in 1892, and has never been seen since.

DEAFNESS.—See MEDICINE.

DEAL.—A deal is a part or share. It is still in use in the phrase 'a great deal' or 'a good deal.' In AV occurs 'tenth deal' (RV 'tenth part'), the Heb. 'issdrôn being a measure used in meal-offerings. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, II.

DEATH.—I. IN THE OT.—1. The Heb. term mweth and our corresponding word 'death' alike spring from primitive roots belonging to the very beginnings of speech. One of man's first needs was a word to denote that stark fact of experience—the final cessation of life to which he and the whole animated creation, and the very trees and plants, were all subject. It is, of course, in this ordinary sense of the term as denoting a physical fact that the expressions 'death' and 'die' are mostly used in the Scriptures.

2. The Scriptures have nothing directly to say as to the place of death in the economy of nature. St. Paul's words in Ro 5²² as to the connexion between sin and death must be explained in harmony with this fact; and, for that matter, in harmony also with his own words in Ro 6²³, where death, the 'wages of sin,' cannot be simply physical death. The Creation narratives are silent on this point, yet in Gn 2¹⁷ man is expected to know what it is to die. We are not to look for exact information on matters such as this from writings of this kind. If the belief enshrined in the story of the Fall in Gn 3 regarded death in the ordinary sense as the penalty of Adam and Eve's transgression, they at any rate did not die 'in the day' of their transgression; v. 22 suggests that even then, could he but also eat of the tree of life, man might escape mortality. All we can say is that in the dawn of human history man appears as one already familiar with the correlative mysteries of life and death.

3. From the contemplation of the act of dying it is an easy step to the thought of death as a state or condition. This is a distinct stage towards believing in existence of some kind beyond the grave. And to the vast mass of mankind to say 'he is dead' has never meant 'he is non-existent.'

4. Divergent beliefs as to what the state of death is show themselves in the OT.—(a) In numerous instances death is represented as a condition of considerable activity and consciousness. The dead are regarded as 'knowing ones,' able to impart information and counsel to the living. Note, the term translated 'wizards' in EV in Lv 19²¹ 20⁶, Is 8¹⁹ 19³ really denotes departed spirits who are sought unto or inquired of 'on behalf of the living.' A vivid instance of this belief is furnished in the story of the Witch of En-dor (1 S 28). So also in Is 14⁹ 10, where we have a graphic description of the commotion caused in Sheol by the arrival of the king of Babylon, a description with which we may compare the dream of 'false Clarence' in Shakespeare's Rich. III., i. 4. The reference to the dead under the term 'gods' (elohim), as in 1 S 28¹³, is noticeable. Whether in all this we have a relic of ancient Semitic ancestor-worship (as e.g. Charles maintains in his Jowett Lectures on Eschatology) or no, it seems to represent very primitive beliefs which survived in one form and another, even after the stern Jahwistic prohibition of necromancy was promulgated. They may also have affected the treatment of the dead, just as even yet there are usages in existence amongst us in regard to behaviour towards the dead which are probably traceable to very primitive pre-Christian ideas and beliefs.

(b) Jahwism might well forbid resort to necromancers with their weird appeals to the dead for guidance and information, for in its view the state of death was one of unconsciousness, forgetfulness, and silence (see Ps 88¹² 94¹⁷ 115¹⁷ etc.). The present world is emphatically 'the land of the living' (Ps 27¹³ 116⁹ etc.). Those that are in Sheol have no communion with Jahweh; see the Song of Hezekiah in Is 38, and elsewhere. Sheol appears inviting to a soul in distress because it is a realm of unconscious rest (Job 31¹⁷); and there is nothing to be known or to be done there (Ec 9¹⁰). It is true that here and there glimpses of a different prospect for the individual soul show themselves (e.g. Job 19²⁶, and probably Ps 16¹⁰); but the foregoing was evidently the prevalent view in a period when the individual was altogether subservient to the nation, and the religious concerns of the latter were rigorously limited to the present life.

(c) Other ideas of death as not terminating man's existence and interests were, however, reached in later prophetic teaching, mainly through the thought of the worth of the individual, the significance of his conscious union with God, and of the covenant relations established by God with His people (Jer 31; cf. Ezk 18). 'Thou wilt not leave us in the dust.'

5. Death as standing in penal relation to man's sin and unrighteousness is frequently insisted on. That this is something more than natural death is clear from such an antithesis as we have in Dt 30¹⁵ 19 ('life and good; death and evil'), and this set in strict relation to conduct. Cf. the burden of Ezk 18, 'the soul that sinneth it shall die,' with the correlative promise of life; similarly Pr 15¹⁰. All this points to some experience in the man himself and to conditions outlasting the present life. On the other hand, the thought of dying 'the death of the righteous' (Nu 23¹⁹) as a desirable thing looks in the same direction. And why has the righteous 'hope in his death' (Pr 14³²)?

6. As minor matters, OT poetical uses of references to death may be merely pointed out. 'Chambers of death,' Pr 7⁷; 'gates,' Ps 91³ (=state); 'bitterness of death,' 1 S 15³², Ec 7²⁶; 'terrors,' Ps 55³; 'sorrows,' Ps 116³ (=man's natural dread); 'shadow of death,' Job, Ps., the Prophets, passim (=any experience of horror and gloom, as well as with reference to death itself); 'the sleep of death,' Ps 13³ (to be distinguished from later Christian usage); 'snares of death,' Prov. passim, etc. (=things leading to destruction); the phrase 'to death,' as 'vexed unto death,' Jg 13⁷; 'sick,' 2 K 20¹ (=to an extreme degree).

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—The value of the Apocrypha in connexion with the study of Scriptural teaching and usage here is not to be overlooked. Notice e.g. Wisdom chs. 1–5, with its treatment of the attitude of the ungodly towards death ('Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we dis'), of the problem of the early, untimely death of the good, and of immortality in relation to the ungodly and the righteous; Sirach, in which no clear conception of immortality appears, the best that can be said, to alleviate sorrow for the dead, being that 'the dead is at rest' (38²²); in which also the fear of death is spoken of as besetting all ranks of men (40), and we are told who they are to whom death comes as a dread foe, and again who may welcome death as a friend (41).

III. IN THE NT.—1. The teaching of Jesus.—(a) It is noticeable that our Lord has nothing to say directly concerning death as a physical phenomenon. He offers no explanation touching those matters in the experience of death which have always excited the curiosity of men, and in this respect His attitude is in strong contrast with that found in Rabbinical writings. He makes no use of the conception of 'the angel of death,' so characteristic of the latter, and traceable perhaps in language such as that of 1 Co 15⁵², He 2¹⁴, and Rev 20¹³, 14.

(b) No stress is laid on death as an evil in itself. In the few stories which we have in the Gospels of His raising the dead to life, the raising is never represented as a deliverance and a good for the person brought back. Compassion for the sorrows of those bereaved is the prime motive: in the case of Lazarus, it is expressly added that the restoration was 'for the glory of God' (Jn 11⁴, 40). Still, those aspects of death which make the living and active shrink from it are incidentally recognized. Jesus in Rabbinic phrase speaks of tasting death (Mk 9¹¹) and of seeing death (Jn 8⁵¹, 52); and the feeling underlying such expressions is the very antithesis of that attaching to 'seeing life' and 'seeing many days.' Death is to common human feeling an unwelcome, though inevitable, draught. This gives point also to our Lord's promise that the believer shall never die (Jn 11²⁶). At the same time, there is no reference in His teaching to natural death as the solemn end of life's experiences and opportunities, unless an exception be found in the saying about working 'while it is day' (Jn 9⁴); but contrast with this as to tone a passage like Ec 9¹⁰.

(c) Jesus speaks of death as a sleep (Mk 5³⁹, Jn 11¹¹⁻¹²); but the same euphemistic use is found in OT and in extra-Biblical writers. It did not of itself necessarily lessen the terrors of death (see Ps 13³); but we owe it to Christ and the Christian faith mainly that such a representation of death has come to mitigate its bitterness,—such a use as is also found elsewhere in NT (e.g. 1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁴). This conception of death is, of course, to be limited to its relation to the activities and interests of this world. It is a falling asleep after life's day—and 'we sleep to wake'; but there is nothing here to shed light on such questions as to whether that sleep is a prolonged period of unconsciousness or no.

(d) Natural death is lost sight of in the much larger and more solemn conception of the condition of man resulting from sin, which in the Fourth Gospel is particularly described as 'death' (see Jn 5²⁴, 6⁵⁰, 8²¹, 24). The exemption and deliverance promised in Jn 11²⁶ relate to this spiritual death, and by that deliverance natural death is shorn of its real terrors. This condition, resulting from sin and separation from God, may be regarded as incipient here and tending to a manifest consummation hereafter, with physical death intervening as a moment of transition and deriving a solemn significance from its association with the course and state of sin (see Bayschlag, NT Theol., Eng. tr. ii. p. 66 f.). The corresponding language of 1 Ep. of John is not to be overlooked (3¹⁴) as exemplifying Johannine phraseology. The conception, however, is not found exclusively in the Johannine writings. Note the saying in Lk 9⁴⁰ as bearing on this point. In Mt 7¹³, 'destruction' is the antithesis of 'life' (and cf. Mt 5²⁰, 18¹⁸, Mk 8³⁶, Jn 3¹⁶ etc.); but the conception of 'perishing' covers the deep experience of spiritual death, the loss of all that really makes the man.

(The phrase 'die the death' in EV, in Mk 7¹⁰ and parallel, may be noticed as being not a literal translation of the Greek, but a mid-English emphatic expression, now archaic.)

2. The rest of the NT.—We may notice the following points: (a) The Pauline doctrine that natural death is the primitive consequence of sin, already referred to, is to be explained as the common Jewish interpretation of the OT account of the Fall, and finds no direct support in the Gospels. The feeling that 'the sting of death is sin' is, however, widely existent in NT. (b) The use of the term 'death' as denoting a certain spiritual state in which men may live and be still destitute of all that is worth calling 'life,' is quite common (Eph 2¹, 5¹⁴, Col 2¹³, 1 Ti 5⁶, Ja 1¹², Jude 12, Rev 3¹). (c) A mystical and figurative use of the notion of death as denoting the change from a sinful to a new life is noticeable. The believer, the man spiritually alive, is also 'dead to sin' (Ro 6², 1 P 2²⁴), is 'dead with Christ' (Ro 6⁸, Col 2²⁰ etc.). (d) The expression 'eternal death' is found nowhere in NT, common as its use is in religious and theological language. It is the correlative, easily suggested by the expression 'eternal life' which is so conspicuous a topic of NT teaching, and it serves loosely as an equivalent for the antitheses to 'life' or 'eternal life' that actually occur, such as 'destruction' (Mt 7¹³), 'the eternal fire' (Mt 18⁸), 'eternal punishment' (Mt 25⁴⁶). Cf. also 'the second death' in Rev 21⁸. If we substitute for 'eternal' some other rendering such as 'of the ages' or 'æonian,' it but serves to remind us of the profound difficulties attaching to the predication of eternity in relation to the subject of man's destiny or doom.

DEBATE.—This word had formerly the meaning of 'strife,' as in the Geneva tr. of Gn 13⁷, 'there was debate between the herdmen of Abrams cattell, and the herdmen of Lots cattell.'

DEBIR.—The king of Eglon, who acc. to Jos 10² joined other four kings against Joshua, but was defeated and put to death along with his allies at Makkedah.

DEBIR.—1. A town first known as Kiriath-sepher (Jos 15¹⁵, Jg 1¹¹) in the neighbourhood of Hebron, and inhabited by Anakim (Jos 11²¹), conquered by Joshua (10²⁸, 11²¹, 12¹³), or more specifically by Othniel (15¹⁵), assigned as a Levitical city (21¹³, 1 Ch 6⁵⁸) in the tribe of Judah (Jos 15¹⁵). An alternative name Kiriath-sannah, once recorded (15¹⁵), is probably a corruption of Kiriath-sepher, due primarily to the similarity of p and n in the old Hebrew alphabet. It has been doubtfully identified with edh-Dhaheriye near Hebron; till the site can be identified and examined, the attractive speculations based on the apparent meaning of the older name ('City of Books' or 'Scribes') must be left in the region of theory.

2. A place named in the northern boundary of Judah, near the valley of Achor (Jos 15⁷). The name still survives as the appellation of a place in this neighbourhood.

3. A place, not identified, in the border of the trans-Jordanic territory of Gad (Jos 13²³). An alternative reading is Lidebir (cf. LO-DEBAR).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DEBORAH ('bee').—1. Rebekah's nurse, who accompanied her mistress to her new home on her marrying Isaac (Gn 24⁴⁹). She was evidently held in great reverence, as the name of the site of her grave in Bethel shows, Allon-bacuth, the 'terebinth of weeping' (Gn 35⁹).

2. The fourth of the leaders, or 'Judges,' of Israel; called also a 'propheteas,' i.e. an inspired woman—one of the four mentioned in the OT—of the tribe of Issachar (Jg 5⁶), wife of Lappidoth (4¹). Her home was between Bethel and Ramah in the hill-country of Ephraim where the Israelites came to her for judgment and guidance. She was the real deliverer of the Israelites, who had sunk into a state of feebleness and impotence, through the oppression of Jabin, king of Hazor (see BARAK). A personality of great power and outstanding character, she was looked up to as a 'mother in Israel' (57), and was instant both in word and in deed in fulfilling her calling of 'Judge.' Her rôle is the more remarkable in that the general position of women in those days was of a distinctly subordinate character.

Deborah's Song (Jg 5:2-31) is one of the most ancient and magnificent remains of early Hebrew literature. It is a song of victory, sung in memory of Israel's triumph (under the leadership of Deborah and Barak) over Sisera and the kings of Canaan. The vivid pictures which the poem brings up before the mind's eye make it certain that the writer (whether Deborah or another) lived at the time of the events described. The parallel, and somewhat later, account (in prose) of the same battle (Jg 4:2-24) agrees in the main with the poem, though there are many differences in the details. The song is divided into four distinct sections:

Praise to Jahweh, and the terror of His approach, vv. 2-4.
Condition of Israel prior to Deborah's activity, vv. 5-11.
Gathering of the tribes of Israel, vv. 12-18.
Victory of Israel and death of Sisera, vv. 19-31.

The chief importance of the Song lies in the historical data it contains, and in the light it throws on some of early Israel's conceptions of Jahweh. Of the former, the main points are that at this time the Israelites had securely settled themselves in the mountainous districts, but had not as yet obtained any hold on the fertile lands of the Plain; that unity had not yet been established among the tribes of Israel; and that the 'twelve tribes' of later times had not yet all come into existence.

Of the latter, the main points are: that Jahweh has His dwelling-place on the mountains in the South; that, therefore, He has not yet come to dwell among His people, though He is regarded as specifically the God of Israel; that He comes forth from His dwelling-place to lead His people to battle; and that His might and strength are so great that the very elements are shaken at His approach.

The Hebrew text is in some places (notably in vv. 3, 10-15) very corrupt; but the general sense is clear.

3. The mother of Tobit's father; she seems to have taught her grandchild the duty of almsgiving (To 18).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

DEBT.—1. In OT.—Loans in the OT period were not of a commercial nature. They were not granted to enable a man to start or extend his business, but to meet the pressure of poverty. To the borrower they were a misfortune (Dt 28:15, 46); to the lender a form of charity. Hence the tone of legislation on the subject.

Usury is forbidden in all three codes (Ex 22:25 [JE], Dt 23:19, Lv 25:35 [H]); it was making a profit out of a brother's distress. In Dt. it may be taken from a foreigner. Pledges were allowed, but under strict limitations (Dt 24:10, Job 24:7). In Dt 15 is a remarkable law providing for the 'letting drop' of loans every seventh year (see Driver, ad loc.). Its relation to the law of the Sabbatical year in Ex 23:10 (JE), Lv 25:1 (H) is not clear, but the cessation of agriculture would obviously lead to serious financial difficulties, and debtors might reasonably look for some relief. This consideration makes for the modern view, that the passage implies only the suspension for a year of the creditor's right to demand payment. It must be admitted, however, that apart from a priori considerations the obvious interpretation is a total remission of debts (so the older, and Jewish commentators). Foreigners do not come under the law. The other codes have no parallel, except where the debt may have led to the bondage of the debtor's person.

Historically the legislation seems to have been largely ignored. In 2 K 4:1-7 a small debt involves the bondage of a widow's two sons (cf. Is 50:1, Mt 18:23), and Elisha helps her not by invoking the law, but by a miracle. In Neh 5 mortgaged lands and interest are restored under the pressure of an economic crisis. Nehemiah himself has been a creditor and taken usury. There is an apparent reference to Dt 15 in Neh 10:31. In later times the strictness of the law was evaded by various legal fictions: Hillel introduced a system of 'contracting out.' That loans played a large part in social life is shown by frequent references in the Prophets, Psalms, and Proverbs (Is 24:1, Ps 15:3, 37:21, Pr 19:17, 28:8). Jer 15:10 shows that the relation between debtor and creditor was proverbially an unpleasant one. In Ps 37:21 it is part of the misfortune of the wicked that he shall be unable to pay his debts; there is no reference to dishonesty. Pr. 22:7, Sir 18:24 warn against borrowing, and Sir 29 has some delightful common-sense advice on the whole subject.

2. In NT.—Loans are assumed by our Lord as a normal factor in social life (Mt 23:7, Lk 16:19:23). Lk 6:24, 25 suggests that the Christian will not always stand on his rights in this respect. Debt is used as a synonym for sin in Mt 6:12 (cf. the two parables Mt 18:23, Lk 7:41; and Col 2:14). The context of these passages is a sufficient warning against the external and legalistic view of sin which might be suggested by the word itself. Christ does not imply that it is a debt which can be paid by any amount of good deeds or retributive suffering. The word is chosen to emphasize our duty of forgiveness, and it has a wide meaning, including all we owe to God. The metaphor of the money payment has ceased to be prominent, except where it is implied by the context.

DECALOGUE.—See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

DECAPOLES.—Originally a league of ten cities, Greek in population and constitution, for mutual defence against the Semitic tribes around them. It must have come into existence about the beginning of the Christian era. The original ten cities, as enumerated by Pliny, were Scythopolis, Pella, Dion, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Gadara, Raphana, Kanatha, Hippos, and Damascus. Other cities joined the league from time to time. The region of Decapolis (Mt 4:23, Mk 5:20, 7:31) was the territory in which these cities were situated; that is (excluding Damascus), roughly speaking, the country S.E. of the Sea of Galilee.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DECEASE.—The Gr. word exodos ('exodus,' 'out-going') is translated 'decease' in Lk 9:31 and 2 P 1:13, the meaning being departure out of the world. In this sense the Gr. word is used also in Wis 3:7, Sir 38:2. The opposite, eisodos, is used of the 'coming' of Christ. The only other occurrence of the Gr. exodos in NT is in He 11:27, of the Exodus from Egypt (AV and RV 'departure').

DECENTLY.—1 Co 14:40, 'Let all things be done decently and in order,' that is, in a comely, handsome manner; for that is the old meaning of 'decent,' and it is the meaning of the Gr. word used.

DECISION.—Duly constituted and recognized authorities have the power of decision granted to them in all questions of right in the Bible. Moses (Ex 18:13), the judges (1 S 7:10), and the kings (1 K 3:10:2) exercise this power upon occasion. Questions of right between Christian brethren are to be decided by Church courts and not by civil authorities (Mt 18:17, 1 Co 6:1-3). The only method of decision sanctioned in the NT is the exercise of godly judgment on the part of the individual to whom authority has been granted. The casting of lots by heathen soldiers (Mk 15:24) and the sortilege of Ac 1:16-17 cannot be cited as examples for the Christian Church. No instance of the casting of lots can be found after Pentecost. The Spirit of a sound mind now decides what is right and what is true.

D. A. HAYES.

DECISION, VALLEY OF.—The phrase is found only in Jl 3:14 'Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision; for the day of Jehovah is near in the valley of decision.' This valley is evidently the valley of Jehoshaphat mentioned in the preceding context (vv. 1-12). The decision is that of Jehovah Himself, His final judgment upon the heathen assembled. The scene of this judgment has been fixed by Jews, Roman Catholics, and Mohammedans in the Valley of the Kidron. The valley of Jehoshaphat has been identified with the Valley of the Kidron since the time of Eusebius. Orelli, Michaelis, Robinson, and others think the valley of this prophecy is purely a symbolic one, the valley of 'Jehovah's judgment,' as the Heb. name Jehoshaphat ('Jehovah hath judged') suggests. D. A. HAYES.

DECREE.—What theologians speak of as the 'decrees of God,' and describe as one, immutable, eternal, all-embracing, free, etc., do not receive this designation in Scripture. The equivalents are to be sought for under such headings as ELECTION, PREDESTINATION, PROVIDENCE, REPROBATE. In the EV the term is frequently used in Esther, Ezra, Daniel, with different Heb. and Aram. words, for royal decrees (in Dn 6 RV 'interdict'; in 2^d RV 'law,' elsewhere 'decree'). In the NT also the Gr. word dogmata is employed of decrees of Caesar (Lk 21, Ac 17); in Ac 16¹ it is used of decrees of the Church; elsewhere (Eph 2¹⁵, Col. 2²⁰) it is tr. 'ordinances.' The nearest approach to the theological sense of the term is, in OT, in the Heb. word hok, ordinarily tr. 'statute,' which is used in various places of God's sovereign appointments in nature and providence (Job 28²⁸, Ps 148⁶, Pr 8²⁹, Jer 5²², Zeph 2²). The Hebrews had not the modern conception of 'laws of nature,' but they had a good equivalent in the idea of the world as ordered and founded by God's decrees; as regulated by His ordinances (cf. Ps 104⁵, 9 119⁸⁸⁻⁹¹, Jer 10²³). The same word is used in Ps 27 of God's 'decree' regarding His king; in Dn 4¹⁷, 24 (Aram.) we have 'decree' of 'the watchers' and 'the most High.' JAMES ORR.

DEDAN.—A north Arabian people, according to Gn 10⁷ descended from Cush, and according to 25³ from Abraham through Keturah. The combination is not difficult to understand when we remember the Arabian affiliations of the Cushites (cf. Is 21¹³). In Ezk 25¹³ Dedan is placed almost within the Edomite territory, which it must have bordered on the southeast (cf. Jer 25²³ 49¹). The Dedanites were among the Arabian peoples who sent their native wares to the markets of Tyre (Ezk 27²⁰). In Ezk 27¹⁵ read 'Rodan' (Rhodians) for 'Dedan.' J. F. McCURDY.

DEDICATION.—See HOUSE, § 3.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF THE.—After the desecration of the Temple and altar by Antiochus Epiphanes, Judas Maccabeus re-consecrated them in b.c. 165 on the 25th day of Chislew (December); cf. 1 Mac 4⁵²⁻⁵⁹, 2 Mac 10⁶. This event was henceforward celebrated by a feast all over the country (Jn 10²²). It lasted 8 days. There was no suspension of business or labour, and but few additions were made to the ordinary synagogue services. The special feature of the festival was the illumination of private houses, whence came its alternative name—'the Feast of Lights.' (There were divergent rules for these illuminations in the various schools of traditionalists.) It was an occasion for feasting and jollity: the people assembled at the synagogues, carrying branches of palms and other trees; the services were jubilant, no fast or mourning could begin during the period, and the Hallel (Pss 113-118) was chanted. The resemblances of this celebration to the Feast of Tabernacles were perhaps intentional. A. W. F. BLUNT.

DEHAITES (AV Dehavites, Ezr 4⁹).—The Dehaites were among the peoples settled in Samaria by Osnappar, i.e. probably the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal. The name has been connected with that of a nomadic Persian tribe, the Daoti, mentioned in Herod. i. 125, or with the name of the city Du'-da, mentioned on Assyrian contract-tablets; but these identifications are very doubtful.

DELAIAH.—1. One of the sons of Elioenai (1 Ch 3²⁴, AV Dalaiah). 2. A priest and leader of the 23rd course of priests (1 Ch 24¹⁸). 3. The son of Shemaiah (Jer 38¹² 2³). 4. The son of Mehetabel, and father of Shemaiah (Neh 6¹⁰). 5. The head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁶⁰=Neh 7⁶²). The name in 1 Es 5³⁷ is Dalan.

DELIIAH.—The Philistine woman who betrayed Samson into the hands of the Philistines. See SAMSON.

DELOS.—A small rocky island in the Ægean Sea, which has played an extraordinary part in history. It was the seat of a wide-spread worship of Apollo, who, with his sister Artemis, was said to have been born there. In b.c. 478 it was chosen as the meeting-place of the confederacy of Greek States united against their common enemy the Persians, and became a rival of Athens. In the 2nd and 1st cents. b.c. it became a great harbour, and was under Roman protection from b.c. 197 to 167. It was later a portion of the Roman province Achaia. It is mentioned in the famous letter of the Romans in favour of the Jews (b.c. 139-138, 1 Mac 15¹⁶⁻²⁰). It was a great exchange, where slaves and other products of the E. were bought for the Italian market. It was the scene in b.c. 87 of a horrible massacre carried out by Mithradates, king of Pontus, who slaughtered 80,000 Italians there and in neighbouring islands. It never fully recovered, and in the Empire became insignificant. A. SOUTER.

DELUGE.—1. The Biblical story, Gn 6⁹⁻⁹¹⁷ [6¹⁻⁴ is probably a separate tradition, unconnected with the Deluge (see Driver, Genesis, p. 82)]. The two narratives of J and P have been combined; the verses are assigned by Driver as follows: J 6⁹⁻⁸ 7¹⁻⁵ 7¹⁰ 11. 16b. 17b. 22. 23 24b-32a. 8-12. 12b. 20-22; P 6⁹⁻¹² 7⁶ 11. 13-16a. 17a. 17-21. 24 31. 22a. 25b-5. 13a. 14-19 9¹⁻¹⁷. J alone relates the sending out of the birds, and the sacrifice with which J¹ is so pleased that He determines never again to curse the ground. P alone gives the directions with regard to the size and construction of the ark, the blessing of Noah, the commands against murder and the eating of blood, and the covenant with the sign of the rainbow. In the portions in which the two narratives overlap, they are at variance in the following points. (a) In P one pair of every kind of animal (6¹⁹⁻²⁰), in J one pair of the unclean and seven of the clean (7² 2²), are to be taken into the ark. (In 7⁹ a redactor has added the words 'two and two' to make J's representation conform to that of P.) The reason for the difference is that, according to P, animals were not eaten at all till after the Deluge (9³), so that there was no distinction required between clean and unclean. (b) In P the cause of the Deluge is not only rain but also the bursting forth of the subterranean abyss (6¹¹); J mentions rain only (v. 12). (c) In P the water begins to abate after 150 days (8²), the mountain tops are visible after 8 months and 13 days (7¹⁷ 8³), and the earth is dry after a year and 10 days (8¹⁴); in J the Flood lasts only 40 days (7¹² 8²), and the water had begun to abate before that.

2. The Historicity of the story.—The modern study of geology and comparative mythology has made it impossible to see in the story of the Deluge the literal record of an historical event. (The fact that marine fossils are found on the tops of hills cannot be used as an argument, for (i.) the same argument could be used—and is actually used by native tribes—to prove other flood-stories in various parts of the globe; and (ii.) though it proves that some spots which are now at the tops of hills were at one time submerged, that is not equivalent to asserting that a flood ever occurred which covered the whole planet—apart from the extreme improbability that the submergence of mountains was within the period of man's existence.) The difficulties in the story as it stands are immense. (a) All the water in the world, together with all the vapour if reduced to water, would not cover the whole earth to the height of Mt. Ararat. And if it had, it is impossible to imagine how it could have dried up in a year and 10 days (not to speak of 40 days), or whither it could have flowed away. (b) If only a single family survived, it is impossible to account for the wide variety of races and languages. (c) The means of safety is not a ship, but simply a huge chest, which would instantly capsize in a storm. It is popularly assumed that it had a hull, shaped like that of a ship; but of this nothing is said in the Heb. narrative. (d) The collection by Noah of a pair of every kind of animal, bird, and creeping thing, which would include species peculiar to different countries from the arctic regions to the tropics, is inconceivable. And no less so the housing of them all in a single chest, the feeding and care of them by eight persons, the arrangements to prevent their devouring one another, and the provision of the widely diverse conditions of life necessary for creatures from different countries and climates. From every point of view it is clear that the story is legendary, and similar in character to the legends which are found in the folk-lore of all peoples.

3. The Cause of the Deluge.—This is stated to be rain (7^{1b} 12), and the bursting forth of the subterranean abyss. It must be studied in connexion with other flood-stories. Such stories are found principally in America, but also in India, Cashmir, Tibet, China, Kamschatka, Australia, some of the Polynesian Islands, Lithuania, and Greece. In the great majority of cases the flood is caused by some startling natural phenomenon, which often has a special connexion with the locality to which it belongs; e.g. the melting of the ice or snow, in the extreme N. of America; earthquakes, on the American coastlands where they frequently occur; the submergence or emergence of islands, in districts liable to volcanic eruptions; among inland peoples the cause is frequently the bursting of the banks of rivers which have been swollen by rains. Sometimes the stories have grown up to account for various facts of observation; e.g. the dispersion of peoples, and differences of language; the red colour, or the pale colour, of certain tribes; the discovery of marine fossils inland, and so on. In some cases these stories have been coloured by the Bible story, owing to the teaching of Christian missionaries in modern times, and often mixed up with other Bible stories, and reproduced with grotesque details by local adaptation. But there are very many which are quite unconnected with the story of Noah. (For a much fuller discussion of the various flood-stories see the valuable art. 'Flood' in Hastings' DB ii.) It is reasonable, therefore, to treat the Hebrew story as one of these old-world legends, and to look for the cause of it in the natural features of the land which gave it birth. And we are fortunate in the possession of an earlier form of the legend, which belongs to Babylonia, and makes it probable that its origin is to be ascribed to the inundation of the large Babylonian plain by the bursting forth of one of the rivers by which it is intersected, and perhaps also, as some think, to the incursion of a tidal wave due to an earthquake somewhere in the South. This, among a people whose world was bounded by very narrow limits, would easily be magnified in oral tradition into a universal Deluge.

4. The Babylonian story.—(a) One form of the story has long been known from the fragments of Berosus, an Egyptian priest of the 3rd cent. B.C. It differs in certain details from the other form known to us; e.g. when the birds return the second time, clay is seen to be attaching to their legs (a point which finds parallels in some N. American flood-legends); and not only the hero of the story, Xisuthros, and his wife, but also his daughter and the pilot of the ship are carried away by the gods.

(b) The other and more important form is contained in Akkadian cuneiform tablets in the British Museum, first deciphered in 1872. It is part of an epic in 12 parts, each connected with a sign of the Zodiac; the Flood story is the 11th, and is connected with Aquarius, the 'water-bearer.' Gilgamesh of Uruk (Erech, Gn 10¹⁰), the hero of the epic, contrived to visit his ancestor Ut-napishtim, who had received the gift of immortality. The latter is in one passage called Adra-hasis, which being inverted as Hasis-adra appears in Greek as Xisuthros. He relates to Gilgamesh how, for his piety, he had been preserved from a great flood. When Bel and three other gods determined to destroy Shurippak, a city lying on the Euphrates, Ea warned him to build a ship. He built it 120 cubits in height and breadth, with six decks, divided into 7 storeys, each with 9 compartments; it had a mast, and was smeared with bitumen. He took on board all his possessions, 'the seed of life of every kind that I possessed,' cattle and beasts of the field, his family, servants, and craftsmen. He entered the ship and shut the door. Then Rammān the storm-god thundered, and the spirits of heaven brought lightnings; the gods were terrified; they fled to heaven, and cowered in a heap like a dog in his kennel. On the 7th day the rain ceased, and all mankind were turned to clay. The ship grounded on Mt. Nisir, E. of the Tigris, where it remained 6 days. Then Ut-napishtim sent forth a dove, a swallow, and a raven, and the last did not return. He then sent the animals to the four winds, and offered sacrifice on an altar at the top of the mountain. The gods smelled the savour and gathered like flies. The great goddess Ishtar lighted up the rainbow. She reproached Bel for destroying all mankind instead of one city only. Bel, on the other hand, was angry at the escape of Ut-napishtim, and refused to come to the sacrifice. But he was pacified by Ea, and at length entered the ship, and made a covenant with Ut-napishtim, and translated him and his wife to 'the mouth of the rivers,' and made them immortal.

The similarities to the Heb. story, and the differences from it, are alike obvious. It dates from at least B.C. 3000, and it would pass through a long course of oral repetition before it reached the Hebrew form. And herein is seen the religious value of the latter. The genius of the Hebrew race under Divine inspiration gradually stripped it of all its crude polytheism, and made it the vehicle of spiritual truth. It teaches the unity and omnipotence of J^h; His hatred of sin and His punishment of sinners; but at the same time His merciful kindness to them that obey Him, which is shown in rescuing them from destruction, and in entering into a covenant with them.

5. It is strange that, apart from Gn 9²⁸ 10¹ ≈ 11¹⁰, there are only two allusions in the OT to the Flood, Is 54⁹ and Ps 29¹⁰ (the latter uncertain; see commentaries). In the Apoc.: 2 Es 3²⁷, Wis 10⁴, Sir 44¹⁷. (40¹⁰ in LXX, but not in Heb.). In the NT: Mt 24³⁸, Lk 17²⁷, He 11⁷, 1 P 3²⁰, 2 P 2⁶. A. H. M'NEILE.

DEMAS (= Demetrius?).—A companion of St. Paul in his first Roman imprisonment (Col 4¹⁴, Philem 24). There is some indication (cf. Ph 2²⁰.) that even then Demas was not altogether trusted; and later he forsook the Apostle, 'having loved this present world' (2 Ti 4¹⁰). He was apparently a native of Thessalonica.

A. J. MACLEAN.

DEMETRIUS.—1. Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator. In his boyhood he was sent (B.C. 175) to Rome as a hostage, but made his escape after the death of his uncle, Antiochus Epiphanes. Landing at Tripolis, he was joined by large bodies of the people, and even by the bodyguard of his cousin, Antiochus Eupator. Eupator was soon defeated and put to death, and in B.C. 162, Demetrius was proclaimed king (1 Mac 7:4, 2 Mac 14:1-2; Jos. Ant. xii. x. 1). After seven years, Alexander Balas (wh. see) was set up as a claimant to the crown of Syria (b.c. 153); and he and Demetrius competed for the support of Jonathan (1 Mac 10¹⁻²¹; Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 1-3). Balas prevailed in spite of the attempts of his rival to outbid him (1 Mac 10²²⁻⁴⁵). In b.c. 150 a decisive engagement took place, in which Demetrius was defeated and slain (1 Mac 10⁴⁶⁻⁶⁰; Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 4).

2. Nikator, sent by his father, D. Soter, for safety to Cnidus after the success of Balas seemed probable. After several years of exile he landed (b.c. 147) with an army of Cretan mercenaries on the Cilician coast, and finally inflicted a fatal defeat upon Balas (b.c. 145) on the banks of the Genoparas, from which event Demetrius derived his surname (1 Mac 11¹⁴⁻¹⁹; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 8). He bought off the opposition of Jonathan by the addition of three Samaritan provinces to Judaea, and the exemption from tribute of the country thus enlarged (1 Mac 11²⁰⁻²⁷; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 9). After varying fortunes in the war with Tryphon (wh. see), Demetrius invaded the dominions of the king of Parthia, by whom, in b.c. 138, he was taken prisoner (1 Mac 14¹⁻³). Upon regaining his liberty at the end of ten years, he undertook a war against Ptolemy Physkon of Egypt. Having been defeated by Zablnas at Damascus, he fled to Ptolemais, and thence to Tyre, where in b.c. 125 he was murdered (Jos. Ant. xiii. ix. 3), possibly at the instigation of his wife Cleopatra (App. Syr. 68; Liv. Epit. ix.).

3. Eukaitos, grandson of D. Nikator. On the death of his father he established himself in Coele-Syria, with Damascus as his capital (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 4). When civil war broke out between Alexander Jannæus and his Pharisee subjects, the latter invited the assistance of Demetrius (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 5, BJ i. iv. 4), who defeated Jannæus in a pitched battle near Shechem (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv. 1, BJ i. iv. 5). After a chequered career, Demetrius fell into the hands of the Parthians, by whom he was detained in captivity until his death (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv. 3).

4. 5. Two persons of the name are mentioned in NT—the ringleader in the riot at Ephesus (Ac 19²⁴), and a disciple commended by St. John (3 Jn 12). Probably the same name occurs in a contracted form as Demas.

DEMON.—The word does not occur in AV. In RV it is substituted for 'devil' in the margin of many passages, and the American Committee was in favour of its adoption in the text. Twice it stands in the text (Dt 32¹⁷, Ps 106³⁷), representing a root found in both Assy. and Arab., and denoting a species of genii or demi-gods, who were conceived as invested with power for good or evil, and to whom even human sacrifices were offered. So in Bar 4⁷; and in the same sense probably 'devils' is used in 1 Co 10²⁰ and Rev 9²⁰. For the conception of demon as an influence or spirit, exclusively evil, see DEVIL; and for the phenomena, see POSSESSION and EXORCISM. R. W. MOSS.

DEMOPHON (2 Mac 12¹).—A Syrian commandant in Palestine under Antiochus Eupator.

DEN.—The five Heb. words represented by 'den' signify respectively 'hollow place' (Is 32¹⁴), 'thicket' (Ps 10⁶), 'place of ambush' (Job 37⁶), 'dwelling' (Job 38¹⁰), 'light hole' or 'eyeball' (Is 11⁶); but the last passage may be corrupt. J. TAYLOR.

DENARIUS.—See MONEY, §§ 6. 7.

DEPUTY.—1. AV of Est 8⁹ (RV 'governor') astr. of pechdā. See GOVERNOR. 2. AV of Ac 13⁷. s. 12 18¹² 19¹⁸ (RV 'proconsul') as tr. of Gr. anthupatos. See PROCONSUL. 3. RV of Jer 51²². 23 (AV 'ruler'), Dn 3². 3 6⁷ (AV 'governor') as tr. of sāpn or its Aram. equivalent. The term denotes in these passages a superior official or prefect of the Babylonian Empire. It is applied elsewhere (Ezr 9¹, Neh 2¹⁴ 4¹⁴. 19 etc.) to petty officials in Judah (EV 'rulers', RVm 'deputies'). 4. AV and

DESCENT INTO HADES

DERBE.—A city in the ethnic district Lycaonia, and in the region Lycaonia-Galatia of the Roman province Galatia, on the main road from Iconium (or Lystra) S.E. to Laranda. The modern villages Losta and Gudeissin are built on the ruins of the city or its territory. Amyntas, king of Galatia, had conquered it, and in b.c. 25 it passed with the rest of his territory into the hands of the Romans. From A.D. 41 to 72 it was the frontier city of the province, and was honoured with the prefix Claudio. It was in this period that St. Paul visited it (Ac 14⁶), and then retraced his steps to Lystra, etc. On his second journey, coming from Cilicia, he reached it first and then went on to Lystra, as he did also on the third journey. Galus of Derbe was one of the representatives of Galatia in the deputation which carried the collection for the poor Christians in Jerusalem (Ac 20⁴). Derbe was on the whole one of the least important places visited by St. Paul, and appears little in history. A. SOUTER.

DESCENT INTO HADES.—The general meaning of the word 'hell' (Hades) in the OT is the unseen, hidden place. It is the shadowy dwelling-place of the spirits of the dead. At first there was no idea of a distinction between good and bad. But such an idea grew up, and in the NT our Lord sanctioned the belief. In the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16¹⁹⁻²¹), while the soul of Dives was said to be in torment the soul of Lazarus was taken to the society of Abraham. The promise to the penitent robber (Lk 23⁴³) 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise,' points in the same direction.

The Apostles seem to have taught from the first that the soul of Christ Himself passed into Hades at His death. This appears in the first sermon of St. Peter (Ac 2²⁴⁻³¹), when he quotes Ps 16⁹, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades,' as a prophecy of the Resurrection. St. Paul also, adapting some words from Dt 30¹⁹, wrote to the Romans (10⁷) that it is not necessary to search the depth, since Christ is risen from the dead. His reference to 'the lower parts of the earth' in Eph 4⁹ has been interpreted to mean 'came down to earth in the Incarnation': 'Now this, he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?' But the phrase had been used in Ps 63⁹ with reference to Hades, and has probably that meaning in this passage also. Through obedience even unto death, Christ became Lord of the under world also, and in His descent asserted His Lordship (Ph 2⁶).

Thus we find the way prepared for explanation of the difficult passage 1 P 3¹⁸⁻²⁰: 'Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit; in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which aforetime were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing'; cf. 4⁶ 'For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.'

Until the time of St. Augustine this passage was interpreted to mean that Christ preached to the spirits of men and women who were drowned in the Flood. The Apostle bids his readers take courage from the fact that Christ's death was followed by a quickening in the spirit. If persecution should bring them to death also, similar increase of spiritual energy would follow. There is a reference to the Ascension in v. 2, which marks the time that Christ preached and excludes the idea that Christ in Noah preached to the men of Noah's time, which was first suggested by St. Augustine. This view, however, though supported in modern times by the great names of Hammond, Pearson, and Barrow, is generally regarded as impossible.

There is one other interpretation, which must be mentioned as a possible alternative. Some critics suggest that the preaching was to the fallen angels mentioned in 2 P 2¹, Jude 4, either after Christ's death or before the Incarnation. The word 'spirits' is used of angels in the NT (Ac 23⁸), but is used also of spirits of the dead (He 12²³, cf. Lk 24³⁷⁻³⁹), and 1 P 4⁸ seems to prove that this is the sense here.

We may pass by fanciful theories such as that the passage refers to the preaching of Enoch regarded as an incarnation of the Messiah. The apocryphal Book of Enoch records preaching of punishment to fallen angels, but says nothing of a preaching of salvation to the souls of men. And the word 'preached' in 1 P 3¹⁸ implies preached the gospel.

If it is asked why should only one set of sinners be mentioned, we may reply that they were typical sinners, whose fate, as Dr. Bigs shows (Com., ad loc.), was much questioned at the time when St. Peter wrote. There is some evidence that a belief was current in the Jewish schools to the effect that a time of repentance would be allowed to the sinners who perished in the Flood before the final judgment. We may hope for fresh light on the point from further research, and for the present may rest content with the interpretation which enables us to quote these passages in 1 P. as proving that moral distinctions exist in Hades, and that moral change is possible for moral beings there as here, unless they sin against light.

DEUTERONOMY.—1. Structure, Origin, Influence.

—The book consists of three speeches (18-40, 5-26, 28, 29-30²⁰) and two poems (chs. 32, 33), all of which are represented as having been uttered by Moses on the plains of Moab before the crossing of Jordan. The slight narrative (chs. 27, 31, 34) is concerned mainly with the last days of Moses. Chapters 1-3, however, contain an historical sketch cast into the form of a speech.

Chs. 5-26, 28-40 are a unity with a formal opening (44-49) and close (29¹); and this section, apart from some later additions, is homogeneous. Thus chs. 5-11 elaborate those principles concerning Jahweh and His relation to His people which give a peculiar character to the Hebrew polity; chs. 12-26 develop these into a code of law; 28-40 pronounce blessings on obedience, curses on disobedience. This section, it is now agreed, was the Law-book found in the Temple in the 18th year of Josiah (b.c. 622-621), which formed the basis of the reform described in 2 K 22 f. Thus Josiah abolished the high places in Judah and Jerusalem (22¹⁷ 13), and confined legitimate worship to the sanctuary at Jerusalem; and this centralization of the cult is the dominating idea of Dt 5-26. Again, Josiah purified the Jahweh-worship from baser elements, destroying the Asherah (2 K 23¹⁹, cf. Dt 16²¹ f.) and the houses of sodomy (2 K 23⁷, cf. Dt 23¹⁷ f.). His opposition to idolatry was directed against the same forms as those denounced in Deut. (cf. the sun-worship, 2 K 23¹¹, Dt 17²; and the worship of Milcom, 23¹⁰ 13, Dt 12³¹). The Passover, celebrated in his day at Jerusalem, is stated to have been unique (2 K 23²⁰); and Deut. forbids the celebration of the Passover elsewhere than in Jerusalem (16¹). The king abolished the superstitious means of learning the Divine will (2 K 23²⁴), which Deut. forbids (18¹⁰). The demands of the Law-book and the performance of the king are parallel.

It is, however, a more difficult question how far the reforms which Josiah instituted in obedience to Deut. were new, and how far they were a return to older practices from which the nation had degenerated during the early monarchy. Three other codes can be distinguished in the Pentateuch, and a comparison of these with Deut. helps to determine its place in the development of Israel's religion. An examination of the social legislation in Deut. leads to the conclusion that it is later than the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23²²). Though we are not justified in calling Deut. a deliberate expansion of this legislation, it certainly represents a more developed state of society, as is seen, e.g., in its numerous laws about contracts. And in one particular it controls the cult at a cardinal point which Exod. left vague: the 'every place where Jahweh records his name' (Ex 20²⁴) has become 'the place which Jahweh shall choose to put his name there' (Deut. passim). When Deut. is compared with the Law of Holiness (Lv 17-26), the codes are seen to be framed for different purposes—Leviticus as a handbook for priests, Deut. as a layman's manual. But their legislation is parallel. Compared with P, Deut. is earlier, for questions left uncertain in Deut. are decided in P. See further, art. HEXATEUCH.

The few references in Deut. to events in Israel's history bear out the conclusion thus reached, for they are dependent on JE, but show no acquaintance with P's history. It is difficult, e.g., to explain the absence of Korah in Dt 11¹, if the author read Nu 16 in its present form, where Korah from P has been woven into the early story. When chs. 1-3 (see below) are included in this scrutiny, they support the inference that Deut. was an independent book, before P was incorporated with JE.

There are further indications of the date at which this code was introduced. Thus Deut. insists throughout on one sanctuary, at which legitimate worship can be offered to Jahweh.

The extent to which this dominates the code is not to be measured merely by the number of times the command is repeated. Older customs are recast in consequence of this change. The Passover alters its character from a family to a national festival (16¹). A central tribunal is set up to replace the decisions at the local shrines (17⁹). Asylums for the manslayer are needed (19¹²), since the village altars where he once found safety (Ex 21¹⁴) are abolished, etc.

Now this was an innovation in Israel. Elijah, far from condemning the high places, is indignant at the sacrilege which has thrown down the altars of Jahweh (1 K 19¹⁹). When he leaves the polluted land to seek Jahweh, he makes his way not to Jerusalem, but to Horeb (contrast Is 27¹). Hosea and Amos find much to condemn in the worship which was practised at Bethel and Dan, but never suggest that any worship offered at these shrines was ipso facto illegitimate. Yet these were the religious teachers of the nation. Deut., again, forbids the erection of pillars beside Jahweh's altars (12³ f.); it is difficult to understand how Isaiah (19¹⁹) could have associated a pillar with Jahweh-worship, had this law been accepted in his day. The worship of the host of heaven—one of the few forms of idolatry specified in Deut.—is not mentioned till it receives severe blame from the prophets of the 7th cent. (Jer 8² 19¹³ 32²⁰, Zeph 1³). But this Assyrian cult became a real danger to Israel's religion, when Manasseh came under Eastern influences.

Hezekiah is the first king of whom we learn that he attempted to remove the high places (2 K 18⁴). Evidently, however, this was an unpopular step, for the Rabshakeh was able to appeal to the conservative instincts of the nation against a king who practised such questionable innovations (18²²). What impelled Hezekiah was a religious, not a political, motive. The splendid monotheistic teaching of Isaiah carried with it the inference 'One God, one sanctuary.' Besides, the abuses which were associated with the local shrines compelled the religious leaders of the nation, who had been influenced by the teaching of Hosea and Amos, to go to the root and abolish such worship altogether. The one means of purifying their worship was to sever it from the high places with their Canaanite associations. Political events helped them. The fall of N. Israel (b.c. 722) carried with it the condemnation of the worship which was practised there, and swept away the worshippers who were attached to it. The deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib threw a glory round the sanctuary of which Jahweh had so signally vindicated the inviolability. Probably a body of reformers framed their code in Hezekiah's later years. They did not create a new legislation, they recast and put a new spirit into an older code. It would have been impossible to secure the acceptance of a brand-new code from a whole people.

Efforts have been made to break up Dt 5-26 into several sections, and to trace their origin. These have not been very convincing: they have relied too much on a proof of difference of origin derived from the use of the singular or the plural number in forms of address to the people. But they have proved that older elements and varied elements have been fused together into this Law-book.

Under Manasse there followed a strong reaction, which resorted even to persecution. The reformers' Law-book was forgotten, the reformers themselves may have been martyred. But the code itself survived to be discovered under Josiah, and to become the basis of a pregnant reform.

Opinion is divided as to whether chs. 1-3 are by the hand which wrote the main work. The fact that in 11th Moses is represented as speaking to men who had witnessed the Exodus, while in 21st that generation is represented as dead, seems decisive that they are not. The chapters may have been added as an historical introduction to a separate edition of the code. The fact that their history is based on JE proves that this must have been early.

Chapters 41-40 29 f. belong together, and are a later addition in view of new circumstances, viz., the prospect or the reality of exile.

The Song (32nd-43), with its double introduction (31st-22. 30) and close (32nd), is a didactic poem, giving an interpretation of Israel's entire history, and bearing traces of influence from the Wisdom literature. It may date from the 7th cent. or the Exile.

The Blessing (ch. 33) dates from a time when N. Israel in the flush of its vigour could anticipate further conquests (v. 17), since Eastern Israel had regained part of its lost territory (v. 20). It may belong to the reign of Jeroboam II. (b.c. 782-43), by whom the Syrians of Damascus were defeated.

Ch. 27 is difficult to assign. It evidently breaks the connexion of 26 and 28, and as evidently is composite. The Levites in v. 1st carry out what in v. 12th the tribes are commissioned to do, and there are no blessings uttered at all. There may be early elements in v. 1st, but it is best to confess that the chapter is still a crux.

2. Main principles.—(a) The fundamental principle of the book is the unity of Jahweh, who is God of the whole earth (10th), and who is more than the God of Israel, since He has relations to other nations apart from their relations to Israel (9th 12th). This carries with it the consequence that idolatry is the supreme sin (6th 17th etc.). To avoid even the possibility of such a crime, intercourse with other nations is severely restrained (7th etc.), and older customs of worship are forbidden (16th etc.).—(b) As He is God of the whole earth, Jahweh's will is the moral law, and in connexion with its requirements He rewards and punishes (cf. the teaching of Amos). As God of Israel, the fundamental principles of His relation to His people are also ethical.—(c) Yet Jahweh is not merely a lifeless moral principle or glorified code. His love to His people was shown, before they could prove any desert (9th etc.). He gave them their land—a gift they must not imagine themselves to have merited (8th etc.). Hence love is the supreme return for His love (8th etc., and cf. Hosea). Hence also there is room for worship and for prayer. Their cult, an expression of their loving gratitude, is to be joyous in character, not like the darker superstitions to which national disaster and foreign rites were making them incline (12th etc.).—(d) A religion, the heart of which is loving gratitude, naturally expresses itself in humanity towards all with whom men live, and even towards the lower animals (22nd etc. 4th etc.). A religion also with so strong a sense of the Divine personality brings with it respect for human personality (24th etc.).—(e) As personal and loving, Jahweh can and does reveal Himself. Through His self-revelation He is the historic God of Israel. This is emphasized in contrast with the baalim, who, as gods of Canaan, had no historic connexion with Israel. Jahweh has made known Himself and His will by the deeds He has wrought for and among His people. (Hence it was a right instinct which led to the addition of chs. 1-3 with their record of Jahweh's past guidance.)—(f) This element enters now into the cult. It gives fresh historic associations to the national festivals and weds them to the great events of their past. See especially ch. 26, where all Israel's past is made to enter into the worship of the individual Israelite, and where also emphasis is laid on the truth that the fruits of the land are not from the baalim, but from Jahweh's bounty (cf. Hos 2nd).—(g) Such a religion, with its strong sense of the historic unity of God's dealings with His nation, and its conviction of the reasonableness of God's demands, can and ought to be taught. Children are to have it explained to them (6th 11th); and means are to be used to bring it to men's thoughts daily (9th 12th). Most of the outward observances are thus brought into connexion with great vivifying principles, so that this code becomes the finest illustration of an effort made to bring religious principles home to a nation in its entire work and life.

DEVIL.—The word came into English from Greek either directly or through its Latin transliteration. Used with the definite article, its original meaning was that of the accuser or traducer of men (see SATAN), whence it soon came to denote the supreme spirit of evil, the personal tempter of man and enemy of God. With the indefinite article it stands for a malignant being of superhuman nature and powers, and represents the conception expressed by the Greeks in the original of our term 'demon.' At first the idea of malignancy was not necessarily associated with these beings, some being regarded as harmless and others as wielding even benign influence; but gradually they were considered as operating exclusively in the sphere of mischief, and as needing to be guarded against by magic rites or religious observances.

1. Earlier conceptions.—Jewish demonology must be traced back to primitive and pre-Mosaic times, when both a form of animism was present in a belief in the ill-disposed activity of the spirits of the dead, and a variety of places and objects were supposed to be rendered sacred by the occupation, permanent or temporary, of some superhuman power. Of these views only traces are to be found in the earliest parts of Scripture, and the riper development of later ages may fairly be ascribed to foreign, and especially Bab. and Greek, influences. That certain animals were believed to be endowed with demonic power appears from Gn 31-35, though here the serpent itself is represented as demonic, and not yet as possessed by an evil spirit (Wis 2nd, Ro 16th). So with the 'he-goats' or satyrs (Lv 17, 2 Ch 11th, Is 13th 34th), which were evidently regarded as a kind of demon, though without the rich accompaniments of the Greek conception. Their home was the open field or wilderness, where Azazel was supposed to dwell (Lv 16th), and whither one of the birds used in cleansing cases of leprosy was let go to carry back the disease (Lv 14th 4th). On the contrary, the roes and the hinds of the field (Ca 2nd 3rd) seem to have been thought of as faun-like spirits, for whose aid a lover might hopefully plead. Under Bab. influence the spirit was conceived as abstracted from any visible form, and as still capable of inflicting injury; hence the need of protection against 'the destroyer' of Ex 12². In Greek thought there took place a development partly parallel. The word used by Hesiod for the blessed soul of a hero becomes with Plato an abstract influence sometimes beneficent and helpful, but emerges in the orators and tragedians as descriptive of baleful genii, who bring misfortune and even reveal in cruelty.

2. Later Judaism.—Under these various influences the demonology of later Judaism became somewhat elaborate. The conception of demon or devil was used to embrace three species of existences. (1) It included the national deities, conceived as fallen, but not always as stripped of all power (Ex 12², Is 19¹ 24², cf. 14¹²). (2) It covered such of the angels as were thought to have been once attendants upon the true God, but to have fallen (2 P 2⁴, Jude ⁶, Ethiop. Enoch chs. 6, 7). For a variety of personal spirits were interposed between God as mediating agencies according to Bab. and Persian views, or, according to the strict Jewish view, as ministers of His will. (3) To these were added—a survival with modification of the primitive animism—the spirits of the wicked dead (Josephus, Ant. viii. ii. 5, BJ vii. vi. 3), who were supposed to haunt the tombs, or at least to cause the men they possessed to do so (Mt 8²⁸). The devils of later Judaism accordingly are thought of as invisible spirits, to whom every ill, physical or moral, was attributed. Their relation to God was one of quasi-independence. At times they do His bidding and are the ministers of His wrath, but in this sense are not classed in Scripture as devils; e.g., the demon of pestilence is the destroying angel or even 'the angel of the Lord' (2 S 24¹⁶, 2 K 19³⁵, Is 37³⁶, Ps 78¹⁹). Yet they were thought to reside in the lower world in an organized kingdom of their own (Job 18¹⁴; cf. Rev 9¹¹, Ethiop. Enoch 54⁴, Mt 12²⁴⁻²⁷); though the kingdom is not entirely outside the sovereign rule of Jehovah, who is the Lord of all spirits and of the abyss in which they dwell (Enoch 40, Dt 32², Job 11⁸, Ps 139⁸, Lk 16²³).

3. In the NT.—In the period of the NT the belief in devils as spirits, evil and innumerable, was general amongst the nations, whether Jewish or Gentile; but in Jesus and His disciples the cruder features of the belief, such as the grotesqueness of the functions assigned to these spirits in the literature of the second century, do not appear. The writers of the Gospels were in this respect not much in advance of their contemporaries, and for Jesus Himself no theory of accommodation to current beliefs can be sustained. The Fourth Gospel is comparatively free from the demonic element. Possession is thrice alluded to (7³⁰ 8¹⁰ 10²⁶) as a suggested explanation of Christ's work and influence; but evil generally is traced back rather to the activity of the devil (6¹⁰, where 'a devil' is not a demon, but the word is used metaphorically much as 'Satan' in Mt 10²³, Jn 13²⁷), whose subordinates fall into the background. The Synoptics, especially Lk., abound in references to demons, who are conceived, not as evil influences resting upon or working within a man, but as personal spirits besetting or even possessing him. The demon was said to enter into a man (Lk 8³⁰) or certain animals (Mt 8²⁸), and to pass out (Mt 17¹⁸, Lk 11¹⁴) or be cast out (Mt 9³⁴). This demoniacal possession is referred to as the cause of various diseases, the cases being preponderantly such as exhibit symptoms of psychical disease in association with physical (see POSSESSION). St. Paul and the other writers in the NT evidently shared the views underlying the Synoptics. Possession so called is a familiar phenomenon to them, as it continued to be in the early years of the Church, though there is a marked disposition towards the Johannine view of a central source of evil. St. Paul speaks of doctrines emanating from devils (1 Ti 4¹, where the word should not be taken metaphorically). The devils of 1 Co 10²⁰ were demigods or deposed idols. St. James recognizes the existence of a number of devils (2¹⁹), whose independence of God is not complete. The Apocalypse (9²⁰ 16¹⁴ 18²) similarly speaks of a diverse and manifold activity, though again its derivation from a common source is frequent. In all these books the conception of devils seems to be giving way to that of the devil; the former gradually lose any power of initiative or free action, and become the agents of a great spirit of evil behind them.

In the OT this process has advanced so far that the personal name Satan (wh. see) is used in the later books with some freedom, Asmodæus occurring in the same sense in To 3⁸ 17. But in the NT the process is complete, and in every part the devil appears as a personal and almost sovereign spirit of evil, capable of such actions as cannot be explained away by the application of any theory of poetic or dramatic personification. It is he who tempted Christ (Mt 4¹⁰, Lk 4²²), and in the parables sowed the tares (Mt 13³⁹) or snatched up the good seed (Lk 8¹²; cf. 'the evil one' of Mt 13¹⁹); and for him and his angels an appropriate destiny is prepared (Mt 25⁴¹). According to Jn., the devil prompted the treason of Judas (13²⁷), and is vicious in his lusts, a liar and a murderer (8⁴⁴), a sinner in both nature and act (1 Jn 3⁸ 10). He prolongs the tribulation of the faithful who do not yield to him (Rev 2¹⁸); after his great fall (12⁹) he is goaded by defeat into more venomous activity (v. 12), but eventually meets his doom (20¹⁰). Jude ⁹ preserves the tradition of a personal encounter with Michael; and St. Peter represents the devil as prowling about in search of prey (1 P 5⁸), the standing adversary of man, baffled by Jesus (Ac 10³⁸). To St. James (4⁷) the devil is an antagonist who upon resistance takes to flight. If 'son of the devil' (Ac 13¹⁰) is metaphorical, St. Paul considers his snare (1 Ti 3⁷, 2 Ti 2²⁶) and his wiles (Eph 6¹¹) real enough. To give opportunity to the devil (Eph 4²⁷) may lead to a share in his condemnation (1 Ti 3⁶). Death is his realm (He 2¹⁴, Wis 7²⁴), and not a part of the original Divine order; though not inflicted at his pleasure, he makes it subservient to his purposes, and in its spiritual sense it becomes the fate of those who accept his rule. Such language, common to all the writers, and pervading the whole NT, allows no other conclusion than that the forces and spirits of evil were conceived as gathered up into a personal head and centre, whose authority they recognized and at whose bidding they moved.

This opinion is confirmed by the representation of the devil's relation to men and to God, and by many phrases in which he is referred to under other names. He is the moral adversary of man (Mt 13³⁸, Lk 10¹⁸, Eph 4²⁷, 1 P 5⁸), acting, according to the OT, with the permission of God (cf. Job 1⁹⁻¹²), though with an assiduity that shows the function to be congenial; but in the NT with a power of origination that is recognized, if watched and restrained. Hence he is called the 'tempter' (Mt 4³, 1 Th 3⁵), and the 'accuser' of those who listen to his solicitation (Rev 12¹⁰). In hindering and harming men he stands in antithesis to Christ (2 Co 6¹⁶), and hence is fittingly termed the evil and injurious one (Mt 6¹³ 13¹⁹, Jn 17¹⁸, Eph 6¹⁶, 2 Th 3³, 1 Jn 2¹³ 3¹² 5¹⁸).—but in some of these passages it is open to contend that the word is not personal). Bent upon maintaining and spreading evil, he begins with the seduction of Eve (2 Co 11³) and the luring of men to doom (Jn 8⁴⁴). Death being thus brought by him into the world (Ro 5¹², Wis 2²⁴), by the fear of it he keeps men in bondage (He 2¹⁴). He entices men to sin (1 Co 7⁵), as he enticed Jesus, though with better success, places every woful obstacle in the way of their trust in Christ (2 Co 4⁴), and thus seeks to multiply 'the sons of disobedience' (Eph 2³), who may be rightly called his children (1 Jn 3¹⁰). In the final apostasy his methods are unchanged, and his hostility to everything good in man becomes embittered and insatiable (2 Th 2¹⁷, Rev 20⁷).

In regard to the devil's relation to God, the degree of independence and personal initiative is less in the OT than in the NT, but nowhere is there anything like the exact co-ordination of the two. The representation is not that of a dualism, but of the revolt of a subordinate though superhuman power, patiently permitted for a time for wise purposes and then peremptorily put down. In Job 1^o the devil associates himself with 'the sons of God,' and yet is represented as not strictly classed with them; he has the right of access to heaven, but his activity is subject to Divine consent. Another stage is marked in 1 Ch 21^o, where the statement of 2 S 24^o is modified as though the devil worked in complete and unshackled opposition to God. In the Book of Enoch he is the ruler of a kingdom of evil, over which kingdom, however, the Divine sovereignty, or at least suzerainty, stands. The NT preserves the conception in most of its parts. God and the devil are placed in antithesis (Ja 4^o); so 'the power of darkness' and 'the kingdom of the Son of his love' (Col 1^o), as though the two were entirely distinct. The devil is the prince and personal head of the demons (Mk 3^o). According to Jn., he is 'the prince of this world' (12^o), and Jesus is contrasted with him (8^o, 18^o), and outside the sphere of his influence (14^o). St. Paul expresses similar views; the devil is 'the god of this world' or age (2 Co 4^o), 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph 2^o), ruling over the evil spirits who are located in the sky or air (Lk 10^o, Rev 12^o; cf. 'heavenly places,' Eph 6^o), and who are graded in orders and communities much like the spirits of good (Eph 1^o). The dualism is so imperfect that Christ has but to speak and the demons recognize His superior authority. He is the stronger (Lk 11^o), and can even now, under the limitations of the moral probation of men, frustrate the devil's designs (Lk 22^o), and destroy his works (1 Jn 3^o), and will eventually bring him to nought (He 2^o). Already the triumph is assured and partially achieved (Jn 16^o, 1 Jn 4^o), and Christians share in it (Ro 16^o). It becomes complete and final at the Parousia (1 Co 15^o, Ps 110^o).

The personality of the devil must consequently be regarded as taught by Scripture. He is not conceived as the original or only source of evil, but as its supreme personal representative. His existence, like that of evil itself, may be ascribed to the permissive will of God, with analogous limitations in each case. The psychical researches of recent years have tended to confirm the belief in spiritual existences, good and bad, and thereby to reduce a fundamental difficulty, which would otherwise attach also in a degree to the belief in the Holy Spirit. And the tradition of a revolt and fall of angels has this in its favour, that it fits in with the belief in devils and the devil, and provides a partially intelligible account of circumstances under which such a belief might take shape. It supplies the preceding chapters in the history, and enables the career to be traced from the first stage of moral choice through the process of hardening of purpose and increasing separation from God to the appropriate abyss at the close. The devil thus becomes a type of every confirmed evil-doer: and the patience and the righteousness of God are alike exemplified.

DEVOTED.—See BAN.

DEW.—The process whereby dew is formed is enhanced in Eastern countries like Palestine, where the surface of the ground and the air in contact therewith are highly heated during the daytime, but where at night, and particularly under a cloudless sky, the heat of the ground is radiated into space and the air becomes rapidly cooled down. The excess of moisture in the air then gently 'falls as dew on the tender herb,' and sometimes so copiously as to sustain the life of many plants which would otherwise perish during the rainless season; or even, as in the case of Gideon, to saturate a fleece of wool (Jg 6^o). Deprivation of dew, as well as of rain becomes a terrible calamity in the East. On this account 'dew and rain' are associated in the imprecation called down by David on the mountains of Gilboa (2 S 12^o); and in the curse pronounced on Ahab and his kingdom by Elijah (1 K 17^o), as also by the prophet Haggai on the Jews after the Restoration (Hag 1^o) owing to their unwillingness to rebuild the Temple. In the Book of Job the formation of dew is pointed to as one of the mysteries of nature insoluble by man (Job 38^o); but in Pr. it is ascribed to the omniscience and power of the Lord (Pr 3^o). Dew is a favourite emblem in Scripture: (a) richness and fertility (Gn 27^o, Dt 33^o); (b) refreshing and vivifying effects (Dt 32^o, Is 18^o); (c) stealth (2 S 17^o); (d) inconstancy (Hos 6^o 13^o); (e) the young warriors of the Messianic king (Ps 110^o).

DIADEM.—See CROWN, and DRESS, § 5.

DIAL (2 K 20^o, Is 38^o).—The Heb. word commonly denotes 'steps' (see Ex 20^o, 1 K 10^o), and is so rendered elsewhere in this narrative (2 K 20^o-11, Is 38^o: AV 'degrees'). The 'steps' referred to doubtless formed part of some kind of sun-clock. According to Herod. ii. 109, the Babylonians were the inventors of the polos or concave dial, the gnomon, and the division of the day into 12 hours. The introduction by Ahaz of a device for measuring the time may be regarded as a result of his intercourse with the Assyrians (2 K 16^o), but it is uncertain what kind of clock is intended. See also art. TIME.

DIAMOND.—See ADAMANT, and JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS.—This name is really erroneous, and it is unfortunate that it has become popularized beyond possibility of correction. The goddess meant is Artemis. There were two conceptions of Artemis in ancient times: (1) the Greek maiden huntress, sister of Apollo; to this conception corresponded the Italian Diana; (2) the mother-goddess, the emblem of fertility, the fountain of nourishment, an Anatolian divinity, who was Grecized under the name of Artemis: this is the goddess referred to in Acts, and she has nothing to do with Diana, representing in fact a contrary idea. While Artemis (Diana) was represented in art attired as a huntress, with the bow and arrows, the Anatolian Artemis was represented with many breasts (multimammia), and sometimes in company with two stags. In this form she was worshipped over the whole of Lydia, before Greeks ever settled there, and the same divine power of reproduction was worshipped under other names over most of the peninsula of Asia Minor. The rude idol preserved in her chief temple at Ephesus was said to have fallen from heaven (this is the real meaning of Ac 19^o), a not uncommon idea in ancient times, which suggests that such images were sometimes meteoric stones. The chief priest, who bore a Persian title, had under him a large company of priestesses. There was also a large body of priests, each appointed for a year, who seem to have been city officials at the same time, and other bodies of ministers. The ritual was of the abominable character which it might be expected to have. The epithet 'great' (Ac 19^o) is proved by inscriptions to have been characteristically applied to the goddess, and the exclamation in Acts may have been really an invocation. The silver shrines (Ac 19^o) were small representations of the goddess within her shrine purchased by the rich. The poor bought them in terra-cotta or marble. Both classes dedicated them as offerings to the goddess, in whose temple they would be hung up. When the accumulation became too great, the priests cleared them away throwing the terra-cotta or marble ones onto the rubbish heap, or into a hole, but securing the others for the melting-pot. All those which survive are naturally in terra-cotta or marble. The goddess had so many worshippers (Ac 19²⁷) that the manufacture of such silver shrines was very profitable.

DIBLAH.—An unknown place mentioned by Ezekiel (6¹⁴). A variant (prob. correct) reading is Riblah (wh. see). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DIBLAIM.—The father of Gomer, Hosea's wife (Hos 1³). See HOSEA.

DIBON.—1. A city east of the Dead Sea and north of the Arnon, in the land which, before the coming of the Israelites, Sihon, king of the Amorites, had taken from a former king of Moab (Nu 21²⁶⁻²⁹). The Israelites dispossessed Sihon, and the territory was assigned to Reuben (Jos 13¹⁷), but the city Dibon is mentioned among those built (or rebuilt) by Gad (Nu 32³⁴), hence the name Dibon-gad by which it is once called (Nu 33⁴⁴). The children of Israel were not able to retain possession of the land, and in the time of Isaiah Dibon is reckoned among the cities of Moab (Is 15). In Is 15⁹ Dimon is supposed to be a modified form of Dibon, adopted in order to resemble more closely the Heb. word for blood (dam), and support the play on words in that verse. The modern name of the town is Dhiban, about half an hour N. of 'Ara'ir, which is on the edge of the Arnon Valley. It is a dreary and featureless ruin on two adjacent knolls, but has acquired notoriety in consequence of the discovery there of the Moabite Stone.

2. A town in Judah inhabited in Nehemiah's time by some of the children of Judah (Neh 11²⁶). Perhaps it is the same as Dimonah (Jos 15²²) among the southernmost cities of Judah.

DIBRI.—A Danite, grandfather of the blasphemer who was stoned to death (Lv 24¹¹).

DIDRACHMA, Mt 17²⁴ in marg. of EV; AV has 'tribute money,' RV correctly 'half-shekel.' See MONEY, § 7.

DIDYMUS.—See THOMAS.

DIET.—In AV, apart from Sir 30²⁸, where it signifies 'food,' this word occurs only in Jer 52²⁴, where RV has the more correct 'allowance,' i.e. of food, as AV in the parallel passage 2 K 25²⁰. In Jer 40⁸ the same word is rendered 'victuals,' but RVm 'allowance.'

DIKLAH.—The name of a son of Joktan (Gn 10²⁷, 1 Ch 1²¹), probably representing a nation or community. The names immediately preceding and following Diklah give no clue to its identification.

DILAN (Jos 15²³).—A town of Judah, in the same group with Lachish and Eglon. The site is unknown.

DILL.—See ANISE.

DIMNAH.—A Levitical city in Zebulun (Jos 21²⁸). The name is possibly a copyist's error for Rimmon (cf. 1 Ch 6²³, Jos 19¹³).

DIMON, DIMONAH.—See DIBON.

DINAH.—The daughter of Jacob by Leah, and sister of Simeon and Levi, according to Gn 30²¹.

This verse appears to have been inserted by a late redactor perhaps the one who added the section Gn 46¹⁻⁷ (cf. v. 14). Nothing is said in 29^{11-30²⁸} 35¹⁰, where the birth stories of Jacob's children are given, of other daughters of Jacob; but 37² (J) and 46⁷ (P) speak of 'all his daughters.' P, moreover, clearly distinguishes between his 'daughters' and his 'daughters-in-law.'

In Gn 34 we have a composite narrative of the seizure of Dinah by the Hivite prince, Shechem, the son of Hamor. The probable remnants of J's story make it appear that the tale, as it was first told, was a very simple one. Shechem took Dinah to his house and cohabited with her, and her father and brothers resented the defilement. Shechem, acting on his own behalf, proposed marriage, promising to accept any conditions of dower her father and brothers might impose. The marriage took place, and afterwards her full brothers Simeon and Levi, slew Shechem and took Dinah out of his house. Jacob rebuked them for this, because of the vengeance it was liable to bring upon his house. Jacob thinks only of consequences here. If, as is generally supposed, Gn 49²⁴ refers to this act, the reprimand administered was based by him not upon the dread of consequences, but upon the turpitude of a cruel revenge.

The remaining verses of ch. 34 make Hamor spokesman for his son. He not only offered generously to make honourable amends for Shechem's misconduct, but also proposed a mutual covenant of general intercourse, including the connubium. Jacob and his sons see their opportunity for revenge, and refuse, except upon the one condition that all the males of the city be circumcised. When, as a result, the latter were unable to defend themselves, all the sons of Jacob fell upon them with the sword, sparing only the women and children, whom they took captive with the spoil of the city. The words 'two of' and 'Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brethren' in v. 25 are interpolated (cf. v. 12). This story is clearly an elaboration of the earlier form, despite its one or two more antique touches, and suggests, moreover, the spirit at work in Ezra's marriage reforms.

The story, like many others, introduced as episodes in the family history of Jacob, should probably receive a tribal interpretation. Simeon and Levi are tribes. Dinah was perhaps a small Israelite clan, according to the traditions closely related to Simeon and Levi; according to the name, possibly more closely to Dan. Shechem, the prince, is the eponymous hero of the city of that name. Hamor is the name of the Hivite clan in possession of the city. The weak Israelite clan, having become detached from the related tribes, was overpowered by the Canaanite inhabitants of Shechem and incorporated. Simeon and Levi, by a willfully plotted and unexpected attack, hoped to effect its deliverance. They were momentarily successful, and inflicted a severe blow upon the Shechemites; but their temerity cost them their tribal existence. A counter-attack of the Canaanites resulted immediately in the decimation of the tribe, and finally in the absorption of their remnants into the neighbouring tribes. The Dinah clan disappeared at the same time. JAMES A. CRAIG.

DINAITES (Ezr 4⁹).—A people settled in Samaria by Osnapper (i.e. probably Ashurbanipal). They have been variously identified with the Da-ja-äni, a tribe of western Armenia, mentioned in inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser I.; and with the inhabitants of Deinaver, a Median city, or of Din-Sharru near Susa. The last view seems the most probable.

DINHABAH.—The capital city of king Bela in Edom (Gn 36²²=1 Ch 14¹). There is some doubt as to its identification. Possibly it is Thenib, E.N.E. from Heshbon.

DINNER.—See MEALS, § 2.

DIONYSIA.—A feast in honour of Dionysus, another name of the god Bacchus (2 Mac 6⁷). He was the god of tree-life, but especially of the life of the vine and its produce. The festival celebrated the revival of the drink-giving vine after the deadness of winter. It was accompanied by orgiastic excesses, themselves at once emblematic of, and caused by, the renewed fertility of the soil. The most famous festivals of Dionysus, four in all, were held in Attica at various periods of the year, corresponding to the stages in the life of the vine, the Antheateria, the Lenaea, the Lesser and the Greater Dionysia. The Lesser Dionysia was a vintage festival held in the country in December; the Greater Dionysia was held in the city, and it was in connexion with this that the tragedies and comedies were produced in the theatre of Dionysus. Attendance at these plays was an act of worship. In 2 Mac 6⁷ we are told that Antiochus compelled the Jews to attend a festival of Dionysus, wearing wreaths of ivy, a plant sacred to the god. A. SOUTER.

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE.—A member of the University Court of the Areopagus at Athens (Ac 17³⁴), converted by St. Paul. The writings ascribed to Dionysius are of a much later date. He is by some identified with St. Denys of France.

A. J. MACLEAN.

DIONYSUS.—One of the various names applied to the god who is most commonly called Bacchus. It is probable that, to begin with, he was a god of vegetation in general, but as time went on he became identified with the vine exclusively. It is supposed that this specialization originated in Thrace. Later still, the worship, under Assyrian and Babylonian influence, took the form of mysteries, like that of Demeter, the goddess of bread. Mythology speaks of a triumphal journey taken by the god in India. His worship was widely disseminated over Greek lands, and it was assumed that the Jews would have no objection to it (2 Mac 6⁷ 14²⁸). Ptolemy Philopator also attempted to force the worship of Dionysus, the god of his family upon the Jews (3 Mac 2²⁹). A. SOUTER.

DIOSCORINTHIUS.—See TIME.

DIOSCURI (RVm), or The Twin Brothers (RV), or Castor and Pollux (AV).—The sign or figurehead of the Alexandrian ship in which St. Paul sailed from Malta (Ac 28¹¹), perhaps one of those employed to bring corn to Rome. The Twins (Gemini) were the protectors of sailors; in mythology they were sons of Zeus and Leda, and were placed in the sky as a constellation for their brotherly love. A. J. MACLEAN.

DIOTREPHES.—A person, otherwise unknown, who is introduced in 3 John (vv. 9, 10) as ambitious, resisting the writer's authority, and standing in the way of the hospitable reception of brethren who visited the Church.

DIPHATH occurs in RV and AVm of 1 Ch 1⁶, but it is practically certain that AV Riphath (wh. see) is the correct reading.

DISALLOW.—1 P 2⁴, 'a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God'; 2⁷, 'the stone which the builders disallowed.' The Eng. word means emphatically disowned, as in the AV heading to 1 S 29, 'David, marching with the Philistines, is disallowed by their princes.' RV gives 'rejected,' as the same Gr. verb is rendered in Mt 21⁴³, Mk 8³¹, Lk 17²⁵. But in Nu 30⁸, 11 'disallow' means no more than disapprove, as in Barlowe's Dialogue, p. 83, 'ye can not fynde that they be dysallowed of God, but rather approved.'

DISCIPLES.—In the ancient world every teacher had his company of disciples or learners. The Greek philosophers and the Jewish Rabbis had theirs, and John the Baptist had his (Mk 2¹⁸ 'the disciples of John and the disciples of the Pharisees'; cf. Jn 1², Mt 14¹²). In like manner Jesus had His disciples. The term had two applications, a wider and a narrower. It denoted (1) all who believed in Him, though they remained where He had found them, pursuing their former avocations, yet rendering no small service to His cause by confessing their allegiance and testifying to His grace (cf. Lk 6¹³ 19²⁷, Jn 4¹ 6⁶⁶ 67). (2) The inner circle of the Twelve, whom He called 'Apostles,' and whom He required to forsake their old lives and follow Him whithersoever He went, not merely that they might strengthen Him by their sympathy (cf. Lk 22²⁸), but that they might aid Him in His ministry (Mt 9³⁷ 10¹ 4), and, above all, that they might be trained by daily intercourse and discipline to carry forward the work after He was gone. These were 'the disciples' par excellence (Mt 10¹ 12¹ 40 15²² 21, Mk 8²⁷, Lk 8⁹, Jn 11⁷ 12¹ 16¹⁷ 32). See also APOSTLES. DAVID SMITH.

DISCOVER.—In AV 'discover' is used in some obsolete meanings. 1. To uncover, make to be seen, as Knox, Hist. p. 250, 'who rashly discovering himself in the Trenches, was shot in the head.' So Ps 29⁹, 'The voice of the Lord . . . discovereth the forests,' and other passages. 2. To disclose, as Shakespeare, Merry Wives, II. ii. 190, 'I shall discover a thing to you.' So Pr 25⁹, 'discover not a secret to another,' etc. 3. To descry, get sight of, as Ac 21⁵, 'When we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand'; 27¹⁶ 'they discovered a certain creek.'

DISCUS.—See GAMES.

DISEASE.—See MEDICINE.

DISH.—See CHARGER; HOUSE, § 9; MEALS, § 5; and TABERNACLE, § 5 (a).

DISHAN.—A son of Seir, Gn 36²⁹. 28. 30 = 1 Ch 1²⁸. 42.

DISHCN.—1. A son of Seir (Gn 36²⁹ = 1 Ch 1²⁸). 2. A son of Anah and grandson of Seir (Gn 36²⁸, cf. v. 30 = 1 Ch 1²⁴; Dishon should also be read for MT Dishan in Gn 36²⁹). Dishan and Dishon are, of course, not individual names, but the eponyms of Horite clans. Their exact location is a matter of uncertainty.

DISPERSION.—The name (Gr. Diaspora) given to the Jewish communities outside Palestine (2 Mac 1²⁷, Jn 7²⁴, Ja 1¹, 1 P 1¹). It is uncertain when the establishment of these non-Palestinian communities began. It appears from 1 K 20³⁴ that an Israelitish colony was established in Damascus in the reign of Ahab. Possibly the similar alliances of David and Solomon with Phoenicia had established similar colonies there. In the 8th cent. Tiglath-pileser III. carried many Israelites captive to Assyria (2 K 15²⁹), and Sargon transported from Samaria 27,290 Hebrews (cf. KIB ii. 55), and settled them in Mesopotamia and Media (2 K 17⁷). As the Deuteronomic law had not at this date differentiated the religion of Israel sharply from other Semitic religions (cf. ISRAEL), it is doubtful whether these communities maintained their identity. Probably they were absorbed and thus lost to Israel.

The real Dispersion began with the Babylonian Exile. Nebuchadnezzar transplanted to Babylonia the choicest of the Judean population (2 K 24¹²⁻¹⁶ 25¹, Jer 52¹⁶). Probably 50,000 were transported, and Jewish communities were formed in Babylonia at many points, as at Tel-abib (Ezk 3¹) and Casiphia (Ezr 8¹⁷). Here the Jewish religion was maintained; prophets like Ezekiel and priests like Ezra sprang up, the old laws were studied and worked over, the Pentateuch elaborated, and from this centre Jews radiated to many parts of the East (Neh 1¹, 2, 10, 11¹). Thus the Jews reached Media, Persia, Cappadocia, Armenia, and the Black Sea. Only a few of these Babylonian Jews returned to Palestine. They maintained the Jewish communities in Babylonia till about A.D. 1000. Here, after the beginning of the Christian era, the Babylonian Talmud was compiled.

In B.C. 608, Necho took King Jehoahaz and probably others to Egypt. In this general period colonies of Jews were living at Memphis, Migdol, Tahpanhes, and Pathros in Egypt (Jer 44¹). Papyri recently discovered prove the existence of a large Jewish colony and a Jewish temple at the First Cataract, in the 5th cent. B.C. Other Jews seem to have followed Alexander the Great to Egypt (Jos. BJ II. xviii. 8; c. Apion. ii. 4). Many others migrated to Egypt under the Ptolemys (Ant. xii. i. 1, ii. 1 ff.). Philo estimated the number of Jews in Egypt in the reign of Caligula (A.D. 38-41) at a million.

Josephus states that Seleucus I. (312-280) gave the Jews rights in all the cities founded by him in Syria and Asia (Ant. xii. iii. 1). This has been doubted by some, who suppose that the spread of Jews over Syria occurred after the Maccabean uprising (168-143). At all events by the 1st cent. B.C. Jews were in all this region, as well as in Greece and Rome, in the most important centres about the Mediterranean, and had also penetrated to Arabia (Ac 2¹⁰).

At Leontopolis in Egypt, Onias III., the legitimate Aaronic high priest, who had left Palestine because he hated Antiochus IV., founded, about B.C. 170, a temple which was for a century a mild rival of the Temple in Jerusalem. With few exceptions the Dispersion were loyal to the religion of the home land. Far removed from the Temple, they developed in the synagogue a spiritual religion without sacrifice, which, after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, kept Judaism alive. All Jews paid the annual half-shekel tax for the support of the Temple-worship, and at the great feasts made pilgrimages to Jerusalem from all parts of the world (Ac 2¹⁰ 11). They soon lost the use of Hebrew, and had the Greek translation—the Septuagint—made for their use. Contact with the world gave them a broader outlook and a wider thought than the Palestinian Jews, and they conceived the idea of converting the world to Judaism. For use in this propaganda the Sibylline Oracles and other forms of literature likely to interest Græco-Roman readers were produced.

DIVINATION.—See MAGIC, DIVINATION, AND SORCERY.

DIVORCE.—See MARRIAGE.

DIZAHAB.—The writer of Dt. 1¹ thought of this as a town on the further side of the Jordan, in the 'Arabah, on the border of Moab, 'over against Suph,' and as belonging to a group of places which he names. Unfortunately the mention of them does not make the matter clear. The site of Suph is unknown. So is that of Paran. The proposed identification of Tophel with et-Tafle, S.S.E. of the Dead Sea, fails on phonetic grounds. If 'Ain el-Hudarah, between Jebel Musa and 'Akabah, represents a Hazereth, and if Laban = Libnah (Nu 33²⁰), not far from 'Ain el-Hudarah, these are at too great a distance from the 'Arabah. The same is to be said of Burckhardt's suggestion that Mina ed-Dhabab, between the Ras Muhammad and 'Akabah, is the place of which we are in search. Most probably the text is corrupt. At Nu 21¹⁴ we find Suphah (Dt 1¹ Suph) in conjunction with Vaheb (see RV); and Vaheb, in the original, is almost the same as Zahab, which, indeed, the LXX reads. There seems to be some relationship between the two passages, but neither of them has so far been satisfactorily explained. At Gn 36²⁹ we have Mezahab (= 'waters of gold'): this gives a better sense than Dizahab, and may be the proper form of the name.

The Versions do not help us. The LXX has Katachrysea (= 'rich in gold'). The Vulg. (ubi auri est plurimum) takes the word as descriptive of the district, 'where is gold in abundance.' The Targums see in it an allusion to the golden calf. And we may add that Ibn Ezra thought it was an unusual designation of a place which commonly went by another name. J. TAYLOR.

DOCTOR.—In Lk 2⁴ it is said that the boy Jesus was found in the Temple, 'sitting in the midst of the doctors.' The doctors were Jewish Rabbis. The Eng. word, like the Greek (didaskalos), means simply 'teacher.' So Lk 5¹⁷ and Ac 5³⁴, where the Gr. for 'doctor of the law' is one word (nomodidaskalos). Bacon calls St. Paul 'the Doctor of the Gentiles.'

DOCTRINE.—The only word in the OT that RV as well as AV renders 'doctrine' is teqah = 'instruction,' lit. 'what is received' (Dt 32¹, Job 11⁴, Pr 4¹, Is 29²⁴). In the NT 'doctrine' stands once for logos (He 6¹ AV; but cf. RV), otherwise for didachē and didaskalia, of which the former denotes esp. the act of teaching, the latter the thing that is taught. For didaskalia RV has usually retained 'doctrine' of AV, but in the case of didachē has almost invariably substituted 'teaching.' It is noteworthy that didaskalia is never used of the teaching of Jesus, always didachē; also that didaskalia is found chiefly in the Pastoral Epp., and outside of these, with two exceptions (Ro 12⁷ 15⁴), is used in a disparaging sense (Mt 15⁹, Mk 7⁷, Eph 4¹⁴, Col 2²²). This is in keeping with the distinction between didachē as 'teaching' and didaskalia as 'doctrine.' It reminds us that at first there were no formulations of Christian belief. The immediate disciples of Jesus had the Living Word Himself; the earliest generation of Christians, the inspired utterances of Apostles and other Spirit-filled men. J. C. LAMBERT.

DODANIM.—Named in the MT of Gn 10⁴ among the descendants of Javan, or Ionians. The LXX and Sam. versions and the parallel passage 1 Ch 1⁷ read Rodanim i.e. Rhodians. Cf. the true reading of Eak 27¹⁴ under DEDAN. J. F. MCCURDY.

DODAVAHU ('beloved of J', AV Dodavah).—Father of Eleazar of Mareshah, the prophet who censured Jehoshaphat for entering into alliance with Ahaziah (2 Ch 20¹⁷).

DODO (so the Qerē, Kethibh Dodai).—1. The father of Eleazar, the second of the three captains who were over 'the thirty' (2 S 23⁹). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11¹²) the name is given as Dodo and also 'the Ahohite' for the erroneous 'son of Ahohi'. In the third list (1 Ch 27⁴) Dodai is described as general of the second division of the army, but the words 'Eleazar the son of' appear to have been accidentally omitted. The traditional spelling (Dodo) is most probably right: the name Dudu has been found on the Tell el-Amarna tablets, apparently as that of an Amorite official at the Egypt. court. 2. A Bethlehemite, father of Elhanan, one of 'the thirty' (2 S 23⁹, 1 Ch 11¹²). 3. A man of Issachar, the forerunner of Tola the judge (Jg 10¹).

DOE.—RV (Pr 5¹⁹), AV 'roe,' is in Heb. ya' adah, the female ibex. See 'Wild goat', s.v. GOAT.

DOEG.—An Edomite, and chief of the herdmen [or better, 'runners', reading hā-rātīm for hā-rō'īm] of king Saul. When David fled to Nob to Ahimelech (or Ahijah) the priest, Doeg was there 'detained before the Lord.' Upon his report Saul ordered Ahimelech and his companions to be slain. The order was carried out by Doeg, when the rest of the king's guard shrank from obeying it (1 S 21⁷ 22⁹⁻¹⁹). Doeg is mentioned in the title of Ps. 52.

DOG.—All the Bible references to dogs breathe the modern Oriental feeling with regard to them; they refer to the common pariah dogs. These creatures are in all their ways repulsive, and in the majority of cases they have not even outward attractiveness. They live in and around the streets, and act as scavengers. In the environs of Jerusalem, e.g. the Valley of Hinnom, where carcasses are cast out, they may be seen prowling around and consuming horrible, putrid bodies, or lying stretched near the remains of their meal, satiated with their loathsome repast. Whole companies of dogs consume the offal of the slaughter-house. There is not the slightest doubt that they would consume human bodies to-day had they the opportunity; indeed, cases do occur from time to time (cf. 1 K 14¹¹ 16⁴ 21¹⁹. 22²⁸, 2 K 9¹⁰. 30, Jer 15⁴, Ps 68²³). All night they parade the streets (Ps 59⁶. 14¹⁵), each company jealously guarding that district which they have annexed, and fighting with noisy onslaught any canine stranger who ventures to invade their territory. Such a quarrel may start all the dogs in the city into a hideous chorus of furious barks. In many parts these creatures are a real danger, and the wise man leaves them alone (Pr 26¹⁷). When they attack themselves, quite uninvited, to certain houses or encampments, they defend them from all intruders (Is 56¹⁰). To call a man a 'dog' is a dire insult, but by no means an uncommon one from an arrogant superior to one much below him, and to apply such an epithet to himself on the part of an inferior is an expression of humility (2 K 8¹² etc.). A 'dead dog' is an even lower stage; it is an all too common object, an unclean animal in a condition of putridity left unconsumed even by his companions (1 S 24¹⁴ etc.). The feeling against casting bread to a dog is a strong one; bread is sacred, and to cast it to dogs is even to-day strongly condemned in Palestine (Mk 7²⁷).

The shepherd dog (Job 30¹) is, as a rule, a very superior animal; many of these are handsome beasts of a Kurdish breed, and have the intelligent ways and habits of our best shepherds' dogs at home.

Greyhounds are still bred by some Bedouin in S. Palestine, and are used for hunting the gazelle; they are treated very differently from the pariah dogs. Pr 30¹ is a very doubtful reference to the greyhound; RVm has 'war horse,' LXX 'cock.'

The 'price of a dog' (Dt 23¹⁸) evidently has reference to degraded practices of the qedzshīm ('male prostitutes') connected with the worship at 'Baal' temples.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

DOK.—A fortress near Jericho, where Simon the Maccabee, along with two of his sons, was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy, 1 Mac 16¹⁵. The name survives in the modern 'Ain Dūk, 4 miles N.W. of Jericho.

DOLEFUL CREATURE.—See JACKAL.

DOMINION.—Lordship, or the possession and exercise of the power to rule. In Col 1⁸ the word is used in the plural, along with 'thrones, principalities, and powers,' to denote supernatural beings possessed of the power of lordship, and ranking as so many kings, princes, and potentates of the heavenly regions. The same word in the singular, and essentially the same meaning, appears in Eph 1²¹, where allusion is made to the exaltation of Christ 'far above all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come.' There is no necessary reference in either of these texts to evil angels, but a comparison of what is written in Eph 2² 6¹² shows that 'the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' need not be excluded. Similar indefiniteness is apparent in the other two passages, 2 P 2¹⁰, Jude 8, where the same word is found. It is understood by some to refer here to the lordship of civil rulers, or to any concrete representative of such lordship. Others believe that the reference is to angels, either good or evil, as representing some form of supernatural power and dominion, and the reference in the context to Michael, the archangel, not bringing a railing judgment even against the devil, may be thought to favour this view. A third explanation is also possible, and is favoured by the mention in Jude 4 of 'our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ.' Those ungodly men, who deny the Lord Jesus, would not hesitate to despise, set at nought, and rail at all manner of glorious lordships and dignities. See AUTHORITY, POWER.

M. S. TERRY.

DOOR, DOORKEEPER, DOORPOST.—See HOUSE, § 6. For 'doorkeeper' in the Temple, see PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

DOPHKAH.—A station in the itinerary of the children of Israel (Nu 33²⁷). This station and the next one, Alush, which lie between the 'encampment by the sea' and Rephidim, have not been identified, and they are not alluded to in Exodus. It is possible that Dophkah is an erroneous transcription of Majkah, the name of an Egypt. district near the Wady Maghara.

DOR.—One of the cities which joined Jabin against Joshua (Jos 11²), and whose king was killed (12⁹). It lay apparently on or near the border between Manasseh and Asher, so that its possession was ambiguous (17¹¹). The aborigines were not driven out (Jg 13⁷). It was administered by Ben-abinadab for Solomon (1 K 4¹¹). Though Josephus refers to it as on the sea-coast, and it is traditionally equated to Tantura, north of Caesarea, the reference to the 'heights of Dor' rather suggests that it was in some hilly district such as the slope of the range of Carmel. The name seems quite forgotten.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

DORCAS (Gr. form of Aram. Tabitha, lit. 'gazelle,' Ac 9³⁶).—The name of a Christian woman at Joppa, 'full of good works and almsdeeds,' who, having died, was raised by St. Peter's prayer and the words 'Tabitha, arise.' The description recalls the 'Talitha cumi' scene in Jairus' house (Mk 5⁴¹). A. J. MACLEAN.

DORYMENES.—The father of Ptolemy Macron, who was a trusted friend of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 4⁴), and was chosen by Lysias to command the Syrian army in Pal. in conjunction with Nicanor and Gorgias (1 Mac 3¹¹).

DOSITHEUS.—1. The priest who, according to a note in one of the Greek recensions of Esther, brought the book to Alexandria in the 4th year of Ptolemy Philometor (?) and Cleopatra, c. B.C. 178 (Ad. Est 11¹). 2. A soldier of Judas Maccabæus, who made a vain attempt to take Gorgias prisoner (2 Mac 12²⁰). 3. A renegade Jew who frustrated the plot of Theodotus to assassinate king Ptolemy Philopator (3 Mac 13¹). 4. An officer of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12^{19, 24}).

DOTĒA (Jth 3⁹).—Another form of Dothan (wh. see). AV has incorrectly Judea.

DOTHAN (Gn 37¹⁷, 2 K 6¹²⁻¹⁸; Dotæa, Jth 3⁹; Dothaim, Jth 4⁸ etc.).—To-day, Tell Dothan, a remarkable isolated hill at the S.E. corner of a great plain Sahl 'Arrābeh; surrounded on three sides by hills (2 K 6¹⁷). Clearly a place suitable for defence, it must have been of importance when the neighbouring high-road, still much used, was a main thoroughfare from Damascus to Egypt. The situation is, too, a choice one on account of its abundant fountain, now used to work a mill and irrigate fruit gardens; two ancient wells and a number of empty cisterns (Gn 37²⁴) are also found near the foot of the tell. Great herds of cattle, sheep, and goats from the neighbouring abundant pastures, may always be found gathered there in the afternoon drinking from the water and browsing in the shade. Although there are no ancient remains on the surface, traces of walls may be seen all around the hill top. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

DOUBT (from Lat. dubitare, 'to hold two (opinions),' 'hesitate').—1. In AV 'doubt' (vb. and noun) six times renders a Gr. vb. meaning 'to be at a loss' or 'quite at a loss'; in all these instances except Jn 13³² RV substitutes 'perplexity,' following the AV rendering of Lk 9²⁴, 2 Co 4⁴. In this sense 'doubt' is now nearly obsolete; as it is in the meaning riddle, knotty question, which it bears in Dn 5^{12, 16}. Not dissimilar is its use in the AV of Jn 10²⁴ ('make us to doubt'), where RV more literally reads 'hold us in suspense.' Quite archaic also is the use of 'doubt' for 'suspect,' instance in Sir 6¹² (AV). 2. Elsewhere 'doubt' has a religious signification, standing in express or tacit antithesis to 'faith' (wh. see). (a) In Mt 21²¹, Mk 11²², Ac 10^{20, 11}, Ro 14²³, Ja 1⁶ (RV), Jude 2² (RV), it stands for a vb. signifying 'to be divided in mind (judgment)'—the same Gr. word is rendered 'staggered' in AV, 'wavered' in RV, of Ro 4²⁰; (b) in Mt 14^{31, 28} 'to be of two opinions,' 'to waver,' is the force of the original: the vb. above indicates (1) more subjectively, (2) more objectively, a state of qualified faith, of faith mixed with misgiving, something between whole-hearted faith and decided unbelief. Thus wavering, faith is robbed of its power; hence such hesitation, in regard to Christ and the promises and commands of God, is strongly deprecated and re-proved. In the above examples the doubt, affecting the mind of a believer, arises from contradictory circumstances or conscientious scruples; unless this be the case in Mt 28¹⁷ (cf. Lk 24³⁸, noticed below), it has none of the quality of rationalistic doubt or scepticism. (c) Akin to the above is the expression of Lk 12²⁹, where 'of doubtful mind' (AV, RV) is the rendering of an obscure Gr. word that seems to mean being lifted into the air, and so agitated, held in suspense or driven by gusts (cf. Eph 4¹⁴, Ja 1⁴⁻⁶). (d) Another group of expressions remains: Ro 14¹ 'doubtful disputations' (AV), 'decisions of doubts' (RVm); 1 Ti 2⁸ 'disputing' (RV) or 'doubting' (AV) = 'reasoning' (Lk 24³⁸ RV); 'disputings' (Ph 2¹⁴). In these passages arguing, questioning is intended, and (in Ro.) matter of argument, debatable questions. This usage lies on the border between 1 and 2; for the questions referred to, except in Lk 24³⁸, did not directly belong to faith, but their agitation disturbed and tended to weaken it. G. G. FINDLAY.

DOVE.—The words translated 'dove' apply equally to doves and pigeons. In Palestine seven varieties of the Columba are found. The most noticeable are the:

wood pigeons or ring-doves (Columba palumbus), which fly in great flocks all over the land; the turtle-dove (Turtur communis), a harbinger of spring, arriving in the land in April (Jer 8¹, Ca 2¹²); and the palm turtle-dove (Turtur senegalensis), which is common in a semi-domesticated state in the streets and courts of Jerusalem. 'Dove' is a favourite name of affection (Ca 1^{14, 41, 52, 12, 63}), and to-day it is one of the commonest names given to girls by Eastern Jewish parents. It is typical of harmlessness (Mt 10¹⁶), helplessness (Ps 74¹⁹), and innocence. The last quality doubtless makes it typical of the Holy Spirit (Mt 3¹⁶ etc.). Doves were used in sacrifice (Lv 5^{7, 12} etc.), and have been kept as pets for long ages. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

DOVES' DUNG.—A fourth part of a cab' of this material was sold at a high price in Samaria during the siege (2 K 6²⁵). The words harī yōnīm, as they stand, are plain, and no suggested alternative has cleared up the difficulty. It is an example of the actual extremity of the siege comparable with the threats of the approaching siege of 2 K 18²⁷. Whether, as Josephus suggests, the dung was a source of salt, or was used as medicine or as food, it is impossible to say. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

DOWRY.—See MARRIAGE.

DRACHM.—See DRAM; MONEY, §§ 4, 7.

DRAGON.—(1) tannīm (pl.), AV 'dragons,' but RV 'jackals,' Is 13^{22, 34}, 35⁷, Job 30²⁹, Ps 44¹⁹, Jer 10^{22, 49}, 32¹. (2) tannōth, AV 'dragons,' but RV 'jackals,' Mal 1³. See JACKAL. (3) tannīm (sing.), 'dragon,' Ezk 29^{3, 32}, refers to Egypt, and probably means specially the crocodile (wh. see). (4) tannīn (pl. tannīnīm), tr. in RV of Gn 1² and Job 7¹² 'sea monster(s)' (AV 'whale(s)'); Aaron's rod became a tannīn (Ex 7⁹⁻¹², EV serpent [wh. see, § 11]). The same term, tannīn, is also applied metaphorically to Pharaoh (Ps 74¹³, Is 51⁹; and thus perhaps refers to the crocodile), and to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 51³⁴). Doubtless many references here and elsewhere are tinged by current mythological tales of 'dragons,' such as that preserved in the Assyrian creation-epic of the contest between Marduk and Tiamat. The reference in Rev 12³ is certainly of this nature. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

DRAM, from the Gr. drachma, is used in AV to render two words which RV, with questionable accuracy, has rendered 'darics' (see more fully under MONEY, § 4). The 'ten pieces of silver' of Lk 15⁸, however, were real drachmas, as marg. of AV and RV, for which see MONEY, § 7.

DRAUGHT (Mt 15¹⁷, Mk 7¹⁹) and DRAUGHTHOUSE (Amer. RV 'draught-house,' 2 K 10²⁷) both signify a privy or closet, which in the Mishna is 'water-house.' Jehu, according to the last-cited passage, turned the temple of Baal in Samaria into public latrines.

DREAMS.—Sleep impressed primitive savages as a great mystery; and they consequently attributed a peculiar significance to the dreams of sleepers, as phenomena which they could not control by their will or explain by their reason. In the lowest stage of culture all dreams were regarded as objectively real experiences; the god or spirit actually visited the dreamer, the events dreamed actually occurred. Hence any one who was subject to frequent dreaming was looked on as a special medium of Divine energy, and many sought to produce the state by artificial means, e.g. fasting or the use of drugs. In process of time dreams came to be treated rather as Divine warnings than as actual occurrences. Such admonitions could be deliberately sought, e.g. by sleeping in a sacred spot, such as the temples of Asklepios or Serapis or the grotto of Trophonius; or they could come unsought, when the gods wished either to reveal or to deceive. (Plato, however, while allowing that the gods may send dreams, denies that they can wish to deceive men). Thus, for instance, among the Babylonians, the Assyrians, the Arabs, the Egyptians, a profound importance was attached to dreams; there were professional interpreters of them (cf. Gn 40^a 41^a, Dn 2^a, and manuals were compiled to aid the work of elucidation (cf. the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus of Ephesus). Wiser theorists might discriminate between dreams, but popular superstition tended to regard them all as omens, to be explained, as far as possible, in accordance with definite rules.

1. Among the Jews.—In both Testaments we find significance attached to dreams (Gn 37^a 41^a, Jg 7¹³, Dn 2^a 7¹³, Mt 1²⁰ 21³⁰, Ac 23¹¹ 27²³), and in OT times it seems that a great deal of vulgar superstition existed with regard to such phenomena; similarly necromancy and sorcery, though discouraged by the higher thought of the nation (cf. Dt 18¹⁰⁻¹¹), were undoubtedly practised. We find hardly any traces, however, of dreams being regularly sought; 1 S 28¹³ may be one; and in Gn 28¹²⁻¹³ and 1 K 3^a it is possible to suppose a reference to the practice of sleeping in a sacred locality in order to receive a Divine communication. On the whole, the general trend of OT teaching is as follows:—Dreams may in some cases be genuine communications from God (Job 33^a, Jer 23²⁸), and as such are revered (Gn 20³ 31^{10a}), though Nu 12^{a-8} treats them as an inferior medium; but there are false dreams and lying dreamers, against whom precautions are necessary; and the idea that habitual dreaming is a certain sign of Divine inspiration is stoutly combated (cf. Jer 23²⁸ 27²⁹, Zec 10³, Ec 5⁷), and it is definitely recognized that the interpretation of dreams belongs to God, and is not a matter of human codification (cf. Gn 40^a).

2. General.—The consideration of dreams is partly a subject for the sciences which treat of the general relations between body and spirit, and partly a matter of common sense. It seems clear that dreams are connected with physical states, and that their psychological origin lies mainly in the region beneath the 'threshold of consciousness.' But all dreams and all waking states are states of consciousness, whether it be partial or complete, and as such are subject to law; if any are to be regarded as 'supernatural,' it must be owing not to their methods but to their messages. Some dreams convey no message, and can be explained as valuable only by a resort to superstition. Others may be real revelations, and as such Divine; in abnormal cases the power of spiritual perception may be intensified and heightened in the dream-state, and thus an insight into Divine truth may be obtained which had been denied to the waking consciousness. Similarly Condorcet is said to have solved in a dream a mathematical problem which had baffled his waking powers, and Coleridge to have dreamt the poem of Kubla Khan. But under any circumstances the interpretation of a dream 'belongs to God'; the question whether its message is a Divine communication or not must ultimately be answered by an appeal to the religious consciousness, or in other words to the higher reason. The awakened intelligence must be called in to criticise and appraise the deliverances received in dreams, and its verdict must decide what measure of attention is to be paid to them. Dreams, in short, may be the source of suggestions, but scarcely of authoritative directions.

DRESS.—The numerous synonyms for 'dress' to be found in our EV—'apparel,' 'attire,' 'clothes,' 'raiment,' 'garments,' etc.—fairly reflect a similar wealth of terminology in the original Hebrew and Greek, more especially the former. As regards the particular articles of dress, the identification of these is in many cases rendered almost impossible for the English reader by the curious lack of consistency in the renderings of the translators, illustrations of which will be met with again and again in this article. For this and other reasons it will be necessary to have recourse to transliteration as the only certain means of distinguishing the various garments to be discussed.

1. Materials.—Scripture and anthropology are in agreement as to the great antiquity of the skins of animals, wild and domesticated, as dress material (Gn 3^a 'coats of skin'; cf. for later times, He 11³⁷). The favourite materials in Palestine, however, were wool and flax (Pr 31¹³). The finest quality of linen was probably an importation from Egypt (see LINEN). Goats' hair and camels' hair supplied the materials for coarser fabrics. The first certain mention of silk is in Rev 18¹², for the meaning of the word so rendered in Ezk 16¹⁰ is doubtful, and the silk of Pr 31²² (AV) is really 'fine linen' as in (RV).

2. Under Garments.—(a) The oldest and most widely distributed of all the articles of human apparel is the loin-cloth (Heb. 'ezôr), originally a strip of skin or cloth wrapped round the loins and fastened with a knot. Among the Hebrews in historical times it had been displaced in ordinary life by the shirt or tunic (see below). The loin-cloth or waist-cloth, however, is found in a number of interesting survivals in OT, where it is unfortunately hidden from the English reader by the translation 'girdle,' a term which should be reserved for an entirely different article of dress (see § 3). The universal sign of mourning, for example, was the 'girding' of the waist with an 'ezôr of hair-cloth (EV 'sackcloth'). Certain of the prophets, again, as exponents of the simple life, wore the waist-cloth as their only under garment, such as Elijah, who 'was girt about with a loin-cloth (EV 'girdle') of leather' (2 K 1^a), and John the Baptist (Mt 3^a, Mk 1^a). Isaiah on one occasion wore an 'ezôr of hair-cloth (Is 20³), and Jeremiah on another occasion one of linen (Jer 13⁵).

The noun and the cognate verb are frequently used in figurative senses, the point of which is lost unless it is remembered that the waist-cloth was always worn next the skin, as e.g. Jer 13¹, Is 11^a, the figure in the latter case signifying that righteousness and faithfulness are essential and inseparable elements in the character of the Messianic 'Shoot.'

(b) The aprons of Ac 19¹² were the Roman semicinctum, a short waist-cloth worn specially by slaves and workmen (see illust. in Rich, Dict. of Rom. and Gr. Antiq., s.v.).

(c) In early times the priests wore a waist-cloth of linen, which bore the special name of the ephod (1 S 2¹³), and which the incident recorded in 2 S 6^{10a}—David, as priest, dancing before the ark—shows to have been of the nature of a short kilt. By the Priests' Code, however, the priests were required to wear the under garment described under BREECHES. See, further, HOSEN.

(d) In OT, as has been said, the everyday under garment of all classes—save for certain individuals or on special occasions—is the shirt or tunic (kuttaneth, a term which reappears in Greek as chiton, and probably in Latin as tunica). The uniform rendering of EV is coat, only Jn 19²³ RVm 'tunic.' A familiar Assyrian sculpture, representing the siege and capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, shows the Jewish captives, male and female alike, dressed in a moderately tight garment fitting close to the neck (cf. Job 30¹³) and reaching almost to the ankles, which must represent the kuttaneth of the period as worn in towns. That of the peasantry and of most workmen was probably both looser and shorter, resembling in these respects its modern representative, the kamees (Lat. camisia, our 'chemise') of the Syrian fellahin.

As regards sleeves, which are not expressly mentioned in OT—but see RVm at Gn 37³ (Joseph) and 2 S 13¹⁸ (Tamar)—three modes are found. An early Egyptian representation of a group of Semitic traders (c. B.C. 2000) shows a coloured sleeveless tunic, which fastens on the left shoulder, leaving the right shoulder bare. The Lachish tunics, above mentioned, have short sleeves reaching half-way to the elbows. This probably represents the prevailing type of tunic among the Hebrews of the earlier period at least, since a third variety, fitted with long and wide sleeves and reaching to the ground, was evidently restricted to the upper and wealthier classes. This is the 'tunic of (i.e. reaching to) palms and soles' worn by Joseph and the royal princess Tamar (see above), more familiar as the 'coat of many (or diverse) colours,' a rendering which represents a now generally abandoned tradition. In Josephus' day the long white linen tunic, which was the chief garment of the ordinary priesthood, had sleeves which for practical reasons were tied to the arms (Jos. Ant. iii. vii. 2). By this time, also, it had become usual even among the lower ranks of the people to wear an under tunic or real shirt (ib. xvii. v. 7; Mishna, passim, where this garment is named chálák). In this case the upper tunic, the kuttoneth proper, would be taken off at night (Ca 5^a).

The ordinary tunic was made in at least three ways. (1) It might consist of two similar pieces of woollen or linen cloth cut from a larger web, which were sewed together along the sides and top. (2) The material for a single tunic might be woven on the loom, and afterwards put together without cutting, in the manner of the Egyptian tunics described and figured in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq. s.v. 'Tunica' (ii. 904). (3) As we know from the description of the chítón worn by our Lord at the time of His Passion (Jn 19²³), and from other sources, a third variety was woven 'without seam' on a special loom (see SPINNING AND WEAVING) and required no further adjustment.

The garment intended by the 'coats' of Dn 3ⁿ. 27 (AV) is uncertain. Most recent authorities favour mantles (so AVm; RV has 'hosen', wh. see). For the 'coat of mail' see ARMOUR, 2 (c).

3. The Girdle.—Almost as indispensable as the tunic was the girdle, which varied in material and workmanship from a simple rope (Is 3^a RV) to the rich and elaborate waist-belt of the priests, and the 'golden girdles' of Rev 1^a 15^a. Usually it consisted of a long strip of cloth, folded several times and wound round the waist above the tunic, with or without the ends hanging down in front. When work or a journey was in contemplation, the girdle was put on, and part of the tunic drawn up till it hung over in folds. Hence this operation of 'girdling the loins' became a figure for energetic action. The girdle served also as a sword-belt (2 S 20^a); through it was stuck the writer's inkhorn (Ezk 9^a 11), while its folds served as a purse (Mt 10^a RVm). The special priests' girdle, termed 'abnét' (Ex 28^a and oft.), was a richly embroidered sash wound several times round the waist, according to Josephus, and tied in front, the ends falling to the ankles.

4. Upper Garments.—While the kuttoneth or tunic was the garment in which the work of the day was done (see Mt 24¹⁸ RV, Mk 13¹⁶ RV), men and women alike possessed a second garment, which served as a protection against inclement weather by day and as a covering by night (Ex 22²⁶). The two are sharply distinguished in the familiar saying of Jesus: 'If any man sue thee at the law and take away thy coat (chítón), let him have thy cloak (himation) also' (Mt 5⁴⁰).

(a) The commonest name for this upper garment in OT is simlah or salmah. The simlah was almost certainly a large rectangular piece of cloth, in most cases of wool, in more special cases of linen. It was thus the exact counterpart of the himation of the Greeks, which we have seen to be its NT name, and the pallium of the Romans. Like them, it belonged not to the class of endumata or garments 'put on,' as the tunic, but to the perilemata or garments 'wrapped round' the body.

Since this view is at variance with that of acknowledged authorities on the subject (Nowack, Benzinger, Mackie in art. 'Dress' in Hastings' DB 1. 625), who identify the simlah with the modern 'aba, the coarse loose overcoat of the modern Syrian peasantry, the grounds on which it is based may be here briefly set forth. (1) If the parallel passages, Ex 22²⁶ and Dt 24¹⁸ 17 on the one hand, and Nu 15¹⁸ and Dt 22²¹ on the other, are compared in the original, it will be found that three terms are used indiscriminately for the ordinary upper garment of the Hebrews, and, further, that this garment had four corners, to each of which a tassel had to be attached (see more fully FRINGS).—a detail which suggests a plain four-cornered plaid like the himation, not a made-up garment like the chítón or the 'aba. (2) The incident of the sick woman in Mt 9¹⁸ and parallel passages, who reached forward in the crowd to touch the tassel of Jesus' himation from behind, shows that the Jewish upper garment was still worn by being wrapped round the body, over the back from left to right, with one corner and its tassel falling over the left shoulder. (3) The shape of the simple oblong tallith or prayer-shawl of the modern Jews, with its four tassels, which is the direct descendant of the simlah and the more recent tallith of the Mishna, is in favour of the former having the shape now advocated. (4) The clear distinction in NT already referred to, between the two principal garments of the Jews, confirms the conclusion that the typical Jewish upper garment closely resembled, if it was not identical with, the garment known as the himation throughout the Greek-speaking world.

In our EV the simlah is concealed from the English reader under a variety of renderings. Thus, to give but a few illustrations, it is the 'garment' with which Noah's nakedness was covered in Gn 9²¹, and the 'clothes' in which the Hebrews bound up their kneading-troughs (Ex 12²⁴); it is the 'garment' of Gideon in Jg 8², and the 'raiment' of Ruth (3^a); just as the himation of NT is not only the 'cloak' of Mt 5⁴⁰, but the 'clothes' of Mt 24¹⁸ (but RV 'cloak'); the 'garment' of Mk 13¹⁸, and so on.

(b) Another variety of upper garment, known as the me'ul, is mentioned only in connexion with men of high social position or of the priestly order. It is the robe of Saul—the skirt (lit. 'corner') of which was cut off by David (1 S 24⁴)—of Jonathan (18^a), and of Ezra (Ezr 9^a 5), the little 'coat' of the boy-priest Samuel (1 S 21^a), and his 'mantle' at a later stage (15²⁷). RV has 'robe' for me'ul throughout. Wherein did the me'ul differ from the simlah? From its constant association with men of rank, we should expect it to be of a more elaborate and ornate description. The violet 'robe of the ephod' prescribed for the high priest (Ex 28³⁰ff. 39²²) had 'a hole for the head in the midst thereof, as it were the hole of a coat of mail,' and was trimmed with an elaborate ball-and-bell fringe. Now on the black obelisk of Shalmaneser, the bearers of Jehu's tribute, nobles of Samaria doubtless, are represented wearing over their tunics a similar fringed and sleeveless garment, open at the sides, and resembling, if not identical with, the upper garment of Assyrian kings and dignitaries of state, which may with some confidence be identified with the me'ul. The latter, then, seems to have been a piece of cloth of superior material and workmanship, in the shape of a magnified chest-protector, worn over the tunic like a priest's chasuble, and reaching almost to the ankles. It probably came to the Hebrews from Babylonia through the medium of the Canaanites, and survives to-day in the 'little tallith' or arba kanphoth of the Jews (see FRINGS). By the time of Josephus, the high priest's me'ul had become a sleeveless and seamless upper tunic (Jos. Ant. iii. vii. 4).

(c) A third variety of upper garment, the 'addereth, appears to have been the distinctive garment of the prophets (see Zec 13^a RV 'hairy mantle'). Elijah's mantle, in particular, is always so named. The latter, according to the Gr. version of Kings, was made of sheepskin, with the wool outside (cf. 2 K 1^a RVm and Gn 25⁵ 'hairy garment'). It may, however, have been of goats' or camels' hair, as in the case of John the Baptist (Mt 3^a, Mk 1^a).

(d) Among the products of the domestic loom was a fourth garment, the sádn (Pr 31^a). From the Mishna we learn that it was a plain sheet of fine linen with tassels, which could be used as a light upper garment.

DRESS

as a curtain, and as a shroud. In this last respect it resembled the NT sindon, the 'linen cloth' of Mt 27⁵⁹, Mk 15⁴⁶ RV. It is probably as an upper garment of fine white linen for gala use (cf. Ec 9⁸) that the sādn is introduced in Jg 14²¹. (AV 'sheets,' RV 'linen garments') and Is 3²².

(e) Mention must also be made of the 'scarlet robe' (chlamys) in which Jesus was arrayed by the Roman soldiers (Mt 27²⁸, 31). It is the paludamentum or military cloak worn over their armour by the superior officers of the Roman army. The 'cloak' finally, which St. Paul left at Troas (2 Ti 4¹³) was the Roman penula, a circular travelling cape. For the brooch or buckle by which an upper garment was sometimes fastened, see ORNAMENTS, § 6.

5. Headdress.—(a) The Hebrews appear at first to have had no covering for the head, except on special occasions, such as war, when a leather helmet was worn (see ARMOUR, 2 (b)). At most a rope or cord served as a fillet, as may be inferred from 1 K 20³¹, and as may be seen in the representations of Syrians on the monuments of Egypt. In cases of prolonged exposure to the sun, it is most probable that recourse would be had to a covering in the style of the modern keffiyeh, which protects not only the head but also the neck and shoulders. Jehu's tribute-carriers, above mentioned, are depicted in a headgear resembling the familiar Phrygian cap. The best attested covering, however—at least for the upper ranks of both sexes—is the tsādnāph (from a root signifying 'wind round') or turban. It is the royal 'diadem' of Is 62², the ladies' 'hood' of Is 3²⁴ (RV 'turban'), and the 'mitre' of Zec 3⁴ (RVm 'turban or diadem'). A kindred word is used for the high priest's turban, the 'mitre' of Ex 28⁴, etc., for which see MITRE. A turban is also implied in Ezekiel's description of a lady's headdress: 'I have bound thee with a tire of fine linen' (Ezk 16¹⁰ RVm). The egg-shaped turban of the ordinary priests has been discussed under BONNET (RV 'head-tires'). The 'hats' of Dn 3²¹ were probably a variety of the conical Babylonian headdress, although RV gives 'mantles.' Antiochus Epiphanes, it is recorded, compelled the young Jewish nobles to wear the petasus, the low, broad-brimmed hat associated with Hermes (2 Mac 4⁸, RV 'the Greek cap').

In NT times, as may be learned from the Mishna, many forms of headdress were in use. One was named the sādn, from the Lat. sudarium (a cloth for wiping off perspiration, sudor), which is the napkin of Jn 11⁵⁴ 20⁷, although there it appears as a kerchief or head-covering for the dead (cf. below, 8).

(b) As regards the headdress of the female sex, we have seen that both sexes of the wealthier classes wore the tsādnāph or turban. The female captives from Lachish wear over their tunics an upper garment, which covers the forehead and hair and falls down over the shoulders as far as the ankles. Whether this is the garment intended by any of the words rendered vail in AV, as that of Ruth, for example (3⁴, RV 'mantle'), or by the 'kerchiefs' for the head' of Ezk 13¹⁸ RV, it is impossible to say. The veil, however, with which Rebekah and Tamar covered themselves (Gn 24⁶ 38⁴), was more probably a large mantle in which the whole body could be wrapped, like the sādn of 4 (d) above. Indeed, it is impossible to draw a clear distinction in OT between the mantle and the veil. The only express mention of a face-veil is in the case of Moses (Ex 34²⁹).

6. Shoes and sandals.—Within doors the Hebrews went barefoot. Out of doors it was customary to wear either sandals or shoes, mostly the former. The simplest form of sandal consisted of a plain sole of leather, bound to the feet by a leather thong, the 'shoelatchet' of Gn 14²² and the 'latchet' of Mk 1⁷ etc. The Assyrians preferred a sandal fitted with a heel-cap, by which they are distinguished from Jehu's attendants on the obelisk of Shalmaneser, who wear shoes completely covering the feet. In Ezekiel's day ladies wore shoes of 'sealskin' (Ezk 16¹⁰ RV; but see BADGERS' SKINS). The laced boot of the soldier may be referred to in Is 9⁴ (see RVm). The sandals were removed not only in cases of mourning (2 S 15³⁰) and of a visit to a friend, but also on entering a sacred precinct (Ex 3⁵, Jos 5¹⁵); the Jewish priests, accordingly, performed all their offices in the Temple barefoot.

7. It need hardly be said that the taste for 'purple and fine linen' was not peculiar to the days of Dives, as may be seen from the remarkable dress-list in Is 3¹⁶. Richly embroidered garments are mentioned as early as the time of the Judges (Jg 5³⁰ RV). King Josiah had an official who bore the title of 'the keeper of the wardrobe' (2 K 22⁴). The 'change of raiment,' however, several times mentioned in OT, were not so many complete outfits, but special gala robes, for which one's ordinary garments were 'changed.' In the East, such robes have continued a favourite form of gift and expression of esteem from sovereigns and other persons of high rank to the present day.

For what may be termed accessories of dress, see ORNAMENTS, SEAL, STAFF.

8. A special interest must always attach to the question of the outward appearance of the Man of Nazareth, so far as it is associated with the dress He wore. This must have consisted of at least six separate articles, not five, as Edersheim states (Life and Times of Jesus, i. 625). By the 1st cent. it had become usual to wear a linen shirt (chālūk) beneath the tunic (see 2 (d) above). In our Lord's case this seems required by the mention of the upper garments (himatia, i.e. mantle and tunic) which He laid aside before washing the disciples' feet (Jn 13⁴). The tunic proper, we know, was 'woven without seam' throughout, and therefore fitted closely at the neck, with the usual short sleeves as above described. White linen was the favourite material for both shirt and tunic. Above the tunic was the linen girdle wound several times round the waist. On His feet were leather sandals (Mt 3⁴). His upper garment, as has been shown, was of the customary oblong shape—probably of white woollen cloth, as is suggested by the details of the Transfiguration narrative in Mk 9³—with the four prescribed tassels at the corners (see above, 4 (a)). To the form of His headdress we have no clue, but it may be regarded as certain—the traditional artistic convention notwithstanding—that no Jewish teacher of that period would appear in public with head uncovered. Probably a white linen 'napkin' (sudarium) was tied round the head as a simple turban, the ends falling down over the neck. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

DRUSILLA.—The third wife of the procurator Felix (Ac 24²⁴). She was the youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and is said to have been persuaded by one Simon (? Simon Magus) to desert her first husband, Azizus king of Emesa, for Felix. She cannot have been more than 16 years of age when she listened to St. Paul reasoning on 'righteousness and temperance and the judgment to come' (Ac 24²⁵).

DUALISM.—The belief in, or doctrine of, two ultimate conflicting principles, powers, or tendencies in the universe. Haeckel describes as dualism the distinction between God and the world, and between matter and mind, and opposes to it his monism, which identifies both (Riddle of the Universe, ch. 1, p. 8). In this sense of the word the Bible teaches dualism. It does distinguish God as Creator from the world as created (Gn 1¹, Is 40²⁶, Jn 1³), and describes God as Spirit in contrast with matter (Jn 4²⁴). In man it distinguishes the body taken from the dust, and the spirit given by God (Gn 27, Ec 12⁷). This conclusion need not be proved further, as this view is implied in all the teaching of the Bible about God, world, man. But, setting aside this new sense of the term, we must consider whether the Bible gives evidence of dualism in the older sense, as opposing to God any antagonist or hindrance in His creating, preserving, and ruling the world. It is held that dualism in three forms can be traced in the Bible—(1) the mythical, (2) the metaphysical, (3) the ethical. Each must be separately examined.

1. Mythical dualism.—In the Babylonian cosmology, Marduk, the champion of the upper deities, wages war against Tiamat, who leads the lower deities; at last he slays her, divides her body, and makes part a covering for the heavens to hold back the upper waters. There is little doubt that the account of the Creation in Gn 1 reproduces some of the features of this myth, but it is transformed by the monotheism of the author (see Bennett's Genesis, pp. 67-72). Tiamat appears under the name Rahab in several passages (Job 9¹³ [RV] 26¹²; [see Davidson's Job, p. 54], Is 51⁹, cf. 27¹ 'leviathan the swift serpent,' 'leviathan the crooked serpent,' 'the dragon that is in the sea'). See Cheyne's notes on these passages in the Prophecies of Isaiah, I. 158, II. 31. In illustration of Is 51⁹ he quotes the address to Ra in the Egyptian Book of the Dead: 'Hail! thou who hast cut in pieces the Scorpion and strangled the Apophis' [i.e. the evil serpent, Ps 89¹⁰, cf. Ps 74¹³ 'the dragons,' 'leviathan']. This name is used as a symbolic name of Egypt (Ps 87⁴, Is 30⁷), probably on account of its position on the Nile, and its hostility to the people of God. The sea is regarded as God's foe (Dn 7³ 'four great beasts came up from the sea'; Rev 13¹ 'a beast coming up out of the sea,' 21¹ 'the sea is no more,' that is, the power hostile to God has ceased), a conception in which the myth survives. The influence of the myth is seen only in the poetical language, but not in the religious beliefs of the Holy Scriptures.

2. Metaphysical dualism.—Greek thought was dualistic. Anaxagoras assumed hylē, 'matter,' as well as nous, 'mind,' as the ultimate principles. Plato does not harmonize the world of ideas and the world of sense. Aristotle begins with matter and form. Neo-Platonism seeks to fill up the gulf between God and the world by a series of emanations. In Gnosticism the plerōma and the logos mediate between the essential and the phenomenal existence. St. John (1¹⁻¹⁴) meets this Greek thought of his environment by asserting that Christ is the Word who is with God and is God, and who has become flesh. Against Gnostic heretics St. Paul in Colossians (1⁹ 2⁹) asserts that the plerōma, the fulness of the Godhead, dwells bodily in Christ; to this dualism is opposed the union of Creator and creation, reason and matter in Christ.

From this metaphysical there resulted a practical dualism in Greek thought, between sense and reason. While Aristotle thought that reason might use sense as an artist his material, Neo-Platonism taught that only by an ascetic discipline could reason be emancipated from the bondage of sense; and Stoicism treated sense as a usurper in man's nature, to be crushed and cast out by reason. Holsten has tried to show that this dualism is involved in St. Paul's doctrine of the flesh, and Pfleiderer also holds this position. It is held that St. Paul, starting from the common Hebraic notion of flesh (basar), 'according to which it signifies material substance, which is void indeed of the spirit, but not contrary to it, which is certainly weak and perishable, and so far unclean, but not positively evil,' advances to the conception of the flesh as 'an agency opposed to the spirit,' having 'an active tendency towards death.' 'From the opposition of physically different substances results the dualism of antagonistic moral principles' (Pfleiderer's Paulinism, I. 52 ff.). This conclusion is, however, generally challenged with good reason, and cannot be regarded as proved. The question will be more fully discussed in art. FLESH.

3. Ethical dualism.—In Persian thought there are opposed to one another, as in conflict with one another, Ormuzd and Ahriman, the personal principles of good and evil. While the OT recognizes the power of sin in the world, yet God's ultimate causality and sole supremacy are affirmed. In post-exilic Judaism, however, there was a twofold tendency so to assert the transcendence of God that angels must be recognized as mediating between Him and the world, and to preserve His moral perfection by assigning the evil in the world to the agency of evil spirits under the leadership of Satan, the adversary. While these tendencies may be regarded as inherent in the development of Hebrew monotheism, both were doubtless stimulated by the influence of Persian thought with its elaborate angelology and demonology. In the Apocalyptic literature the present world is represented as under Satan's dominion, and as wrested from him only by a supernatural manifestation of God's power to establish His Kingdom. This dualism pervades the Apocalypse. In the NT generally the doctrine of the devil current in Judaism is taken over, but the Divine supremacy is never denied, and the Divine victory over all evil is always confidently anticipated. (See artt. APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, DEVIL, ESCHATOLOGY.)

While in the Bible there are these traces of the threefold dualism, it is never developed; and monotheism is throughout maintained, God's sole eternity, ultimate causality, and final victory being asserted, while God is distinguished from the world, and in the world a distinction between matter and mind is recognized.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

DUKE.—The title of 'duke' in the AV has a very general meaning. It is an inheritance from the Eng. of earlier versions, in which (after Vulg. dux) 'duke' meant any leader or chief. Latimer calls Gideon a duke, and Wyclif uses this title of Christ, as in his Works (iii. 137), 'Jesus Christ, duke of our batel.' The title of 'duke' is confined in AV to the chiefs of Edom, with the exception of Jos 13¹⁸ 'dukes of Sihon,' and 1 Mac 10⁶⁶ (applied to Jonathan Maccabæus).

DULCIMER.—This term, which denotes a stringed instrument (7 the mediæval 'psaltery'; see MUSIC, § 4 (1) (b)), is given incorrectly by EV in Dn 3⁸ as tr. of sumpōnna (Gr. loan-word), which prob. = 'bagpipe'; see MUSIC, § 4 (2) (d).

DUMAH.—1. Cited in Gn 25¹⁴ (1 Ch 1²⁰) as among the twelve tribes of Ishmael. The region thus indicated is supposed to be the oasis formerly called by the Arabs Dūmat el-Jendel and now known as el-Jōf, about three-fourths of the way from Damascus to Medina. The same place may be referred to in the obscure oracle Is 21¹⁴, but the LXX has 'Idumæa,' and it is possible that Edom is meant. 2. The name of a town in the highlands of Judah (Jos 15²²). The reading is not certain. The LXX and Vulg. indicate Rumah, and not all editions of the Hebrew agree. If the received text is correct, an identification may be plausibly made with ed-Daumeḥ 10 miles S.W. of Hebron. J. F. McCURDY.

DUMBNESS.—See MEDICINE.

DUNG.—1. Used in the East as manure (Lk 13⁹) and for fuel; especially that of cattle, where wood and charcoal are scarce or unattainable. Directions for personal cleanliness are given in Dt 23¹⁰⁻¹⁴; and in the case of sacrifices the dung of the animals was burnt outside the camp (Ex 29¹⁴, Lv 4¹¹, 12 8¹⁷, Nu 19⁵). 2. The word is used (a) to express contempt and abhorrence, as in the case of the carcass of Jezebel (2 K 9³⁷); and in that of the Jews (Jer 9⁷, Zeph 1¹⁷). (b) To spread dung upon the face was a sign of humiliation (Mal 2⁹). (c) As representing worthlessness, Paul counted all things but dung that he might win Christ (Ph 3⁸).

DURA, PLAIN OF

DURA, PLAIN OF.—The precise locality is uncertain, but it must have been in the vicinity of Babylon. Perhaps the name is derived from the Bab. durū = 'wall,' which is frequently used as a town name. Oppert (Expéd. en Mésop. 1. 238) found a small river so named, falling into the Euphrates 6 or 7 miles S.E. of Babylon, the neighbouring mounds being also named Tolul Dura. A curious Talmudic legend makes this plain the scene of Ezekiel's vision (37¹⁻¹⁴), which it regards as an actual event (Sanh. 92 b). J. TAYLOR.

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE

DWARF is the rendering in AV and RV of daq, a word (Lv 21²⁰) denoting one of the physical disqualifications by which a priest was unfitted for service. The word means thin, lean, small. The conjecture that it here means a dwarf is plausible. But others regard it as meaning an unnaturally thin man—a consumptive, perhaps.

EAGLE.—(1) neshet, Dt 32¹¹ etc., Lv 11¹³ RVm 'great vulture.' (2) rāchām, Lv 11¹³, AV 'gier eagle,' RV 'vulture.' (3) aetos, Mt 24²⁸|| Lk 17³⁷ (RVm 'vultures'), Rev 4⁷ 12¹⁴. The Heb. neshet is the equivalent of the Arab. nīsr, which includes eagles, vultures, and ospreys. It is clear from Mic 1¹⁶ 'enlarge thy baldness as the eagle,' that the vulture is referred to. There are eight varieties of eagles and four of vultures known in Palestine. The references to neshet are specially appropriate as applied to the griffon vulture (Gyps fulvus), a magnificent bird, 'the most striking ornithological feature of Palestine' (Tristram), found especially around the precipitous gorges leading to various parts of the Jordan Valley. Job 39²⁷⁻³⁰ and Jer 49¹⁶ well describe its habits; and its powerful and rapid flight is referred to in Is 40³¹, Dt 28⁴⁶, Hab 1⁸. Rāchām corresponds to the Arab. rakhām, the Egyptian vulture, a ubiquitous scavenger which visits Palestine from the south every summer. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

EAR.—Both in OT and NT the spiritual disposition to attend, which issues in obedience, is thus designated (e.g. Is 6¹⁰, Mt 11¹⁴, Rev 2⁷). Hence 'to uncover the ear' (RVm, 1 S 9¹⁵ etc.) = to reveal; the 'uncircumcised ear' (Jer 6¹⁰) = the ear which remains unpurified and clogged and therefore unable to perceive; hence 'mine ears hast thou opened' (Ps 40⁶) = 'Thou hast enabled me to understand. The perforated ear was a sign of slavery or dependence, indicating the obligation to attend (Ex 21⁶, Dt 15⁶). The tip of the priest's right ear was touched with blood in token that the sense of hearing was consecrated to God's service (Ex 29²⁰, Lv 8²³). J. TAYLOR.

EARING.—Gn 45⁴, 'There shall be neither earring nor harvest.' 'Earing' is the old expression for 'ploughing.' The verb 'to ear' (connected with Lat. arare) also occurs, as Dt 21⁴ 'a rough valley, which is neither eared nor sown.'

EARNEST.—In 2 Co 1²² 5⁵, Eph 1¹⁴ St. Paul describes the Holy Spirit as the believer's 'earnest.' The word means 'part-payment,' the deposit being the same in kind as what is to follow. Cf. Tindale's (1533) use of 'earnest-penny': 'that assured saving health and earnest-penny of everlasting life.' Rabbi Greenstone (JE v. 26) quotes Kid. 3a to the effect that the payment of a perutah, the smallest coin of Palestinian currency, on account of the purchase, was sufficient to bind the bargain. The Gr. word was probably introduced by the Phœnicians. Deissmann (Bible Studies, p. 108 f.) shows that in 2 Co 1²² the verb 'stablisheth' connotes a legal idea and stands in 'an essential relation' to 'earnest' in v. 2². St. Paul represents the relation of God to believers under the image of 'a legally guaranteed security.'

EAR-RING.—See AMULETS, 2; ORNAMENTS, 2.

EARTH in OT usually stands for one or other of the Heb. words 'eretz' and 'adāmāh'. In AV these are rendered indiscriminately 'earth' and 'ground,' but RV distinguishes them by using, to some extent, 'earth' for the former, and 'ground' for the latter. Both words have a wide range of meanings, some of which they possess in common, while others are peculiar to each. Thus 'eretz' denotes: (a) earth as opposed to heaven (Gn 1¹), and (b) dry land as opposed to sea (12²⁰). 'adāmāh' is specially used: (a) for earth as a specific substance (Gn 2⁷, 2 K 5¹⁷); and (b) for the surface of the ground, in such phrases as 'face of the earth.' Both words are employed to describe: (a) the soil from which plants grow, 'adāmāh' being the more common term in this sense; (b) the whole earth with its inhabitants, for which, however, 'adāmāh' is but rarely used; and (c) a land or country, this also being usually expressed by 'eretz'. In one or two cases it is doubtful in which of the two last senses 'eretz' is to be taken, e.g. Jer 22²⁹ (EV 'earth,' RVm 'land').

In NT the Gr. words for 'earth' are gē and oikoumenē, the former having practically all the variety of meanings mentioned above, while the latter denotes specially the whole inhabited earth, and is once used (Heb 2⁵) in a still wider sense for the universe of the future. See, further, art. WORLD. JAMES PATRICK.

EARTHQUAKE.—The whole formation of the country running in a straight line from the Taurus range to the gulf of Akabah, which therefore includes Central Judæa, reveals a volcanic character of a striking kind. That this large tract was, in days gone by, the scene of frequent and terrible earthquakes, admits of no doubt. Apart from the actual occurrences of earthquakes recorded in the Bible and elsewhere (e.g. at the time of the battle of Actium, in the seventh year of the reign of Herod the Great, Jos. Ant. xv. v. 2), the often-used imagery of the earthquake bears eloquent testimony to a fearful experience.

It is necessary to distinguish between actual earthquakes and those which belong to the descriptive accounts of theophanies or Divine manifestations of wrath, etc. Of the former only one is mentioned in the OT, that which occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Am 1¹, Zec 14⁴); among the latter must be included such references as Ex 19¹⁸, 1 K 19¹¹, Nu 16³¹, Ps 18⁷ 68⁸ 77¹⁸ 104⁴, Is 29⁶ etc. In the NT it is recorded that an earthquake occurred at the Crucifixion (Mt 27⁵¹ 54), at the Resurrection (Mt 28²), and on the night of St. Paul's imprisonment in Philippi (Ac 16²⁶); further, it is foretold that there shall be earthquakes at Christ's second coming (Mt 24⁷, Mk 13⁸, Lk 21¹⁰); their mention in Rev. is characteristic of apocalyptic literature.

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE.—A common designation of the inhabitants of the Syrian desert, who were partly Aramæan and partly Arabian (Jg 6³ 8¹⁰, Ezk 25⁴ 10, Is 11⁴, Jer 49²⁸, Job 1³). Certain of them had obtained great renown for wisdom (1 K 5¹⁰).

EAST SEA, EASTERN SEA.—See DEAD SEA.

EASTER (AV of Ac 12^a; RV 'the Passover').—The anachronism of AV was inherited from older VSS which avoided, as far as possible, expressions which could not be understood by the people.

EBAL.—1. Name of a son of Joktan (1 Ch 1²², in Gn 10²⁸ Obal), probably representing a place or tribe in Arabia. 2. A son of Shobal son of Seir (Gn 36²³, 1 Ch 1⁴⁰).

EBAL.—Now Jebel esh-Shemali, a mountain north of Nabius (Shechem), 1207 ft. above the valley, 3077 ft. above the sea. Ruins of a fortress and of a building called a 'little church' exist on its summit, as well as a Mohammedan shrine said to contain the skull of John the Baptist. The mountain commands an extensive view over almost the whole of Galilee, which includes points from Hermon to Jerusalem and from the sea to the Hauran. On this mountain Joshua built an altar and erected a monument bearing the law of Moses (Jos 8³⁰); and the curses for breaches of the moral law were here proclaimed to the assembled Israelites on their formally taking possession of the Promised Land (Dt 11²⁹ 27⁴, 12, Jos 8³²).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

EBED.—1. The father of Gaal (Jg 9²⁰⁻²⁵). 2. One of those who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8⁹); called in 1 Es 8²² Obeth.

EBED-MELECH.—An Ethiop. eunuch, by whom Jeremiah was released from the pit-prison (Jer 38⁷, 39¹⁸). It is possible that the name Ebed-melech, which means 'servant of [the] king,' may have been an official title.

EBEN-EZER (the stone of help' [LXX 'of the helper']).—1. The scene of a disastrous battle in which the ark was lost (1 S 4¹⁻⁵). 2. The name of the stone erected to commemorate an equally glorious victory (7¹²). The precise situation is uncertain, but if Shen (7¹²), i.e. Yeshana (according to LXX and Syriac) is the modern 'Ain Semije a little N. of Bethel the locality is approximately defined. Samuel's explanatory words should be read thus: 'This is a witness that Jahweh hath helped us.' J. TAYLOR.

EBER.—1. The eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews (the first letter in both words being the same in the Heb.), the great-grandson of Shem, and 'father' of Peleg and Joktan (Gn 10²¹, ≈ 11¹⁰). The word 'Eber' signifies 'the other side,' 'across'; and 'ibri,' 'Hebrew,' which is in form a gentile name denoting the inhabitant of a country or member of a tribe is usually explained as denoting those who have come from 'Eber han-nahar' (see Jos 24²⁻³), or 'the other side of the River' (the Euphrates), i.e. from Haran (Gn 11³¹), in Aram-naharaim the home of Abraham and Nahor (Gn 24¹, 7¹⁰). According to Sayce however (Exp. T. xviii. [1907] p. 233) the word is of Bab. origin, and denoted originally the 'traders' who went to and fro across the Euphrates. In the genealogies in Gn 10. 11 the district from which the 'Hebrews' came is transformed into an imaginary eponymous ancestor. Why Eber is not the immediate, but the sixth ancestor of Abraham, and why many other tribes besides the Hebrews are reckoned as his descendants, is perhaps to be explained (König) by the fact that though the Israelites were in a special sense 'Hebrews,' it was remembered that their ancestors had long made the region 'across' the Euphrates their resting-place, and many other tribes (Peleg, Joktan, etc.) had migrated from it. What Eber means in Nu 24²⁴ is uncertain: most probably perhaps, the country across the Euphrates (|| with Asshur, i.e. Assyria).

2 A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹²). 3. 4. Two Benjamites (1 Ch 8¹⁸ 21). 5 Head of a priestly family (Neh 12²⁰).

ECCLESIASTES.—1. Title and Canonicity.—The title has come to us through Jerome from the LXX, in which it was an attempt to express the Heb. nom de plume 'Kôheleth,' i.e. 'one who speaks in an assembly' (kāhal)—the assembly being all who give their hearts to the acquisition of wisdom. The book is one of the third group in the Heb. Bible—the Kethūbhīm or 'Writings'—which were the latest to receive recognition as canonical Scripture. It appears to have been accepted as Scripture by c. B.C. 100. At the synod of Jamnia (c. A.D. 100) the canonicity of Ec., the Song of Songs, and Esther was brought up for discussion, and was confirmed.

2. Author and Date.—The book contains the outpourings of the mind of a rich Jew, at the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. We may perhaps gather that he was in a high station of life, for otherwise his very unorthodox reflexions could hardly have escaped oblivion. He could provide himself with every luxury (2⁴⁻¹⁰). But he had private sorrows and disappointments; 7²²⁻²⁸ seems to imply that his life had been saddened by a woman who was unworthy of him. He was apparently an old man, because his attempts to find the summum bonum of life in pleasure and in wisdom, which could hardly have been abandoned in a few years, were now bygone memories (1²⁻²⁴). And he lived in or near Jerusalem, for he was an eye-witness of events which occurred at the 'holy place' (8¹⁰). That is all that he reveals about himself. But he paints a lurid picture of the state of his country. The king was 'a child'—much too young for his responsible position; and his courtiers spent their days in drunken revelry (10¹⁶); he was capricious in his favouritism (vv. 5-7), violent in temper (v. 3), and despotic (8²⁴). The result was that wickedness usurped the place of justice (3¹⁶), and the upper classes crushed the poor with an oppression from which there was no escape (4¹); the country groaned under an irresponsible officialism, each official being unable to move a finger in the cause of justice because he was under the thumb of a higher one and the highest was a creature of the tyrannous king (5⁷); and in such a state of social rottenness espionage was rife (10²⁰). The only passage which distinctly alludes to contemporary history is 4¹³⁻¹⁶, but no period has been found which suits all the facts. In 8¹⁰ an historical allusion is improbable, and 9¹³⁻¹⁴ is too vague to afford any indication of date.

The book or, more probably, 1-2¹¹ only, is written under the guise of Solomon. In 2¹² (according to the most probable interpretation of the verse) the writer appears to throw off the impersonation. But the language and grammatical peculiarities of the writing make it impossible to ascribe it to Solomon. The Heb. language which had been pure enough for some time after the return from Babylon, began to decay from the time of Nehemiah. There are signs of the change in Ezr., Neh., and Mal. and it is still more evident in Chron. Est., and Eccl. the latter having the most striking Mishnic idioms. It must therefore be later (probably much later) than Esther (c. B.C. 300), but before ben-Sira, who alludes to several passages in it (c. B.C. 180). It may thus be dated c. B.C. 200.

3. Composition.—One of the most striking features of the book is the frequency with which a despairing sadness alternates with a calm pious assurance. Many have seen in this the struggles of a religiously minded man halting between doubt and faith; e.g. Plumptre compares this mental conflict with Tennyson's 'Two Voices.' But the more the book is read, the more the reader feels that this is not so. The contrasts are so sudden; the scepticism is so despairing, and the piety so calm and assured, that they can be explained only on the assumption of interpolations by other hands. Moreover, in the midst of the despair and the faith there are scattered proverbs, somewhat frigid and didactic, often with no relevance to the context. The literary history of the writing appears to be as follows: (a) The gnomic character of some of Koheleth's remarks, and the ascription to Solomon, attracted one of the thinkers of the day whose minds were dominated by the idea of 'Wisdom'—such a writer as those whose observations are collected in the Book of Proverbs. He enriched the original writing with proverbs culled from various sources. (b) But that which attracts also repels. The impression which the book made upon the orthodox Jew may be seen in the Book of Wisdom, in which (21-9) the writer collects some of Koheleth's despairing reflexions; and, placing them in the mouth of the ungodly, raises his protest against them. There were living at the time not only gnomic moralizers but also men of intense, if narrow piety—men of the temple, afterwards seen in the Maccabees. One of these interpolated observations on (i.) the fear of God, (ii.) the judgment of God. In every case except 51-7 (Heb. 417-50) his remarks explicitly correct some complaint of Koheleth to which he objected. 12^{11, 12} is a postscript by the 'wise man,' and vv. 12, 14 by the pious man. The additions which appear to be due to the former are 4^b, 9-12 6⁷, 9 71^a, 4-12, 19 81 917f. 101-3, 8-14^a, 15, 18^f, 1211f. and to the latter 2²⁸ 314b, 17 51-7 718b, 26b, 29 82b, 2a, 5, 6a, 11-13 118b, 121a, 13f.

4. Koheleth's reflexions.—(a) His view of life.—After the exordium (1-21). In which under the guise of Solomon, he explains that he made every possible attempt to discover the meaning and aim of life, the rest of his writing consists of a miscellaneous series of pictures, illustrating his recurrent thought that 'all is a vapour, and a striving after wind.' And the conclusion at which he arrives is that man can aim at nothing guide himself by nothing. His only course is to fall back upon present enjoyment and industry. It is far from being a summum bonum; it is not an Epicurean theory of life; it is a mere modus vivendi, whereby he shall not take much account of the days of his life' (51⁹). And to this conclusion he incessantly returns, whenever he finds life's mysteries insoluble: 2¹¹, 31¹¹, 27 51-19 81⁵ 97-10 111-10 (exc. 9b) 121b-7.

(b) His religious ideas.—It is improbable that he came into immediate contact with any of the Greek schools of thought. It has often been maintained that he shows distinct signs of having been influenced by both Stoic and Epicurean philosophy. Of the latter it is difficult to discern the slightest trace; but for the former there is more to be said. But there is nothing at which a thinking Jew, of a philosophical temper of mind, could not have arrived independently. And it must not be forgotten that even Stoicism was not a purely Greek product; its founder Zeno was of Phoenician descent, and his followers came from Syria, Cilicia, Carthage, and other Hellenistic (as distinct from Hellenic) quarters. Koheleth occupies (what may be called) debatable ground between Semitic and Greek thought. He has lost the vitality of belief in a personal God, which inspired the earlier prophets, and takes his stand upon a somewhat colourless monotheism. He never uses the personal name 'Jahweh,' but always the descriptive title 'Elohim' (4 times) or 'the Elohim' (16 times), 'the deity' who manifests Himself in the inscrutable and irresistible forces of Nature. At the same time he never commits himself to any definitely pantheistic statements. He has not quite lost his Semitic belief that God is more than Nature, for His action shows evidence of design (31¹¹, 18 22 812b 714 817 114). Moreover, God's work—the course of Nature—appears in the form of an endless cycle. Events and phenomena are brought upon the stage of life, and banished into the past, only to be recalled and banished again (14-11 31¹⁵). And this, for Koheleth, paralyzes all real effort; for no amount of labour can produce anything new or of real profit—no one can add to, or subtract from, the unswerving chain of facts (1¹⁵ 31-2, 14^a, 71¹⁵); no one can contend with Him that is mightier than he (61⁹). And he gains no relief from the expectation of Messianic peace and perfection, which animated the orthodox Jew. There are left him only the shreds of the religious convictions of his fathers, with a species of 'natural religion' which has fatalism and altruism among its ingredients.

5. The value of the book for us lies largely in its very deficiencies. The untroubled orthodoxy of the pious man who corrected what he thought was wrong, the moral aphorisms of the 'wise man,' and the Weltschmerz of Koheleth with his longing for light, were each examples of the state of thought of the time. They corresponded to the three classes of men in 1 Co 12¹⁰—the 'scribe' (who clung faithfully to his accepted traditions), the wise man, and the 'searcher of this world.' Each possessed elements of lasting truth, but each needed to be answered and raised to a higher plane of thought, by the revelation of God in the Incarnation. A. H. M'NEIL.

ECCLESIASTICUS—See APOCRYPHA, § 13.

ECLIPSE.—See SUN.

ED.—In the Hebrew (and also in the Greek) text of Jos 22²⁴ the name given by the two and a half tribes to the altar erected by them on the east bank of the Jordan has dropped out. Our English translators have filled the gap by inserting Ed as the name of the altar in question. For this they have the authority of a few MSS.

The location of this altar on the east bank of the Jordan is required by the whole tenor of the narrative. The west bank is suggested by v. 12 in its present form, and maintained also by RV in v. 11, by a translation of doubtful admissibility, in the forefront of the land of Canaan, on the side that pertaineth to the children of Israel.

EDDINUS.—One of the 'holy singers' at Josiah's passover (1 Es 14¹⁵). In the parallel passage 2 Ch 35¹⁴ the corresponding name is Jeduthun, which is read also, contrary to MS authority, by AV in 1 Esdras. The text of the latter is probably corrupt.

EDEN.—2 Ch 29¹² 31¹⁵, a Levite, or possibly two. It is not certain that Eden is the true form of the name: LXX has Jodan in the first, Odum in the second passage. When it transliterates Eden elsewhere it is usually in the form Edem. J. TAYLOR.

EDEN, CHILDREN OF.—The people occupying Bit-Adini (2 K 19¹² 13 37¹²; for Ezk 27²⁴ see CANNEN). See EDEN (HOUSE OF). Tellassar (2 K 19¹²) may perhaps be Tū Bashūr of the inscriptions. J. TAYLOR.

EDEN GARDEN OF.—Gn 2f. relates how God planted a garden in the East, in Eden. A river rose in that land, flowed through the garden, and then divided into four streams. Within the enclosure were many trees useful for food; also the tree of life, whose fruit conferred immortality, and the tree of knowledge, which gave power to discriminate between things profitable and things hurtful, or, between right and wrong. The animal denizens were innocuous to man and to each other. When the first man and woman yielded to the tempter and ate of the tree of knowledge, they were expelled, and precluded from re-entering the garden.

In this account Gn 21¹⁰⁻¹⁴ 32², 24 seem to be interpolations. But the topographical data in 21¹⁰⁻¹⁴ are of especial importance, because they have supplied the material for countless attempts to locate the garden. It has been almost universally agreed that one of the four rivers is the Euphrates and another the Tigris. Here the agreement ends, and no useful purpose would be served by an attempt to enumerate the conflicting theories. Three which have found favour of late, may be briefly mentioned. One is that the Gihon is the Nile, and the Pishon the Persian and Arabian Gulfs, conceived of as a great river, with its source and that of the Nile not far from those of the Euphrates and the Tigris. Another regards Eden as an island not far from the head of the Persian Gulf near the mouths of the Euphrates the Tigris the Kerkha and the Karun. The third puts Eden near Eridu (once the seaport of Chaldaea on the Persian Gulf), and takes the Pishon to be the canal afterwards called Pallakottas, and the Gihon to be the Khoaspes (now Kerkha). In support of the last-named view a cuneiform tablet is quoted which speaks of a tree or shrub planted near Eridu by the gods. The sun-god and 'the peerless mother of Tammuz' dwell there: 'no man enters into the midst of it.' But the correspondences with the Biblical Eden are not sufficiently striking to compel conviction. At the same time it can hardly be doubted that the Biblical writer utilized traditional matter which came originally from Babylonia. The very name Eden, which to him meant 'delight,' is almost certainly the Bab. edunu = 'plain.' The Bab. author would conceive of the garden as lying in a district near his own land, hard by the supposed common source of the great rivers. And this, to the Hebrews, is in the East.

Eden, or the garden of Eden, became the symbol of a very fertile land (Gn 13¹⁰, Is 51³, Ezk 31⁸, 16, 18, J1 2³). The dirge over the king of Tyre (Ezk 28¹³) is founded on a Paradise legend which resembles that in Gn, but has a stronger mythological colouring: the 'garden of God' (v. 13) is apparently identified with the well-known mythical mountain of the gods (v. 14); the cherub and the king of Tyre are assimilated to each other, the stones of fire may be compared with the flame of a sword (Gn 3²⁴; see also Enoch 24⁶). In later literature we find much expansion and embellishment of the theme: see Jubilees 3⁹ 4², Enoch 24¹ 32. 60. 61. 2 Es 8², Assump. Mos. ix ff., Ev. Nic. xix. etc. NT thought and imagery have been affected by the description of Eden given in Gn 2 f.; see Lk 23³¹, 2 Co 12⁴, Rev 27. The Koran has many references to the garden of Paradise Lost, and the gardens of the Paradise to come (ix. xiii. xvii. lv. lxxviii. etc.). J. TAYLOR.

EDEN, HOUSE OF.—A place or district connected politically with Damascus (Am 1⁶ RVm Beth-eden). Of the five suggestions for locality the likeliest is 'Eden or Ehdan, 20 miles N.W. of Baalbek, on the N.W. slope of Lebanon. Its most formidable competitor, Bit-Adini, a district on either bank of the Middle Euphrates, frequently mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions, is too far—200 miles—from Damascus, and in the days of Amos had long been subject to Assyria. J. TAYLOR.

EDER.—1. Gn 35²¹ 'And Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Eder.' 'Eder means 'a flock'; and the phrase Midgal-eder ('flock-tower,' cf. Mic 4⁸) would have been the appellation given to a tower occupied by shepherds for the protection of their flocks against robbers (cf. 2 K 18², 2 Ch 26¹⁰). The tower here mentioned lay between Bethlehem and Hebron (cf. vv. 19 27). Jerome mentions a Jewish tradition that this Eder was the site of the Temple, but himself prefers to think that it was the spot on which the shepherds received the angels' message. 2. Jos 15¹¹. The name of one of the towns of Judah 'in the south,' close to the Edomite frontier; perhaps Ka. el-'Adir, 5 miles S. of Gaza. 3. 1 Ch 23²⁸ 24³⁰. The name of a Merarite Levite in the days of David. 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch. 8¹⁴).

EDNA.—Wife of Raguel of Ecbatana, and mother of Sarah, who became wife of Tobias (To 7²². 10¹² 11¹). See APOCRYPHA, § 8.

EDOM, EDMITES.—The Edomites were a tribe or group of tribes residing in early Biblical times in Mount Seir (Gn 32³, Jg 5⁴), but covering territory on both sides of it. At times their territory seems to have included the region to the Red Sea and Sinai (1 K 9²⁶, Jg 5⁴). Edom or Esau was their reputed ancestor. The Israelites were conscious that the Edomites were their near kinsmen, hence the tradition that Esau and Jacob were twin brothers (Gn 25²⁴). That the Edomites were an older nation they showed by making Esau the first-born twin. The tradition that Jacob tricked Esau out of his birthright (Gn 27), and that enmity arose between the brothers, is an actual reflexion of the hostile relations of the Edomites and Israelites for which the Israelites were to a considerable degree responsible.

Before the conquest of Canaan, Edom is said to have refused to let Israel pass through his territory (Nu 20¹⁸, 21). Probably during the period of the Judges, Edomites invaded southern Judah (cf. Paton, Syria and Palestine 161 ff.). Possibly Edomites settled here and were incorporated in Judah, for Kenaz is said in Gn 36¹¹ to be a son of Esau, while in Jg 3⁹ he is counted a Judahite.

During the monarchy Saul is said to have fought the Edomites (1 S 14⁷); David conquered Edom and put garrisons in the country (2 S 8¹³, 14); Edom regained its independence under Solomon (1 K 11¹⁴⁻²²); Jehoshaphat a century later reconquered Edom (cf. 1 K 22⁴⁷, 48), and Edomites helped him in his war with Moab (2 K 3); in the reign of Joram his successor, the Edomites regained their independence after a bloody revolution (8²⁰, 21); at the beginning of the next century Amaziah reconquered them for a short time, capturing Sela, and slaughtering a large number of them (2 K 14⁷). A little later Amos (Am 1¹¹) accuses Edom of pursuing his brother with the sword. During the next century Edom was independent of Israel, but paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III., Sennacherib, Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, kings of Assyria (cf. KTB ii. 21, 91, 149, 239).

In connexion with the wars of Nebuchadnezzar, which resulted in the destruction of Jerusalem in 586, many Jews migrated to Edom; but the Edomites rejoiced in the overthrow of the Jews. This deepened the old-time enmity, and called forth bitter denunciations and predictions of vengeance from Israel's prophets (cf. Ezk 25¹²⁻¹⁴, Ob 1⁶. Is 63¹⁻⁷). A little later great suffering was inflicted on the Edomites by the Nabataeans, who overran the country and crowded the Edomites up into southern Judah. This invasion of Nabataeans is probably referred to in Mal 1⁴, for by 312 they were in this region, and Antigonus and Demetrius came in contact with them (cf. Diodorus Siculus, x. 95, 96, 100).

The Edomites, because of this, occupied the territory of Judah as far as the town of Beth-zur, to the north of Hebron, which became the Idumaea (wh. see) of the NT period. Here Judas Maccabeus fought with the Edomites (1 Mac 5³, 40), and John Hyrcanus shortly before the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. conquered them, and compelled them to be circumcised and to accept the Jewish religion (cf. Jos. Ant. xii. ix. 1, xiv. i. 3, and xv. vii. 9). This was the end of the Edomites as a nation, but they obtained a kind of revenge on the Jews by furnishing the Herodian dynasty to them.

EDREI.—1. A royal city of Og, king of Bashan (Dt 1⁴ 31⁰, Jos 12¹⁴ 13¹²), the scene of the battle at which Og was defeated (Nu 21³³, Dt 3¹); assigned to the eastern division of Manasseh (Jos 13³¹). It seems to be the modern ed-Der'a, where are several important remains of antiquity, including a great subterranean catacomb. 2. A town in Naphtali (Jos 19³⁷), not identified. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

EDUCATION.—In the importance which they attached to the education of the young, it may fairly be claimed that the Hebrews were facile princeps among the nations of antiquity. Indeed, if the ultimate aim of education be the formation of character, the Hebrew ideals and methods will bear comparison with the best even of modern times. In character Hebrew education was predominantly one might almost say exclusively, religious and ethical. Its fundamental principle may be expressed in the familiar words: 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge' (Pr 1⁷). Yet it recognized that conduct was the true test of character; in the words of Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, that 'not learning but doing is the chief thing.'

As to the educational attainments of the Hebrews before the conquest of Canaan, it is useless to speculate. On their settlement in Canaan, however, they were brought into contact with a civilization which for two thousand years or more had been under the influence of Babylonia and in a less degree of Egypt. The language of Babylonia, with its complicated system of wedge-writing, had for long been the medium of communication not only between the rulers of the petty states of Canaan and the great powers outside its borders, but even, as we now know from Sellin's discoveries at Taanach, between these rulers themselves. This implies the existence of some provision for instruction in reading and writing the difficult Babylonian script. Although in this early period such accomplishments were probably confined to a limited number of high officials and professional scribes, the incident in Gideon's experience, Jg 8¹⁴ (where we must render with RVm 'wrote down'), warns us against unduly restricting the number of those able to read and write in the somewhat later period of the Judges. The more stable political conditions under the monarchy, and in particular the development of the administration and the growth of commerce under Solomon, must undoubtedly have furthered the spread of education among all classes.

Of schools and schoolmasters, however, there is no evidence till after the Exile, for the expression 'schools of the prophets' has no Scripture warrant. Only once, indeed, is the word 'school' to be found even in NT (Ac 19⁹), and then only of the lecture-room of a Greek teacher in Ephesus. The explanation of this silence is found in the fact that the Hebrew child received his education in the home, with his parents as his only instructors. Although he grew up ignorant of much that 'every school-boy' knows to-day, he must not on that account be set down as uneducated. He had been instructed, first of all, in the truths of his ancestral religion (see Dt 6²⁰⁻²⁵ and elsewhere); and in the ritual of the recurring festivals there was provided for him object-lessons in history and religion (Ex 12¹⁴, 13⁸, 14). In the traditions of his family and race—some of which are still preserved in the older parts of OT—he had a unique storehouse of the highest ideals of faith and conduct, and these after all are the things that matter.

Descending the stream of history, we reach an epoch-making event in the history of education, not less than of religion, among the Jews, in the assembly convened by Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8¹⁻⁴), at which the people pledged themselves to accept 'the book of the law of Moses' as the norm of their life in all its relations. Henceforward the Jews were pre-eminently, in Mohammed's phrase, 'the people of the Book.' But if the Jewish community was henceforth to regulate its whole life, not according to the living word of priest and prophet, but according to the requirements of a written law, it was indispensable that provision should be made for the instruction of all classes in this law. To this practical necessity is due the origin of the synagogue (wh. see), which, from the Jewish point of view, was essentially a meeting-place for religious instruction, and, indeed, is expressly so named by Philo. In NT also the preacher or expounder in the synagogue is invariably said to 'teach' (Mt 4²³, Mk 1²¹, and passim), and the education of youth continues to the last to be associated with the synagogue (see below). The situation created by this new zeal for the Law has been admirably described by Wellhausen: 'The Bible became the spelling-book, the community a school. . . . Piety and education were inseparable; whoever could not read was no true Jew. We may say that in this way were created the beginnings of popular education.'

This new educational movement was under the guidance of a body of students and teachers of the Law known as the Sopherim (lit. 'book-men') or scribes, of whom Ezra is the typical example (Ezr 7⁶). Alongside these, if not identical with them, as many hold, we find an influential class of religious and moral teachers, known as the Sages or the Wise, whose activity culminates in the century preceding the fall of the Persian empire (B.C. 430-330). The arguments for the identity in all important respects of the early scribes and the sages are given by the present writer in Hastings' DB i. 648; but even if the two classes were originally distinct, there can be no doubt that by the time of Jesus ben Sira, the author of Ecclesiasticus (cir. B.C. 180-170), himself a scribe and the last of the sages, they had become merged in one.

To appreciate the religious and ethical teaching of the sages, we have only to open the Book of Proverbs. Here life is pictured as a discipline, the Hebrew word for which is found thirty times in this book. 'The whole of life,' it has been said, 'is here considered from the view-point of a pedagogic institution. God educates men, and men educate each other' (O. Holtzmann).

With the coming of the Greeks a new educational force in the shape of Hellenistic culture entered Palestine—a force which made itself felt in many directions in the pre-Maccabean age. From a reference in Josephus (Ant. xii. iv. 6) it may be inferred that schools on the Greek model had been established in Jerusalem itself before B.C. 220. It was somewhere in this period, too, that the preacher could say: 'Of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh' (Ec 12¹²)—reflexions which necessarily presuppose a wide-spread interest in intellectual pursuits. The edict of Antiochus Epiphanes at a later date (1 Mac 1⁵⁷) equally implies a considerable circulation of the Torah among the people, with the ability to profit by its study.

Passing now, as this brief sketch requires, to the period of Jewish history that lies between the triumph of the Maccabees and the end of the Jewish State in A.D. 70, we find a tradition—there is no valid reason for rejecting it as untrustworthy—which illustrates the extent to which elementary education, at least, was fostered under the later Maccabean princes. A famous scribe of the period (cir. B.C. 75), Simon ben-Shetach, brother of Queen Alexandra, is said to have got a law passed ordaining that 'the children shall attend the elementary school.' This we understand on various grounds to mean, not that these schools were first instituted, but that attendance at them was henceforth to be compulsory. The elementary school, termed 'the house of the Book' (i.e. Scripture), in opposition to 'the house of study' or college of the scribes (see below), was always closely associated with the synagogue. In the smaller places, indeed, the same building served for both.

The elementary teachers, as we may call them, formed the lowest rank in the powerful guild of the scribes. They are 'the doctors (lit. teachers) of the law,' who, in our Lord's day, were to be found in 'every village of Galilee and Judaea' (Lk 5¹⁷ RV), and who figure so frequently in the Gospels. Attendance at the elementary school began at the age of six. Already the boy had learned to repeat the Shema ('Hear, O Israel,' etc., Dt 6⁴), selected proverbs and verses from the Psalms. He now began to learn to read. His only textbooks were the rolls of the sacred Scriptures, especially the roll of the Law, the opening chapters of Leviticus being usually the first to be taken in hand. After the letters were mastered, the teacher copied a verse which the child had already learned by heart, and taught him to identify the individual words. The chief feature of the teaching was learning by rote, and that audibly, for the Jewish teachers were thorough believers in the Latin maxim, repetitio mater studiorum. The pupils sat on the floor at the teacher's feet, as did Saul at the feet of Gamaliel (Ac 22³).

The subjects taught were 'the three R's'—reading, writing, and arithmetic, the last in a very elementary form. The child's first attempts at writing were probably done, as in the Greek schools of the period, on sherds of pottery; from these he would be promoted to a wax tablet (Lk 15¹ RV), on which he wrote 'with a pointed style or metal instrument, very much as if one wrote on thickly buttered bread with a small stiletto.' Only after considerable progress had been made would he finally reach the dignity of papyrus.

For the mass of young Jews of the male sex, for whom alone public provision was made, the girls being still restricted to the tuition of the home, the teaching of the primary school sufficed. Those, however, who wished to be themselves teachers, or otherwise to devote themselves to the professional study of the Law, passed on to the higher schools or colleges above mentioned. At the beginning of our era the two most important of these colleges were taught by the famous 'doctors of the law,' Hillel and Shammai. It was a grandson of the former, Gamaliel I., who, thirty years later, numbered Saul of Tarsus among his students (Ac 22³). In the Beth hamidrash (house of study) the exclusive subjects of study were the interpretation of the OT, and the art of applying the regulations of the Torah, by means of certain exegetical canons, to the minutest details of the life of the time. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

EGG.—See FOOD, § 7.

EGLAH ('heifer').—One of the wives of David, and mother of Ithream (2 S 3³, 1 Ch 3³).

EGLAIM (Is 15⁸).—A town of Moab. The name has not been recovered.

EGLATH-SHELISHYAH occurs in an ancient oracle against Moab, which is quoted in Is 15² and Jer 48³⁴. In both these passages RV takes the word to be a proper name, giving in margin the alternative tr. '[as] an heifer of three years old,' which is AV in Jer 48³⁴ and AVm in Is 15². In the latter passage, AV text omits '[as].' It is still somewhat uncertain whether the word is an appellative or a proper name, although the latter view has commended itself to the majority of modern scholars.

EGLON.—King of Moab, under whose leadership the Ammonites and Amalekites joined with the Moabites in fighting and defeating the Israelites. The latter 'served,' i.e. paid tribute to, Egion for eighteen years. Towards the end of this period Ehud assassinated Egion, and brought to an end the Moabite ascendancy over Israel (Jg 3¹²⁻²⁰). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

EGLON.—A town near Lachish, mentioned only in connexion with the campaign of Joshua. Its king, Debir, joined the coalition against the Gibeonites (Jos 10⁹), and after the reduction of Lachish Joshua captured and destroyed it (10³⁴). The site is probably Tell Nejleh, near Tell el-Hesi (Lachish); the neighbouring Khurbet 'Ajlun better preserves the name, but the site is of no great antiquity.

EGYPT.—Habitable and cultivable Egypt consists practically of the broad fan-shaped Delta opening on to the Mediterranean, and the narrow valley of the Nile bordered by deserts as far as the First Cataract (beyond which is Nubia, i.e. Ethiopia), with a few oases westward of the valley. Amongst the latter may be counted the Fayyum, which, however, is separated from the river only by a narrow ridge, and is connected therewith by a canal or natural channel conveying the waters of the river to the oasis. The Greek name Agyptos may perhaps be connected with Hakeptah, a name in vogue during the New Kingdom for Memphis, the northern capital. Egypt was divided anciently into Upper and Lower, the latter comprising the Delta and a portion of the valley reaching above Memphis, while Upper Egypt (the northern portion of which is often spoken of as Middle Egypt) terminated at the First Cataract (Aswan). Each of these main divisions was subdivided into nomes, or counties, varying to some extent at different times, 22 being a standard number for the Upper Country and 20 for the Lower. Each nome had its capital city—the god of which was important throughout the nome—and was generally governed by a nomarch. The alluvial land of Egypt is very fertile and easy to cultivate. Its fertility is independent of rainfall, that being quite insignificant except along the Mediterranean coast; it depends on the annual rise of the Nile, which commences in June and continues till October. If the rise is adequate, it secures the main crops throughout the country. In ancient times there may have been extensive groves of acacia trees on the borders of the alluvium kept moist by soakage from the Nile; but at most seasons of the year there was practically no natural pasture or other spontaneous growth except in marshy districts.

In this brief sketch it is impossible to bestow more than a glance upon the various aspects of Egyptian civilization. The ancient Egyptians were essentially not negroes, though some affirm that their skulls reveal a negro admixture. Their language shows a remote affinity with the Semitic group in structure, but very little in vocabulary; the writing for monumental and decorative purposes was in pictorial 'hieroglyphic' signs, modified for ordinary purposes into cursive 'hieratic' and in late times further to 'demotic'; the last form preserves no traces of the pictorial origins recognizable by any one but a student. The Egyptian, like the old Hebrew writing, cannot record vowels, but only the consonantal skeletons of words.*

The Egyptian artist at his best could rise to great beauty and sublimity, but the bulk of his work is dead with conventionality, and he never attained to the idea of perspective in drawing. The Egyptian engineers could accurately place the largest monoliths, without, however, learning any such mechanical contrivances as the pulley or the screw. The 'wisdom of the Egyptians' was neither far advanced nor profound, though many ideas were familiar to them that had never entered the heads of the nomads and inferior races about them. Their mathematics and astronomy were of the simplest kind; yet the Egyptian calendar was infinitely superior to all its contemporaries, and is scarcely surpassed by our own. The special importance attached by the Egyptians to the disposal and furnishing of the body after death may have been inspired by the preservative climate. From an early time the elaboration of doctrines regarding the after-life went on, involving endless contradictions. We may well admire the early connexion of religion with morality, shown especially in the 'Negative Confession' and the judgment scene of the weighing of the soul before Osiris, dating not later than the 18th Dynasty; yet in practice the Egyptian religion, so far as we can judge, was mainly a compelling of the gods by magic formulae. The priesthood was wealthy and powerful, and the people devout. The worship of animals was probably restricted to a few sacred individuals in early Egypt, but a degree of sanctity was afterwards extended to the whole of a species, and to almost every species.

* Egyptian names in this and other articles by the same writer, if not in their Grecized or Hebraized forms, are given, where possible, as they appear to have been pronounced in the time of the Deltaic Dynasties and onwards, i.e. during the last 1000 years B.C. This appears preferable to a purely conventional form, as it represents approximately the pronunciation heard by the Hebrew writers. The vowels are to be pronounced as in Italian.

1. The History of Egypt was divided by Manetho (who wrote for Ptolemy I. or II.) into 31 dynasties from Menes to Alexander. The chronology is very uncertain for the early times: most authorities in Germany place the 1st Dyn. about B.C. 3300, and the 12th Dyn. at B.C. 2000–1800. These dates, which depend largely on the interpretation of records of astronomical phenomena, may perhaps be taken as the minimum. The allowance of time (200 years) for the dark period between the 12th and the 18th Dyns. seems insufficient: some would place the 12th Dyn. at B.C. 2500–2300, or even a whole 'Sothic' period of 1460 years earlier than the minimum; and the 1st Dynasty would then be pushed back at least in equal measure. From the 18th Dyn. onwards there is close agreement.

The historic period must have been preceded by a long pre-historic age, evidenced in Upper Egypt by extensive cemeteries of graves containing fine pottery, instruments in flint exquisitely worked, and in bone and copper, and shapely vessels in hard stone. Tradition points to separate kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt towards the close of this period. Menes, the founder of the 1st Dyn., united the two lands. He came probably from This, near Abydos, where royal tombs of the first three Dyns. have been found; but he built Memphis as his capital near the dividing line between the two halves of his kingdom. The earliest pyramid dates from the end of the 3rd dynasty. The stupendous Pyramids at Gizeh are of Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus of the 4th Dyn., from which time we have also very beautiful statues in wood, limestone, and diorite. In the 5th Dyn. the relief sculpture on tombs reached its highest excellence. The 6th Dyn. is notable for long inscriptions, both religious texts in the pyramids and biographical inscriptions in the lesser tombs. The first eight Dyns., of which the 7th and 8th are utterly obscure, constitute the Old Kingdom. After the first two Dyns., best represented at Abydos, its monuments are concentrated at Memphis, but important records of the 6th Dyn. are widely spread as far south as the First Cataract, parallel with the growing power and culture of the nomarchs. Expeditions were made even under the 1st Dyn. to the copper and turquoise mines in the peninsula of Sinai, and cedar wood was probably then already obtained from Lebanon by sea. Under the 6th Dyn. Nubia furnished troops to the Egyptian armies from the distant south as far perhaps as Khartum. But at the end of it there was a collapse, probably through insufficient control of the local princes of that time by the nomarch.

In the next period, the Middle Kingdom (Dyns. 9–17), we see the rise of Thebes; but the 9th and 10th Dyns. were from Heracleopolis, partly contemporary with the 11th Dyn., which eventually suppressed the rival house. The monuments of the 11th Dyn. are almost confined to the neighbourhood of Thebes. Under the Amenemhês and Senwosiris of the 12th Dyn., Egypt was as great as it was in the 4th Dyn., but its power was not concentrated as then. The break-up of the old Kingdom had given an opportunity to a number of powerful families to grow up and establish themselves in local principedoms: the family that triumphed over the rest by arms or diplomacy could control but could not ignore them, and feudalism was the result, each great prince having a court and an army resembling those of the king, but on a smaller scale. The most notable achievement of these Dyns. was the regulation of the lake of Mœris by Amenemhê III., with much other important work for irrigation and improvement of agriculture. Literature also flourished at this period. The traditional exploits of the world-conqueror Sesostris seem to have been developed in late times out of the petty expeditions of Senwosir III. into Nubia, Libya, and Palestine. The 13th and 14th Dyns. are represented by a crowd of 150 royal names: they are very obscure, and some scholars would make them contemporary with each other and with the following. The 15th and 16th Dyns. were of the little-known Hyksos or 'Shepherd kings,' apparently invaders from the East, who for a time ruled all Egypt (c. B.C. 1650). Excepting scarabs engraved with the names of the kings, monuments of the Hyksos are extremely rare. Their names betray a Semitic language: they were probably barbarian, but in the end took on the culture of Egypt, and it is a strange fact that inscribed relics of one of them, Khyan, have been found in places as far apart as at Cnossus in Crete and Baghdad; no other Egyptian king, not even Thetmosi III., has quite so wide a range as that mysterious Hyksos. The foreign rulers are said to have oppressed the natives and to have forbidden the worship of the Egyptian deities. The princes of Thebes, becoming more or less independent, formed the 17th Dyn., and succeeded in ousting the hated Hyksos, now probably diminished in numbers and weakened by luxury, from Upper Egypt. The first king of the 18th Dyn., Ahmosi, drove them across the N.E. frontier and pursued them into Palestine (c. B.C. 1580).

The 18th Dyn. ushers in the most glorious period in Egyptian history, the New Kingdom, or, as it has been called on account of its far-reaching sway, the Empire, lasting to the end of the 20th Dynasty. The prolonged effort to cast out the Hyksos had welded together a nation in arms under the leadership of the Theban kings, leaving no trace of the old feudalism: the hatred of the oppressor pursued the 'pest' far into Syria in successive campaigns, until Thetmosi I., the second successor of Ahmosi, reached the Euphrates. Thetmosi II. and a queen, Hatshepsut (c. 1500), ruled for a time with less vigorous hands, and the latter cultivated only the arts of peace. Meanwhile the princes of Syria strengthened themselves and united to offer a formidable opposition to Thetmosi III. when he endeavoured to recover the lost ground. This Pharaoh, however, was a great strategist, as well as a valiant soldier: as the result of many annual campaigns, he not only placed his tablet on the bank of the Euphrates, by the side of that of Thetmosi I., but also consolidated the rule of Egypt over the whole of Syria and Phœnicia. The wealth of the conquered countries poured into Egypt, and the temple of the Theban Ammon, the god under whose banner the armies of the Pharaohs of two dynasties had won their victories, was ever growing in wealth of slaves, lands, and spoil. Amenhotp III. enjoyed the fruits of his predecessors' conquests, and was a mighty builder. His are the colossi at Thebes named Memnon by the Greeks. The empire had then reached its zenith. Under Amenhotp IV. (c. 1370), in some ways the most striking figure in Egyptian history [the latest discoveries tend to show that the king was not more than 14 years old when the great innovation took place. He may thus have been rather a tool in the hands of a reformer], it rapidly declined: the Hittites were pressing into Syria from the north, and all the while the Pharaoh was a dreamer absorbed in establishing a monotheistic worship of Aton (the sun) against the polytheism of Egypt, and more especially against the Theban and national worship of Ammon. He changed his own name to Akhenaton, built a new capital, the 'Horizon of Aton,' in place of Thebes, and erased the name and figure of Ammon wherever they were seen. Art, too, found in him a lavish patron, and struck out new types, often bizarre rather than beautiful. But for the empire Pharaoh had no thought or leisure. The cuneiform letters found in the ruins of his new-fangled capital at el-Amarna show us his distracted agents and vassals in Syria appealing to him in vain for support against the intrigues and onslaughts of rebels and invaders. His father Amenhotp III. had carried on an active correspondence with the distant kings of Babylonia, Assyria, and Mitanni in Mesopotamia; but after a few years Akhenaton must have lost all influence with them. Shortly after Akhenaton's death the new order of things, for which he had striven so long and sacrificed so much, was abolished, its triumph having lasted for but 10 or 15 years. Ammon worship was then restored, and retaliated on the name and figure of the heretic king and of his god.

Although the 18th Dyn. was so powerful and active, and had built temples in Nubia as well as in Syria, the Delta was neglected. Only on the road to Asia, at Heliopolis and Bubastis, have relics been found of these kings. Until Akhenaton's heresy, their religious zeal was devoted to honouring Ammon. The 19th Dyn., on the other hand, was as active in the Delta as in other parts of Egypt, and although Ammon remained the principal god of the State, Ptah of Memphis and Rê the sun-god of Heliopolis were given places of honour at his side. There is a famous series of reliefs at Karnak of the Syrian war of Seti I. (c. 1300); but his son Ramesses II. (c. 1290-1220) was the greatest figure in the Dynasty: he was not indeed able to drive back the Hittites, but he fought so valorously in Syria that they could make no advance southward. They were compelled to make a treaty with Pharaoh and leave him master of Syria as far as Kadesh on the Orontes. Ramesses II. was the greatest builder of all the Pharaohs, covering the land with temples and monuments of stone, the inscriptions and scenes upon them in many cases extolling his exploit against the Hittites at the battle of Kadesh, when his personal prowess saved the Egyptian camp and army from overwhelming disaster. Towards the end of his long reign of 67 years disorders multiplied, and his son and successor Mineptah had to face encroachments of the Libyans on his own soil and revolt in his frontier possessions in Palestine. Mineptah, too, was old, but by the fifth year of his reign he was able to boast of peace and security restored to his country. The 19th Dyn. ended, however, in utter confusion, a Syrian finally usurping the throne. In the 20th Dyn. the assaults on Egypt were renewed with greater violence than ever by Libyans from the west and by sea-rovers from the islands and coasts of the eastern Mediterranean. But Setnekht and his son and successor Ramesses III. (c. 1200-1165) were equal to the occasion. The latter was victorious everywhere, on sea and on land, and a great incursion from the north, after maiming the Hittite power, was hurled back by the Egyptian king, who then established his rule in Syria and Phœnicia over a wider area than his celebrated namesake had controlled. Ramesses III. was followed by sons and others of his own name down to Ramesses XII., but all within glorious reigns. Under them the empire flickered out, from sheer feebleness and internal decay.

Egypt now (c. 1100) enters upon a new period of history, that of the Deltaic Dynasties. Thebes was no longer the metropolis. The growth of commerce in the Levant transferred the centre of gravity northward. After the fall of the New Kingdom, all the native dynasties originated in various cities of Lower, with perhaps Middle, Egypt. The later Ramessides had depended for their fighting men on Libyan mercenaries, and the tendency of the Libyans to settle on the rich lands of Egypt was thus hastened and encouraged. The military chiefs established their families in the larger towns, and speedily became wealthy as well as powerful; it was from such families of Libyan origin that the later 'native' dynasties arose. Dyn. 21 was from Tanis (Zoan); parallel with and apparently subject to it was a dynasty of priest-kings at Thebes. The pitiful report of a certain Unamun, sent from Thebes to obtain wood from Lebanon, shows how completely Egypt's influence in Syria and the Levant had passed away at the beginning of this dynasty. The 22nd Dyn. (c. 950-750) arose in Bubastis, or perhaps at Heracleopolis in Middle Egypt. Its founder, Sheshonk I., the Biblical Shishak, was energetic and overran Palestine, but his successors quickly degenerated. The 23rd Dyn., said to be Tanite, was perhaps also Bubastite. There were now again all the elements of feudalism in the country except the central control, and Egypt thus lay an easy prey to a resolute invader. We find at the end of the 23rd Egyptian Dyn. Pankhi, king of Ethiopia, already in full possession of the Thebaid (c. 730). Tefnakht, prince of Sais, was then endeavouring to establish his sway over the other petty princes of the Delta and Middle Egypt. Pankhi accepted the implied challenge, overthrew Tefnakht, and compelled him to do homage. Tefnakht's son Bocchoris alone forms the 24th Dynasty. He was swept away by another invasion led by Shabako (c. 715), who heads the Ethiopian or 25th Dynasty. Shabako was followed by his son Shabitu and by Taharak. The kings of this dynasty, uniting the forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, endeavoured to extend their influence over Syria in opposition to the Assyrians. Taharak (Tirhakah) was particularly active in this endeavour, but as soon as Esarhaddon was free to invade Egypt the Assyrian king had no difficulty in taking Memphis, capturing most of the royal family, and driving Taharak southward (c. 670). The native princes were no doubt hostile at heart to the Ethiopian domination: on his departure, Esarhaddon left these, to the number of 20, with Assyrian garrisons, in charge of different parts of the country; an Assyrian governor, however, was appointed to Pelusium, which was the key of Egypt. None the less the Ethiopian returned as soon as the Assyrian host had withdrawn, and annihilated the army of occupation. Esarhaddon thereupon prepared a second expedition, but died on the way. Ashurbanipal succeeding, reinstated the governors, and his army reached Thebes. On his withdrawal there was trouble again. The Assyrian governor of Pelusium was accused of treachery with Niku (Neko), prince of Sais and Memphis, and Pekrur of Pisapt (Goshen), and their correspondence with Taharak was intercepted. They were all brought in chains to Nineveh, but Niku was sent back to Egypt with honour, and his son was appointed governor of Athribis. Soon after this failure Taharak died: his nephew Tandamane recovered Memphis, but was speedily expelled by Ashurbanipal, who advanced up the river to Thebes and plundered it.

Meanwhile the family of Neko at Sais was securing its position in the Delta, taking advantage of the protection afforded by the Assyrians and the weakening of the Ethiopian power. Neko himself was killed, perhaps by Tandamane, but his son Psammetichus took his place, founding the 26th Dynasty. Counting his reign from the death of Taharak (c. 664), Psammetichus soon ruled both Upper and Lower Egypt, while in the absence of fresh expeditions all trace of the brief Assyrian domination disappeared. The 26th Dyn. marks a great revival: Egypt quickly regained its prosperity after the terrible ravages of civil wars and Ethiopian and Assyrian invasions. Psammetichus I., in his long reign of 54 years, re-organized the country, safeguarded it against attack from Ethiopia, and carried his arms into S.W. Palestine. His son Neko, profiting by the long weakness of Assyria, swept through Syria as far as Carchemish on the Euphrates, and put the land to tribute, until the Babylonian army commanded by Nebuchadrezzar hurled him back (b.c. 605). His successors, Psammetichus II. and Apries (Hophra), attempted to regain influence in Syria, but without success. Apries with his Greek mercenaries became unpopular with the native soldiery, and he was dethroned by Amasis (Amasis). This king, although he made alliances with Croesus of Lydia, Polycrates of Samos, and Battus of Cyrene during a reign of 46 years, devoted himself to promoting the internal prosperity of Egypt. It was a golden age while it lasted, but it did not prevent the new Persian masters of the East from preparing to add Egypt to their dominions. Cyrus lacked opportunity, but Cambyzes easily accomplished the conquest of Egypt in B.C. 527, six months after the death of Amasis.

The Persian Dynasty is counted as the 27th. The memory of its founder was hateful to the Egyptians and the Greeks alike; probably the stories of his mad cruelty, though exaggerated, have a solid basis. Darius, on the other hand (521-486), was a good and considerate ruler, under whom Egypt prospered again; yet after the battle of Marathon it revolted. Xerxes, who quelled the revolt, and Artaxerxes were both detested. Inaros the Libyan headed another rebellion, which was backed by an Athenian army and fleet; but after some brilliant successes his attempt was crushed. It was not till about B.C. 405 that Egypt revolted successfully; thereafter, in spite of several attempts to bring it again under the Persian yoke, it continued independent for some 60 years, through Dyns. 28-30. At length, in 345, Ochus reconquered the province, and it remained subject to Persia until Alexander the Great entered it almost without bloodshed in 332 after the battle of Issus.

Throughout the Hellenistic (Ptolemaic and Roman) period the capital of Egypt was Alexandria, the intellectual head of the world. Under the Ptolemys, Egypt on the whole prospered for two centuries, though often torn by war and dissension. [In the reign of Philometor (c. B.C. 170) a temple was built by the high-priest Onias for the Jews in Egypt after the model of the Temple at Jerusalem (Josephus, BJ vii. x. 3). The ruins have been recognized by Flinders Petrie at Tell el-Yahudieh.] From B.C. 70 there is a conspicuous absence of native documents, until Augustus in B.C. 30 inaugurated the Roman rule. Egypt gradually recovered under its new masters, and in the second cent. of their rule was exceedingly prosperous as a rich and well-managed cornfield for the free supply of Rome.

2. Egypt in the Bible is Egypt under the Deltaic Dynasties, or, at earliest, of the New Kingdom. This applies not only to the professedly late references in 1 and 2 Kings, but also throughout. Abraham and Joseph may belong chronologically to the Middle Kingdom, but the Egyptian names in the story of Joseph are such as were prevalent only in the time of the Deltaic Dynasties. There were wide differences in manners and customs and in the condition of the country and people at different periods of the history of Egypt. In the Biblical accounts, unfortunately, there are not many criteria for a close fixing of the dates of composition. It may be remarked that there were settlements of Jews in Pathros (Upper Egypt) as early as the days of Jeremiah, and papyri indicate the existence of an important Jewish colony at Syene and Elephantine, on the S. border of Egypt, at an equally early date. The OT writers naturally show themselves much better acquainted with the eastern Delta, and especially the towns on the road to Memphis, than with any other part of Egypt. For instance, Sais, the royal city of the 26th Dyn. on the W. side of the Delta, is not once mentioned, and the situation of Thebes (No-Amon) is quite misunderstood by Nahum. Of localities in Upper Egypt only Syene and Thebes (No) are mentioned; in Middle Egypt, Hanes; while on the eastern border and the route to Memphis (Noph) are Shihor, Shur, Sin, Migdol, Tahpanhes, Pi-beseth, On; and by the southern route, Goshen, Pithom, Succoth, Rameses, besides lesser places in the Exodus. Zoan was not on the border routes, but was itself an important centre in the East of the Delta, as being a royal city. There are but few instances in which the borrowing of Egyptian customs or even words by the Hebrews can be traced; but the latter were none the less well acquainted with Egyptian ways. The Egyptian mourning of 70 days for Jacob is characteristic (Gn 50³), so also may be the baker's habit of carrying on the head (40^{16, 17}). The assertion that to eat bread with the Hebrews was an abomination to the Egyptians (43²⁶) has not yet been satisfactorily explained. The Hebrews, no doubt, like the Greeks in Herodotus, slew and ate animals, e.g. the sheep and the cow, which Egyptians in the later days were forbidden to slay by their religious scruples. Circumcision was frequent in Egypt, but how far it was a general custom (cf. Jos 5⁴) is not clear. Prophecies of a Messianic type were current in Egypt, and one can be traced back to about the time of the Hyksos domination. It has been suggested that in this and in the custom of circumcision are to be seen the most notable influences of Egypt on the people of Israel.

3. Religion.—The piety of the Egyptians was the characteristic that struck the Greeks most forcibly, and their stupendous monuments and the bulk of the literature that has come down to us are either religious or funerary. An historical examination of all the phenomena would show that piety was inherent in the nature of the people, and that their religious observances grew and multiplied with the ages, until the Moslem conquest. The attempt will now be made to sketch some outlines of the Egyptian religion and its practices, as they appear especially in the last millennium B.C. The piety of the Egyptians then manifested itself especially in the extraordinary care bestowed on the dead, and also in the number of objects, whether living or inanimate, that were looked upon as divine.

The priests (Egyp. 'the pure ones' or 'the divine fathers') were a special class with semi-hereditary privileges and duties. Many of them were pluralists. They received stipends in kind from the temples to which they were attached, and in each temple were divided into four phyla or tribes, which served in succession for a lunar month at a time. The chief offices were filled by select priests entitled prophets by the Greeks (Egyp. 'servants of the god'; Potiphara (Gn 41⁴⁵) was prophet [of Rē] in On), of which there was theoretically one for each god in a temple. Below the priests in the temple were the pastophori (Egyp. 'openers,' i.e. of shrines), and of the same rank as these were the choachytes (Egyp. 'water-pourers') in the necropolis. These two ranks probably made offerings of incense and libations before the figure of the god or of the deceased. The priestly class were very attentive to cleanliness, wearing white linen raiment, shaving their heads, and washing frequently. They abstained especially from fish and beans, and were probably all circumcised. The revenues of the temples came from endowments of land, from offerings and from fees. The daily ritual of offering to the deity was strictly regulated, formulae with magic power being addressed to the shrine, its door, its lock, etc., as it was being opened, as well as to the deity within: hymns were sung and sistrums rattled, animals slaughtered, and the altar piled with offerings. On festival occasions the god would be carried about in procession, sometimes to visit a neighbouring deity. Burnt-offerings, beyond the burning of incense, were unknown in early times, but probably became usual after the New Kingdom. Offerings of all kinds were the perquisite of the priests when the god (image or animal) had had his enjoyment of them. Oracles were given in the temples, not by an inspired priest, but by nods or other signs made by the god; sometimes, for instance, the decision of a god was sought in a legal matter by laying before him a papyrus in which the case was stated. In other cases the enquirer slept in the temple, and the revelation came in a dream. The oracles of the Theban Ammon and (later) of Buto were political forces: that of Ammon in the Oasis of Siwa played a part in Greek history. The most striking hymns date from the New Kingdom, and are addressed especially to the solar form of Ammon (or to the Aton during Akhenaton's heresy); the fervour of the worshipper renders them henotheistic, pantheistic, or even theistic in tone. Prayers also occur; but the tendency was overwhelmingly greater to magic, compelling the action of the gods, or in other ways producing the desired effect. Preservative amulets, over which the formulæ had been spoken or on which such were engraved, abound on the mummies of the later dynasties, and no doubt were worn by living persons. The endless texts inscribed in the pyramids of the end of the Old Kingdom, on coffins of the Middle Kingdom, and in the Book of the Dead, are almost wholly magical formulæ for the preservation of the material mummy, for the divinization of the deceased, for taking him safely through the perils of the under world, and giving him all that he would wish to enjoy in the future life. A papyrus is known of spells for the use of a mother nursing her child; spells accompanied the employment of drugs in medicine; and to injure an enemy images were made in wax and transformed by spells into persecuting demons.

Egyptian theology was very complex and self-contradictory; so also were its views about the life after death. These were the result of the amalgamation of doctrines originally belonging to different localities; the priests and people were always willing to accept or absorb new ideas without displacing the old, and to develop the old ones by imagination in different directions. No one attempted to reach a uniform system, or, if any had done so, none would abide long by any system. Death evidently separated the elements of which the living man was composed; the corpse might be rejoined from time to time by the hawk-winged soul, while at other times the latter would be in the heavens associating with gods. To the ka (life or activity or genius) offerings were made at the tomb; we hear also of the 'shade' and 'power.' The dead man was judged before Osiris, the king of the dead, and if condemned, was devoured by a demon, but if justified, fields of more than earthly fruitfulness were awarded to him in the under world; or he was received into the bark of the sun to traverse the heavens gloriously; or, according to another view, he passed a gloomy and feeble existence in the shadows of the under world, cheered only for an hour as the sun travelled nightly between two of the hour-gates of the infernal regions. No hint of the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, attributed by Herodotus to the Egyptians, has yet been found in their writings; but spells were given to the dead man by which he could voluntarily assume the form of a lotus, of an ibis or a heron or a serpent, or of the god Ptah, or 'anything that he wished.' Supplies for the dead were deposited with him in the grave, or secured to him by magic formulæ; offerings might be brought by his family on appropriate occasions, or might be made more permanent by endowment; but such would not be kept up for many generations.

As to the deities, the king was entitled the 'good god,' was a mediator between god and man as the religious head of the State and chief of the priesthood, and his image might be treated as divine even during his lifetime. A dead man duly buried was divine and identified with Osiris, but in few cases did men preserving their personality become acknowledged gods; such was the case, however, conspicuously with two great scribes and learned men—Imhotep, architect of king Zoser of the 3rd dynasty, and Amenhotp, son of Hap, of the time of Amenhotp III. (18th dynasty), who eventually became divine patrons of science and writing; the former was considered to be a son of Ptah, the god of Memphis, and was the equivalent of Asklepios as god of healing. Persons drowned or devoured by crocodiles were accounted specially divine, and Osiris from certain incidents in his myth was sometimes named 'the Drowned.' The divinities proper were (1) gods of portions of the universe: the sun-god Rē was the most important of these; others were the earth-god Geb, the sky-god Shooou, and the goddess Nut, with stellar deities, etc. (2) Gods of particular qualities or functions: as Thoth the god of wisdom, Mei goddess of justice and truth, Mont the god of war, Ptah the artificer god. (3) Gods of particular localities: these included many of classes (1) and (2). Some of them had a wide vogue from political, mythological, or other reasons: thus, through the rise of Thebes, Ammon, its local god, became the King of the Gods, and the god of the whole State in the New Empire; and Osiris, god of Busiris in the Delta, became the universal King of the Dead, probably because his myth, shown in Passion Plays at festivals, made a strong appeal to humanity. Around the principal god of a temple were grouped a number of other deities, subordinate to him there and forming his court, although they might severally be his superiors in other localities; nine was the typical number in the divine court, and thus the co-temple deities were called the Ennead of the principal god, though the number varied considerably. Each principal god or goddess, too, had a consort and their child, forming a triad; these triads had been gradually developed by analogy from one group to another, as from that of Osiris, Isis, and Horus described below.

Some of the deities were of human form, as Ptah, Osiris, Etom, Muth, Neith, besides those which were of human origin. Bes, the god of joy and of children, was a grotesque dwarf dancer. Others were in the form of animals or animal-headed—canine, as Anubis and Ophois; feline, as Mihos (Miusis) and the goddesses Sakhmis and Bubastis. Thoth was ibis-headed; Horus, Rē, and Mont had the heads of falcons. Besides the sacred animal whose head is seen in the representations of the god, there were others which did not affect his normal form, although they were considered as incarnations of him. Thus the bull Apis was sacred to Ptah, Mnevis to Etom, Bacis to Mont; and in addition to the ibis, the ape was, in a more complete sense than these, an embodiment of Thoth. In the late ages most mammals, birds, reptiles, fishes, and several insects were looked upon as sacred,—some only in particular localities, others universally, such as the cow sacred to Hathor, Isis, etc., and the cat sacred to Bubastis; after death, the sacred animals were mummified, fully or in part, separately or in batches, according to their size and sanctity.

Rē, the sun-god, was the ruler of heaven and the archetype of the living king; other ruling gods, such as Ammon, Suchos the crocodile-god, Mont the war-god, were identified with Rē, whose name was then generally added to theirs. The popular Osiris legend was the supreme factor in the Egyptian religion, however, from the 26th Dynasty and onwards. Osiris was the beneficent king of Egypt, slain and cut in pieces by his wicked brother Seth, sought for by his sister-wife Isis, and restored by her magic to life; Isis bore him Horus, who avenged his father by overcoming Seth. The dead Osiris was an emblem of the dead king and of the sun in the night, Horus of the succeeding or reigning king and of the next day's sun; thus the tragedy and the triumph were ever renewed. Not only dead kings, but also all the blessed dead, were assimilated to Osiris, and triumphed through Horus and his helpers. With the Osiris legend are connected the best features in the Book of the Dead, the remarkable judgment scene, and the negative confession, implying that felicity after death depended on a meritorious life. Seth, once god of several localities and a type of power, as an element of the myth, was the type of darkness and wickedness; and in late times he, together with his animals the ass and the hippopotamus, and Suchos the crocodile-god, were execrated, and his worship hardly tolerated even in his own cities. Ptah the god of Memphis had an uninteresting personality; the inhabitants of that populous capital reserved their emotions for the occasions when Apis died and a new Apis was found, assimilating the former to Osiris and probably the latter to Horus. The dead Apis, which was buried with such pomp and expenditure, was called the Osiris Apis—Ostrapis or Serapis. With some modification, this Serapis, well known and popular amongst natives and foreign settlers alike, was chosen by Ptolemy Soter to be the presiding deity of his kingdom, for the Egyptians, and more especially for the Greeks at Alexandria. He was worshipped as a form of Osiris, an infernal Zeus, associated with Isis. His acceptance by the Greek world, and still more enthusiastically by the Romans and the western half of the Roman world, spread the Osiris Passion—otherwise the Isiac mysteries—far and wide. This Isiac worship possessed many features in common with Christianity: on the one hand, it prepared the world for the latter, and influenced its symbols; while, on the other, it proved perhaps the most powerful and stubborn adversary of the Christian dogma in its contest with paganism. EGYPT, RIVER (RV 'brook,' better 'wady') OF.—The S.W. boundary of Palestine (Nu 34^s, Is 27¹² etc.; cf. 'river (nahar) of Egypt,' Gn 15¹⁸, and simply 'the wady,' Ezk 47¹⁹ 48²⁸). It is the Wady el-Arish, still the boundary of Egypt, in the desert half-way between Pe usum and Gaza. Water is always to be found by digging in the bed of the wady, and after heavy rain the latter is filled with a rushing stream. El-Arish, where the wady reaches the Mediterranean, was an Egyptian frontier post to which malefactors were banished after having their noses cut off; hence its Greek name Rhinocorura. See also SHIHOR, SHUR. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

EGYPTIAN, THE.—An unnamed leader of the 'Assassins' or 'Sicaris' for whom Claudius Lysias took St. Paul (Ac 21³⁸). This man is also mentioned by Josephus as a leader defeated by Felix, but not as connected with the 'Assassins' (Ant. xx. viii. 6). The Egyptian escaped, and Lysias thought that he had secured him in St. Paul's person. The discrepancies between Josephus and St. Luke here make mutual borrowing improbable. See THEUDAS. A. J. MACLEAN.

EGYPTIAN VERSIONS.—See TEXT OF NT, §§ 27-29.

EHI.—See AHIRAM.

EHUD.—1. The deliverer of Israel from Eglon, king of Moab (Jg 3¹²⁻³⁰). The story of how Ehud slew Eglon bears upon it the stamp of genuineness; according to it, Ehud was the bearer of a present from the children of Israel to their conqueror, the king of Moab. On being left alone with the king, Ehud plunges his sword into the body of Eglon, and makes good his escape into the hill-country of Ephraim. Israel is thus delivered from the Moabite supremacy. 2. Son of Bilhan, a Benjamite (1 Ch 7¹⁹, cf. 8⁹). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

EKER.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 27²).

EKREBEL (Jth 7¹⁸).—Apparently the town of 'Akrahel, E. of Shechem, the capital of Akrabattine.

EKRON.—A city in the Philistine Pentapolis, not conquered by Joshua (Jos 13^s), but theoretically a border city of Judah (15¹⁴) and Dan (19⁴⁹); said, in a passage which is probably an interpolation, to have been smitten by Judah (Jg 1¹⁸). Hither the captured ark was brought from Ashdod (1 S 5¹⁰), and on its restoration the Philistine lords who had followed it to Beth-shemesh returned to Ekron (1 S 6¹⁸). Ekron was the border town of a territory that passed in the days of Samuel from the Philistines to Israel (1 S 7¹⁴), and 'it was the limit of the pursuit of the Philistines after the slaying of Goliath by David (17⁵²). Its local numen was Baal-zebub, whose oracle Ahaziah consulted after his accident (2 K 1²). Like the other Philistine cities, it is made the subject of denunciation by Jeremiah, Amos, Zephaniah, and the anonymous prophet whose writing occupies Zec 9-11. This city is commonly identified with 'Akir, a village on the Philistine plain between Gezer and the sea, where there is now a Jewish colony. For the identification there is no basis, except the coincidence of name; there are no remains of antiquity whatever at 'Akir. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

EL.—See GOD.

ELA.—1. 1 Es 9²⁷—Elam, Ezr 10²⁸. 2. 1 K 4¹ father of Solomon's commissariat officer in Benjamin.

ELAH.—1. A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36¹, 1 Ch 1²⁸). 2. Son of Baasha, king of Israel. He had nominal possession of the throne two years or fractions of years (1 K 16⁸⁻¹⁴). He gave himself to drunken dissipation, until Zimri, one of his generals, revolted and killed him. The usual extirpation of the defeated dynasty followed. 3. Father of Hoshea (2 K 15³⁰ 17¹ 18¹). 4. Second son of Caleb (1 Ch 4¹⁵). 5. A Benjamite (1 Ch 9⁸).

H. P. SMITH.

ELAH ('terebinth').—A valley in the Shephêla; the scene of the battle between David and Goliath. (1 S 17. 21⁹). It is most likely the modern Wady es-Sunt, which, rising in the mountains about Jeba, about 11 miles due S.W. of Jerusalem, runs westward, under various names, till it opens on the Maritime Plain at Tell es-Safi. In the middle of the valley is a watercourse which runs in winter only; the bottom is full of small stones such as David might have selected for his sling. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ELAM.—1. A son of Shem (Gn 10²² = 1 Ch 1¹⁷), the eponymous ancestor of the Elamites (see following article). 2. A Korahite (1 Ch 26³). 3. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²⁴). 4. The eponym of a family of which 1254 returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁷, Neh 7¹², 1 Es 5¹²) and 71 with Ezra (Ezr 8⁷, 1 Es 8²³). It was one of the Benê-Elam that urged Ezra to take action against mixed marriages (Ezr 10²), and six of the same family are reported to have put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁰). Elam acc. to Neh 10⁴ 'sealed the covenant.' 5. In the parallel lists Ezr 2²⁴, Neh 7²⁴ 'the other Elam' has also 1254 descendants who return with Zerubbabel. 6. A priest who took part in the dedication of the walls (Neh 12⁴⁷).

ELAM.—An important country of Western Asia, called Elamtu by the Babylonians and Elymais by the Greeks (also Susiana, from Shushan or Susa the capital). It corresponds nearly to the modern Chuzistan, lying to the east of the lower Tigris, but including also the mountains that skirt the plain. The portion south of Susa was known as Anshan (Anzan). In Gn 10²² (1 Ch 1¹⁷) Elam is called a son of Shem, from the mistaken idea that the people were of the Semitic race. They belonged to the great family of barbarous or semi-barbarous tribes which occupied the highlands to the east and north of the Semites before the influx of the Aryans.

Historically Elam's most important place in the Bible is found in Gn 14⁸, where it is mentioned as the suzerain of Babylonia and therewith of the whole western country including Palestine. The period there alluded to was that of Elam's greatest power, a little later than B.C. 2300. For many centuries previous, Elam had upon the whole been subordinate to the ruling power of Babylonia, no matter which of the great cities west of the Tigris happened to be supreme. Not many years later, Hammurabi of Babylon (perhaps the Amraphel of Gn 14) threw off the yoke of Elam, which henceforth held an inferior place. Wars between the two countries were, however, very common, and Elam frequently had the advantage. The splendidly defensible position of the capital contributed greatly to its independence and recuperative power, and thus Susa became a repository of much valuable spoil secured from the Babylonian cities. This explains how it came about that the Code of Hammurabi, the most important single monument of Oriental antiquity, was found in the ruins of Susa. A change in relations gradually took place after Assyria began to control Babylonia and thus encroach upon Elam, which was thenceforth, as a rule, in league with the patriotic Babylonians, especially with the Chaldeans from the south-land. Interesting and tragic is the story of the combined efforts of the Chaldeans and Elamites to repel the invaders. The last scene of the drama was the capture and sack of Susa (c. B.C. 645). The conqueror Ashurbanipal (Bibl. Osnappar) completed the subjugation of Elam by deporting many of its inhabitants, among the exiles being a detachment sent to the province of Samaria (Ezr 4⁹). Shortly thereafter, when Assyria itself declined and fell, Elam was occupied by the rising Aryan tribes, the Medes from the north and the Persians from the south. Cyrus the Persian (born about B.C. 590) was the fourth hereditary prince of Anshan.

Elam has a somewhat prominent place in the prophetic writings, in which Media + Elam = Persian empire. See esp. Is 21¹⁷, Jer 49³⁴, and cf. Is 22⁶, Jer 25²², Ezk 32²⁴. Particular interest attached to the part taken by the Elamites in the overthrow of Babylonia. An effect of this participation is curiously shown in the fact that after the Exile, Elam was a fairly common name among the Jews themselves (Ezr 27²¹, Neh 7¹², 1 Ch 8³⁴ et al.). J. F. McCurdy.

ELASA (1 Mac 9⁶).—The scene of the defeat and death of Judas Maccabæus. The site may be at the ruin Il'asa, near Beth-horon.

ELASAH ('God hath made').—1. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁷). 2. The son of Shaphan, who, along with Gemariah the son of Hilkiah, carried a message from king Zedekiah to Babylon (Jer 29³).

ELATH (called also Eloth, 'the great trees').—An important Edomite town on the N.E. arm of the Red Sea, near Ezion-geber. It is mentioned as one of the places passed by the Israelites during their wanderings (Dt 2⁹). Close to it king Solomon's navy was constructed (1 K 9²⁶). Subsequently the town must have been destroyed, as we read in 2 K 14²² of its being built by Azariah. Later on it was conquered by the Edomites (so RVm). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

EL-BERITH.—See BAAL-BERITH.

EL-BETHEL.—The name which Jacob is said to have given to the scene of his vision on his way back from Paddan-aram, Gn 35⁷ (P ?).

ELDAAH.—A son of Midian (Gn 25⁴, 1 Ch 1³⁴).

ELDAD.—One of the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the government of the people. On one occasion he and another named Medad were not present with Moses and the rest of the elders at the door of the Tabernacle to hear God's message and receive His spirit. But the spirit of the Lord came upon them where they were, and they prophesied in the camp. Joshua regarded this as an irregularity, but Moses declined to interfere (Nu 11²⁶⁻²⁹).

ELDER (in OT).—The rudimentary form of government which prevailed amongst the Hebrews in primitive times grew out of family life. As the father is head of the household, so the chiefs of the principal families ruled the clan and the tribe, their authority being ill-defined, and, like that of an Arab sheik, depending on the consent of the governed. In our earliest documents the 'elders of Israel' are the men of position and influence, who represent the community in both religious and civil affairs (Ex 3¹⁶, 18, 12¹⁴, 17¹⁶, 18¹³, 19⁷, Nu 11¹⁶, Dt 5²², 27¹, 31²³); the 'elders' of Ex 24¹ are the 'nobles' of v. 11. Josephus sums up correctly when he makes Moses declare: 'Aristocracy . . . is the best constitution' (Ant. vi. viii. 17). The system existed in other Semitic races (Nu 22⁴, Jos 9¹¹, Ezk 27⁹, Ps 105²²). After the settlement in Canaan the 'elders' still possessed much weight (1 S 4³, 8¹, 15³⁰, 2 S 3¹⁷, 5¹⁷, 17¹⁴, 1 K 8¹). And now we find 'elders of the city' the governing body of the town (Ru 4², 9, 1 S 11³, 1 K 21⁸, 11, 2 K 10⁴, 5); the little town of Succoth boasted no fewer than seventy-seven (Jg 8¹⁴). Deuteronomy brings into prominence their judicial functions (Dt 16¹⁸, 19¹³, 21¹⁹, 22¹⁶, 25⁷), which were doubtless infringed upon by the position of the king as supreme judge (1 S 8²⁰, 2 S 15⁴, 1 K 3⁹, 2 K 15³, Is 11³, Am 2⁹), but could not be abolished

(1 K 20²⁷, 2 K 10¹⁸, 23¹). During the Exile the 'elders are the centre of the people's life (Jer 29¹, Ezk 8¹, 14¹, 20¹, Ezr 5¹⁰, 6⁷; cf. Sus³), and after the Return they continue active (Ezr 10⁴, 14, Ps 107²³, Pr 31²², Jl 1¹⁴, 21⁶). It is not improbable that the later Sanhedrin is a development of this institution. J. TAYLOR.

ELDER (in NT).—See BISHOP; CHURCH GOVERNMENT 6 (2).

ELEAD.—An Ephraimite (1 Ch 7²¹).

ELEADAH.—An Ephraimite (1 Ch 7²⁰).

ELEALEH (Nu 32²⁷, Is 15⁴, 16⁹, Jer 48³⁴).—A town of the Moabite plateau, conquered by Gad and Reuben, and rebuilt by the latter tribe. It is now the ruined mound of el-'Al, about a mile N. of Heshbon.

ELEASAH.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 23⁹, 40). 2. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁷, 9⁴).

ELEAZAR ('God hath helped').—1. A son of Aaron. It was natural that priestly traditions should have much to say about him. But in earlier writings his name appears only twice, both probably from E: Dt 10⁶ (his succession to the priestly office at Aaron's death), Jos 24³³ (his death and burial). In P he is the third son of Aaron by Elisheba, his brothers being Nadab, Abihu, and Ithamar (Ex 6²³, Nu 3²). With them he was consecrated priest (Ex 28¹), and was chief over the Levites (Nu 3³²). Nadab and Abihu having died (Lv 10¹), he succeeded Aaron as chief priest (Nu 20²⁵⁻²⁸). He took part in the census in Moab (Nu 26¹, 62), and afterwards played a prominent part in the history of the settlement under Joshua (Jos 14¹, 17¹, 19¹¹, 21¹). He married a daughter of Putiel, and she bore him Phinehas (Ex 6²⁵). When the Zadokite priests returned from Babylon, they traced their descent to Aaron through Eleazar, ignoring the house of Eli (1 Ch 6³⁻⁸); in some cases, however, the claim was made through Ithamar (1 Ch 24¹). 2. Son of Abinadab (1 S 7¹). 3. One of David's three heroes (2 S 23⁹, 1 Ch 11³²). 4. A Levite (1 Ch 23²¹, 24²⁸). 5. 1 Es 8⁴². 6. Eliezer, Ezr 10¹⁸. 6. A priest (Ezr 8³³, Neh 12¹², 1 Es 8⁴²). 7. 1 Es 9¹². 8. Eliezer, Ezr 10¹⁸. 8. One who took a non-Israelite wife (Ezr 10², 1 Es 9²⁶). 9. A brother of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 2⁵, 6³⁴⁻⁴⁶, 2 Mac 8²³). 10. A martyr under Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 6¹⁸⁻²¹). 11. Father of Jason (1 Mac 8¹⁷). 12. Sirach Eleazar (Sir 50²⁷). 13. An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1¹³). A. H. McNEILE.

ELECTION.—The idea of election, as expressive of God's method of accomplishing His purpose for the world in both providence and grace, though (as befits the character of the Bible as peculiarly 'the history of redemption') especially in grace, goes to the heart of Scripture teaching. The word 'election' itself occurs but a few times (Ac 9¹⁵ 'vessel of election,' Ro 9¹¹, 11⁵, 2¹³, 1 Th 1⁴, 2 P 1¹⁰); 'elect' in NT much oftener (see below); but equivalent words in OT and NT, as 'choose,' 'chosen,' 'foreknow' (in sense of 'fore-designate'), etc., considerably extend the range of usage. In the OT, as will be seen, the special object of the Divine election is Israel (e.g. Dt 4³⁷, 7⁷ etc.); but within Israel are special elections, as of the tribe of Levi, the house of Aaron, Judah, David and his house, etc.; while, in a broader sense, the idea, if not the expression, is present wherever individuals are raised up, or separated, for special service (thus of Cyrus, Is 44²⁸, 45¹⁻⁴). In the NT the term 'elect' is frequently used, both by Christ and by the Apostles, for those who are heirs of salvation (e.g. Mt 24²², 24³¹, Lk 18⁷, Ro 8³⁰, Col 3¹², 2 Ti 2¹⁰, Tit 1¹, 1 P 1¹), and the Church, as the new Israel, is described as 'an elect race' (1 P 2⁹). Jesus Himself is called, with reference to Is 42¹, God's 'chosen' or 'elect' One (Mt 12¹⁸, Lk 9³⁸ RV, 23³⁵); and mention is once made of 'elect' angels (1 Ti 5²¹). In St. Paul's Epistles the idea has great prominence (Ro 9, Eph 1⁴ etc.). It is now necessary to investigate the implications of this idea more carefully.

Election, etymologically, is the choice of one, or of some, out of many. In the usage we are investigating, election is always, and only, of God. It is the method by which, in the exercise of His holy freedom, He carries out His purpose ('the purpose of God according to election,' Ro 9¹¹). The 'call' which brings the election to light, as in the call of Abraham, Israel, believers, is in time, but the call rests on God's prior, eternal determination (Ro 8^{28, 29}). Israel was chosen of God's free love (Dt 7⁶⁻⁸); believers are declared to be blessed in Christ, 'even as he chose' them 'in him'—the One in whom is the ground of all salvation—'before the foundation of the world' (Eph 1⁴). It is strongly insisted on, therefore, that the reason of election is not anything in the object itself (Ro 9^{11, 16}); the ground of the election of believers is not in their holiness or good works, or even in fides praevisa, but solely in God's free grace and mercy (Eph 1⁴); holiness a result, not a cause). They are 'made a heritage, having been foreordained according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (Eph 1¹¹); or, as in an earlier verse, 'according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace' (v.⁵). Yet, as it is axiomatic that there is no unrighteousness with God (Ro 9¹⁴); that His loving will embraces the whole world (Jn 3¹⁶, 1 Ti 2⁴); that He can never, in even the slightest degree, act partially or capriciously (Ac 10³⁴, 2 Ti 1¹³); and that, as salvation in the case of none is compulsory, but is always in accordance with the saved person's own free choice, so none perishes but by his own fault or unbelief—it is obvious that difficult problems arise on this subject which can be solved, so far as solution is possible, only by close attention to all Scripture indications.

1. In the OT.—Valuable help is afforded, first, by observing how this idea shapes itself, and is developed, in the OT. From the first, then, we see that God's purpose advances by a method of election, but observe also that, while sovereign and free, this election is never an end in itself, but is subordinated as a means to a wider end. It is obvious also that it was only by an election—that is, by beginning with some individual or people, at some time, in some place—that such ends as God had in view in His Kingdom could be realized. Abraham, accordingly, is chosen, and God calls him, and makes His covenant with him, and with his seed; not, however, as a private, personal transaction, but that in him and in his seed all families of the earth should be blessed (Gn 12^{2, 3} etc.). Further elections narrow down this line of promise—Isaac, not Ishmael; Jacob, not Esau (cf. Ro 9⁷⁻¹³)—till Israel is grown, and prepared for the national covenant at Sinai. Israel, again, is chosen from among the families of the earth (Ex 19³⁻⁶, Dt 4³⁴, Am 3²); not, however, for its own sake, but that it may be a means of blessing to the Gentiles. This is the ideal calling of Israel which peculiarly comes out in the prophecies of the Servant of Jehovah (Is 41-49)—a calling of which the nation as a whole so fatally fell short (Is 42^{19, 20}). So far as these prophecies of the Servant point to Christ—the Elect One in the supreme sense, as both Augustine and Calvin emphasize—His mission also was one of salvation to the world.

Here, however, it will naturally be asked—Is there not, after all, a reason for these and similar elections in the greater congruity of the object with the purpose for which it was designed? If God chose Abraham, was it not because Abraham was the best fitted among existing men for such a vocation? Was Isaac not better fitted than Ishmael, and Jacob than Esau, to be the transmitters of the promise? This leads to a remark which carries us much deeper into the nature of election. We err grievously if we think of God's relation to the objects of His choice as that of a workman to a set of tools provided for him, from which he selects that most suited to his end. It is a shallow view of the Divine election which regards it as simply availing itself of happy varieties of character spontaneously presenting themselves in the course of natural development. Election goes deeper than grace—even into the sphere of nature. It presides, to use a happy phrase of Lange's, at the making of its object (Abraham, Moses, David, Paul, etc.), as well as uses it when made. The question is not simply how, a man of the gifts and qualifications of Abraham, or Moses, or Paul, being given, God should use him in the way He did, but rather how a man of this spiritual build, and these gifts and qualifications, came at that precise juncture to be there at all. The answer to that question can be found only in the Divine ordering; election working in the natural sphere prior to its being revealed in the spiritual, God does not simply find His instruments—He creates them: He has had them. In a true sense, in view, and has been preparing them from the foundation of things. Hence St. Paul's saying of himself that he was separated from his mother's womb (Gal 1¹⁵; cf. of Jeremiah, Jer 1⁵; of Cyrus, Is 45⁵ etc.).

Here comes in another consideration. Israel was the elect nation, but as a nation it miserably failed in its vocation (so sometimes with the outward Church). It would seem, then, as if, on the external side, election had failed of its result; but it did not do so really. This is the next step in the OT development—the realization of an election within the election, of a true and spiritual Israel within the natural, of individual election as distinct from national. This idea is seen shaping itself in the greater prophets in the doctrine of the 'remnant' (cf. Is 1⁹ 6¹³ 8¹³⁻¹⁵ etc.); in the idea of a godly kernel in Israel in distinction from the unbelieving mass (involved in prophecies of the Servant); and is laid hold of, and effectively used, by St. Paul in his rebutting of the supposition that the word of God had failed (Ro 9⁶ 'for they are not all Israel that are of Israel,' 11^{5, 7} etc.). This yields us the natural transition to the NT conception.

2. In the NT.—The difference in the NT standpoint in regard to election may perhaps now be thus defined. (1) Whereas the election in the OT is primarily national, and only gradually works round to the idea of an inner, spiritual election, the opposite is the case in the NT—election is there at first personal and individual, and the Church as an elect body is viewed as made up of these individual believers and all others professing faith in Christ (a distinction thus again arising between inward and outward). (2) Whereas the personal aspect of election in the OT is throughout subordinate to the idea of service, in the NT, on the other hand, stress is laid on the personal election to eternal salvation; and the aspect of election as a means to an end beyond itself falls into the background, without, however, being at all intended to be lost sight of. The believer, according to NT teaching, is called to nothing so much as to active service; he is to be a light of the world (Mt 5¹³⁻¹⁶), a worker together with God (1 Co 3⁹), a living epistle, known and read of all men (2 Co 3^{2, 3}); the light has shined in his heart that he should give it forth to others (2 Co 4⁶); he is elected to the end that he may show forth the excellencies of Him who called him (1 P 2⁹), etc. St. Paul is a 'vessel of election' to the definite end that he should bear Christ's name to the Gentiles (Ac 9¹⁵). Believers are a kind of 'first-fruits' unto God (Ro 16⁵, 1 Co 16¹⁵, Ja 1¹⁸, Rev 14⁴); there is a 'fulness' to be brought in (Ro 11²⁵).

As carrying us, perhaps, most deeply into the comprehension of the NT doctrine of election, it is lastly to be observed that, apart from the inheritance of ideas from the OT, there is an experiential basis for this doctrine, from which, in the living consciousness of faith, it can never be divorced. In general it is to be remembered how God's providence is everywhere in Scripture represented as extending over all persons and events—nothing escaping His notice, or falling outside of His counsel (not even the great crime of the Crucifixion, Ac 4²⁸)—and how uniformly everything good and gracious is ascribed to His Spirit as its author (e.g. Ac 11¹⁸, Eph 2⁸, Ph 2¹³, He 13²⁰. 21). It cannot, therefore, be that in so great a matter as a soul's regeneration (see REGENERATION), and the translating of it out of the darkness of sin into the light and blessing of Christ's Kingdom (Ac 26¹⁸, Col 1¹². 13, 1 P 2⁹. 10), the change should not be viewed as a supreme triumph of the grace of God in that soul, and should not be referred to an eternal act of God, choosing the individual, and in His love calling him in His own good time into this felicity. Thus also, in the experience of salvation, the soul, conscious of the part of God in bringing it to Himself, and hourly realizing its entire dependence on Him for everything good, will desire to regard it and will regard it; and will feel that in this thought of God's everlasting choice of it lies its true ground of security and comfort (Ro 8²⁸. 33. 38. 39). It is not the soul that has chosen God, but God that has chosen it (cf. Jn 15¹⁶), and all the comforting and assuring promises which Christ gives to those whom He describes as 'given' Him by the Father (Jn 6³⁷. 39 etc.)—as His 'sheep' (Jn 10²⁻⁵ etc.)—are humbly appropriated by it for its consolation and encouragement (cf. Jn 6³⁹ 10²⁷⁻²⁹ etc.).

On this experiential basis Calvinist and Arminian may be trusted to agree, though it leaves the speculative question still unsolved of how precisely God's grace and human freedom work together in the production of this great change. That is a question which meets us wherever God's purpose and man's free will touch, and probably will be found to embrace unsolved element till the end. Start from the Divine side, and the work of salvation is all of grace; start from the human side, there is responsibility and choice. The elect, on any showing, must always be those in whom grace is regarded as effecting its result; the will, on the other hand, must be freely won; but this winning of the will may be viewed as itself the last triumph of grace—God working in us to will and to do of His good pleasure (Ph 2¹³, He 13²⁰. 21). From this highest point of view the antinomy disappears; the believer is ready to acknowledge that it is not anything in self, not his willing and running, that has brought him into the Kingdom (Ro 9¹⁶), but only God's eternal mercy. See, further, PREDESTINATION, REGENERATION, REPHOBATE.

JAMES ORR.

ELECT LADY.—See JOHN [EPISTLES OF, II.].

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL.—Upon the 'parcel of ground' which he had bought at Shechem, Jacob built an altar and called it El-elohc-Israel, 'El, the god of Israel,' Gn 33²⁰ (E). This appears a strange name for an altar, and it is just possible that we should emend the text, so as to read with the LXX, 'he called upon the God of Israel.'

EL ELYON.—See GOD, and MOST HIGH.

ELEMENT.—A component or constituent part of a complex body. The ancient philosophers inquired after the essential constituent elements, principles, or substances of the physical universe; and many supposed them to consist of earth, air, fire, and water. As used in the NT the word always appears in the plural.

1. In 2 P 3¹⁰. 12 the physical elements of the heavens and the earth are referred to as destined to destruction at the sudden coming of the Day of the Lord, 'by reason of which the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat.' In the same sense the apocryphal Book of Wisdom (7¹⁷) employs the word, and speaks of 'the constitution of the world and the operation of the elements.' It should be observed also that the later Jewish angelology conceived these different elements and all the heavenly bodies as animated by living spirits, so that there were angels of the waters, the winds, the clouds, the hail, the frost, and the various seasons of the year. Thus we read in the NT Apocalypse of the four angels of the four winds, the angel that has power over fire, the angel of the waters, and an angel standing in the sun. And so every element and every star had its controlling spirit or angel, and this concept of the animism of nature has been widespread among the nations (see ANGEL).

2. The exact meaning of the phrase 'elements of the world' in the four texts of Gal 4³. 9 and Col 2⁸. 20 has been found difficult to determine. (a) Not a few interpreters, both ancient and modern, understand the 'elements' mentioned in these passages to refer to the physical elements possessed and presided over by angels or demons. It is argued that the context in both these Epistles favours this opinion, and the express statement that the Galatians 'were in bondage to them that by nature are no gods,' and the admonition in Colossians against 'philosophy, vain deceit, and worshipping of the angels,' show that the Apostle had in mind a current superstitious belief in cosmic spiritual beings, and a worshipping of them as princes of the powers of the air and world-rulers of darkness. Such a low and superstitious bondage might well be pronounced both 'weak and beggarly.' (b) But probably the majority of interpreters understand by these 'elements of the world' the ordinances and customs of Jewish legalism, which tied the worshipper down to the ritualism of a 'worldly sanctuary' (cf. He 9¹). Such a bondage to the letter had some adaptation to babes, who might need the discipline of signs and symbols while under the care of a tutor, but it was a weak and beggarly thing in comparison with conscious living fellowship with the Lord Christ. For the sons of God through faith in Jesus Christ are not to remain little children, or in a state of dependence nothing different from that of a bond-servant, but they receive the fulness of the Holy Spirit in their hearts, and cry 'Abba, Father.' Such are no longer 'held in bondage under the rudiments of the world,' for Christ sets them free from dependence upon rites, ordinances, vows, sacrifices, observance of times and seasons, which all belong to the elementary stages and phases of the lower religious cults of the world. It should be noticed that both these interpretations of the texts in Gal. and Col. claim support in the immediate context, and both will probably long continue to find favour among painstaking and critical expositors. But the last-mentioned interpretation seems to command widest acceptance, and to accord best with the gospel and teaching of St. Paul.

3. The word is found also with yet another meaning in He 5¹², where the persons addressed are said to need instruction in 'the rudiments of the first principles of the oracles of God.' Here the term 'rudiments,' or 'elements,' is obviously used in an ethical sense. By these 'elements of the beginning of the oracles of God' the writer means the primary and simplest truths of God's revelation of Himself in the prophets and in Christ. These are the A B C of the Christian religion.

M. S. TERRY.

ELEPH (Jos 18²⁸ only).—A town of Benjamin, probably the present village Lifta, W. of Jerusalem.

ELEPHANT.—Job 40¹⁵ AVm, but RVm correctly 'hippopotamus' (see BEHEMOTH). The use of elephants in warfare is frequently noticed in the Books of Maccabees (e.g. 1 Mac 3²⁴ 6³⁰ 8⁵ 11¹⁶, 2 Mac 11⁴ 13¹⁵). See also IVORY.

ELEUTHERUS (1 Mac 11⁷ 12³⁰).—A river which separated Syria and Phœnicia, and appears to be the mod. Nahr el-Kebîr or 'Great River,' which divides the Lebanon in two north of Tripoli.

ELHANAN ('God is gracious').—1. The son of Jair according to 1 Ch 20⁴, of Jaare-oregim according to 2 S 21¹⁵; in the former text he is represented as slaying Lahmi the brother of Goliath, in the latter as slaying Goliath himself. A comparison of the Hebrew of these two texts is instructive, because they offer one of the clearest and simplest examples of how easy it is for corruptions to creep into the OT text. It is difficult, without using Hebrew letters, to show how this is the case here; but the following points may be noticed. Oregim means 'weavers,' a word which occurs in the latter half of the verse in each case, and may easily have got displaced in the 2 Sam. passage; in both the texts the word which should be the equivalent of Jair is wrongly written; the words 'the Bethlehemite' (2 Sam.) and 'Lahmi the brother of' (1 Chr.) look almost identical when written in Hebrew. The original text, of which each of these two verses is a corruption, probably ran: 'And Elhanan the son of Jair, the Bethlehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam.' But if this is so, how are we to reconcile it with what we read of David's killing Goliath? Judging from what we know of the natural tendency there is to ascribe heroic deeds to great national warriors, realizing the very corrupt state of the Hebrew text of the Books of Samuel, and remembering the conflicting accounts given of David's first introduction to public life (see DAVID, § 1), the probability is that Elhanan slew Goliath, and that this heroic deed was in later times ascribed to David.

2. In 2 S 23²⁴ and 1 Ch 11³⁴ Elhanan the son of Dodo of Bethlehem is numbered among David's 'mighty men.' Remembering that the word Jair above is wrongly written in each case, and that it thus shows signs of corruption, it is quite possible that this Elhanan and the one just referred to are one and the same.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELI (possibly an abbreviated form of Eliel, 'God is aigh').—The predecessor of Samuel as 'judge,' and high priest in the sanctuary at Shiloh. Excepting in the final scene of his life, every time he comes before us it is in connexion with others who occupy the position of greater interest. Thus in his interviews with Hannah, in the first one it is she in whom the chief interest centres (1 S 1¹⁰); in the second it is the child Samuel (v. 24²⁵). The next time he is mentioned it is only as the father of Hophni and Phinehas, the whole passage being occupied with an account of their evil doings (2²⁶). Again, in 27²⁸, Eli is mentioned only as the listener to 'a man of God' who utters his prophecy of evil. And lastly, in his dealings with the boy Samuel the whole account (ch. 3) is really concerned with Samuel, while Eli plays quite a subsidiary part. All this seems to illustrate the personality of Eli as that of a humble-minded, good man of weak character; his lack of influence over his sons only serves to emphasize this estimate.

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.—See ELOI, ELOI, etc.

ELIAB ('God is father').—1. The representative, or 'prince,' of the tribe of Zebulun, who assisted Moses and Aaron in numbering the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 1⁴). 2. The father of Dathan and Abiram (Nu 16¹). 3. The eldest brother of David, and thought by Samuel to have been destined for kingship in Israel on account of his beauty and stature (1 S 16⁶⁻⁷). He is mentioned as being a warrior in the Israelite camp on the occasion of Goliath's challenge to and defiance of the armies of Israel; he rebukes his younger brother David for his presumption in mixing himself up with the affairs of the army; his attitude towards David, after the victory of the latter over Goliath, is not mentioned. 4. One of the musicians who were appointed by the Levites, at David's command, to accompany the procession which was formed on the occasion of bringing the ark from the house of Obbedom up to Jerusalem (1 Ch 15¹⁶). 5. One of the Gadites who joined David, during his outlaw life, in the hold in the wilderness (1 Ch 12⁹). 6. An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6²⁷; see ELIHU No. 1). 7. One of Judith's ancestors (Jth 8¹). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELIADA.—1. A son of David (2 S 5¹⁶); called Beeliada in 1 Ch 14⁷. 2. Father of Rezon, an 'adversary' of Solomon (1 K 11²³). 3. A warrior of Benjamin (2 Ch 17¹⁷).

ELIADAS (1 Es 9²⁸) = Ezr 10²⁷ Elioani.

ELIAHBA.—One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23³⁰, 1 Ch 11³²).

ELIAKIM ('God will establish').—1. The son of Hilkiah, he who was 'over the household' of king Hezekiah, and one of the three who represented the king during the interview with Sennacherib's emissaries (2 K 18¹⁸, Is 36³). In Is 22²⁰⁻²⁴ (v. 22 seems to be out of place) he is contrasted favourably with his predecessor Shebna (who is still in office), and the prophet prophesies that Eliakim shall be a 'father' in the land. 2. The name of king Josiah's son, who reigned after him; Pharaoh-necho changed his name to Jehoiakim (2 K 23³⁴). 3. In Neh 12⁴ a priest of this name is mentioned as one among those who assisted at the ceremony of the dedication of the wall. 4. The son of Abiud (Mt 1³). 5. The son of Melea (Lk 3³⁰). The last two occur in the genealogies of our Lord.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELIALI (1 Es 9³⁴).—The name either corresponds to Binnui in Ezr 10²⁸ or is unrepresented there.

ELIAM.—1. Father of Bathsheba, whose first husband was a Hittite, 1 S 11³ (= 1 Ch 3⁸, where Eliam is called Ammiel). 2. Son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, and one of David's heroes (2 S 23³⁴). It is not impossible that this Eliam is the same as the preceding.

ELIAONIAS (1 Es 8²¹).—A descendant of Phaathmoab, who returned from Babylon with Esdras. In Ezr 8¹ Eliehoenai.

ELIAS.—See ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH.—1. Son of Deuel, and prince of Gad at the first census (Nu 1¹⁴ 2¹⁴ 7⁴, 47 10²⁰ P). 2. Son of Lael, and prince of the Gershonites (Nu 3²⁴ P).

ELIASHIB.—1. The high priest who was contemporary with Nehemiah. He was son of Joiakim, grandson of Jeshua the son of Jozadak, the contemporary of Zerubbabel (Neh 12¹⁰, Ezr 3¹), and father of Joiada (Neh 12¹⁰ 13³). He assisted in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerus, during Nehemiah's governorship (Neh 3¹). He can have had no sympathy with the exclusive policy of Ezra and Nehemiah, for both he himself and members of his family allied themselves with the leading foreign opponents of Nehemiah. See JOIADA, No. 2, TOBIAH, and SANBALLAT. 2. A singer of the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁴); called in 1 Es 9³⁴ Eliasibus. 3. An Israelite of the family of Zattu (Ezr 10²⁷; in 1 Es 9³⁵ Eliasimus); and 4. another of the family of Bani (Ezr 10²⁸; called in 1 Es 9³⁴ Enasibus, who had married foreign wives. 5. A son of Eliehoenai (1 Ch 3²⁴). 6. The name of a priestly house (1 Ch 24¹³). 7. Father of Jehohanan, to whose chamber in the Temple Ezra resorted (Ezr 10⁹); possibly identical with No. 1.

ELIASIB (1 Es 9³¹).—A high priest in the time of Neh.; in Ezr 10²⁴ Eliashib.

ELIASIBUS (AV Eleasurus, 1 Es 9³⁴).—One of the 'holy singers,' who put away his strange wife. In Ezr 10²⁴ Eliashib.

ELIASIMUS, 1 Es 9³⁴ = Ezr 10²⁷ Eliashib.

ELIASIS (1 Es 9³⁴).—This name and Enasibus may be duplicate forms answering to Eliashib in Ezr 10²⁴.

ELIATHAH.—A Hemanite, whose family formed the twentieth division of the Temple service (1 Ch 25⁴, 27).

ELIDAD.—Son of Chislon, and Benjamin's representative for dividing the land, Nu 34¹ P (perh. = Eldad, one of the elders, Nu 11²⁶, E).

ELIEHOENAI.—1. A Korahite (1 Ch 26²). 2. The head of a family of exiles that returned (Ezr 8⁴); called in 1 Es 8³¹ Eliaonias.

ELIEL.—1. A Korahite (1 Ch 6³⁴), prob. = Eliab of v. 37 and Elihu of 1 S 1¹. 2. 3. 4. Mighty men in the service of David (1 Ch 11⁴, 47 12¹¹). 5. A chief of eastern Manasseh (1 Ch 5²⁴). 6. 7. Two Benjamite chiefs (1 Ch 8²⁰, 22). 8. A Levite mentioned in connexion with the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15⁹, 11). 9. A Levite in time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹³).

ELIENAI.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²⁹).

ELIEZER (cf. ELEAZAR).—1. Abraham's chief servant, a Damascene (Gn 15² AV, RVm. The construction here is difficult, but the words can hardly be rendered as a double proper name as RV, 'Dammeseek Eliezer.' Whatever the exact construction, the words, unless there is a corruption in the text, must be intended to suggest that Eliezer was in some way connected with Damascus). This same Eliezer is prob. the servant referred to in Gn. 24. 2. A son of Moses by Zipporah; so named to commemorate the deliverance of Moses from Pharaoh (Ex 18¹, 1 Ch 23¹⁶, 17). 3. The son of Becher, a Benjamite (1 Ch 7⁵). 4. The son of Zichri, captain of the tribe of Reuben in David's reign (1 Ch 27¹⁰). 5. The son of Dodavahu of Mareshah, who prophesied the destruction of the fleet of ships which Jehoshaphat built in co-operation with Ahaziah (2 Ch 20³⁷). 6. One of the 'chief men' whom Ezra sent to Caspasia to find Levites and Nethinim to join the expedition to Jerusalem (Ezr 8¹⁶). [= 1 Es 8⁴ Eleazar]. 7. 8. 9. A priest, a Levite, and a son of Harim, who had married 'strange women' (Ezr 10¹⁸). [= 1 Es 9¹⁰ Eleazar] 2. 31 [= 1 Es 9²² Elionas]. 10. One of the priests appointed to blow with the trumpets before the ark of God when David brought it from the house of Obed-edom to Jerus. (1 Ch 15²¹). 11. A Levite (1 Ch 26²⁸). 12. An ancestor of our Lord (Lk 3²⁹).

ELIHOREPH.—One of Solomon's scribes (1 K 4³).

ELIHU.—1. An ancestor of Samuel (1 S 1¹); called in 1 Ch 6³⁴ Eliel, and in 1 Ch 6³⁷ Eliab. 2. A variation in 1 Ch 27¹⁸ for Eliab, David's eldest son (1 S 16⁸). 3. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12²⁰). 4. A Korahite porter (1 Ch 26⁷). 5. See JOB [BOOK OF]. 6. An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8¹).

ELIJAH.—1. Elijah, the weirdest figure among the prophets of Israel, steps across the threshold of history when Ahab is on the throne (c. B.C. 876-854), and is last seen in the reign of Ahaziah (854-853), although a posthumous activity is attributed to him in 2 Ch 21¹⁸. A native of Thisbe in Gilead (1 K 17¹), he appears on the scene unheralded; not a single hint is given as to his birth and parentage. A rugged Bedouin in his hairy mantle (2 K 1⁸), Elijah appears as a representative of the nomadic stage of Hebrew civilization. He is a veritable incarnation of the austere morals and the purer religion of an earlier period. His name ('Jah is God') may be regarded as the motto of his life, and expresses the aim of his mission as a prophet. Ahab had brought on a religious crisis in Israel by marrying Jezebel, a daughter of the Tyrian king Ethbaal, who, prior to his assuming royal purple, had been a priest of Melkart, the Tyrian Baal, and in order to ascend the throne had stained his hand with his master's blood. True to her early training and environment, Jezebel not only persuaded her husband to build a temple to Baal in Samaria (1 K 16²³), but became a zealous propagandist, and developed into a cruel persecutor of the prophets and followers of Jehovah. The foreign deity, thus supported by the throne, threatened to crush all allegiance to Israel's national God in the hearts of the people.

Such was the situation, when Elijah suddenly appears before Ahab as the champion of Jehovah. The hearts of the apostate king and people are to be chastened by a drought (17¹). It lasts three years; according to a statement of Menander quoted by Josephus (Ant. viii. xiii. 2), in the reign of Ithobal, the Biblical Ethbaal, Phœnicia suffered from a terrible drought, which lasted one year. Providence first guides the stern prophet to the brook Cherith (Wady Kelt in the vicinity of Jericho), where the ravens supply him with food. Soon the stream becomes a bed of stones, and Elijah flees to Zarephath in the territory of Zidon. As the guest of a poor widow, he brings blessings to the household (cf. Lk 4⁸, Ja 5⁷). The barrel of meal did not waste, and the crust of oil did not fail. Like the Great Prophet of the NT, he brings gladness to the heart of a bereaved mother by restoring her son to life (1 K 17²², cf. Lk 7¹¹⁻¹⁵).

The heavens have been like brass for months upon months and vegetation has disappeared. The hearts of Ahab's subjects have been mellowed, and many are ready to return to their old allegiance. The time is ripe for action and Elijah throws down the gauntlet to Baal and his followers. Ahab and his chief steward, Obadiah, a devoted follower of the true God, are traversing the land in different directions in search of grass for the royal stables, when the latter encounters the strange figure of Jehovah's relentless champion. Obadiah, after considerable hesitation and reluctance, is persuaded by the prophet to announce him to the king (1 K 18¹⁻¹⁸). As the two meet, we have the first skirmish of the battle. 'Art thou he that troubleth Israel?' is the monarch's greeting; but the prophet's reply puts the matter in a true light: 'I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house.' At Elijah's suggestion the prophets of Baal are summoned to Carmel to a trial by fire. The priests of the Tyrian deity, termed 'prophets' because they practised the mantic art, select a bullock and lay it upon an altar without kindling the wood. From morn till noon, and from noon till dewy eve, they cry to Baal for fire, but all in vain. Elijah cuts them to the quick with his biting sarcasm: 'Cry aloud; for he is a god: either he is musing, or he is gone aside, or he is on a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth and must be awaked.' Towards evening a dismantled altar of Jehovah is repaired, and a trench is dug round it. After the sacrificial animal has been prepared, and laid upon the wood, water is poured over it, until everything about the altar is thoroughly soaked and the trench is full. At the prayer of Elijah, fire falls from heaven, devouring the wood, stone, and water as well as the victim. The people are convinced, and shout, 'Jehovah, he is God; Jehovah, he is God.' That evening, Kishon's flood, as of old (Jg 5²), is red with the blood of Jehovah's enemies. The guilt of the land has been atoned for, and the long hoped for rain arrives. Elijah, in spite of his dignified position, runs before the chariot of Ahab, indicating that he is willing to serve the king as well as lead Jehovah's people (1 K 18⁴⁻⁹). The fanatical and implacable Jezebel now threatens the life of the prophet who has dared to put her minions to death. Jehovah's successful champion loses heart, and flees to Beer-sheba on the extreme south of Judah. Leaving his servant, he plunges alone into the desert a day's journey. Now comes the reaction, so natural after an achievement like that on Carmel, and Elijah prays that he may be permitted to die. Instead of granting his request, God sends an angel who ministers to the prophet's physical needs. On the strength of that food he journeys forty days until he reaches Horeb, where he receives a new revelation of Jehovah (1 K 19¹⁻⁸). Elijah takes refuge in a cave, perhaps the same in which Moses hid (Ex 33²), and hears the voice of Jehovah, 'What doest thou here, Elijah?' The prophet replies, 'I have been very jealous for Jehovah, God of Hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away.' Then Jehovah reveals His omnipotence in a great wind, earthquake, and fire; but we read that Jehovah was not in these. Then followed a still small voice (Heb. lit. 'a sound of gentle stillness'), in which God made known His true nature and His real purpose (1 K 19⁹⁻¹⁴). After hearing his complaint, Jehovah gives His faithful servant a threefold commission: Hazael is to be anointed king of Syria, Jehu of Israel; and Elisha is to be his successor in the prophetic order. Elijah is further encouraged with information that there are still 7000 in Israel who have not bowed the knee to Baal (1 K 19¹⁸). As far as we know, only the last of these three commissions was executed by the prophet himself, who, after this sublime incident, made his headquarters in the wilderness of Damascus (v. 10); the other two were carried out either by Elisha or by members of the prophetic guilds (2 K 8⁷, 9¹).

Elijah is also the champion of that civic righteousness which Jehovah loved and enjoined on His people. Naboth owns a vineyard in the vicinity of Jermeel. In the spirit of the Israelitish law (Lv 25²³, Nu 36³) he refuses to sell his property to the king. But Jezebel is equal to the occasion; at her suggestion false witnesses are bribed to swear that Naboth has cursed God and the king. The citizens, thus deceived, stone their fellow-townsmen to death. Ahab, on his way to take possession of his ill-gotten estate, meets his old antagonist, who pronounces the judgment of God upon him: 'In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine,' is the prophet's greeting. For Ahab's sins, every male child of his house will be swept off by an awful fate (1 K 21¹⁹, 2. 24). By the ramparts of Jezreel itself, the dogs will devour the body of Jezebel (v. 23). These predictions, although delayed for a time on account of the repentance of Ahab, were all fulfilled (1 K 22³⁸, 2 K 9²⁵, 30f., 10⁷⁵).

Ahaziah is a true son of Ahab and Jezebel. Meeting with a serious accident, after his fall he sends a messenger to Ekron to inquire of Baal-zebub, the fly-god, concerning his recovery. Elijah intercepts the emissaries of the king, bidding them return to their master with this word from Jehovah: 'Is it because there is no God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? Thou shalt not come down from the bed whither thou art gone up, but shalt surely die.' Ahaziah recognizes the author of this message, and sends three captains of fifties to capture the prophet, who calls down fire from heaven on the first two. The third approaches him in a humble spirit, and at God's bidding Elijah accompanies the soldier to the palace and reiterates the message of doom (2 K 1).

Like all the great events of his life, the death of this great man of God was dramatic. Accompanied by his faithful follower Elisha, he passes from Bethel to Jericho, and from thence they cross the Jordan, after Elijah has parted the waters by striking them with his mantle. As they go on their way, buried in conversation, there suddenly appears a chariot of fire with horses of fire, which parts them asunder; and Elijah goes up by a whirlwind to heaven (cf. ELISHA).

In the history of prophecy Elijah holds a prominent position. Prophetism had two important duties to perform: (1) to extirpate the worship of heathen deities in Israel, (2) to raise the religion of Jehovah to ethical purity. To the former of these two tasks Elijah addressed himself with zeal; the latter was left to his successors in the eighth century. In his battle against Baal, he struggled for the moral rights and freedom of man, and introduced 'the categorical imperative into prophecy.' He started a movement which finally drove the Phœnician Baal from Israel's confines.

Elijah figures largely in later Scriptures; he is the harbinger of the Day of the Lord (Mal 4⁵); in the NT he is looked upon as a type of the herald of God, and the prediction of his coming in the Messianic Age is fulfilled in the advent of John the Baptist (Mt 11¹⁰). On the Mount of Transfiguration he appears as the representative of OT prophecy (Mt 17³, Mk 9⁴, Lk 9³⁰). The prophet whose 'word burned like a torch' (Sir 48¹) was a favourite with the later Jews; a host of Rabbinical legends grew up around his name. According to the Rabbis, Elijah was to precede the Messiah, to restore families to purity, to settle controversies and legal disputes, and perform seven miracles (cf. JE, s.v.; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 17¹⁰; Schoettgen, Hor. Heb. ii. 533 ff.). Origen mentions an apocryphal work, The Apocalypse of Elijah, and maintains that 1 Co 2⁹ is a quotation from it. Elijah is found also in the Koran (vi. 85, xxxvii. 123-130), and many legends concerning him are current in Arabic literature.

2. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8²⁷). 3. A priest and a layman who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²¹, 25).

JAMES A. KELSO.

ELIKA.—One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23²³).

ELIM.—One of the stations in the wanderings of the children of Israel (Ex 15²⁷, Nu 33⁹); apparently the fourth station after the passage of the Red Sea, and the first place where the Israelites met with fresh water. It was also marked by an abundant growth of palm trees (cf. Ex 15²⁷, twelve wells and seventy palms). If the traditional site of Mt. Sinai be correct, the likeliest place for Elim is the Wady Gharandel, where there is a good deal of vegetation, especially stunted palms, and a number of water-holes in the sand; but some travellers have pushed the site of Elim farther on, and placed it almost a day's journey nearer to Sinai, in the Wady Tayibeh, where there are again palm trees and a scanty supply of brackish water.

ELIMELECH.—The husband of Naomi and father of Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Bethlehem-Judah (cf. 1 S 17¹²). He is spoken of as if he were the head of a clan in the tribe of Judah (cf. Ru 2¹, 4). This would be the Hezronites (1 Ch 2⁹, cf. Gn 46¹²).

ELIOENAI.—1. A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4³⁶). 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 7³). 3. A descendant of David who lived after the Exile (1 Ch 3²³, 24). 4. A son of Pashhur who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁷); called in 1 Es 9²⁸ Eliomas. 5. A son of Zattu who had committed the same offence (Ezr 10²⁷); called in 1 Es 9²⁸ Eliadas. 6. A priest (Neh 12²⁴).

ELIONAS.—1. Es 9²²=Ezr 10²² Elioenai. 2. 1 Es 9³²=Ezr 10³¹ Eli ezer.

ELIPHAL.—One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11³⁴), called in 2 S 23³³ Eliphelet.

ELIPHALAT.—1. 1 Es 8³⁹=Ezr 8¹² Eliphelet. 2. 1 Es 9³²=Ezr 10³³ Eliphelet.

ELIPHAZ.—1. Eliphaz appears in the Edomite genealogy of Gn 36 (and hence 1 Ch 18¹) as son of Esau by Adah (vv. 4, 10), and father of Amalek by his Horite concubine Timnah (vv. 12, 22). 2. See JOB [Book of].

ELIPHELEHU.—A doorkeeper (1 Ch 15¹⁸, 21).

ELIPHELET.—1. One of David's sons (2 S 5¹⁶, 1 Ch 14⁷ (AV Eliphalet), 1 Ch 3⁸, 24=Elpelet of 1 Ch 14⁵). The double occurrence of the name in Chronicles, as if David had had two sons named Eliphelet, is probably due to a scribal error. 2. One of David's mighty men (2 S 23³⁴=Eliphal of 1 Ch 11³⁴). 3. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8³⁹). 4. One of the sons of Adonikam who returned from exile (Ezr 8¹²=Eliphalat of 1 Es 8³⁹). 5. A son of Hashum who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³³=Eliphalat of 1 Es 9³²).

ELISABETH.—The wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist (Lk 1²⁶). The Hebrew form of the name is Elisheba (Ezr 6²³). Elisabeth was of a priestly family, 'the kinswoman' of Mary (Lk 1²⁶), whom she greeted as the mother of the Messiah (v. 43).

J. G. TASKER.

ELISEUS.—The AV form of Elisha (wh. see) in NT.

ELISHA.—Elisha was a native of Abel-meholah, which was situated in the Jordan valley 10 Roman miles from Scythopolis, probably on the site of the modern Ain Helweh. His father was a well-to-do farmer, and so Elisha is a representative of the newer form of Hebrew society. On his return from Horeb, Elijah cast his mantle upon the youth, as he was directing his father's servants at their ploughing. The young man at once recognized the call from God, and, after a hastily-devised farewell feast, he left the parental abode (1 K 19¹⁶, 19), and ever after he was known as the man 'who poured water on the hands of Elijah' (2 K 3¹¹). His devotion to, and his admiration for, his great master are apparent in the closing scenes of the latter's life. A double portion of Elijah's spirit (cf. the right of the firstborn to a double portion of the patrimony) is the summum bonum which he craved. In order to receive this boon he must be a witness of the translation of the mighty hero of Jehovah; and as Elijah is whirled away in the chariot of fire, his mantle falls upon his disciple, who immediately makes use of it in parting the waters of the Jordan. After Elisha has recrossed the river, he is greeted by the sons of the prophets as their leader (2 K 2¹⁵).

After this event it is impossible to reduce the incidents of Elisha's life to any chronological sequence. His ministry covered half a century (B.C. 855-798), and during this period four monarchs, Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, and Joash, sat on the throne of Israel (2 K 3¹⁰, cf. 13¹⁰). The story of Elisha was borrowed by the author of the Book of Kings from some prophetic work of the Northern Kingdom; and, without any regard for sequence in time, he has arranged his material according to subject-matter. In our canonical Book of Kings, the larger part of Elisha's activities is placed within the reign of Jehoram (2 K 3¹⁰, cf. 9¹⁰). He may have reached the zenith of his career in these twelve years, but all the recorded events of his life cannot be crowded into this short period.

His name, Elisha (= 'God is salvation'), like that of his master, tersely describes his character and expresses his mission. Elijah's was a flint-like nature, which crushed its opponents and won its victories by hard blows. Elisha is a gentler and more gracious man, and gains his ends by diplomacy. He loves the haunts of men, and resides in cities like Dothan and Samaria. His miracles are deeds of mercy, and, like that of the Prophet of Nazareth, his ministry breathes a spirit 'of gracious, soothing, holy beneficence.' We find him at the headquarters of the sons of the prophets, making his benign presence felt. He sweetens a spring of brackish water at Jericho (2 K 2¹⁹) at a time of drought; he renders a poisonous mess of pottage harmless for the members of the prophetic guild (4³⁸); he multiplies the oil for the prophet's widow, who finds herself in dire extremity (4¹). At the prophet's command, as at the bidding of a greater than Elisha, the loaves are multiplied (4¹²). His sympathy goes out in a practical way for the man who has lost his axe (6¹⁰). One of the most beautiful stories in the whole range of Scripture is that of the entertainment of Elisha in the home of the Shunammite. Her hospitality and the practical manifestation of gratitude on the part of the prophet form a charming picture. In the restoration of her son to life, Elisha performs one of his greatest miracles (4¹⁸ 8¹⁰). In his treatment of the Syrian troops which had been despatched to capture him, he anticipated the spirit of the Saviour (2 K 6¹⁰). The familiar incident of the healing of the leprosy of Naaman not only gives an idea of the influence and power of the man of God, but the story is suggestive of the profoundest spiritual truths (2 K 5¹⁻¹⁷).

The contrast between the spirit of master and disciple may be over-emphasized. Elisha could be as stern as Elijah: at Bethel he treats the mocking youth in the spirit of Sinai (2²³), and no touch of pity can be detected in the sentence that falls on Gehazi (5²⁷). The estimate of Sirach (48¹²) is according to all the facts of the OT narrative:

'Elijah it was who was wrapped in a tempest:
And Elisha was filled with his spirit:
And in all his days he was not moved by the fear of any ruler.
And no one brought him into subjection.'

This severer side of the prophet's character appears in his public rather than in his private life. In the Moabish campaign, the allied kings seek his counsel. His address to Jehoram of Israel, 'What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophets of thy father and the prophets of thy mother,' indicates that Elisha had not forgotten the past and the conflicts of his master (3¹⁰). Later, the relations between the reigning monarch and the prophet seem more cordial, for the man of God reveals the plans of the Syrians to Israel's king (6¹⁰). This change of attitude on the part of the prophet may be due to the fact that Jehoram attempted to do away with Baal worship (3²): but Elisha has not forgotten the doom pronounced upon the house of Ahab by Elijah. While Jehu is commanding the forces besieging Ramoth-gilead, Elisha sends one of the sons of the prophets to anoint the general as king, and thus he executes the commission which Elijah received from Jehovah at Horeb (1 K 19¹⁶).

Elisha's relations with the Syrians are exceedingly interesting. On one occasion he appears to be as much at home in Damascus as in Samaria. Ben-hadad, suffering from a severe ailment, hears of his presence in his capital, and sends Hazael to the man of God to inquire concerning the issue. The prophet reads the heart of the messenger, and predicts both the king's recovery and his assassination by Hazael (2 K 8⁷). Nothing is said of a formal anointing, but in this connexion Elisha seems to have carried out the commission of Elijah (1 K 19¹⁷). The blockade of Samaria (2 K 6²⁴⁻⁷²) probably falls in the reign of Jehoahaz. That the prophet is held by king and statesmen responsible for the straits to which the city has been reduced, is an eloquent tribute to his political influence. In this connexion Elisha's prediction of deliverance is speedily fulfilled. Under Joash, Israel was hard pressed, and her might had dwindled to insignificance (13⁷), but Elisha was still the saviour of his country. Joash weeps over him as he lies on his deathbed: 'My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof.' Directing the monarch to perform a symbolical act, the prophet gives him assurance of victory (13¹⁸). Even after his burial his bones had the power to perform a beneficent miracle (13²⁰⁻²¹).

An incident in the life of Elisha throws light on the prophetic state. Before declaring the final result of the campaign to the three kings, he asks for a minstrel. The music induces the ecstatic state, and then he prophesies (3¹⁵). The supernatural abounds in his life; in many instances he manifests the power of prediction (4¹⁰ 5²⁰ 6¹⁰ 7¹⁰ 8¹⁰ 12¹⁰ 9¹⁰ 13¹⁰). But some of his deeds are not miracles in the modern sense (2¹⁰ 4¹⁰ 6¹⁰).

JAMES A. KELSO.

ELISHAH.—The eldest 'son' of Javan (Gn 10⁴), whence the Tyrians obtained the purple dye (Ezk 27⁷). The latter favours identification with S. Italy and Sicily, or Carthage and N. African coast, both districts famous for the purple dye. Elisha, or Dido, the traditional foundress of Carthage, may indicate Elisha as an early name of Carthage, and Syncellus gives the gloss 'Elisha, whence the Sikeloi.' The Targum on Ezk. gives 'the province of Italy.' The Tell el-Amarna tablets include letters to the king of Egypt from the king of Alashia, Egyptian Alsa, which has been identified with Cyprus; known to Sargon, king of Assyria, as the land of the Ionians, Javan. There are difficulties in all these identifications, possibly because the name itself denoted different districts at different epochs, and no certainty can yet be attained.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ELISHAMA.—1. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim at the census in the wilderness, son of Ammihud and grandfather of Joshua (Nu 1¹⁰ 2¹⁰, 1 Ch 7²⁶). 2. One of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (2 S 5¹⁶, 1 Ch 3¹⁴). 3. In 1 Ch 3⁶ by mistake for ELISHUA of 2 S 5¹⁶, 1 Ch 14⁶. 4. A descendant of Judah, son of Jekamiah (1 Ch 2⁴). 5. The father of Nathaniah, and grandfather of Ishmael, 'of the seed royal,' who killed Gedaliah at the time of the Exile (2 K 25²⁵, Jer 41¹). Jerome, following Jewish tradition identifies him with No. 4. 6. A scribe or secretary to Jehoiakim (Jer 36¹¹ 20 21). 7. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁹).

ELISHAPHAT.—One of the captains who helped Jehoiada to install king Joash (2 Ch 23¹).

ELISHEBA.—Daughter of Amminadab and wife of Aaron (Ex 6²³).

ELISHUA.—A son of David (2 S 5¹⁶, 1 Ch 14⁶; also 1 Ch 3⁶ [corrected text; see ELISHAMA, 3]).

ELIUD.—An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1¹).

ELIZAPHAN.—1. Prince of the Kohathites (Nu 3³⁰, 1 Ch 15¹, 2 Ch 29¹²)—Elisaphan (Ex 6²³, Lv 10⁴ P). 2.

ELIZUR

Zebulun's representative for dividing the land (Nu 34² P).

ELIZUR ('God is a rock,' cf. Zur).—Prince of Reuben at the first census (Nu 1² 210 730. 3 101² P).

ELKANAH ('God hath acquired').—1. A son of Korah (Ex 6²⁴). 2. An Ephraimite, husband of Peninnah and Hannah; by the former he had several children, but Hannah was for many years childless. Her rival mocked her for this as they went up year by year with Elkanah to sacrifice in Shiloh. Elkanah loved Hannah more than Peninnah, and sought, in vain, to comfort her in her distress. At length Hannah conceived, and bore a son, Samuel. Afterwards three sons and two daughters were born to them (see HANNAH, and SAMUEL). 3. The son of Assir (1 Ch 6²³). 4. The father of Zophai (Zuph), a descendant of 3 (1 Ch 6²³ 35). 5. A Levite who dwelt in a village of the Netophathites (1 Ch 9¹⁶). 6. One of the mighty men who came to David to Ziklag (1 Ch 12²). 7. A door-keeper for the ark (1 Ch 15²²). 8. A high official, 'next to the king,' at the court of Ahaz (2 Ch 28⁶ 7).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ELKIAH.—An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8¹).

ELKOSHITE.—See NAHUM.

ELLASAR.—Arioch king of Ellasar was allied with Chedorlaomer in the campaign against the kings of the plain (Gn 14¹). He has been identified with Rim-sin, king of Larsa, and consequently 'Ellasar' is thought to be for al-Larsa, 'the city of Larsa.' Larsa, modern Senkerek in Lower Babylonia on the east bank of the Euphrates, was celebrated for its temple and worship of the sun-god Shamash.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ELM.—Hos 4¹ AV, but RV 'terebinth.' See also PINE.

ELMADAM.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁸).

ELNAAM.—The father of two of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11¹⁶).

ELNATHAN.—1. The father of Nehushta, the mother of Jehoiachin (2 K 24¹). 2. The son of Achior, the chief of those sent to Egypt to fetch Uriah, who had offended Jehoiakim by his prophecy (Jer 26²²); and one of those who had entreated the king not to burn the roll (36²³). It is possible that he is identical with No. 1. 3. The name occurs no fewer than three times in the list of those sent for Ezra when he camped near Ahava (Ezr 8¹⁸). In 1 Es 8⁴⁴ there are only two corresponding names, the second of which is Ennatan.

ELOHIM.—See GOD.

ELOHIST.—See HEXATEUCH.

ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.—These Aram. words occur in Mk. 15³⁴, being an Eng. transliteration from the Greek. The underlying Aram. would be Elahi, Elahi, l'ma shabaktani. The l in Eloi is probably a local pronunciation of d as aw or o, as in some Syriac dialects. Dalman, however, maintains that our Lord spoke the first two words in Hebrew and the other two in Aramaic. In this case Eloi represents the Heb. Elohai = 'my God.' For sabachthani the Codex Sinaiticus reads sabaktani, which may be the original reading. It is more correct; but on that very account it may be a gloss. Lama for Aram. l'ma = 'for what?' 'why?' has many variants in Gr. MSS, as lema, lamta, l'ma.

In the parallel passage in Mt 27⁴⁶ we find Eli, Eli (though Cod. Sin. reads Eloi and B Eloei). Eli is a Heb. word, here, as elsewhere, borrowed in Aramaic. The Aram. word for 'forsake' is sh'daq for which the Heb. equivalent is 'azabh. In Heb. 'hast thou forsaken me?' would be 'azabhtani. This explains the reading of Codex D. zaphthanei, which some officious literary scribe substituted for sabachthani, both in Mt. and Mk.

J. T. MARSHALL.

ELON.—('terebinth').—1. Of the tribe of Zebulun, one of the minor judges (Jg 12¹¹ 12). All that is told of him is simply that he judged Israel for ten years, that he died, and was buried in Elon in Zebulun. 2. A son of Zebulun (Gn 46¹⁴, Nu 26²⁸, where the gentilic name Elonites occurs). 3. A Hittite, the father-in-law of Esau (Gn 26³⁴ 36²).

ELON.—1. A town in the territory of Dan, now unknown (Jos 19⁴³). It is perhaps the same as Elon-beth-hanan (1 K 4⁹). 2. An unknown locality in Zebulun (Jg 12¹³). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ELON-BETH-HANAN.—See preceding article.

ELOTH.—See ELATH.

ELPAAL.—A Benjamite family (1 Ch 8¹¹ 12. 18).

EL-PARAN (Gn 14⁶).—See PARAN.

ELPELET (1 Ch 14⁵, AV Elpalet).—One of David's sons.—Elphelet No. 1.

EL-SHADDAI.—See GOD.

ELTEKE(H).—A town in Dan associated with Ekron and Gibeon (Jos 19⁴⁴ 21²), probably the Ataqa mentioned by Sennacherib as the locality of his defeat of the Philistines and Egyptians in the time of Hezekiah just before his capture of Ekron. It was a Levitical city. Its modern site is uncertain.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

ELTEKON (Jos 15⁵⁹).—A town of Judah, noticed with Maarath and Beth-anoth. Site unknown.

ELTOLAD (Jos 15⁵⁰).—A town in the extreme S. of Judah, given to Simeon (19⁴); probably = Tolad (1 Ch 4²⁹). The site is unknown.

ELUL (Neh 6¹⁵, 1 Mac 14²⁷).—See TIME.

ELUZAI.—One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12²⁶).

ELYMAIS.—This name, which represents the OT Elam, was given to a district of Persia, lying along the southern spurs of Mt. Zagros, S. of Media and N. of Susiana. In 1 Mac 6¹, according to the common reading, which is adopted by the AV, Elymais is named as a rich city in Persia. No such city, however, is mentioned elsewhere, except by Josephus, who is simply following 1 Mac. There can be no doubt, therefore, that we should correct the text and read with RV, 'in Elymais in Persia there was a city.'

ELYMAS.—See BAR-JESUS.

ELZABAD.—1. A Gadite chief who joined David (1 Ch 12¹³). 2. A Korahite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26⁷).

ELZAPHAN.—See ELIZAPHAN.

EMADABUN (1 Es 5¹⁸).—One of the Levites who superintended the restoration of the Temple. The name does not occur in the parallel Ezr 3²; it is probably due to a repetition of the name which follows, liadun.

EMATHEIS (1 Es 9²²) = Athlai, Ezr 10²².

EMBALMING.—This specifically Egyptian (non-Israelitish) method of treating dead bodies is mentioned in Scripture only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gn 50²⁴ 25).

EMBROIDERY AND NEEDLEWORK.—Embroidery is the art of working patterns or figures on textile fabrics with woollen linen, silk, or gold thread by means of a needle. The process was exactly described by the Romans as painting with a needle (acu pingere).

The Hebrew word for embroidery (rigmah) is rendered by AV in Jg 5³⁰ and Ps 45¹¹ by 'needlework,' for which RV substitutes 'embroidery,'—in the former passage, however, render 'a piece of embroidery or two' for 'embroidery on both sides,'—and in Ezk 16¹⁰ 12. 1. 27. 18. 24 by 'brodered work' or 'brodered garments,' which RV retains. Similarly in connexion with certain fabrics of the Tabernacle and the high priest's girdle, for 'wrought with needlework' RV has the more literal rendering 'the work of the embroiderer' (Ex 26²⁸ 27¹⁸ 28²⁹ etc.), whom AV also introduces in 35³⁵ 38²².

An entirely different word, the real significance of which is uncertain, is also rendered in AV by 'embroider.' 'thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen' (Ex 28²⁹), for which RV has: 'thou shalt weave the coat in chequer work' (for which see SPINNING AND WEAVING). So for a 'broidered coat' (Ex 28⁴) RV has 'a coat of chequer work.'

The art of embroidery was an invention of the Babylonians, from whom it passed, through the medium of the Phrygians, to the Greeks and the other nations of the West. Mummy cloths are still preserved showing that the art was also practised in Egypt. No actual specimens of Babylonian embroidery have survived, but the sculptures of Assyrian palaces, notably a sculptured figure of Ashurnazirpal, show the royal robes ornamented with borders of the most elaborate embroidery. The various designs are discussed, with illustrations, by Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldaea and Assyria, ii. 363 ff.

If, as is generally believed, the Priests' Code was compiled in Babylonia, we may trace the influence of the latter in the embroideries introduced into the Tabernacle screens and elsewhere (reft. above). In the passages in question the work of 'the embroiderer' (rōgēm) is distinguished from, and mentioned after, the work of 'the cunning workman' (chōshēb, lit. 'designer', in Phoenician 'weaver'), who appears to have woven his designs into the fabric after the manner of tapestry (see SPINNING AND WEAVING). The materials used by both artists were the same, linen thread dyed blue, purple, and scarlet, and fine gold thread, the preparation of which is minutely described, Ex 39².

An illustration in colours of the sails which Tyre imported from Egypt, 'of fine linen with broidered work' (Ezk 27⁷), may be seen in the frontispiece to Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, vol. ii.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

EMEK-KEZIZ (Jos 18²¹, AV 'Valley of Keziz,' mentioned among the towns of Benjamin).—A place apparently in the Jordan Valley near Jericho. The site is unknown.

EMERALD.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

EMERODS.—See MEDICINE.

EMIM.—Primitive inhabitants of Moab, a gigantic people of Hebrew tradition (Rephaim, Dt 2¹⁰, cf. Gn 14⁵). J. F. McCURDY.

EMMANUEL.—See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS.—1. A village sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, where the risen Christ made Himself known to two disciples (Lk 24¹³). There is no clue to the position of this place, and it has been sought in Kub-eibeh, N.W. of the city; in Kuloniyeh, W. of it, in Khamasah to the S.W., and in Urtas to the S. The traditional site is Emmaus Nicopolis ('Amwas'), W. of Jerusalem, which, however, is much too far—20 miles—from the city.

2. Emmaus Nicopolis, now 'Amwas', on the main Jerusalem-Jaffa road, the scene of the defeat of Gorgias by Judas (1 Mac 3⁶⁰, 47 42-27), held and fortified by Bacchides (1 Mac 9⁴⁰). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

EMMER (1 Es 9²¹) = Ezr 10²⁸ Immer.

EMMERUTH (1 Es 5²¹).—A corruption of Immer in Ezr 2²⁷.

ENAIM.—A Judæan town in the Shephelah (Jos 15²⁴ 'Enaim'; Gn 38¹⁴, AV 'in an open place,' RV 'in the gate of Enaim'; v. 24, AV 'openly,' RV 'at Enaim'). From the narrative in Gn 38 we gather that it lay between Adullam and Timnah. The site is not identified. Conder suggests Khirbet Wady Alin, near Beth-shemesh and En-gannim. W. EWING.

ENAN.—Prince of Naphtali at the first census (Nu 14 2²⁹ 7⁷⁸, 10 10²⁷ P).

ENASIBUS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Ezr 10²⁸ Ellashib. The form is probably due to reading Enas as N.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE SEA.—One of the stations in the itinerary of the children of Israel, where they encamped after leaving Elim, Nu 33⁹. If the position of Elim be in the Wady Gharandel, then the camp by the sea is on the shore of the Gulf of Suez, somewhere south of the point where the Wady Tayyibeh opens to the coast. The curious return of the line of march to the seashore is a phenomenon that has always arrested the attention of travellers to Mt. Sinai: and if Mt. Sinai be really in the so-called Sinaitic peninsula, the camp can be located within a half-mile.

ENCHANTMENT.—See MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY.

EN-DOR.—A town of Manasseh in the territory of Issachar (Jos 17¹¹); the home of a woman with a familiar spirit consulted by Saul on the eve of the battle of Gilboa (1 S 28); and, according to a psalmist (83¹⁰), the scene of the rout of Jabin and Sisera. It is identified with Endār, south of Tabor, where are several ancient caves. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

EN-EGLAIM.—A locality on the Dead Sea, mentioned along with En-gedi (Ezk 47¹⁰). It has not been identified, but is not improbably 'Ain Feshkah' (Robinson, BRP ii. 489). Tristram (Bible Places, 93) would make it 'Ain Hajlah' (Beth-hoglah). In any case, it probably lay to the N. towards the mouth of the Jordan.

ENEMESSAR.—Name of a king of Assyria in Gr. MSS of To 14, where the Syriac and Lat. give Shalmaneser, who is probably meant. The corruption is best accounted for by the loss of Sh and l and the transposition of m and n; but naturally many explanations may be offered without conviction. C. H. W. JOHNS.

ENENEUS (1 Es 5⁴).—One of the twelve leaders of the return from Babylon under Zerubbabel. The name is omitted in the parallel list in Ezr 2, which gives only eleven leaders; but answers to Nahamani, Neh 7⁷.

EN-GANNIM.—1. Jos 15²⁴. A town of Judah noticed with Zanoah and Eshtaol; perhaps the ruin Umm Jina in the valley near Zanoah. 2. Jos 19²¹ 21²⁹ (in 1 Ch 6³³ Anem). A town of Issachar given to the Levites; now Jenin, a town on the S. border of Esdraelon, with a fine spring, gardens, and palms. It marked the S. limit of Galilee, and appears to have been always a flourishing town.

EN-GEDI ('spring of the kid').—A place 'in the wilderness' in the tribe of Judah (Jos 15²³), where David for a time was in hiding (1 S 23²⁹ 24¹). Here the Moabites and Ammonites came against Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20²). The Shulamite compares her beloved to henna flowers in En-gedi (Ca 1⁴); and in Ezekiel's idealistic vision of the healing of the Dead Sea waters, a picture is drawn of fishers here spreading their nets (Ezk 47¹⁰). An alternative name is Hazon-tamar, found in Gn 14⁷ and 2 Ch 20². There is no doubt of the identification of En-gedi with 'Ain Jidy', a spring of warm water that breaks out 330 ft. above the level of the Dead Sea, about the middle of its W. side. It once was cultivated, but is now given over to a wild semi-tropical vegetation. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ENGINE.—See FORTIFICATION, etc., § 6.

ENGLISH VERSIONS.—1. The history of the English Bible begins early in the history of the English people, though not quite at the beginning of it, and only slowly attains to any magnitude. The Bible which was brought into the country by the first missionaries, by Aidan in the north and Augustine in the south, was the Latin Bible; and for some considerable time after the first preaching of Christianity to the English no vernacular version would be required. Nor is there any trace of a vernacular Bible in the Celtic Church, which still existed in Wales and Ireland. The literary language of the educated minority was Latin; and the instruction of the newly converted English tribes was carried on by oral teaching and preaching. As time went on, however, and monasteries were founded, many of whose inmates were imperfectly acquainted either with English or with Latin, a demand arose for English translations of the Scriptures. This took two forms. On the one hand, there was a call for word-for-word translations of the Latin, which might assist readers to a comprehension of the Latin Bible; and, on the other, for continuous versions or paraphrases, which might be read to, or by, those whose skill in reading Latin was small.

2. The earliest form, so far as is known, in which this demand was met was the poem of Cædmon, the work of a monk of Whitby in the third quarter of the 7th cent., which gives a metrical paraphrase of parts of both Testaments. The only extant MS of the poem (in the Bodleian) belongs to the end of the 10th cent., and it is doubtful how much of it really goes back to the time of Cædmon. In any case, the poem as it appears here does not appear to be later than the 8th century. A tradition, originating with Bale, attributed an English version of the Psalms to Aldhelm, bishop of Sherborne (d. 707), but it appears to be quite baseless (see A. S. Cook, Bibl. Quot. in Old Eng. Prose Writers, 1878, pp. xiv-xviii). An Anglo-Saxon Psalter in an 11th cent. MS at Paris (partly in prose and partly in verse) has been identified, without any evidence, with this imaginary work. The well-known story of the death of Bede (in 735) shows him engaged on an English translation of St. John's Gospel [one early MS (at St. Gall) represents this as extending only to Jn 6⁹; but so abrupt a conclusion seems inconsistent with the course of the narrative]; but of this all traces have disappeared. The scholarship of the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, which had an important influence on the textual history of the Latin Vulgate, did not concern itself with vernacular translations; and no further trace of an English Bible appears until the 9th century. To that period is assigned a word-for-word translation of the Psalter, written between the lines of a Latin MS (Cotton MS Vespasian A.1., in the British Museum), which was the progenitor of several similar glosses between that date and the 12th cent.; and to it certainly belongs the attempt of Alfred to educate his people by English translations of the works which he thought most needful to them. He is said to have undertaken a version of the Psalms, of which no portion survives, unless the prose portion (Ps 1-50) of the above-mentioned Paris MS is a relic of it; but we still have the translation of the Decalogue, the summary of the Mosaic law, and the letter of the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15²³⁻²⁹), which he prefixed to his code of laws. To the 10th cent. belongs probably the verse portion of the Paris MS, and the interlinear translation of the Gospels in Northumbrian dialect inserted by the priest Aldred in the Lindisfarne Gospels (British Museum), which is repeated in the Rushworth Gospels (Bodleian) of the same century, with the difference that the version of Mt. is there in the Mercian dialect. This is the earliest extant translation of the Gospels into English.

3. The earliest independent version of any of the books of the Bible has likewise generally been assigned to the 10th cent., but if this claim can be made good at all, it can apply only to the last years of that century. The version in question is a translation of the Gospels in the dialect of Wessex, of which six MSS (with a fragment of a seventh) are now extant. It was edited by W. Skeat, The Holy Gospels in Anglo-Saxon (1871-1877); two MSS are in the British Museum, two at Cambridge, and two (with a fragment of another) at Oxford. From the number of copies which still survive, it must be presumed to have had a certain circulation, at any rate in Wessex, and it continued to be copied for at least a century. The earliest MSS are assigned to the beginning of the 11th cent.; but it is observable that Ælfric the Grammarian, abbot of Eynsham, writing about 990, says that the English at that time 'had not the evangelical doctrines among their writings, . . . those books excepted which King Alfred wisely turned from Latin into English' [preface to Ælfric's Homilies, edited by B. Thorpe, London, 1843-46]. In a subsequent treatise (Treatise concerning the Old and New Testament, ed. W. Lisle, London, 1623) also (the date of which is said to be about 1010, see Dietrich, Zeitsch. f. hist. Theol. 1856, quoted by Cook, op. cit., p. lxiv.) he speaks as if no English version of the Gospels were in existence, and refers his readers to his own homilies on the Gospels. Since Ælfric had been a monk at Winchester and abbot of Cerne, in Dorset, it is difficult to understand how he could have failed to know of the Wessex version of the Gospels, if it had been produced and circulated much before 1000; and it seems probable that it only came into existence early in the 11th century. In this case it was contemporaneous with another work of translation, due to Ælfric himself. Ælfric, at the request of Æthelweard, son of his patron Æthelmær, ealdorman of Devonshire and founder of Eynsham Abbey, produced a paraphrase of the Heptateuch, homilies containing epitomes of the Books of Kings and Job, and brief versions of Esther, Judith, and Maccabees. These have the interest of being the earliest extant English version of the narrative books of the OT. [The Heptateuch and Job were printed by E. Thwaites (Oxford, 1698). For the rest, see Cook, op. cit.]

4. The Norman Conquest checked for a time all the vernacular literature of England, including the translations of the Bible. One of the first signs of its revival was the production of the Ormulum, a poem which embodies metrical versions of the Gospels and Acts, written about the end of the 12th century. The main Biblical literature of this period, however, was French. For the benefit of the Norman settlers in England, translations of the greater part of both OT and NT were produced during the 12th and 13th centuries. Especially notable among these was the version of the Apocalypse, because it was frequently accompanied by a series of illustrations, the best examples of which are the finest (and also the most quaint) artistic productions of the period in the sphere of book-illustration. Nearly 90 MSS of this version are known, ranging from the first half of the 12th cent. to the first half of the 15th [see P. Berger, La Bible Française au moyen âge, p. 78 ff.; L. Delisle and P. Meyer, L'Apocalypse en Français (Paris, 1901); and New Palaeographical Society, part 2, plates 38, 39], some having been produced in England, and others in France; and in the 14th cent. it reappears in an English dress, having been translated apparently about that time. This English version (which at one time was attributed to Wycliff) is known in no less than 16 MSS, which fall into at least two classes [see Miss A. C. Paves, A Fourteenth Century English Biblical Version (Cambridge, 1902), pp. 24-30]; and it is noteworthy that from the second of these was derived the version which appears in the revised Wycliffe Bible, to be mentioned presently.

5. The 14th cent., which saw the practical extinction of the general use of the French language in England, and the rise of a real native literature, saw also a great revival of vernacular Biblical literature, beginning apparently with the Book of Psalms. Two English versions of the Psalter were produced at this period, one of which enjoyed great popularity. This was the work of Richard Rolle, hermit of Hampole, in Yorkshire (d. 1349). It contains the Latin text of the Psalter, followed verse by verse by an English translation and commentary. Originally written in the northern dialect, it soon spread over all England, and many MSS of it still exist in which the dialect has been altered to suit southern tastes. Towards the end of the century Rolle's work suffered further change, the commentary being re-written from a strongly Lollard point of view, and in this shape it continued to circulate far into the 18th century. Another version of the Psalter was produced contemporaneously with Rolle's, somewhere in the West Midlands. The authorship of it was formerly attributed to William of Shoreham, vicar of Chart Sutton, in Kent, but for no other reason than that in one of the two MSS in which it is preserved (Brit. Mus. Add. MS 17376, the other being at Trinity College, Dublin) it is now bound up with his religious poems. The dialect, however, proves that this authorship is impossible, and the version must be put down as anonymous. As in the case of Rolle's translation, the Latin and English texts are intermixed, verse by verse; but there is no commentary. [See K. S. Bülbring, The Earliest Complete English Prose Psalter (Early English Text Society), 1891.]

6. The Psalter was not the only part of the Bible of which versions came into existence in the course of the 14th century. At Magdalene College, Cambridge (Pepys MS 2498), is an English narrative of the Life of Christ, compiled out of a re-arrangement of the Gospels for Sundays and holy days throughout the year. Quite recently, too, a group of MSS, which (so far as they were known at all) had been regarded as belonging to the Wyclifite Bible, has been shown by Miss Anna C. Paves [A Fourteenth Century English Biblical Version (Cambridge, 1902)] to contain an independent translation of the NT. It is not complete, the Gospels being represented only by Mt 11-6*, and the Apocalypse being altogether omitted. The original nucleus seems, indeed, to have consisted of the four larger Catholic Epistles and the Epistles of St. Paul, to which were subsequently added 2 and 3 John, Jude, Acts, and Mt 11-6*. Four MSS of this version are at present known, the oldest being one at Selwyn College, Cambridge, which was written about 1400. The prologue narrates that the translation was made at the request of a monk and a nun by their superior, who defers to their earnest desire, although, as he says, it is at the risk of his life. This phrase seems to show that the work was produced after the rise of the great party controversy which is associated with the name of Wyclif.

7. With Wyclif (1320-1384) we reach a landmark in the history of the English Bible, in the production of the first complete version of both OT and NT. It belongs to the last period of Wyclif's life, that in which he was engaged in open war with the Papacy and with most of the official chiefs of the English Church. It was connected with his institution of 'poor priests,' or mission preachers, and formed part of his scheme of appealing to the populace in general against the doctrines and supremacy of Rome. The NT seems to have been completed about 1380, the OT between 1382 and 1384. Exactly how much of it was done by Wyclif's own hand is uncertain. The greater part of the OT (as far as Baruch 3²⁰) is assigned in an Oxford MS to Nicholas Hereford, one of Wyclif's principal supporters at that university; and it is certain that this part of the translation is in a different style (more stiff and pedantic) from the rest. The NT is generally attributed to Wyclif himself, and he may also have completed the OT, which Hereford apparently had to abandon abruptly, perhaps when he was summoned to London and excommunicated in 1382. This part of the work is free and vigorous in style, though its interpretation of the original is often strange, and many sentences in it can have conveyed very little idea of their meaning to its readers. Such as it was, however, it was a complete English Bible, addressed to the whole English people, high and low, rich and poor. That this is the case is proved by the character of the copies which have survived (about 30 in number). Some are large folio volumes, handsomely written and illuminated in the best, or nearly the best, style of the period; such is the fine copy, in two volumes (now Brit. Mus. Egerton MSS 617, 618), which once belonged to Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, uncle of Richard II. Others are plain copies of ordinary size, intended for private persons or monastic libraries; for it is clear that, in spite of official disfavour and eventual prohibition there were many places in England where Wyclif and his Bible were welcomed. Wyclif, indeed, enjoyed advantages from personal repute and influential support such as had been enjoyed by no English translator since Alfred. An Oxford scholar, at one time Master of Balliol, holder of livings successively from his college and the Crown, employed officially on behalf of his country in controversy with the Pope, the friend and protégé of John of Gaunt and other prominent nobles, and enjoying as a rule the strenuous support of the University of Oxford, Wyclif was in all respects a person of weight and influence in the realm, who could not be silenced or isolated by the opposition of bishops such as Arundel. The work that he had done had struck its roots too deep to be destroyed, and though it was identified with Lollardism by its adversaries its range was much wider than that of any one sect or party.

8. Wyclif's translation, however, though too strong to be overthrown by its opponents, was capable of improvement by its friends. The difference of style between Hereford and his continuator or continuators, the stiff and unpopular character of the work of the former, and the imperfections inevitable in a first attempt on so large a scale, called aloud for revision; and a second Wyclifite Bible, the result of a very complete revision of its predecessor, saw the light not many years after the Reformer's death. The authorship of the second version is doubtful. It was assigned by Forshall and Madden, the editors of the Wyclifite Bible, to John Purvey, one of Wyclif's most intimate followers; but the evidence is purely circumstantial, and rests mainly on verbal resemblances between the translator's preface and known works of Purvey, together with the fact that a copy of this preface is found attached to a copy of the earlier version which was once Purvey's property. What is certain is that the second version is based upon the first, and that the translator's preface is permeated with Wyclifite opinions. This version speedily superseded the other, and in spite of a decree passed, at Arundel's instigation, by the Council of Blackfriars in 1408, it must have circulated in large numbers. Over 140 copies are still in existence, many of them small pocket volumes such as must have been the personal property of private individuals for their own study. Others belonged to the greatest personages in the land, and copies are still in existence which formerly had for owners Henry VI., Henry VII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth.

9. At this point it seems necessary to say something of the theory which has been propounded by the well-known Roman Catholic historian, Abbot Gasquet, to the effect that the versions which pass under the name of 'Wyclifite' were not produced by Wyclif or his followers at all, but were translations authorized and circulated by the heads of the Church of England, Wyclif's particular enemies. [The Old English Bible, 1897, pp. 102-178.] The strongest argument adduced in support of this view is the possession of copies of the versions in question both by kings and princes of England, and by religious houses and persons of unquestioned orthodoxy. This does, indeed, prove that the persecution of the English Bible and its possessors by the authorities of the Catholic Church was not so universal or continuous as it is sometimes represented to have been, but it does not go far towards disproving the Wyclifite authorship of versions which can be demonstratively connected, as these are, with the names of leading supporters of Wyclif, such as Hereford and Purvey; the more so since the evidence of orthodox ownership of many of the copies in question dates from times long after the cessation of the Lollard persecution. Dr. Gasquet also denies that there is any real evidence connecting Wyclif with the production of an English Bible at all; but in order to make good this assertion he has to ignore several passages in Wyclif's own writings in which he refers to the importance of a vernacular version (to the existence of his own version he could not refer, since that was produced only at the end of his life), and to do violence alike to the proper translation and to the natural interpretation of passages written by Wyclif's opponents (Arundel, Knyghton, and the Council of Oxford in 1408) in which Wyclif's work is mentioned and condemned. Further, Dr. Gasquet denies that the Lollards made a special point of the circulation of the Scriptures in the vernacular, or were charged with so doing by the ecclesiastical authorities who prosecuted them; and in particular he draws a distinction between the versions now extant and the Bible on account of the heretical nature of which (among other charges) one Richard Hun was condemned by the Bishop of London in 1514. It has, however, been shown conclusively that the depositions of the witnesses against the Lollards (which cannot be regarded as wholly irrelevant to the charges brought against them) constantly make mention of the possession of vernacular Bibles; and that the charges against Richard Hun, based upon the prologue to the Bible in his possession, are taken verbatim from the prologue to the version which we now know as Purvey's. It is true that Dr. Gasquet makes the explicit statement that 'we shall look in vain in the edition of Wyclifite Scriptures published by Forshall and Madden for any trace of these errors' (i.e. the errors found by Hun's prosecutors in the prologue to his Bible); but a writer in the Church Quarterly Review (Jan. 1901, p. 292 ff.) has printed in parallel columns the charges against Hun and the corresponding passages in Purvey's prologue, which leave no possibility of doubt that Hun was condemned for possessing a copy of the version which is commonly known as Purvey's, or as the later Wyclifite version. The article in the Church Quarterly Review must be read by everyone who wishes to investigate Dr. Gasquet's theory fully; the evidence there adduced is decisive as to the unsoundness of Dr. Gasquet's historical position. It is impossible to attribute to the official heads of the English Church a translation the prologue to which (to quote but two phrases) speaks of 'the pardouns of the bischoppis of Rome, that ben opyn leessingis,' and declares that 'to eschewe pride and speke honour of God and of his lawe, and reprove synne bi weie of charite, is matir and cause now whi prelatiis and summe lordis sleaundren men, and clepen hem lollardis, eretikis, and riseris of debate and of treson agens the king.' In the face of this evidence it will be impossible in future to deny that the Wyclifite Bible is identical with that which we now possess, and that it was at times the cause of the persecution of its owners by the authorities of the Church. That this persecution was partial and temporary is likely enough. Much of it was due to the activity of individual bishops, such as Arundel; but not all the bishops shared Arundel's views. Wyclif had powerful supporters, notably John of Gaunt and the University of Oxford, and under their protection copies of the vernacular Bible could be produced and circulated. It is, moreover, likely, not to say certain, that as time went on the Wyclifite origin of the version would often be forgotten. Apart from the preface to Purvey's edition, which appears only rarely in the extant MSS, there is nothing in the translation itself which would betray its Lollard origin; and it is quite probable that many persons in the 15th and early 16th cent. used it without any suspicion of its connexion with Wyclif. Sir Thomas More, whose good faith there is no reason to question, appears to have done so; otherwise it can only be supposed that the orthodox English Bibles of which he speaks, and which he expressly distinguishes from the Bible which caused the condemnation of Richard Hun, have wholly disappeared, which is hardly likely. If this be admitted, the rest of More's evidence falls to the ground. The history of the Wyclifite Bible, and of its reception in England, would in some points bear re-statement; but the ingenious, and at first sight plausible, theory of Abbot Gasquet has failed to stand examination, and it is to be hoped that it may be allowed to lapse.

10. With the production of the second Wyclifite version the history of the manuscript English Bible comes to an end. Purvey's work was on the level of the best scholarship and textual knowledge of the age, and it satisfied the requirements of those who needed a vernacular Bible. That it did not reach modern standards in these respects goes without saying. In the first place, it was translated from the Latin Vulgate, not from the original Hebrew and Greek, with which there is no reason to suppose that Wyclif or his assistants were familiar. Secondly, its exegesis is often deficient, and some passages in it must have been wholly unintelligible to its readers. This, however, may be said even of some parts of the AV, so that it is small reproach to Wyclif and Purvey; and on the whole it is a straightforward and intelligible version of the Scriptures. A few examples of this, the first complete English Bible, and the first version in which the English approaches sufficiently near to its modern form to be generally intelligible, may be given here.

Jn 14:1-7. Be not youre herte affraied, ne drede it. Ye bileuen in god, and bileue ye in me. In the hous of my fadir ben many dwellingis: if any thing lasse I hadde seid to you, for I go to make redi to you a place. Amen.

11. The English manuscript Bible was now complete, and no further translation was issued in this form. The Lollard controversy died down amid the strain of the French wars and the passions of the wars of the Roses; and when, in the 16th century, religious questions once more came to the front, the situation had been fundamentally changed through the invention of printing. The first book that issued from the press was the Latin Bible (popularly known as the Mazarin Bible), published by Fust and Gutenberg in 1456. For the Latin Bible (the form in which the Scriptures had hitherto been mainly known in Western Europe) there was indeed so great a demand, that no less than 124 editions of it are said to have been issued before the end of the 15th century; but it was only slowly that scholars realized the importance of utilizing the printing press for the circulation of the Scriptures, either in their original tongues, or in the vernaculars of Europe. The Hebrew Psalter was printed in 1477, the complete OT in 1488. The Greek Bible, both OT and NT, was included in the great Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes, printed in 1514-17, but not published till 1522. The Greek NT (edited by Erasmus) was first published by Froben in 1516, the OT by the Aldine press in 1518. In the way of vernacular versions, a French Bible was printed at Lyons about 1478, and another about 1487; a Spanish Pentateuch was printed (by Jews) in 1497; a German Bible was printed at Strassburg by Mentelin in 1466, and was followed by eighteen others (besides many Psalters and other separate books) between that date and 1522, when the first portion of Luther's translation appeared. In England, Caxton inserted the main part of the OT narrative in his translation of the Golden Legend (which in its original form already contained the Gospel story), published in 1483; but no regular English version of the Bible was printed until 1525, with which date a new chapter in the history of the English Bible begins.

12. It was not the fault of the translator that it did not appear at least as early as Luther's. William Tindale (c. 1490-1536) devoted himself early to Scripture studies, and by the time he had reached the age of about 30 he had taken for the work of his life the translation of the Bible into English. He was born in Gloucestershire, where his family seems to have used the name of Hutchins or Hychins, as well as that of Tindale, so that he is himself sometimes described by both names; and he became a member of Magdalen Hall (a dependency of Magdalen College) at Oxford, where he definitely associated himself with the Protestant party and became known as one of their leaders. He took his degree as B.A. in 1512, as M.A. in 1515, and at some uncertain date he is said (by Foxe) to have gone to Cambridge. If this was between 1511 and 1515, he would have found Erasmus there; but in that case it could have been only an interlude in the middle of his Oxford course, and perhaps it is more probable that his visit belongs to some part of the years 1515 to 1520, as to which there is no definite information. About 1520 he became resident tutor in the house of Sir John Walsh, at Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire, to which period belongs his famous saying, in controversy with an opponent: 'If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth the plough shall know more of the Scripture than thou doest.' With this object he came up to London in 1523, and sought a place in the service of Tunstall, bishop of London, a scholar and patron of scholars, of whom Erasmus had spoken favourably; but here he received no encouragement. He was, however, taken in by Alderman Humphrey Monmouth, in whose house he lived as chaplain and studied for six months; at the end of which time he was forced to the conclusion 'not only that there was no room in my lord of London's palace to translate the New Testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all England.'

13. About May 1524, therefore, Tindale left England and settled in the free city of Hamburg, and in the course of the next 12 months the first stage of his great work was completed. Whether during this time he visited Luther at Wittenberg is quite uncertain; what is certain, and more important, is that he was acquainted with Luther's writings. In 1525, the translation of the NT being finished, he went to Cologne to have it printed at the press of Peter Quentel. Three thousand copies of the first ten sheets of it, in quarto, had been printed off when rumours of the work came to the ears of John Cochläus, a bitter enemy of the Reformation. To obtain information he approached the printers (who were also engaged upon work for him), and having loosened their tongues with wine he learnt the full details of Tindale's enterprise, and sent warning forthwith to England. Meanwhile Tindale escaped with the printed sheets to Worms, in the Lutheran disposition of which place he was secure from interference, and proceeded with his work at the press of Peter Schoeffer. Since, however, a description of the Cologne edition had been sent to England, a change was made in the format. The text was set up again in octavo, and without the marginal notes of the quarto edition; and in this form the first printed English NT was given to the world early in 1526. About the same time an edition in small quarto, with marginal notes, was also issued, and it is probable (though full proof is wanting) that this was the completion of the interrupted Cologne edition. Three thousand copies of each edition were struck off; but so active were the enemies of the Reformation in their destruction, that they have nearly disappeared off the face of the earth. One copy of the octavo edition, complete but for the loss of its title-page, is at the Baptist College at Bristol, whither it found its way from the Harley Library, to which it once belonged; and an imperfect copy is in the library of St. Paul's Cathedral. Of the quarto, all that survives is a fragment consisting of eight sheets (Mt 11-22¹⁴) in the Grenville Library in the British Museum.

14. The hostility of the authorities in Church and State in England was indeed undisguised. Sir T. More attacked the translation as false and heretical, and as disregarding ecclesiastical terminology. Wolsey and the bishops, with Henry's assent, decreed that it should be burnt; and burnt it was at Paul's Cross, after a sermon from Bishop Tunstall. Nevertheless fresh supplies continued to pour into England, the money expended in buying up copies for destruction serving to pay for the production of fresh editions. Six editions are said to have been issued between 1526 and 1530; and the zeal of the authorities for its destruction was fairly matched by the zeal of the reforming party for its circulation. It was, in fact, evident that the appetite for an English Bible, once fairly excited, could not be wholly balked. In 1530 an assembly convoked by Archbishop Warham, while maintaining the previous condemnation of Tindale, and asserting that it was not expedient at that time to divulge the Scripture in the English tongue, announced that the king would have the NT faithfully translated by learned men, and published 'as soon as he might see their manners and behaviour meet, apt, and convenient to receive the same.'

15. Tindale's first NT was epoch-making in many ways. It was the first English printed NT; it laid the foundations, and much more than the foundations, of the AV of 1611; it set on foot the movement which went forward without a break until it culminated in the production of that AV; and it was the first English Bible that was translated directly from the original language. All the English manuscript Bibles were translations from the Vulgate; but Tindale's NT was taken from the Greek, which he knew from the editions by Erasmus, published in 1516, 1519, and 1522. As subsidiary aids he employed the Latin version attached by Erasmus to his Greek text, Luther's German translation of 1522, and the Vulgate; but it has been made abundantly clear that he exercised independent judgment in his use of these materials, and was by no means a slavish copier of Luther. In the marginal notes attached to the quarto edition his debt to Luther was greater; for (so far as can be gathered from the extant fragment) more than half the notes were taken direct from the German Bible, the rest being independent. It is in this connexion with Luther, rather than in anything to be found in the work itself, that the secret of the official hostility to Tindale's version is to be found. That the translation itself was not seriously to blame is shown by the extent to which it was incorporated in the AV, though no doubt to persons who knew the Scriptures only in the Latin Vulgate its divergence from accuracy may have appeared greater than was in fact the case. The octavo edition had no extraneous matter except a short preface, and therefore could not be obnoxious on controversial grounds; and the comments in the quarto edition are generally exegetical, and not polemical. Still, there could be no doubt that they were the work of an adherent of the Reformation, and as such the whole translation fell under the ban of the opponents of the Reformation.

16. Tindale's work did not cease with the production of his NT. Early in 1530 a translation of the Pentateuch was printed for him by Hans Luft, at Marburg in Hesse. The colophon to Genesis is dated Jan. 17, 1530. In England, where the year began on March 25, this would have meant 1531 according to our modern reckoning; but in Germany the year generally began on Jan. 1, or at Christmas. The only perfect copy of this edition is in the British Museum. The different books must have been set up separately, since Gn. and Nu. are printed in black letter, Ex., Lev., and Dt. in Roman; but there is no evidence that they were issued separately. The translation was made (for the first time) from the Hebrew, with which language there is express evidence that Tindale was acquainted. The book was provided with a prologue and with marginal notes, the latter being often controversial. In 1531 he published a translation of the Book of Jonah, of which a single copy (now in the British Museum) came to light in 1861. After this he seems to have reverted to the NT, of which he issued a revised edition in 1534. The immediate occasion of this was the appearance of an unauthorized revision of the translation of 1525, by one George Joye, in which many alterations were made of which Tindale disapproved. Tindale's new edition was printed by Martin Empereur of Antwerp, and published in Nov. 1534. One copy of it was printed on vellum, illuminated, and presented to Anne Boleyn, who had shown favour to one of the agents employed in distributing Tindale's earlier work. It bears her name on the fore-edge, and is now in the British Museum. The volume is a small octavo, and embodies a careful revision of his previous work. Since it was intended for liturgical use, the church lections were marked in it, and in an appendix were added, 'The Epistles taken out of the Old Testament, which are read in the church after the use of Salisbury upon certain days of the year.' These consist of 42 short passages from the OT (8 being taken from the Apocrypha), and constitute an addition to Tindale's work as a translator of the OT. The text of the NT is accompanied throughout by marginal notes, differing (so far as we are in a position to compare them) from those in the quarto of 1525, and very rarely polemical. Nearly all the books are preceded by prologues, which are for the most part derived from Luther (except that to Heb., in which Tindale expressly combats Luther's rejection of its Apostolic authority).

17. The edition of 1534 did not finally satisfy Tindale, and in the following year he put forth another edition 'yet once again corrected.' [The volume bears two dates, 1535 and 1534, but the former, which stands on the first title-page, must be taken to be that of the completion of the work.] It bears the monogram of the publisher, Godfried van der Haghen, and is sometimes known as the GH edition. It has no marginal notes. Another edition, which is stated on its title-page to have been finished in 1535, contains practically the same text, but is notable for its spelling, which appears to be due to a Flemish compositor, working by ear and not by sight. These editions of 1535, which embody several small changes from the text of 1534, represent Tindale's work in its final form. Several editions were issued in 1536, but Tindale was not then in a position to supervise them. In May 1535, through the treachery of one Phillips, he was seized by some officers of the emperor, and carried off from Antwerp (where he had lived for a year past) to the castle of Vilvorde. After some months' imprisonment he was brought to trial, condemned, and finally strangled and burnt at the stake on Oct. 6, 1536, crying 'with a fervent, great, and a loud voice, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes."'.

The chief authority for the life of Tindale is the biography by the Rev. R. Demaus (2nd ed., revised by R. Lovett, 1886). The fragmentary quarto of 1525 is published in photographic facsimile by E. Arber (The First Printed English NT, 1871), with an important introduction. The octavo of 1525 is reproduced in facsimile by F. Fry (1862), as also is the Jonah of 1531 (1863). The Pentateuch is reprinted by Mombert (Bagster, 1884), and the NT of 1534 in Bagster's English Hexapla. See also the general bibliography at the end of this article.

18. Coverdale's Bible (1535). Tindale never had the satisfaction of completing his gift of an English Bible to his country; but during his imprisonment he may have learnt that a complete translation, based largely upon his own, had actually been produced. The credit for this achievement, the first complete printed English Bible, is due to Miles Coverdale (1488-1569), afterwards bishop of Exeter (1551-1553). The details of its production are obscure. Coverdale met Tindale abroad in 1529, and is said to have assisted him in the translation of the Pentateuch. His own work was done under the patronage of Cromwell, who was anxious for the publication of an English Bible. ~~and it was no doubt~~ forwarded by the action of Convocation, which, under Cranmer's leading, had petitioned in 1534 for the undertaking of such a work. It was probably printed by Froshover at Zurich; but this has never been absolutely demonstrated. It was published at the end of 1535, with a dedication to Henry VIII. By this time the conditions were more favourable to a Protestant Bible than they had been in 1525. Henry had finally broken with the Pope, and had committed himself to the principle of an English Bible. Coverdale's work was accordingly tolerated by authority, and when the second edition of it appeared in 1537 (printed by an English printer, Nycolson of Southwark), it bore on its title-page the words, 'Set forth with the Kinges moost gracious licence.' In thus licensing Coverdale's translation, Henry probably did not know how far he was sanctioning the work of Tindale, which he had previously condemned. In the NT, in particular, Tindale's version is the basis of Coverdale's, and to a somewhat less extent this is also the case in the Pentateuch and Jonah; but Coverdale revised the work of his predecessor with the help of the Zurich German Bible of Zwingli and others (1524-1529), a Latin version by Pagninus, the Vulgate, and Luther. In his preface he explicitly disclaims originality as a translator, and there is no sign that he made any noticeable use of the Greek and Hebrew; but he used the available Latin, German, and English versions with judgment. In the parts of the OT which Tindale had not published he appears to have translated mainly from the Zurich Bible. [Coverdale's Bible of 1535 was reprinted by Bagster (1838).]

19. In one respect Coverdale's Bible was epoch-making, namely, in the arrangement of the Books of the OT. In the Vulgate, as is well known, the books which are now classed as Apocrypha are intermingled with the other books of the OT. This was also the case with the LXX, and in general it may be said that the Christian Church had adopted this view of the Canon. It is true that many of the greatest Christian Fathers had protested against it, and had preferred the Hebrew Canon, which rejects these books. The Canon of Athanasius places the Apocrypha in a class apart; the Syrian Bible omitted them; Eusebius and Gregory Nazianzen appear to have held similar views; and Jerome refused to translate them for his Latin Bible. Nevertheless the Church at large, both East and West, retained them in their Bibles, and the provincial Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), under the influence of Augustine, expressly included them in the Canon. In spite of Jerome, the Vulgate, as it circulated in Western Europe, regularly included the disputed books; and Wyclif's Bible, being a translation from the Vulgate, naturally has them too. On the other hand, Luther, though recognizing these books as profitable and good for reading placed them in a class apart, as 'Apocrypha,' and in the same way he segregated Heb., Ja., Jude, and Apoc. at the end of the NT, as of less value and authority than the rest. This arrangement appears in the table of contents of Tindale's NT in 1525, and was adopted by Coverdale, Matthew, and Taverner. It is to Tindale's example, no doubt, that the action of Coverdale is due. His Bible is divided into six parts—(1) Pentateuch; (2) Jos.-Est.; (3) Job-Solomon's Balettes' (i.e. Cant.); (4) Prophets; (5) 'Apocrypha, the bookes and treatises which amonge the fathers of olde are not rekened to be of like authorite with the other bookes of the byble, neither are they founde in the Canon of the Hebrue'; (6) NT. This represents the view generally taken by the Reformers, both in Germany and in England, and so far as concerns the English Bible, Coverdale's example was decisive. On the other hand, the Roman Church, at the Council of Trent (1546), adopted by a majority the opinion that all the books of the larger Canon should be received as of equal authority, and for the first time made this a dogma of the Church, enforced by an anathema. In 1538, Coverdale published a NT with Latin (Vulgate)

and English in parallel columns, revising his English to bring it into conformity with the Latin; but this (which went through three editions with various changes) may be passed over, as it had no influence on the general history of the English Bible.

20. Matthew's Bible (1537). In the same year as the second edition of Coverdale's Bible another English Bible appeared, which likewise bore upon its title-page the statement that it was 'set forth with the Kinges most gracyous lycence.' It was completed not later than Aug. 4, 1537, on which day Crammer sent a copy of it to Cromwell, commending the translation, and begging Cromwell to obtain for it the king's licence; in which, as the title-page prominently shows, he was successful. The origin of this version is slightly obscure, and certainly was not realized by Henry when he sanctioned it. The Pentateuch and NT are taken direct from Tindale with little variation (the latter from the final 'GH' revision of 1535). The books of the OT from Ezra to Mal. (including Jonah) are taken from Coverdale, as also is the Apocrypha. But the historical books of the OT (Jos.-2 Chron.) are a new translation, as to the origin of which no statement is made. It is, however, fairly certain, from a combination of evidence, that it was Tindale's (see Westcott², pp. 169-170). The style agrees with that of Tindale's other work; the passages which Tindale published as 'Epistles' from the OT in his NT of 1534 agree in the main with the present version in these books, but not in those taken from Coverdale; and it is expressly stated in Hall's Chronicle (completed and published by Grafton, one of the publishers of Matthew's Bible) that Tindale, in addition to the NT, translated also 'the v bookes of Moses, Josua, Judicum, Ruth, the bookes of the Kynges and the bookes of Paralipomenon, Nehemias or the fyrst of Esdras, the prophet Jonas, and no more of ye holy scripture.' If we suppose the version of Ezra-Nehemiah to have been incomplete, or for some reason unavailable, this statement harmonizes perfectly with the data of the problem. Tindale may have executed the translation during his imprisonment, at which time we know that he applied for the use of his Hebrew books. The book was printed abroad, at the expense of R. Grafton and E. Whitchurch, two citizens of London, who issued it in London. On the title-page is the statement that the translator was Thomas Matthew, and the same name stands at the foot of the dedication to Henry VIII. Nothing is known of any such person, but tradition identifies him with John Rogers (who in the register of his arrest in 1555 is described as 'John Rogers alias Matthew'), a friend and companion of Tindale. It is therefore generally believed that this Bible is due to the editorial work of John Rogers, who had come into possession of Tindale's unpublished translation of the historical books of the OT, and published them with the rest of his friend's work, completing the Bible with the help of Coverdale. It may be added that the initials I. R. (Rogers), W. T. (Tindale), R. G. and E. W. (Grafton and Whitchurch), and H. R. (unidentified, ? Henricus Rex) are printed in large letters on various blank spaces throughout the OT. The arrangement of the book is in four sections: (1) Gen.-Cant., (2) Prophets, (3) Apocrypha (including for the first time the Prayer of Manasses, translated from the French of Olivetan), (4) NT. There are copious annotations, of a decidedly Protestant tendency, and Tindale's outspoken Prologue to the Romans is included in it. The whole work, therefore, was eminently calculated to extend the impulse given by Tindale, and to perpetuate his work.

21. Taverner's Bible (1539). Matthew's Bible formed the basis for yet another version, which deserves brief mention, though it had no influence on the general development of the English Bible. Richard Taverner, formerly a student of Cardinal College (Christ Church), Oxford, was invited by some London printers ('John Byddell for Thomas Barthlet') to prepare at short notice a revision of the existing Bible. In the OT his alterations are verbal, and aim at the improvement of the style of the translation; in the NT, being a good Greek scholar, he was able to revise it with reference to the original Greek. The NT was issued separately in two editions, in the same year (1539) as the complete Bible, but the success of the official version next to be mentioned speedily extinguished such a personal venture as this. Taverner's Bible is sometimes said to have been the first English Bible completely printed in England; but this honour appears to belong rather to Coverdale's second edition.

22. The Great Bible (1539-1541). The fact that Taverner was invited to revise Matthew's Bible almost immediately after its publication shows that it was not universally regarded as successful; but there were in addition other reasons why those who had promoted the circulation and authorization of Matthew's Bible should be anxious to see it superseded. As stated above, it was highly controversial in character, and bore plentiful evidence of its origin from Tindale. Cromwell and Crammer had, no doubt, been careful not to call Henry's attention to these circumstances; but they might at any time be brought to his notice, when their own position would become highly precarious. It is, indeed, strange that they ever embarked on so risky an enterprise. However that may be, they lost little time in inviting Coverdale to undertake a complete revision of the whole, which was ready for the press early in 1538. The printing was begun by Regnault of Paris, where more sumptuous typography was possible than in England. In spite, however, of the assent of the French king having been obtained, the Inquisition intervened, stopped the printing, and seized the sheets. Some of the sheets, however, had previously been got away to England; others were re-purchased from a tradesman to whom they had been sold; and ultimately, under Cromwell's direction, printers and presses were transported from Paris to London, and the work completed there by Grafton and Whitchurch, whose imprint stands on the magnificent title-page (traditionally ascribed to Holbein) depicting the dissemination of the Scriptures from the hands of Henry, through the instrumentality of Cromwell and Crammer, to the general mass of the loyal and rejoicing populace. [A special copy on vellum, with illuminations, was prepared for Cromwell himself, and is now in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge.]

23. The first edition of the Great Bible appeared in April 1539, and an injunction was issued by Cromwell that a copy of it should be set up in every parish church. It was consequently the first (and only) English Bible formally authorized for public use; and contemporary evidence proves that it was welcomed and read with avidity. No doubt, as at an earlier day (Ph 2^b), some read the gospel 'of envy and strife, and some also of good will'; but in one way or another, for edification or for controversy, the reading of the Bible took a firm hold on the people of England, a hold which has never since been relaxed, and which had much to do with the stable foundation of the Protestant Church in this country. Nor was the translation, though still falling short of the perfection reached three-quarters of a century later, unworthy of its position. It had many positive merits, and marked a distinct advance upon all its predecessors. Coverdale, though without the force and originality, or even the scholarship, of Tindale, had some of the more valuable gifts of a translator, and was well qualified to make the best use of the labours of his predecessors. He had scholarship enough to choose and follow the best authorities, he had a happy gift of smooth and effective phraseology, and his whole heart was in his work. As the basis of his revision he had Tindale's work and his own previous version; and these he revised with reference to the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, with special assistance in the OT from the Latin translation by Sebastian Münster published in 1534-35 (a work decidedly superior to the Zurich Bible, which had been his principal guide in 1534), while in the NT he made considerable use of Erasmus. With regard to the use of ecclesiastical terms, he followed his own previous example, against Tindale, in retaining the familiar Latin phrases; and he introduced a considerable number of words and sentences from the Vulgate, which do not appear in the Hebrew or Greek. The text is divided into five sections—(1) Pent., (2) Jos.-Job, (3) Psalms-Mal., (4) Apocrypha, here entitled 'Hagiographa,' though quite different from the books to which that term is applied in the Hebrew Bible, (5) NT, in which the traditional order of the books is restored in place of Luther's. Coverdale intended to add a commentary at the end, and with this view inserted various marks in the margins, the purpose of which he explains in the Prologue; but he was unable to obtain the sanction of the Privy Council for these, and after standing in the margin for three editions the sign-post marks were withdrawn.

24. The first edition was exhausted within twelve months, and in April 1540 a second edition appeared, this time with a prologue by Cranmer (from which fact the Great Bible is sometimes known as Cranmer's Bible, though he had no part in the translation). Two more editions followed in July and November, the latter (Cromwell having now been overthrown and executed) appearing under the nominal patronage of Bishops Tunstall and Heath. In 1541 three editions were issued. None of these editions was a simple reprint. The Prophets, in particular, were carefully revised with the help of Münster for the second edition. The fourth edition (Nov. 1540) and its successors revert in part to the first. These seven editions spread the knowledge of the Bible in a sound, though not perfect, version broadcast through the land; and one portion of it has never lost its place in our liturgy. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. the Psalter (like the other Scripture passages) was taken from the Great Bible. In 1662, when the other passages were taken from the version of 1611, a special exception was made of the Psalter, on account of the familiarity which it had achieved, and consequently Coverdale's version has held its place in the Book of Common Prayer to this day, and it is in his words that the Psalms have become the familiar household treasures of the English people.

25. With the appearance of the Great Bible comes the first pause in the rapid sequence of vernacular versions set on foot by Tindale. The English Bible was now fully authorized, and accessible to every Englishman in his parish church; and the translation, both in style and in scholarship, was fairly abreast of the attainments and requirements of the age. We hear no more, therefore, at present of further revisions of it. Another circumstance which may have contributed to the same result was the reaction of Henry in his latter years against Protestantism. There was talk in Convocation about a translation to be made by the bishops, which anticipated the plan of the Bible of 1568; and Cranmer prompted Henry to transfer the work to the universities, which anticipated a vital part of the plan of the Bible of 1611; but nothing came of either project. The only practical steps taken were in the direction of the destruction of the earlier versions. In 1543 a proclamation was issued against Tindale's versions, and requiring the obliteration of all notes; in 1546 Coverdale's NT was likewise prohibited. The anti-Protestant reaction, however, was soon terminated by Henry's death (Jan. 1547); and during the reign of Edward VI., though no new translation (except a small part of the Gospels by Sir J. Cheke) was attempted, many new editions of Tindale, Coverdale, Matthew, and the Great Bible issued from the press. The accession of Mary naturally put a stop to the printing and circulation of vernacular Bibles in England; and, during the attempt to put the clock back by force, Rogers and Cranmer followed Tindale to the stake, while Coverdale was imprisoned, but was released, and took refuge at Geneva.

26. The Geneva Bible (1557-1560). Geneva was the place at which the next link in the chain was to be forged. Already famous, through the work of Beza, as a centre of Biblical scholarship, it became the rallying place of the more advanced members of the Protestant party in exile, and under the strong rule of Calvin it was identified with Puritanism in its most rigid form. Puritanism, in fact, was here consolidated into a living and active principle, and demonstrated its strength as a motive power in the religious and social life of Europe. It was by a relative of Calvin, and under his own patronage, that the work of improving the English translation of the Bible was once more taken in hand. This was W. Whittingham, a Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, and subsequently dean of Durham, who in 1557 published the NT at Geneva in a small octavo volume, the handles, form in which the English Scriptures had yet been given to the world. In two other respects also this marked an epoch in the history of the English Bible. It was the first version to be printed in Roman type, and the first in which the division of the text into numbered verses (originally made by R. Stephanus for his Græco-Latin Bible of 1551) was introduced. A preface was contributed by Calvin himself. The translator claims to have made constant use of the original Greek and of translations in other tongues, and he added a full marginal commentary. If the matter had ended there, as the work of a single scholar on one part of the Bible, it would probably have left little mark; but it was at once made the basis of a revised version of both Testaments by a group of Puritan scholars. The details of the work are not recorded, but the principal workers, apart from Whittingham himself, appear to have been Thomas Sampson, formerly dean of Chichester, and afterwards dean of Christ Church, and A. Gilby, of Christ's College, Cambridge. A version of the Psalter was issued in 1559 [the only two extant copies of it belong to the Earl of Ellesmere and Mr. Aldis Wright], and in 1560 the complete Bible was given to the world, with the imprint of Rowland Hall, at Geneva. The Psalter in this was the same as that of 1559; but the NT had been largely revised since 1557. The book was a moderate-sized quarto, and contained a dedication to Elizabeth, an address to the brethren at home, the books of the OT (including Apocrypha) and NT in the same order as in the Great Bible and our modern Bibles, copious marginal notes (those to the NT taken from Whittingham with some additions), and an apparatus of maps and woodcuts. In type and verse-division it followed the example of Whittingham's NT.

27. The Geneva revisers took the Great Bible as their basis in the OT, and Matthew's Bible (i.e. Tindale) in the NT. For the former they had the assistance of the Latin Bible of Leo Juda (1544), in addition to Pagninus (1527), and they were in consultation with the scholars (including Calvin and Beza) who were then engaged at Geneva in a similar work of revision of the French Bible. In the NT their principal guide was Beza, whose reputation stood highest among all the Biblical scholars of the age. The result was a version which completely distanced its predecessors in scholarship, while in style and vocabulary it worthily carried on the great tradition established by Tindale. Its success was as decisive as it was well deserved; and in one respect it met a want which none of its predecessors (except perhaps Tindale's) had attempted to meet. Coverdale's, Matthew's, and the Great Bible were all large folios, suitable for use in church, but unsuited both in size and in price for private possession and domestic study. The Geneva Bible, on the contrary, was moderate in both respects, and achieved instant and long-enduring popularity as the Bible for personal use. For a full century it continued to be the Bible of the people, and it was upon this version, and not upon that of King James, that the Bible knowledge of the Puritans of the Civil War was built up. Its notes furnished them with a full commentary on the sacred text, predominantly hortatory or monitory in character, but Calvinistic in general tone, and occasionally definitely polemical. Over 160 editions of it are said to have been issued, but the only one which requires separate notice is a revision of the NT by Laurence Tomson in 1576, which carried still further the principle of deference to Beza; this revised NT was successful, and was frequently bound up with the Genevan OT in place of the edition of 1560. [The Geneva Bible is frequently called (in booksellers' catalogues and elsewhere) the 'Breeches' Bible, on account of this word being used in the translation of Gn 3⁷.]

28. The Bishops' Bible (1568). Meanwhile there was one quarter in which the Geneva Bible could hardly be expected to find favour, namely, among the leaders of the Church in England. Elizabeth herself was not too well disposed towards the Puritans, and the bishops in general belonged to the less extreme party in the Church. On the other hand, the superiority of the Genevan to the Great Bible could not be contested. Under these circumstances the old project of a translation to be produced by the bishops was revived. The archbishop of Canterbury, Matthew Parker, was himself a scholar, and took up the task with interest. The basis of the new version was to be the authorized Great Bible. Portions of the text were assigned to various revisers, the majority of whom were bishops. The archbishop exercised a general supervision over the work, but there does not appear to have been any organized system of collaboration or revision, and the results were naturally unequal. In the OT the alterations are mainly verbal, and do not show much originality or genius. In the NT the scholarship shown is on a much higher level, and there is much more independence in style and judgment. In both, use is made of the Geneva Bible, as well as of other versions. The volume was equipped with notes, shorter than those of the Geneva Bible, and generally exegetical. It appeared in 1568, from the press of R. Jugge, in a large folio volume, slightly exceeding even the dimensions of the Great Bible. Parker applied through Cecil for the royal sanction, but it does not appear that he ever obtained it; but Convocation in 1571 required a copy to be kept in every archbishop's and bishop's house and in every cathedral, and, as far as could conveniently be done, in all churches. The Bishops' Bible, in fact, superseded the Great Bible as the official version, and its predecessor ceased henceforth to be reprinted; but it never attained the popularity and influence of the Geneva Bible. A second edition was issued in 1569, in which a considerable number of alterations were made, partly, it appears, as the result of the criticisms of Giles Laurence, professor of Greek at Oxford. In 1572 a third edition appeared, of importance chiefly in the NT, and in some cases reverting to the first edition of 1568. In this form the Bishops' Bible continued in official use until its supersession by the version of 1611, of which it formed the immediate basis.

29. The Rheims and Douai Bible (1582-1609). The English exiles for religious causes were not all of one kind or of one faith. There were Roman Catholic refugees on the Continent as well as Puritan, and from the one, as from the other, there proceeded an English version of the Bible. The centre of the English Roman Catholics was the English College at Douai, the foundation (in 1568) of William Allen, formerly of Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently cardinal; and it was from this college that a new version of the Bible emanated which was intended to serve as a counterblast to the Protestant versions, with which England was now flooded. The first instalment of it appeared in 1582, during a temporary migration of the college to Rheims.

This was the NT, the work mainly of Gregory Martin, formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, with the assistance of a small band of scholars from the same university. The OT is stated to have been ready at the same time, but for want of funds it could not be printed until 1609, after the college had returned to Douai, when it appeared just in time to be of some use to the preparers of King James' version. As was natural, the Roman scholars did not concern themselves with the Hebrew and Greek originals, which they definitely rejected as inferior, but translated from the Latin Vulgate, following it with a close fidelity which is not infrequently fatal, not merely to the style, but even to the sense in English. The following short passage (Eph 3⁸⁻¹²), taken almost at random, is a fair example of the Latinization of their style.

'The Gentils to be coheires and concorporat and com participant of his promiss in Christ Jesus by the Gospel: whereof I am made a minister according to the gift of the grace of God, which is given me according to the operation of his power. To me the least of al the saintes is given this grace, among the Gentils to evangelize the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to illuminate al men what is the dispensation of the sacrament hidden from worldes in God, who created al things; that the manifold wisdom of God may be notified to the Princes and Potestats in the celestials by the Church, according to the prefiguration of wordes, which he made in Christ Jesus our Lord. In whom we have affiance and accesse in confidence, by the faith of him.'

The translation, being prepared with a definite polemical purpose, was naturally equipped with notes of a controversial character, and with a preface in which the object and method of the work were explained. It had, however, as a whole, little success. The OT was reprinted only once in the course of a century, and the NT not much oftener. In England the greater part of its circulation was due to the action of a vehement adversary, W. Fulke, who, in order to expose its errors, printed the Rheims NT in parallel columns with the Bishops' version of 1572, and the Rheims annotations with his own refutations of them; and this work had a considerable vogue. Regarded from the point of view of scholarship, the Rheims and Douai Bible is of no importance, marking retrogression rather than advance; but it needs mention in a history of the English Bible, because it is one of the versions of which King James' translators made use. The AV is indeed distinguished by the strongly English (as distinct from Latin) character of its vocabulary; but of the Latin words used (and used effectively), many were derived from the Bible of Rheims and Douai.

30. The Authorized Version (1611). The version which was destined to put the crown on nearly a century of labour, and, after extinguishing by its excellence all rivals, to print an indelible mark on English religion and English literature, came into being almost by accident. It arose out of the Hampton Court Conference, held by James I. in 1604, with the object of arriving at a settlement between the Puritan and Anglican elements in the Church; but it was not one of the prime or original subjects of the conference. In the course of discussion, Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the leader of the moderate Puritan party, referred to the imperfections and disagreements of the existing translations; and the suggestion of a new version, to be prepared by the best scholars in the country, was warmly taken up by the king. The conference, as a whole, was a failure; but James did not allow the idea of the revision to drop. He took an active part in the preparation of instructions for the work, and to him appears to be due the credit of two features which went far to secure its success. He suggested that the translation should be committed in the first instance to the universities (subject to subsequent review by the bishops and the Privy Council, which practically came to nothing), and thereby secured the services of the best scholars in the country, working in co-operation; and (on the suggestion of the bishop of London) he laid down that no marginal notes should be added, which preserved the new version from being the organ of any one party in the Church.

31. Ultimately it was arranged that six companies of translators should be formed, two at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge. The companies varied in strength from 7 to 10 members, the total (though there is some little doubt with regard to a few names) being 47. The Westminster companies undertook Gn.-2 Kings and the Epistles, the Oxford companies the Prophets and the Gospels, Ac., and Apoc., and the Cambridge companies 1 Chron.-Eccles. and the Apocrypha. A series of rules was drawn up for their guidance. The Bishops' Bible was to be taken as the basis. The old ecclesiastical terms were to be kept. No marginal notes were to be affixed, except for the explanation of Hebrew or Greek words. Marginal references, on the contrary, were to be supplied. As each company finished a book, it was to send it to the other companies for their consideration. Suggestions were to be invited from the clergy generally, and opinions requested on passages of special difficulty from any learned man in the land. 'These translations to be used when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, namely, Tindale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whitchurch's (i.e. the Great Bible), Geneva.' The translators claim further to have consulted all the available versions and commentaries in other languages and to have repeatedly revised their own work, without grudging the time which it required. The time occupied by the whole work is stated by themselves as two years and three-quarters. The several companies appear to have begun their labours about the end of 1607, and to have taken two years in completing their several shares. A final revision, occupying nine months, was then made by a smaller body, consisting of two representatives from each company, after which it was seen through the press by Dr. Miles Smith and Bishop Bilson; and in 1611 the new version, printed by R. Barker, the king's printer, was given to the world in a large folio volume (the largest of all the series of English Bibles) of black letter type. The details of its issue are obscure. There were at least two issues in 1611, set up independently, known respectively as the 'He' and 'She' Bibles, from their divergence in the translation of the last words of Ruth 3rd; and bibliographers have differed as to their priority, though the general opinion is in favour of the former. Some copies have a wood-block, others an engraved title-page, with different designs. The title-page was followed by the dedication to King James, which still stands in our ordinary copies of the AV, and this by the translators' preface (believed to have been written by Dr. Miles Smith), which is habitually omitted. [It is printed in the present King's Printers' Variorum Bible, and is interesting and valuable both as an example of the learning of the age and for its description of the translators' labours.] For the rest, the contents and arrangement of the AV are too well known to every reader to need description.

32. Nor is it necessary to dwell at length on the characteristics of the translation. Not only was it superior to all its predecessors, but its excellence was so marked that no further revision was attempted for over 250 years. Its success must be attributed to the fact which differentiated it from its predecessors, namely, that it was not the work of a single scholar (like Tindale's, Coverdale's, and Matthew's Bibles), or of a small group (like the Geneva and Douai Bibles), or of a larger number of men working independently with little supervision (like the Bishops' Bible), but was produced by the collaboration of a carefully selected band of scholars, working with ample time and with full and repeated revision. Nevertheless, it was not a new translation. It owed much to its predecessors. The translators themselves say, in their preface: 'We never thought from the beginning that we should need to make a new translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one, . . . but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones one principal good one, not justly to be excepted against; that hath been our endeavour, that our mark.' The description is very just. The foundations of the AV were laid by Tindale, and a great part of his work continued through every revision. Each succeeding version added something to the original stock, Coverdale (in his own and the Great Bible) and the Geneva scholars contributing the largest share; and the crown was set upon the whole by the skilled labour of the Jacobean divines, making free use of the materials accumulated by others, and happily inspired by the gift of style which was the noblest literary achievement of the age in which they lived. A sense of the solemnity of their subject saved them from the extravagances and conceits which sometimes mar that style; and, as a result, they produced a work which, from the merely literary point of view, is the finest example of Jacobean prose, and has influenced incalculably the whole subsequent course of English literature. On the character and spiritual history of the nation it has left an even deeper mark, to which many writers have borne eloquent testimony; and if England has been, and is, a Bible-reading and Bible-loving country, it is in no small measure due to her possession of a version so nobly executed as the AV.

33. The history of the AV after 1611 can be briefly sketched. In spite of the name by which it is commonly known, and in spite of the statement on both title-pages of 1611 that it was 'appointed to be read in churches,' there is no evidence that it was ever officially authorized either by the Crown or by Convocation. Its authorization seems to have been tacit and gradual. The Bishops' Bible, hitherto the official version, ceased to be reprinted, and the AV no doubt gradually replaced it in churches as occasion arose. In domestic use its fortunes were for a time more doubtful, and for two generations it existed concurrently with the Geneva Bible; but before the century was out its predominance was assured. The first 4to and 8vo editions were issued in 1612; and thenceforward editions were so numerous that it is useless to refer to any except a few of them. The early editions were not very correctly printed. In 1638 an attempt to secure a correct text was made by a small group of Cambridge scholars. In 1633 the first edition printed in Scotland was published. In 1701 Bishop Lloyd superintended the printing of an edition at Oxford, in which Archbishop Ussher's dates for Scripture chronology were printed in the margin, where they thenceforth remained. In 1717 a fine edition, printed by Baskett at Oxford, earned bibliographical notoriety as 'The Vinegar Bible' from a misprint in the headline over Lk 20. In 1762 a carefully revised edition was published at Cambridge under the editorship of Dr. T. Paris, and a similar edition, superintended by Dr. B. Blayney, appeared at Oxford in 1769. These two editions, in which the text was carefully revised, the spelling modernized, the punctuation corrected, and considerable alteration made in the marginal notes, formed the standard for subsequent reprints of the AV, which differ in a number of details, small in importance but fairly numerous in the aggregate, from the original text of 1611. One other detail remains to be mentioned. In 1666 appeared the first edition of the AV from which the Apocrypha was omitted. It had previously been omitted from some editions of the Geneva Bible, from 1599 onwards. The Nonconformists took much objection to it, and in 1664 the Long Parliament forbade the reading of lessons from it in public; but the lectionary of the English Church always included lessons from it. The example of omission was followed in many editions subsequently. The first edition printed in America (apart from a surreptitious edition of 1752), in 1782, is without it. In 1826 the British and Foreign Bible Society, which has been one of the principal agents in the circulation of the Scriptures throughout the world, decided never in future to print or circulate copies containing the Apocrypha; and this decision has been carried into effect ever since.

34. So far as concerned the translation of the Hebrew and Greek texts which lay before them, the work of the authors of the AV, as has been shown above, was done not merely well but excellently. There were, no doubt, occasional errors of interpretation; and in regard to the OT in particular the Hebrew scholarship of the age was not always equal to the demands made upon it. But such errors as were made were not of such magnitude or quantity as to have made any extensive revision necessary or desirable even now, after a lapse of nearly three hundred years. There was, however, another defect, less important (and indeed necessarily invisible at the time), which the lapse of years ultimately forced into prominence, namely, in the text (and especially the Greek text) which they translated. As has been shown elsewhere (TEXT OF THE NT), criticism of the Greek text of the NT had not yet begun. Scholars were content to take the text as it first came to hand, from the late MSS which were most readily accessible to them. The NT of Erasmus, which first made the Greek text generally available in Western Europe, was based upon a small group of relatively late MSS, which happened to be within his reach at Basle. The edition of Stephanus in 1550, which practically established the 'Received Text' which has held the field till our own day, rested upon a somewhat superficial examination of 15 MSS, mostly at Paris, of which only two were uncials, and these were but slightly used. None of the great MSS which now stand at the head of our list of authorities was known to the scholars of 1611. None of the ancient versions had been critically edited; and so far as King James' translators made use of them (as we know they did), it was as aids to interpretation, and not as evidence for the text, that they employed them. In saying this there is no imputation of blame. The materials for a critical study and restoration of the text were not then extant; and men were concerned only to translate the text which lay before them in the current Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Bibles. Nevertheless it was in this inevitable defectiveness of text that the weakness lay which ultimately undermined the authority of the AV.

35. The Revised Version (1881-1895). The textual article above referred to describes the process of accumulation of materials which began with the coming of the Codex Alexandrinus to London in 1625, and continues to the present day, and the critical use made of these materials in the 19th century; and the story need not be repeated here. It was not until the progress of criticism had revealed the defective state of the received Greek text of the NT that any movement arose for the revision of the AV. About the year 1855 the question began to be mooted in magazine articles and motions in Convocation, and by way of bringing it to a head a small group of scholars [Dr. Ellicott, afterwards bishop of Gloucester, Dr. Moberly, head master of Winchester and afterwards bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Barron, principal of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, the Rev. H. Alford, afterwards dean of Canterbury, and the Rev. W. G. Humphrey; with the Rev. E. Hawkins, secretary of the S.P.G., and afterwards canon of Westminster, as their secretary] undertook a revision of the AV of Jn., which was published in 1857. Six of the Epistles followed in 1861 and 1863, by which time the object of the work, in calling attention to the need and the possibility of a revision, had been accomplished. Meanwhile a great stimulus to the interest in textual criticism had been given by the discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus, and by the work of Tischendorf and Tregelles. In Feb. 1870 a motion for a committee to consider the desirability of a revision was adopted by both Houses of the Convocation of Canterbury; and definite motions in favour of such a revision were passed in the following May. The Convocation of York did not concur, and thenceforward the Southern Houses proceeded alone. A committee of both Houses drew up the lists of revisers, and framed the rules for their guidance. The OT company consisted of 25 (afterwards 27) members, the NT of 26. The rules prescribed the introduction of as few alterations in the AV as possible consistently with faithfulness; the text to be adopted for which the evidence is decidedly preponderating, and when it differs from that from which the AV was made, the alteration to be indicated in the margin (this rule was found impracticable); alterations to be made on the first revision by simple majorities, but to be retained only if passed by a two-thirds majority on the second revision. Both companies commenced work at Westminster on June 22, 1870. The NT company met on 407 days in the course of eleven years, the OT company on 792 days in fifteen years. Early in the work the co-operation of American scholars was invited, and in consequence two companies of 15 and 16 members respectively were formed, which began work in 1872, considering the results of the English revision as each section of it was forwarded to them. The collaboration of the English and American companies was perfectly harmonious; and by agreement those recommendations of the American Revisers which were not adopted by the English companies, but to which the proposers nevertheless wished to adhere, were printed in an appendix to the published Bible. Publication took place, in the case of the NT, on May 17, 1881, and in the case of the canonical books of the OT almost exactly four years later. The revision of the Apocrypha was divided between the two English companies, and was taken up by each company on the completion of its main work. The NT company distributed Sirach, Tob., Jud., Wisd., 1 and 2 Mac. among three groups of its members, and the OT company appointed a small committee to deal with the remaining books. The work dragged on over many years, involving some inequalities in revision, and ultimately the Apocrypha was published in 1895.

36. In dealing with the OT the Revisers were not greatly concerned with questions of text. The Massoretic Hebrew text available in 1870 was substantially the same as that which King James' translators had before them; and the criticism of the LXX version was not sufficiently advanced to enable them safely to make much use of it except in marginal notes. Their work consisted mainly in the correction of mistranslations which imperfect Hebrew scholarship had left in the AV. Their changes as a rule are slight, but tend very markedly to remove obscurities and to improve the intelligibility of the translation. The gain is greatest in the poetical and prophetic books (poetical passages are throughout printed as such, which in itself is a great improvement), and there cannot be much doubt that if the revision of the OT had stood by itself it would have been generally accepted without much opposition. With the new version of the NT the case was different. The changes were necessarily more numerous than in the OT, and the greater familiarity with the NT possessed by readers in general made the alterations more conspicuous. The NT Revisers had, in effect, to form a new Greek text before they could proceed to translate it. In this part of their work they were largely influenced by the presence of Drs. Westcott and Hort, who, as will be shown elsewhere (TEXT OF THE NT), were keen and convinced champions of the class of text of which the best representative is the Codex Vaticanus. At the same time Dr. Scrivener, who took a less advanced view of the necessity of changes in the Received Text, was also a prominent member of the company, and it is probably true that not many new readings were adopted which had not the support of Tischendorf and Tregelles, and which would not be regarded by nearly all scholars acquainted with textual criticism as preferable to those of the AV. To Westcott and Hort may be assigned a large part of the credit for leading the Revisers definitely along the path of critical science; but the Revisers did not follow their leaders the whole way, and their text (edited by Archdeacon Palmer for the Oxford Press in 1881) represents a more conservative attitude than that of the two great Cambridge scholars. Nevertheless the amount of textual change was considerable, and to this was added a very large amount of verbal change, sometimes (especially in the Epistles) to secure greater intelligibility, but oftener (and this is more noticeable in the Gospels) to secure uniformity in the translation of Greek words which the AV deliberately rendered differently in different places (even in parallel narratives or the same event), and precision in the representation of moods and tenses. It was to the great number of changes of this kind, which by themselves appeared needless and pedantic, that most of the criticism bestowed upon the RV was due; but it must be remembered that where the words and phrases of a book are often strained to the uttermost in popular application, it is of great importance that those words and phrases should be as accurately rendered as possible. On the whole, it is certain that the RV marks a great advance on the AV in respect of accuracy, and the main criticisms to which it is justly open are that the principles of classical Greek were applied too rigidly to Greek which is not classical, and that the Revisers, in their careful attention to the Greek, were less happily inspired than their predecessors with the genius of the English language. These defects have no doubt militated against the general acceptance of the RV; but whether they continue to do so or not (and it is to be remembered that we have not yet passed through nearly so long a period as that during which the AV competed with the Geneva Bible or Jerome's Vulgate with the Old Latin), it is certain that no student of the Bible can afford to neglect the assistance given by the RV towards the true understanding of the Scriptures. In so using it, it should be remembered that renderings which appear in the margin not infrequently represent the views of more than half the Revisers, though they failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority. This is perhaps especially the case in the OT, where the RV shows a greater adherence to the AV than in the NT.

37. It only remains to add that, after the lapse of the 14 years during which it was agreed that no separate American edition should be brought out, while the American appendix continued to appear in the English RV, the American revisers issued a fresh recension (NT in 1900, OT in 1901, without the Apocrypha), embodying not only the readings which appeared in their appendix to the English RV, but also others on which they had since agreed. It is unfortunate that the action originally taken by the English revisers with a view to securing that the two English-speaking nations should continue to have a common Bible should have brought about the opposite result; and though the alterations introduced by the American revisers eminently deserve consideration on their merits, it may be doubted whether the net result is important enough to justify the existence of a separate version. What influence it may have upon the history of the English Bible in the future it is for the future to decide.

Literature.—No detailed history of the manuscript English versions is in existence. A good summary of the pre-Wycliffe versions is given in the introduction to A. S. Cook's Biblical Quotations in Old English Prose Writers, part 1 (1898); and the principal separate publications have been mentioned above. For the Wycliffe versions the main authority is the complete edition by J. Forshall and F. Madden (4 vols., 1850); the NT in the later version was separately printed by Skeat (1879). A good short conspectus of the subject is given in the introduction to the official Guide to the Wycliffe Exhibition in the British Museum (1884). The printed Bible has been much more fully investigated. The best single authority is Bishop Westcott's History of the English Bible (3rd ed., revised by W. Aldis Wright, 1905); see also the art. by J. H. Lupton in Hastings' DB (Extra Vol., 1904); W. F. Moulton, History of the English Bible (2nd ed., 1884); and H. W. Hoare, The Evolution of the English Bible (2nd ed., 1902). The Printed English Bible, by R. Lovett (R.T.S.'s 'Present Day Primers', 1894) is a good short history, and the same may be said of G. Milligan's The English Bible (Church of Scotland Guild Text Books, new ed., 1907). For a bibliography of printed Bibles, see the section 'Bible' in the British Museum Catalogue (published separately), and the Historical Catalogue of the Printed Editions of Holy Scripture in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society, vol. i., by T. H. Darlow and H. F. Moule (1903). For special and minute studies of certain parts of the subject, the works of F. Fry (The Bible by Coverdale, 1887; Description of the Great Bible, 1865; Bibliographical Description of the Editions of the NT, Tyndale's version, 1878) and E. Arber (The First Printed English NT, 1871) are invaluable. Bagster's English Hexapla (which can often be obtained second-hand) gives in parallel columns, beneath the Greek text as printed by Scholz, the NT according to (1) the second Wycliffe version; (2) Tyndale, from the edition of 1534; (3) the Great Bible of 1539; (4) the Geneva NT of 1557; (5) the Rheims NT of 1582; and (6) the AV of 1611. This gives the student a better idea of the evolution of the English Bible than any description. F. H. A. Scrivener's Authorised Edition of the English Bible (1884) gives a careful and authoritative account of the various editions of the AV. For the history of the RV, see the Revisers' preface and Bishop Ellicott's Revised Version of Holy Scripture (S.P.C.K. 1901). A more extensive bibliography is given in Dr. Lupton's article in Hastings' DB. F. C. KENYON.

EN-HADDAD (Jos 19²¹).—A city of Issachar noticed with En-gannim and Remeth; perhaps the present village Kefr Adhān on the edge of the Dothan plain, W. of En-gannim.

EN-HAKKORE ('spring of the partridge'; cf. 1 S 26²⁰, Jer 17¹¹).—The name of a fountain at Lehi (Jg 15¹⁹). The narrator (J (?)) of the story characteristically connects hakkōrē with the word yikkā ('he called') of v. 18, and evidently interprets 'En-hakkōrē' as 'the spring of him that called.' The whole narrative is rather obscure, and the tr. in some instances doubtful. The situation of En-hakkōrē is also quite uncertain.

EN-HAZOR ('spring of Hazor', Jos 19³⁷).—A town of Naphtali, perhaps the mod. Hazreh, on the W. slopes of the mountains of Upper Galilee, W. of Kedesh.

EN-MISHPAT ('spring of judgment,' or 'decision' (by oracle), Gn 14⁷).—A name for Kadesh—probably Kadesh-barnea. See KADESH.

ENNATAN (AV Eunatan), 1 Es 8⁴.—See ELNATHAN.

ENOCH (Heb. Chānōk) is the 'seventh from Adam' (Jude¹⁴) in the Sethite genealogy of Gn 5 (see vv. 18-24). In the Cainite genealogy of 4^{17a} he is the son of Cain, and therefore the third from Adam. The resemblances between the two lists seem to show that they rest on a common tradition, preserved in different forms by J (ch. 4) and P (ch. 5.), though it is not possible to say which version is the more original.—The notice which invests the figure of Enoch with its peculiar significance is found in 5²⁴ 'Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him.' The idea here suggested—that because of his perfect fellowship with God this patriarch was 'translated' to heaven without tasting death (cf. Sir 44¹⁶ 49⁴, He 11⁵)—appears to have exerted a certain influence on the OT doctrine of immortality (see Ps 49¹⁵ 73²⁴).—A much fuller tradition is presupposed by the remarkable development of the Enoch legend in the Apocalyptic literature, where Enoch appears as a preacher of repentance, a prophet of future events, and the recipient of supernatural knowledge of the secrets of heaven and earth, etc. The origin of this tradition has probably been discovered in a striking Babylonian parallel. The seventh name in the list of ten antediluvian kings given by Berossus is Evedoranchus, which (it seems certain) is a corruption of Enmeduranki, a king of Sippar who was received into the fellowship of Shamash (the sun-god) and Ramman, was initiated into the mysteries of heaven and earth, and became the founder of a guild of priestly diviners. When or how this myth became known to the Jews we cannot tell. A trace of an original connexion with the sun-god has been suspected in the 365 years of Enoch's life (the number of days in the solar year). At all events it is highly probable that the Babylonian legend contains the germ of the later conception of Enoch as embodied in the apocalyptic Book of Enoch (c. a.c. 105-64), and the later Book of the Secrets of Enoch, on which see Hastings' DB i. 705ff.—A citation from the Book of Enoch occurs in Jude 14f. (=En 1^o 54, 272).

J. SKINNER.

ENOSH (Gn 4th J, 5th-11 P), ENOS (Lk 3th).—The name is poetical, denoting 'man'; the son of Seth, and grandson of Adam. As the time of Cain was marked by sin and violence, so that of Seth was marked by piety. In the days of Enosh men began to 'call with the name of J', i.e. to use His name in invocations. The name J^h having been known practically from the beginning of human life, the writer (J) always employs it in preference to the title 'Elohim.' In E (Ex 3rd) and P (6th) it was not revealed till long afterwards. A. H. McNEILE.

EN-RIMMON ('spring of [the] pomegranate').—One of the settlements of the Judahites after the return from the Exile (Neh 11th). In Jos 15th amongst the towns assigned to Judah we find 'Ain and Rimmon,' and in 19th (cf. 1 Ch 4th) amongst those assigned to Simeon are 'Ain, Rimmon.' In all these instances there can be little doubt that we ought to read En-rimmon. En-rimmon is probably to be identified with the modern Umm er-Rumāmin, about 9 miles N. of Beersheba.

EN-ROGEL ('spring of the fuller').—In the border of the territory of Judah (Jos 15th) and Benjamin (18th). It was outside Jerusalem; and David's spies, Jonathan and Ahimaaz, were here stationed in quest of news of the revolt of Absalom (2 S 17th). Here Adonijah made a feast 'by the stone of Zohaleth,' when he endeavoured to seize the kingdom (1 K 1st). The identification of this spring lies between two places, the Virgin's Fountain and Job's Well, both in the Kidron Valley. The strongest argument for the former site is its proximity to a cliff face called Zahweileh, in which an attempt has been made to recognize Zohaleth. This, however, is uncertain, as Zahweileh is a cliff, not an isolated stone.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ENSAMPLE.—'Ensampler' and 'example' (both from Lat. exemplum) are both used in AV. Tindale has 'ensampler' only, and so all the Eng. versions until the Rhemish appeared. That version used 'example' probably as being nearer the Vulg. word exemplum. The AV frequently reveals the influence of the Rhemish version.

EN-SHEMESH ('sun-spring,' Jos 15th 18th).—A spring E. of En-rogel, on the way to Jericho. It is believed to be the spring on the Jericho road E. of Olivet, generally known as the 'Apostles' fountain' ('Ain Hūd').

ENSIGN.—See BANNER.

ENSUE.—The verb 'ensue' is used intransitively, meaning to follow, in Jth 9th; and transitively, with the full force of pursue, in 1 P 3rd.

EN-TAPPUAH.—A place on the boundary of Manasseh (Jos 17th). Generally identified with a spring near Yāsūf, in a valley to the S. of Mukhna, which drains into Wady Kanah. The place is probably the Tappuah (wh. see) of Jos 16th 17th.

ENVY.—Envy leads to strife, and division, and railing, and hatred, and sometimes to murder. The Bible classes it with these things (Ro 12th 13th, 1 Co 3rd, 2 Co 12th, Gal 5th, 1 Ti 6th, Tit 3rd, Ja 3rd 16th). It is the antipode of Christian love. Envy loveth not, and love envieth not (1 Co 13th). Bacon closes his essay on 'Envy' with this sentence: 'Envy is the vilest affection and the most depraved; for which cause it is the proper attribute of the Devil, who is called, The envious man, that soweth tares amongst the wheat by night; as it always cometh to pass, that Envy worketh subtilly and in the dark, and to the prejudice of good things, such as is the wheat.' Chrysostom said: 'As a moth gnaws a garment, so doth envy consume a man, to be a living anatomy, a skeleton, to be a lean and pale carcass, quickened with a fiend.' These are Scriptural estimates. Envy is devilish, and absolutely inconsistent with the highest life. Examples abound in the Bible, such as are suggested by the relations between Cain and Abel, Jacob and Esau, Rachel and Leah, Joseph and his brothers, Saul and David, Haman and Mordecai, the elder brother and the prodigal son, the Roman evangelists of Ph 1st and the Apostle Paul, and many others.

D. A. HAYES.

EPÆNETUS.—A beloved friend of St. Paul at Rome, greeted in Ro 16th; he was the 'firstfruits of Asia (RV) unto Christ,' i.e. one of the first converts of that province. He was probably a native of Ephesus.

A. J. MACLEAN.

EPAPHRAS.—Mentioned by St. Paul in Col 17 4th, Philem 2nd; and described by him as his 'fellow-servant,' and also as a 'servant' and 'faithful minister' of Christ. He was a native or inhabitant of Colossæ (Col 4th), and as St. Paul's representative (17) founded the Church there (17). The fact of his prayerful zeal for Laodicea and Hierapolis suggests his having brought the faith to these cities also (4th). He brought news of the Colossian Church to the Apostle during his first Roman imprisonment, perhaps undertaking the journey to obtain St. Paul's advice as to the heresies that were there prevalent. He is spoken of as St. Paul's 'fellow-prisoner' (Philem 2nd), a title probably meaning that his care of the Apostle entailed the practical sharing of his captivity. The Epistle to the Colossians was a result of this visit, and Epaphras brought it back with him to his flock. Epaphras is a shortened form of Epaphroditus (Ph 2nd), but, as the name was in common use, it is not probable that the two are to be identified.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

EPAPHRODITUS.—Mentioned by St. Paul in Ph 2nd-30 4th, and described by him as his 'brother, fellow-worker, and fellow-soldier' (2nd). He was the messenger by whom the Philippians sent the offerings which fully supplied the necessities of St. Paul during his first Roman imprisonment (2nd 4th). In Rome he laboured so zealously for the Church and for the Apostle as to 'hazard' his life (2nd); indeed, he came 'nigh unto death,' but God had mercy on him, and the Apostle was spared this 'sorrow upon sorrow' (v. 27). News of his illness reached Philippi, and the distress thus caused his friends made him long to return (v. 28). St. Paul therefore sent him 'the more diligently,' thus relieving their minds, and at the same time lessening his own sorrows by his knowledge of their joy at receiving him back in health. Apparently the Epistle to the Philippians was sent by him.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

EPHAH.—1. A son of Midian, descended from Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25th-1 Ch 1st), the eponymous ancestor of an Arabian tribe whose identity is uncertain. This tribe appears in Is 60th as engaged in the transport of gold and frankincense from Sheba. 2. A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch 2nd). 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 2nd).

EPHAH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

EPHAI.—Described in Jer 40 (Gr 47)th as 'the Netophathite,' whose sons were amongst the 'captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah, and were murdered along with him by Ishmael (Jer 41st).

EPHER.—1. The name of the second of the sons of Midian mentioned in Gn 25th, 1 Ch 1st, and recorded as one of the descendants of Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gn 25th). 2. The name of one of the sons of Esrah

(1 Ch 4¹⁷). 3. The first of a group of five heads of fathers' houses belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch 5²⁴).

EPHES-DAMMIM.—The place in Judah where the Philistines were encamped at the time when David slew Goliath (1 S 17¹). The same name appears in 1 Ch 11¹⁸ as Pas-Dammim.

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO.—This Epistle belongs to the group of Epistles of the Captivity, and was almost certainly, if genuine, written from Rome, and sent by Tychicus at the same time as the Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (see COLOSSIANS).

1. Destination.—To whom was it addressed? That it was specifically written to the Ephesian Church is improbable, for two reasons—(1) The words 'at Ephesus' in 1¹ are absent from two of the earliest MSS, and apparently from the Epistle as known to Marcion (A.D. 140), who refers to it as addressed to the Laodiceans. Origen also had access to a copy of the Epistle from which they were absent. (2) The Epistle is almost entirely devoid of the personal touches—references to St. Paul's long stay at Ephesus, greetings to friends, etc.—that we should expect to find in an Epistle to a Church with which the Apostle's relations had been as close as they had been with the Ephesian Church. On the other hand, early tradition, as shown in the title, associated the Epistle with Ephesus, and, except Marcion, no early writer associated it with any other Church. Moreover, personal touches are not wholly absent. St. Paul has heard of the faith and love of those to whom he writes (1¹⁵); they had been saddened by news of his imprisonment (3¹³); they apparently know Tychicus (3²¹, 22). Perhaps the best explanation of all the facts is to be found in the suggestion made by Ussher, and adopted by Lightfoot (Biblical Essays), that the Epistle is really a circular letter to the Churches of Asia (cf. the First Epistle of St. Peter). Possibly the space where 'at Ephesus' now appears was left blank for Tychicus to fill in as he left copies of the letter at the various churches on his line of route. If this solution is the true one, this Epistle is most probably the letter referred to in Col 4¹⁶.

2. Purpose.—This Epistle, unlike most of St. Paul's, does not appear to have been written with a view to any particular controversy or problem of Church life. Of all the Pauline Epistles it has most of the character of a treatise or homily. Its keynote is the union of the Christian body, Jewish and Gentile, in Christ, in whom all things are being fulfilled. It may be regarded as carrying on the doctrinal teaching of the Epistle to the Romans from the point reached in that Epistle; and, indeed, may not improbably have been so intended by St. Paul.

3. Authenticity.—The authenticity of the Epistle is well attested by external testimony, but has been disputed during the last century on internal grounds. The chief of these are—(1) Difference of style from the earlier Epistles. This is very marked, but (a) the style is like that of the Epistle to the Colossians, and resembles also the Epistle to the Philippians; (b) there are many definitely Pauline phrases and turns of expression; (c) arguments from style are always unreliable (see COLOSSIANS). (2) Doctrinal differences. The chief of these are: (a) the prominence given to the 'Catholic' idea of the Church; (b) the doctrine of the pre-existent Christ as the agent of creation; (c) the substitution of the idea of the gradual fulfilment of the Divine purpose for the earlier idea of an imminent return (Parousia) of Christ. In these and other directions there is certainly a development, but is it not such a development as might easily take place in the mind of St. Paul, especially when three years of imprisonment had given him opportunities for quiet thought, and had brought him into contact with Roman imperialism at its centre? (3) The references to 'apostles and prophets' in 3⁴ 4¹¹, which seem to suggest that the writer is looking back on the Apostolic age from the standpoint of the next generation. But in 1 Co 12²⁸ 'apostles' and 'prophets' stand first in the order of spiritual gifts, and both there and here the word 'apostle' ought probably to be taken in a wider sense than as including only the Twelve and St. Paul. Apostles and prophets were the two kinds of teachers exercising general, as distinguished from localized, authority in the early Church.

Those who deny the genuineness of the Epistle have generally regarded it as the work of a disciple of St. Paul early in the 2nd century. Some critics admit the genuineness of Colossians, and regard this Epistle as a revised version drawn up at a later date. But the absence of any reference to the special theological controversies of the 2nd century, and of any obvious motive for the composition of the Epistle at a later time, make this theory difficult to accept. Nor is it easy to see how an Epistle purporting to be by St. Paul, that had not been in circulation during his lifetime, could have secured a place in the collection of his Epistles that began to be made very soon after his death (2 P 3¹⁶). There does not, then, seem to be any adequate ground for denying the Pauline authorship of this Epistle.

4. Characteristics.—The following are among the distinctive lines of thought of the Epistle. (1) The stress laid on the idea of the Church as the fulfilment of the eternal purpose of God—the body of which Christ is the head (1²² 2¹⁶ 3⁴ 4¹², 16), the building of which Christ is the corner-stone (2²⁰, 22), the bride (5²³, 27). (2) The cosmic significance of the Atonement (1¹⁰ 14 27 3¹⁰). (3) The prominence given to the work of the Holy Spirit (1¹³, 17 2¹⁸ 3¹⁶ 4³, 30 5⁶). In this the Epistle differs from Colossians, and resembles 1 Corinthians. (4) Repeated exhortations to unity, and the graces that make for unity (4¹⁻⁷, 13, 26-27 5⁶ etc.). (5) The conception of the Christian household (5²⁷-6⁹) and of the Christian warrior (6¹⁰-18).

5. Relation to other books.—The Epistle has lines of thought recalling 1 Cor. See, e.g., in 1 Cor. the idea of the riches (1³) and the mystery (2⁷-10) of the gospel, the work of the Spirit (2¹⁶, 11 12⁴), the building (3⁹-11, 16), the one body (10¹⁷ 12⁴, 12-16), all things subdued unto Christ (15²⁴-28). The relation to Colossians is very close. 'The one is the general and systematic exposition of the same truths which appear in a special bearing in the other' (Lightfoot). Cf. the relation of Galatians and Romans, Ephesians and Philippians have many thoughts in common. See, e.g., the Christian citizenship (Eph 2¹², 19, Ph 1²⁷ 3²⁰), the exaltation of Christ (Eph 1²⁰, Ph 2⁹), the true circumcision (Eph 2¹¹, Ph 3³), unity and stability (Eph 2¹⁹, 4³ 6¹³, Ph 1²⁷). Cf. also Eph 6¹⁸ with Ph 4⁶, and Eph 5³ with Ph 4¹⁸. In regard to Romans and Ephesians, 'the unity at which the former Epistle seems to arrive by slow and painful steps is assumed in the latter as a starting-point, with a vista of wondrous possibilities beyond' (Hort).

There is a close connexion between this Epistle and 1 Peter, not so much in details as in 'identities of thought and similarity in the structure of the two Epistles as wholes' (Hort). If there is any direct relation, it is probable that the author of 1 Peter used this Epistle, as he certainly used Romans. In some respects this Epistle shows an approximation of Pauline thought to the teaching of the Fourth Gospel. See, e.g., the teaching of both on grace, on the contrast of light and darkness, on the work of the pre-incarnate Logos; and compare Jn 17 with the whole Epistle. Cf. also Rev 21¹⁰, 14 with Eph 2²⁰, 21, Rev 19⁷ with Eph 5²⁶-27, and Rev 13⁸ with Eph 3¹.

J. H. B. MASTERMAN.

EPHESUS.—The capital of the Roman province Asia; a large and ancient city at the mouth of the river Cayster, and about 3 miles from the open sea. The origin of the name, which is native and not Greek, is unknown. It stood at the entrance to one of the four clefts in the surrounding hills. It is along these valleys that the roads through the central plateau of Asia Minor pass. The chief of these was the route up the Mæander as far as the Lycus, its tributary, then along the Lycus towards Apamea. It was the most important avenue of civilization in Asia Minor under the Roman Empire. Miletus had been in earlier times a more important harbour than Ephesus, but the track across from this main road to Ephesus was much shorter than the road to Miletus, and was over a pass only 600 ft. high. Consequently Ephesus replaced Miletus before and during the Roman Empire, especially as the Mæander had silted up so much as to spoil the harbour at the latter place. It became the great emporium for all the trade N. of Mt. Taurus.

Ephesus was on the main route from Rome to the East, and many side roads and sea-routes converged at it (Ac 19²¹ 20¹⁷, 1 Ti 1¹, 2 Ti 4¹²). The governors of the provinces in Asia Minor had always to land at Ephesus. It was an obvious centre for the work of St. Paul, as influences from there spread over the whole province (Ac 19¹⁹). Corinth was the next great station on the way to Rome, and communication between the two places was constant. The ship in Ac 18¹⁸, bound from Corinth for the Syrian coast, touched first at Ephesus.

Besides Paul, Tychicus (Eph 6²¹) and Timothy (according to 1 Ti 1¹, 2 Ti 4¹²), John Mark (Col 4¹⁰, 1 P 5¹²), and the writer of the Apocalypse (1¹ 2¹) were acquainted with Asia or Ephesus.

The harbour of Ephesus was kept large enough and deep enough only by constant attention. The alluvial deposits were (and are) so great that, when once the Roman Empire had ceased to hold sway, the harbour became gradually smaller and smaller, so that now Ephesus is far away from the sea. Even in St. Paul's time there appear to have been difficulties about navigating the channel, and ships avoided Ephesus except when loading or unloading was necessary (cf. Ac 20¹⁶). The route by the high lands, from Ephesus to the East, was suitable for foot passengers and light traffic, and was used by St. Paul (Ac 19¹; probably also 16⁹). The alternative was the main road through Colossæ and Laodicea, neither of which St. Paul ever visited (Col 2¹).

In the open plain, about 5 miles from the sea, S. of the river, stands a little hill which has always been a religious centre. Below its S.W. slope was the temple sacred to Artemis (see DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS). The Greek city Ephesus was built at a distance of 1-2 miles S.W. of this hill. The history of the town turns very much on the opposition between the free Greek spirit of progress and the slavish submission of the Oriental population to the goddess. Cræsus the Lydian represented the predominance of the latter over the former, but Lysimachus (B.C. 295) revived the Greek influence. Ephesus, however, was always proud of the position of 'Warden of the Temple of Artemis' (Ac 19³⁵). The festivals were thronged by crowds from the whole of the province of Asia. St. Paul, whose residence in Ephesus lasted 2 years and 3 months (Ac 19⁸ 10), or, roughly expressed, 3 years (Ac 20³¹), at first incurred no opposition from the devotees of the goddess, because new foreign religions did not lessen the influence of the native goddess; but when his teaching proved prejudicial to the money interests of the people who made a living out of the worship, he was at once bitterly attacked. Prior to this occurrence, his influence had caused many of the famous magicians of the place to burn their books (Ac 19¹⁹⁻¹⁹). The riot of 19⁴² was no mere passing fury of a section of the populace. The references to Ephesus in the Epistles show that the opposition to Christianity there was as long-continued as it was virulent (1 Co 15²³ 16⁹, 2 Co 1¹⁰).

The scene in Ac 19²³ derives some illustration from an account of the topography and the government of the city. The ruins of the theatre are large, and it has been calculated that it could hold 24,000 people. It was on the western slope of Mt. Pion, and overlooked the harbour. The Asiarchs (see ASIARCH), who were friendly to St. Paul, may have been present in Ephesus at that time on account of a meeting of their body (Ac 19³¹). The town-clerk or secretary of the city appears as a person of importance, and this is exactly in accordance with what is known of municipal affairs in such cities. The Empire brought decay of the influence of popular assemblies, which tended more and more to come into the hands of the officials, though the assembly at Ephesus was really the highest municipal authority (Ac 19³⁹), and the Roman courts and the proconsuls (Ac 19³⁸) were the final judicial authority in processes against individuals. The meeting of the assembly described in Acts was not a legal meeting. Legal meetings could be summoned only by the Roman officials, who had the power to call together the people when they pleased. The secretary tried to act as intermediary between the people and these officials, and save the people from trouble at their hands. The temple of Artemis which existed in St. Paul's day was of enormous size. Apart from religious purposes, it was used as a treasure-house: as to the precise arrangements for the charge of this treasure we are in ignorance.

There is evidence outside the NT also for the presence of Jews in Ephesus. The twelve who had been baptized with the baptism of John (Ac 19³) may have been persons who had emigrated to Ephesus before the mission of Jesus began. When St. Paul turned from the Jews to the population in general, he appeared, as earlier in Athens, as a lecturer in philosophy, and occupied the school of Tyrannus out of school hours. The earlier part of the day, beginning before dawn, he spent in manual labour. The actual foundation of Christianity in Ephesus may have been due to Priscilla and Aquila (Ac 18¹⁹).

'Ephesian' occurs as a variant reading in the 'Western' text of Ac 20⁴ for the words 'of Asia,' as applied to Tychicus and Trophimus. Trophimus was an inhabitant of Ephesus (Ac 21²⁹), capital of Asia; but Tychicus was probably merely an inhabitant of the province Asia; hence they are coupled under the only adjective applicable to both. It is hardly safe to infer from the fact that Tychicus bore the letter to the Colossians that he belonged to Colossæ (province Asia); but it is possible that he did. A. SOUTER.

EPHRAIM.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 27⁷).

EPHOD.—1. Father of Hanniel (Nu 34²³ P). 2. See DRESS, § 2 (c), and PRIESTS AND LEVITES. 3. The 'ephod' of Jg 8²⁷ 17¹⁸ 18¹⁴. 17. 18. 20 is probably an image.

EPHAPHATHA.—Mk 7³⁴, where Jesus says to a man who was deaf and had an impediment in his speech, 'Ephphatha,' that is, 'Be opened.' The word is really Aramaic, and if we transliterate it as it stands we obtain epphatath or epphathach. Both these forms are contracted: the former for ithpattath, the latter for ithpethach, which are respectively second sing. Imperative ithpaal and ithpeal of the verb pthach, 'to open.' Some Gr. MSS present ephphetha, which is certainly ithpeal, whereas epphatha may be ithpaal. Jerome also reads ephphetha.

It is not certain whom or what Jesus addressed when He said 'Be opened.' It may be the mouth of the man as in Lk 14¹⁴ (so Weiss, Morison, etc.); or the ear, as in Targ. of Is 50⁶ (so Bruce, Swete, etc.); or it may be the deaf man himself. One gate of knowledge being closed, the man is conceived of as a bolted room, and 'Jesus said to him, Be thou opened.'

EPHRAIM.—A grandson of Jacob, and the brother of Manasseh, the first-born of Joseph by Asenath, the daughter of Potiaphra, priest of On (Gn 41⁵⁰ [E], cf. v. 45 [J]). The 'popular etymology' of E connects the name with the verb pārāh, 'to be fruitful,' and makes it refer to Joseph's sons. In the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49²²) there may be a play upon the name when Joseph, who there represents both Ephraim and Manasseh, is called 'a fruitful bough.' The word is probably descriptive, meaning 'fertile region' whether its root be pārāh, or ʿēpher, 'earth' (?).

Gn 48¹⁴. (J) tells an interesting story of how Jacob adopted his Egyptian grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh, into his own family, and at the same time, against the remonstrances of Joseph, conferred the blessing of the firstborn upon Ephraim—hence Ephraim's predestined superiority in later history.

P's Sinai census gives 40,500 men of war (Nu 1³²), but this is reduced at the Plains of Moab to 32,500 (26²⁷), which is less than any of the tribes except Simeon, which 'hardly existed except in name' (Sayce, Hist. of Heb. p. 77). Contrary to what we should have expected from the Blessing of Jacob, Ephraim, according to P, lost in the meantime 20 per cent. while Manasseh gained 40 per cent.

The appearance of Joseph in the Blessing of Jacob, with no mention of his sons, who according to J had been adopted as Jacob's own, and were therefore entitled on this important occasion to like consideration with the others, points to a traditional echo of the early days in the land when Ephraim and Manasseh were still united. In the Song of Deborah (Jg 5) it is the 'family' Machir, the firstborn (Jos 17¹), the only (Gn 50²²) son of Manasseh, that is mentioned, not a Manasseh tribe. From 2 S 19²⁰ (cf. art. BENJAMIN) it is plain that Shimei still regarded himself as of the house of Joseph; and, despite the traditional indications of a late formation of Benjamin (wh. see), the complete political separation of Manasseh from Ephraim appears to have been still later. At all events, Jeroboam the Ephraimite, who afterwards became the first king of Israel (c. b.c. 930), was appointed by Solomon superintendent of the forced labour of the 'house of Joseph,' not of Ephraim alone. Ephraim, Machir, and Benjamin were apparently closely related, and in early times formed a group of clans known as 'Joseph.' There are no decisive details determining the time when they became definitely separated. Nor are there any reliable memories of the way in which Ephraim came into possession of the best and central portion of the land.

The traditions in the Book of Joshua are notably uninforming. Canaanites remained in the territory until a late date, as is seen from Jg 1² and the history of Shechem (ch. 8 f.). Ephraim was the strongest of the tribes and foremost in leadership, but was compelled to yield the hegemony to David. From that time onwards the history is no longer tribal but national history. Eli, priest of Shiloh and judge of Israel, Samuel, and Jeroboam I. were among its great men. Shechem, Tirzah, and Samaria, the capitals of the North, were within its boundaries; and it was at Shiloh that Joshua is said to have divided the land by lot. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL. JAMES A. CRAIG.

EPHRAIM.—1. A place near Baal-hazor (2 S 13²²) It may be identical with the Ephraim which the Onomasticon places 20 Roman miles N. of Jerusalem, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Sinfil and el-Lubbān. If Baal-hazor be represented, as seems probable, by Tell 'Asūr, the city by relation to which such a prominent feature of the landscape was indicated must have been of some importance. It probably gave its name in later times to the district of Samaria called Aphærema (1 Mac 11²⁴, Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 9). The site is at present unknown. 2. A city 'near the wilderness,' to which Jesus retired after the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11⁵⁴). 'The wilderness' is in Arab. el-barriyeh, i.e., the uncultivated land, much of it affording excellent pasture, on the uplands to the N.W. of Jerusalem. The Onomasticon mentions an 'Efraim' 5 Roman miles E. of Bethel. This may be the modern el-Taiyibeh, about 4 miles N.E. of Beitān, with ancient cisterns and rock-hewn tombs which betoken a place of importance in old times. See also EPHRON, 4.

The Forest of Ephraim (Heb. ya'ar Ephraim) was probably not a forest in our sense of the term, but a stretch of rough country such as the Arabs still call wa'r, abounding in rocks and thickets of brushwood. The district is not identified, but it must have been E. of the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Mahanaim. It was the scene of Absalom's defeat and death (2 S 18⁶⁴). The origin of the name cannot now be discovered. Mount Ephraim. Heb. har Ephraim. Is the name given to that part of the central range of Western Palestine occupied by Ephraim, corresponding in part to the modern Jebel Nāblus—the district under the governor of Nāblus. Having regard to Oriental usage, it seems a mistake to tr. with RV 'the hill country of Ephraim.' Jebel el-Quds does not mean 'the hill country of Jerusalem,' but that part of 'the mountain' which is subject to the city. We prefer to retain, with AV, 'Mount Ephraim.' W. EWING.

EPHRATH, EPHRATHAH.—See BETHLEHEM, and CALEB-EPHRATHAH.

EPHRATHITE.—1. A native of Bethlehem (Ru 1²). 2. An Ephraimite (Jg 12⁴, 1 S 1¹, 1 K 11²²).

EPHRON.—1. The Hittite from whom Abraham purchased the field or plot of ground in which was the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23). The purchase is described with great particularity; and the transactions between Ephron and Abraham are conducted with an elaborate courtesy characteristic of Oriental proceedings. Ephron received 400 shekels' weight of silver (23¹⁶); coined money apparently did not exist at that time. If we compare the sale of the site with other instances (Gn 33¹⁹, 1 K 16²⁴), Ephron seems to have made a good bargain. 2. A mountain district, containing cities, on the border of Judah, between Nephtoi and Kiriath-jearim (Jos 15⁶). The ridge W. of Bethlehem seems intended. 3. A strong fortress in the W. part of Bashan between Asheroth-karnaim and Bethshean (1 Mac 5⁶⁶, 2 Mac 12²⁷). The site is unknown. 4. In 2 Ch 13¹⁸ RV reads Ephron for AV Ephraim. The place referred to is probably the Ephraim of Jn 11⁵⁴. See EPHRAIM (city), No. 2.

EPICUREANS.—St. Paul's visit to Athens (Ac 17¹⁸⁻³⁴) led to an encounter with 'certain of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers,' representatives of the two leading schools of philosophy of that time.

Epicureanism took its name from its founder Epicurus, who was born in the island of Samos in the year b.c. 341. In b.c. 307 he settled in Athens, where he died in b.c. 270. A man of blameless life and of a most amiable character, Epicurus gathered around him, in the garden which he had purchased at Athens, a brotherhood of attached followers, who came to be known as Epicureans, or 'the philosophers of the Garden.' His aim was a practical one. He regarded pleasure as the absolute good. Epicurus, however, did not restrict pleasure as the earlier Cyrenaic school had done, to immediate bodily pleasures. Whatever may have been the practical outcome of the system, Epicurus and his more worthy followers must be acquitted of the charge of sensuality. What Epicurus advocated and aimed at was the happiness of a tranquil life as free from pain as possible, undisturbed by social conventions or political excitement or superstitious fears.

To deliver men from 'the fear of the gods' was the chief endeavour and, according to his famous follower the Roman poet Lucretius, the crowning service of Epicurus. Thus it may be said that, at one point at least, the paths of the Christian Apostle and the Epicurean philosopher touched each other. Epicurus sought to achieve his end by showing that in the physical organization of the world there is no room for the interference of such beings as the gods of the popular theology. There is nothing which is not material, and the primal condition of matter is that of atoms which falling in empty space with an inherent tendency to swerve slightly from the perpendicular, come into contact with each other, and form the world as it appears to the senses. All is material and mechanical. The gods—and Epicurus does not deny the existence of gods—have no part or lot in the affairs of men. They are relegated to a realm of their own in the spaces between the worlds. Further, since the test of life is feeling, death, in which there is no feeling, cannot mean anything at all, and is not a thing to be feared either in prospect or in fact.

The total effect of Epicureanism is negative. Its wide-spread and powerful influence must be accounted for by the personal charm of its founder, and by the conditions of the age in which it appeared and flourished. It takes its place as one of the negative but widening influences, leading up to 'the fulness of time' which saw the birth of Christianity. W. M. MACDONALD.

EPILEPSY.—See MEDICINE.

EPIPHI (2 Mac 6³⁵).—See TIME.

ER.—1. The eldest son of Judah by his Canaanitish wife, the daughter of Shua. For wickedness, the nature of which is not described, 'J' slew him' (Gn 38⁷, Nu 26¹⁹). 2. A son of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Ch 4²¹). 3. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³⁸).

ERAN.—Grandson of Ephraim (Nu 26⁸ P). Patronymic, Erantites, ib.

ERASTUS.—The name occurs thrice in NT among the Pauline company. An Erastus sends greetings in Ro 16²³, and is called 'the treasurer (AV 'chamberlain') of the city' (Corinth). The Erastus who was sent by St. Paul from Ephesus to Macedonia (Ac 19²⁷), and who later remained in Corinth (2 Ti 4²⁰), is perhaps the same. A. J. MACLEAN.

ERECH.—Named second in the list of Nimrod's cities (Gn 10¹⁰) the very ancient Babylonian city of Arku, or Uruk, regarded as exceptionally sacred and beautiful. Its ruins at Warka lie half-way between Hillah and Korna, on the left bank of the Euphrates, and W. of the Nile Canal. The people of Erch are called Archevites in Ezr 4⁹. C. H. W. JOHNS.

ERI.—Son of Gad, Gn 46¹⁶ (Nu 26¹⁶ P). Patronymic Erites, ib.

ESAIAH.—The familiar AV spelling of Isaiah in Apocr. and NT; it is retained by RV only in 2 Es 2¹⁸.

ESARHADDON, son and successor of Sennacherib (2 K 19³⁷, Is 37³⁸), reigned over Assyria B.C. 682-669. He practically re-founded Babylon, which Sennacherib had destroyed, and was a great restorer of temples. He was also a great conqueror, making three expeditions to Egypt, and finally conquered the whole North, garrisoning the chief cities and appointing vassal kings. He subdued all Syria, and received tribute from Manasseh, and Ezr 4² mentions his colonization of Samaria. He ruled over Babylonia as well as Assyria, which explains the statement of 2 Ch 33¹ that Manasseh was carried captive there. C. H. W. JOHNS.

ESAU.—1. The name is best explained as meaning 'tawny' or 'shaaggy' (Gn 25³⁰); Edom or 'ruddy' was sometimes substituted for it (v.³⁰), and Esau is represented as the progenitor of the Edomites (36¹⁻⁴³, Jer 49¹⁰⁻¹¹, Ob¹). He displaced the Horites from the hilly land of Seir, and settled there with his followers (Gn 32³ 36⁸, Dt 2⁵). His career is sketched briefly but finely by weaving incidents collected from two sources (J and E; in the early part, chiefly the former), whilst the Priestly writer is supposed to have contributed a few particulars (Gn 28¹⁰⁻¹¹ 28³ 36). The standing feature of Esau's history is rivalry with Jacob, which is represented as even preceding the birth of the twins (Gn 25²², Hos 12⁵). The facts may be collected into four groups. The sale of the birthright (Gn 25²⁹) carried with it the loss of precedence after the father's death (27³⁹), and probably loss of the domestic priesthood (Nu 3¹² 13), and of the double portion of the patrimony (Dt 21¹⁷). For this act the NT calls Esau 'profane' (He 12¹⁶), thus revealing the secret of his character; the word (Gr. bebēlos) suggests the quality of a man to whom nothing is sacred, whose heart and thought range over only what is material and sensibly present. To propitiate his parents, Esau sought a wife of his own kin (Gn 28⁸ 9), though already married to two Hittite women (26³⁴ 35). His father's proposed blessing was diverted by Jacob's artifice; and, doomed to live by war and the chase (27⁴⁰), Esau resolved to recover his lost honours by killing his brother. Twenty years later the brothers were reconciled (33⁴); after which Esau made Seir his principal abode, and on the death of Isaac settled there permanently (35²⁹ 36⁸, Dt 2⁵ 5, Jos 24⁴).

By a few writers Esau has been regarded as a mythical personage, the personification of the roughness of Idumea. It is at least as likely that a man of Esau's character and habits would himself choose to live in a country of such a kind (Mal 1³); and mere legends about the brothers, as the early Targums are a witness, would not have made Esau the more attractive man, and the venerated Jacob, in comparison, timid, tricky, and full of deceptions. Against the historicity of the record there is really no substantial evidence.

2. The head of one of the families of Nethinim, or Temple servants, who accompanied Nehemiah to Jerusalem (1 Es 5²⁹); see ZIHA. R. W. MOSS.

ESCHATOLOGY is that department of theology which is concerned with the 'last things,' that is, with the state of individuals after death, and with the course of human history when the present order of things has been brought to a close. It includes such matters as the consummation of the age, the day of judgment, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, the millennium, and the fixing of the conditions of eternity.

1. Eschatology of the OT.—In the OT the future life is not greatly emphasized. In fact, so silent is the Hebrew literature on the subject, that some have held that personal immortality was not included among the beliefs of the Hebrews. Such an opinion, however, is hardly based on all the facts at our disposal. It is true that future rewards and punishments after death do not play any particular rôle in either the codes or the prophetic thought. Punishment was generally considered as being meted out in the present age in the shape of loss or misfortune or sickness, while righteousness was expected to bring the corresponding temporal blessings. At the same time, however, it is to be borne in mind that the Hebrews, together with other Semitic people, had a belief in the existence of souls after death. Such beliefs were unquestionably the survivals of that primitive Animism which was the first representative of both psychology and a developed belief in personal immortality. Man was to the Hebrew a dichotomy composed of body and soul, or a trichotomy of body, soul, and spirit. In either case the body perished at death, and the other element, whether soul or spirit, went to the abode of disembodied personalities. The precise relation of the 'soul' to the 'spirit' was not set forth by the Hebrew writers, but it is likely that, as their empirical psychology developed, the spirit rather than the soul was regarded as surviving death. In any case, the disembodied dead were not believed to be immaterial, but of the nature of ghosts or shades (rephaim).

The universe was so constructed that the earth lay between heaven above, where Jehovah was, and the great pit or cavern beneath, Sheol, to which the shades of the dead departed. The Hebrew Scriptures do not give us any considerable material for elaborating a theory as to life in Sheol, but from the warnings against necromancers, as well as from the story of Saul and the witch of Endor (1 S 28¹⁻¹⁸), it is clear that, alongside of the Jehovistic religion as found in the literature of the Hebrews, there was a popular belief in continued exist-tence and conscious life of the spirits of men after death, as well as in the possibility of recalling such spirits from Sheol by some form of incantation. The legislation against necromancy is a further testimony to the same fact (Dt 18¹¹). Early Hebrew thought also dealt but indistinctly with the occupations and conditions of the dead in Sheol. Apparently they were regarded as in a state resembling sleep.

There is no thought of resurrection of the body in the OT, the clause in Job 19²⁶ generally used to prove such a point being more properly translated 'apart from my flesh.' The resurrection expected was not individual, but national. The nation, or at least its pious remnant, was to be restored. This was the great evangel of the prophets. In the midst of this prophetic thought there was occasionally a reference to individual immortality, but such a belief was not utilized for the purpose of inculcating right conduct. Yet the new and higher conception of the worth of the individual and his relation with Jehovah paved the way to a clearer estimate of his immortality.

The later books of the Canon (Pss 49, 73¹³⁻²⁰) refer more frequently to immortality, both of good and of evil men, but continue to deny activity to the dead in Sheol (Job 14²¹, 26⁶, Ps 88¹², 94¹⁷, 115¹⁷, Ec 9¹⁰), and less distinctly (Is 26¹⁹) refer to a resurrection, although with just what content it is not possible to state. It can hardly have been much more than the emergence of shades from Sheol into the light and life of the upper heavens. It would be unwarranted to say that this new life included anything like the reconstruction of the body, which was conceived of as having returned to dust. In these passages there are possibly references to post-mortem retribution and rewards, but if so they are exceptional. OT ethics was not concerned with immortality.

In the Hebrew period, however, there were elements which were subsequently to be utilized in the development of the eschatology of the Pharisees and of Christianity. Chief among these was the Day of Jehovah. At the first this was conceived of as the day in which Jehovah should punish the enemies of His nation Israel. In the course of time, however, and with the enlarged moral horizon of prophecy, the import of this day with its punishments was extended to the Hebrews as well. At its coming the Hebrew nation was to be given all sorts of political and social blessings by Jehovah, but certain of its members were to share in the punishment reserved for the enemies of Jehovah. Such an expectation as this was the natural outcome of the monarchical concept of religion. Jehovah as a great king had given His laws to His chosen people, and would establish a great assize at which all men, including the Hebrews, would be judged. Except in the Haglographa, however, the punishments and rewards of this great judgment are not elaborated, and even in Daniel the treatment is but rudimentary.

A second element of importance was the belief in the rehabilitation of the Hebrew nation, i.e. in a national resurrection. This carried within it the germs of many of the eschatological expectations of later days. In fact, without the prophetic insistence upon the distinction between the period of national suffering and that of national glory, it is hard to see how the later doctrine of the 'two ages,' mentioned below, could have gained its importance.

2. Eschatology of Judaism.—A new period is to be seen in the OT Apocrypha and the pseudepigraphic apocalypses of Judaism. Doubtless much of this new phase in the development of the thought was due to the influence of the Captivity. The Jews came under the influence of the great Babylonian myth-cycles, in which the struggle between right and wrong was expressed as one between God and various supernatural enemies such as dragons and giants. To this period must be attributed also the development of the idea of Sheol, until it included places for the punishment of evil spirits and evil men.

This development was accelerated by the rise of the new type of literature, the apocalypse, the beginnings of which are already to be seen in Isaiah and Zechariah. The various influences which helped to develop this type of literature, with its emphasis upon eschatology, are hard to locate. The influence of the Babylonian myth-cycles was great, but there is also to be seen the influence of the Greek impulse to pictorial expression. No nation ever came into close contact with Greek thought and life without sharing in their incentive to æsthetic expression. In the case of the Hebrews this was limited by religion. The Hebrew could not make graven images, but he could utilize art in literary pictures. The method particularly suited the presentation of the Day of Jehovah, with its punishment of Israel's enemies. As a result we have the very extensive apocalyptic literature which, beginning with the Book of Daniel, was the prevailing mode of expression of a sort of bastard prophecy during the two centuries preceding and the century following Christ. Here, however, the central motif of the Day of Jehovah is greatly expanded. Rewards and punishments become largely transcendental, or show a tendency towards transcendental representation. In this representation we see the Day of Judgment, the Jewish equivalent of the Day of Jehovah, closing one era and opening another. The first was the present age, which is full of wickedness and under the control of Satan, and the second is the coming age, when God's Kingdom is to be supreme and all enemies of the Law are to be punished. It was these elements that were embodied in the Messianic programme of Judaism, and passed over into Christianity (see MESSIAH).

The idea of individual immortality is also highly developed in the apocalypses. The condition of men after death is made a motive for right conduct in the present age, though this ethical use of the doctrine is less prominent than the unsystematized portrayal of the various states of good and evil men. The Pharisees believed in immortality and the entrance of the souls of the righteous into 'new bodies' (Jos. Ant. xviii. i. 3), a view that appears in the later apocalypses as well (Eth. Enoch 37-60, cf. 2 Mac 7¹¹ 14⁶). This body was not necessarily to be physical, but like the angels (Apoc. of Baruch and 2 Esdras, though these writings undoubtedly show the influence of Christian thought). There is also a tendency to regard the resurrection as wholly of the spirit (Eth. Enoch 91¹⁸ 92² 103²¹). Sheol is sometimes treated as an intermediate abode from which the righteous go to heaven. There is no clear expectation of either the resurrection or the annihilation of the wicked. Resurrection was limited to the righteous, or sometimes to Israel. At the same time there is a strongly marked tendency to regard the expected Messianic kingdom which begins with the Day of Judgment as super-mundane and temporary, and personal immortality in heaven becomes the highest good. It should be remembered, however, that each writer has his own peculiar beliefs, and that there was no authoritative eschatological dogma among the Jews. The Sadducees disbelieved in any immortality whatsoever.

3. Eschatology of the NT.—This is the development of the eschatology of Judaism, modified by the fact of Jesus' resurrection.

(a) In the teaching of Jesus we find eschatology prominently represented. The Kingdom of God, as He conceived of it, is formally eschatological. Its members were being gathered by Jesus, but it was to come suddenly with the return of the Christ, and would be ushered in by a general judgment. Jesus, however, does not elaborate the idea of the Kingdom in itself, but rather makes it a point of contact with the Jews for His exposition of eternal life,—that is to say, the life that characterizes the coming age and may be begun in the present evil age. The supreme good in Jesus' teaching is this eternal life which characterizes membership in the Kingdom. Nothing but a highly subjective criticism can eliminate from His teaching this eschatological element, which appears as strongly in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptic writings, and furnishes material for the appeal of His Apostles. It should be added, however, that the eschatology of Jesus, once it is viewed from His own point of view, carries with it no crude theory of rewards and punishments, but rather serves as a vehicle for expressing His fundamental moral and religious concepts. To all intents and purposes it is in form and vocabulary like that of current Judaism. It includes the two ages, the non-physical resurrection of the dead, the Judgment with its sentences, and the establishment of eternal states.

(b) In the teaching of primitive Christians eschatology is a ruling concept, and is thoroughly embedded in the Messianic evangel. Our lack of literary sources, however, forbids any detailed presentation of the content of their expectation beyond a reference to the central position given to the coming day of the Christ's Judgment.

(c) Eschatology was also a controlling element in the teaching of St. Paul. Under its influence the Apostle held himself aloof from social reform and revolution. In his opinion Christians were living in the 'last days' of the present evil age. The Christ was soon to appear to establish His Judgment, and to usher in the new period when the wicked were to suffer and the righteous were to share in the joys of the resurrection and the Messianic Kingdom. Eschatology alone forms the proper point of approach to the Pauline doctrines of justification and salvation, as well as his teachings as to the resurrection. But here again eschatology, though a controlling factor in the Apostle's thought, was, as in the case of Jesus, a medium for the exposition of a genuine spiritual life, which did not rise and fall with any particular forecast as to the future. The elements of the Pauline eschatology are those of Judaism, but corrected and to a considerable extent given distinctiveness by his knowledge of the resurrection of Jesus. He gives no apocalyptic description of the coming age beyond his teaching as to the body of the resurrection, which is doubtless based upon his belief as to that of the risen Jesus. His description of the Judgment is couched in the conventional language of Pharisaic eschatology; but, basing his teaching upon 'the word of the Lord' (1 Th 4th), he develops the doctrine that the Judgment extends both over the living, who are to be caught up into the air, and also over the dead. His teaching is lacking in the specific elements of the apocalypses, and there is no reference to the establishment of a millennium. Opinions differ as to whether St. Paul held that the believer received the resurrection body at death or at the Parousia of Christ. On the whole the former view seems possibly more in accord with his general position as to the work of the Spirit in the believer. The appearance (Parousia) of the Christ to inaugurate the new era St. Paul believed to be close at hand (1 Th 4th 17), but that it would be preceded by the appearance of an Antichrist (2 Th 2nd). The doctrine of the Antichrist, however, does not play any large rôle in Paulinism. While St. Paul's point of view is eschatological, his fundamental thought is really the new life of the believer, through the Spirit, which is made possible by the acceptance of Jesus as the Christ. With St. Paul, as with Jesus, this new life with its God-like love and its certainty of still larger self-realization through the resurrection is the supreme good.

(d) The tendencies of later canonical thought are obviously eschatological. The Johannine Apocalypse discloses a complete eschatological programme. In the latter work we see all the elements of Jewish apocalyptic eschatology utilized in the interest of Christian faith. The two ages, the Judgment and the Resurrection, and the final conquest of God are distinctively described, and the programme of the future is elaborated by the addition of the promise of a first resurrection of the saints; by a millennium (probably derived from Judaism; cf. Slav. Enoch 32. 33) in which Satan is bound; by a great period of conflict in which Satan and his hosts are finally defeated and cast into the lake of fire; and by a general resurrection including the wicked for the purpose of judgment. It is not clear that in this general resurrection there is intended anything more than the summoning of souls from Sheol, for a distinction should probably be made between the resurrection and the giving of the body of the resurrection. This resurrection of the wicked seems inconsistent with the general doctrine of the Pauline literature (cf. 1 Co 15), but appears in St. Paul's address before Felix (Ac 24th), and in a single Johannine formula (Jn 5th). The doctrine of the 'sleep of the dead' finds no justification in the Apocalypse or the NT as a whole.

4. Eschatology and Modern Theology.—The history of Christian theology until within the last few years has been dominated by eschatological concepts, and, though not in the sense alleged by its detractors, has been otherworldly. The rewards and punishments of immortality have been utilized as motives for morality. This tendency has always met with severe criticism at the hands of philosophy, and of late years has to a considerable extent been minimized or neglected by theologians. The doctrine of the eternity of punishment has been denied in the interest of so-called second or continued probation, restorationism, and conditional immortality. The tendency, however, has resulted in a disposition to reduce Christian theology to general morality based upon religion, and has been to a large extent buttressed by that scepticism or agnosticism regarding individual immortality which marks modern thought. Such a situation has proved injurious to the spread of Christianity as more than a general ethical or religious system, and it is to be hoped that the new interest which is now felt in the historical study of the NT will reinstate eschatology in its true place.

Such a reinstatement will include two fundamental doctrines: (1) that of individual immortality as a new phase in the great process of development of the individual which is to be observed in life and guaranteed by the resurrection of Jesus. Distinctions can easily be drawn between the figurative media of NT thought and the great reality of eternal life taught and exemplified by Jesus. (2) The doctrine of a 'Kingdom of God.' This expectation, since it involves the elements of a loving personality like that of a God of love, involves a belief in a new humanity that will live a genuinely social life on the earth, although the conditions of such a life must be left undefined. In a word, therefore, the modern equivalent of Jewish eschatology for practical purposes is that of personal (though truly social) immortality and a completion of the development of society. Utterly to ignore the essential elements of NT eschatology is in so far to re-establish the non-Christian concept of material goods as a supreme motive, and to destroy all confidence in the ultimate triumph of social righteousness. SHAILER MATHEWS.

ESCHEW.—In the older Eng. versions of the Bible 'eschew' is common. In AV it occurs only in Job 1st 8 2nd of Job himself, as 1st 'one that feared God, and eschewed evil,' and in 1 P 3rd 'Let him eschew evil, and do good.' The meaning is 'turn away from' (as RV at 1 P 3rd and Amer. RV everywhere).

ESDRAELON.—The Greek name for Merj Ibn 'Amr, the great plain north of the range of Carmel. It is triangular in shape, the angles being defined by Tell el-Kassis in the N.W., Jenin in the S.E., and Tabor in the N.E. The dimensions of the area are about 20 miles N.W. to S.E., 14 miles N.E. to S.W. It affords a passage into the mountainous interior of Palestine, from the sea-coast at the harbours of the Bay of 'Acca.

It is drained by the Kishon, and is, over nearly all its area, remarkably fertile. It was allotted to the tribe of Issachar.

Esdraelon has been the great battlefield of Palestine. Here Deborah and Barak routed the hosts of Jabin and Sisera (Jg 4), and here Gideon defeated the Midianites (7). Saul here fought his last battle with the Philistines (1 S 28-31). Josiah here attacked Pharaoh-necho on his way to Mesopotamia and was slain (2 K 23³⁰). It is the scene of the encampment of Holofernes (Jth 7³), in connexion with which appears the name by which the valley is generally known: it is a Greek corruption of Jezreel. Here Saladin encamped in 1186; and, finally, here Napoleon encountered and defeated an army of Arabs in 1799. It is chosen by the Apocalyptic writer (Rev 16¹⁴⁻¹⁶) as the fitting scene for the final battle between the good and evil forces of the world.

ESDRAS.—See APOCRYPHA, and APOC. LITERATURE.

ESDRIS.—Mentioned only 2 Mac 12³⁶. The text is probably corrupt. AV has Gorgias, and this is likely enough to be correct.

ESEK ('contention,' Gn 26²⁰).—A well dug by Isaac in the region near Rehoboth and Gerar. The site is unknown.

ESEREBIAS (AV Esebrias), 1 Es 8⁴. See SHEREBIAH.

ESHAN (Jos 15²²).—A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, noticed with Arab and Dumah. The site is doubtful.

ESHBAL.—See ISHBOSHETH.

ESHBAN.—An Edomite chief (Gn 36³⁶, 1 Ch 1⁴¹).

ESHCOL.—1. The brother of Mamre and Aner, the Amorite confederates of Abraham, who assisted the patriarch in his pursuit and defeat of Chedorlaomer's forces (Gn 14¹³⁻²⁴). He lived in the neighbourhood of Hebron (Gn 13¹⁸); and possibly gave his name to the valley of Eshcol, which lay a little to the N. of Hebron (Nu 13²³). 2. A wady, with vineyards and pomegranates, apparently near Hebron (Nu 13²³ 2 32², Dt 1⁴). Eshcol is usually rendered 'bunch of grapes.' The name has not been recovered.

ESHEK.—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³²).

ESHTAOL.—A lowland city of Judah (Jos 15²²) on the borders of Dan (19⁴¹), near which Samson began to feel 'the spirit of the Lord' (Jg 13²⁵), and was buried (16³¹); the home of some of the Danites who attacked Laish (18²⁻¹¹). It is supposed to be the same as Eshu'a, near 'Ain esh-Shems (Beth-shemesh). The Eshtaolites are enumerated among the Calebites (1 Ch 2²³).

ESHTEMOA.—In the tribe of Judah (Jos 15⁵⁰)—here called Eshtemoah, a Levitical city in the district of Hebron (21¹⁴), to which David sent a share of the spoil of the Philistines (1 S 30²⁸). The name as es-Semu'a survives about 8 miles S. of Hebron; extensive remains of antiquity are here to be seen.

ESHTON.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4¹¹⁻¹²).

ESSEI.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁸).

ESSENIANS.—To the student of NT times the Essenes present a problem of extreme difficulty. The very existence of a monastic order within the pale of Judaism is an extraordinary phenomenon. In India such things would have been a matter of course. But the deep racial consciousness and the tenacious national will of the Jews make it hard to account for. When, approaching the subject in this mood, the student straightway finds as features of the order the habit of worshipping towards the sun and the refusal to share in the public services of the Temple, he is tempted to explain Essenism by foreign influences. Yet the Essenes were Jews in good standing. They were inside, not outside, the pale of strictest Judaism. Hence they give the student a problem as interesting as it is difficult.

No small part of the difficulty is due to the character of our witnesses. Essenism was the first form of organized monasticism in the Mediterranean world. The Greeks who followed Alexander to India marvelled at the Ascetics or Gymnosophists. But not until Essenism took shape did the men of the Mediterranean world see monasticism at close quarters. Wonderment and the children of wonderment—fancy and legend—soon set to work on the facts, colouring and distorting them. One of our sources, Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 17), is in part the product of the imagination. Another, Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, 12f., and in Euseb. Præp. Ev. viii. ii. 1), writes in the mood of the preacher to whom facts have no value except as texts for sermons. And even Josephus (Ant. xiii. v. 9, xv. x. 4, 5, xviii. i. 2, 5; Vita, c. 2; BJ ii. viii. 2-13), our best source, is at times under suspicion. But a rough outline of the main facts is discernible.

The foundations of Essenism were laid in the half-century preceding the Maccabean War. The high priesthood was disintegrating. In part this was due to the fact that the loose-jointed Persian Empire had been succeeded by the more coherent kingdom of the Seleucids. With this closer political order, which made Jewish autonomy more difficult of attainment, went the appealing and compelling forces of Hellenism, both as a mode of life and as a reasoned view of the world. The combined pressure of the political, the social, and the intellectual elements of the Greek over-lordship went far towards disorganizing and demoralizing the ruling class in Jerusalem.

But a deeper cause was at work, the genius of Judaism itself (see PHARISEES). When the Hebrew monarchy fell, the political principle lost control. To popularize monotheism, to build up the OT Canon, organize and hold together the widely separated parts of the Jewish race—this work called for a new form of social order which mixed the ecclesiastical with the political. The man whom the times required in order to carry this work through was not the priest, but the Bible scholar. And he was necessarily an intense separatist. Taking Ezra's words, 'Separate yourselves from the people of the land' (Ezr 10¹¹) as the keynote of life, his aim was to free God's people from all taint of heathenism. In the critical period of fifty years preceding the War this class of men was coming more and more into prominence. They stood on the Torah as their platform; the Law of Moses was both their patrimony and their obligation. In them the genius of Judaism was beginning to sound the rally against both the good and the evil of Hellenism, against its illumining culture as well as against the corroding Græco-Syrian morality. The priestly aristocracy of Palestine being in close touch with Hellenism, it naturally resulted that the high priesthood, and the Temple which was inseparable from the high priesthood, suffered a fall in sacramental value.

Into this situation came the life-and-death struggle against the attempt of Antiochus to Hellenize Judaism. In the life of a modern nation a great war has large results. Far greater were the effects of the Maccabean War upon a small nation. It was a supreme point of precipitation wherein the genius of Judaism reached clear self-knowledge and definition. The Essenes appear as a party shortly after the war. It is not necessary to suppose that at the outset they were a monastic order. It is more likely that they at first took form as small groups or brotherhoods of men intent on holiness, according to the Jewish model. This meant a kind of holiness that put an immense emphasis on Levitical precision. To keep the Torah in its smallest details was part and parcel of the very essence of morality. The groups of men who devoted themselves to the realization of that ideal started with a bias against the Temple as a place made unclean by the heathenism of the priests. This bias was strengthened through the assumption of the high priesthood by the Hasmonean house, an event which still further discounted the sacramental value of the Temple services. So these men, knit into closely coherent groups, mainly in Judaea, found the satisfactions of life in deepening fellowship, and an ever more intense devotion to the ideal of Levitical perfection. In course of time, as the logic of life carried them forward into positions of which they had not at first dreamed, the groups became more and more closely knit, and at the same time more fundamentally separatistic regarding the common life of the Jews. So we find, possibly late in the 1st cent. B.C., the main group of Essenes colonizing near the Dead Sea, and constituting a true monastic order.

The stricter Essenes abjured private property and marriage in order to secure entire attention to the Torah. The Levitical laws of holiness were observed with great zeal. An Essene of the higher class became unclean if a fellow-Essene of lower degree so much as touched his garment. They held the name of Moses next in honour to the name of God. And their Sabbatarianism went to such lengths that the bowels must not perform their wonted functions on the Seventh Day.

At the same time, there are reasons for thinking that foreign influences had a hand in their constitution. They worshipped towards the sun, not towards the Temple. This may have been due to the influence of Paratism. Their doctrine of immortality was Hellenic, not Pharisaic. Foreign influences in this period are quite possible, for it was not until the wars with Rome imposed on Judaism a hard-and-fast form that the doors were locked and bolted. Yet, when all is said, the foreign influence gave nothing more than small change to Essenism. Its innermost nature and its deepest motive were thoroughly Jewish.

It is probable that John the Baptist was affected by Essenism. It is possible that our Lord and the Apostolic Church may have been influenced to a certain extent. But influence of a primary sort is out of the question. The impassioned yet sane moral enthusiasm of early Christianity was too strong in its own kind to be deeply touched by a spirit so unlike its own.

HENRY S. NASH.

ESTATE.—'State' and 'estate' occur in AV almost an equal number of times, and with the same meaning. Cf. Col 4⁷ 'All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you,' with the next verse, 'that he might know your estate.' In Ac 22⁹ 'all the estate of the elders' (Gr. 'all the presbytery') means all the members of the Sanhedrin. The pl. occurs in the Pref. to AV, and in Ezk 38¹¹ 'I will settle you after your old estates,' i.e. according to your former position in life. The heading of Ps 37 is 'David persuadeth to patience and confidence in God, by the different estate of the godly and the wicked.'

ESTHER ('star').—The Jewish name, of which this is the Persian (or Babylonian) form, is Hadaassah (cf. Est 2⁷), which means 'myrtle.' She was the daughter of Abihail, of the tribe of Benjamin, and was brought up, an orphan, in the house of her cousin Mordecai, in Shushan. Owing to her beauty she became an inmate of the king's palace, and on Vashti the queen being disgraced, Esther was chosen by Xerxes, the Persian king, to succeed her. The combined wisdom of Mordecai and courage of Esther became the means of doing a great service to the very large number of Jews living under Persian rule; for, owing to the craft and hatred of Haman, the chief court favourite, the Jews were in danger of being massacred en bloc; but Esther, instigated by Mordecai, revealed her Jewish nationality to the king, who realized thereby that she was in danger of losing her life, owing to the royal decree, obtained by Haman, to the effect that all those of Jewish nationality in the king's dominions were to be put to death. Esther's action brought about an entire reversal of the decree. Haman was put to death, and Mordecai was honoured by the king, while Esther's position was still further strengthened; the Jews were permitted to take revenge on those who had sought their destruction. Mordecai and Esther put forth two decrees: first, that the 14th and 15th days of the month Adar were to be kept annually as 'days of feasting and gladness, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor' (Est 9²²); and, second, that a day of mourning and fasting should be observed in memory of the sorrow which the king's first decree had occasioned to the Jewish people (9²⁹⁻³², cf. 4¹⁻³).

The attempt to identify Esther with Amestris, who, according to Herodotus, was one of the wives of Xerxes, has been made more than once in the past; but it is now universally recognized that this identification will not bear examination. All that is known of Amestris—her heathen practices, and the fact that her father, a Persian general named Otanes, is specifically mentioned by Herodotus—proves that she cannot possibly have been a Jewess; besides which, the two names are fundamentally distinct. As to whether Esther was really a historical personage, see the next article.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ESTHER, BOOK OF.—1. Place in the Canon.—The Book of Esther belongs to the second group of the third division of the Hebrew Canon—the Kethubim, or 'Writings'—a group which comprises the Megilloth, or 'Rolls,' of which there are five,—Song of Songs, Ruth, Lam., Eccles., Esther. It was not without much discussion that Esther was admitted into the Canon, for its right to be there was disputed both by the Jewish authorities and by the early Christian Church. As late as the 2nd cent. A.D. the greatest Jewish teacher of his day, Rabbi Jehudah, said, 'The Book of Esther defileth not the hands' [the expression 'to defile the hands' is the technical Jewish way of saying that a book is canonical; it means that the holiness of the sacred object referred to produces by contact with it a state of Levitical impurity]. In some of the earlier lists of the Biblical books in the Christian Church that of Esther is omitted; Athanasius (d. 373) regarded it as uncanonical, so too Gregory Nazianzen (d. 391); Jacob of Edessa (c.700) reckons it among the apocryphal books. It is clear that Esther was not universally accepted as a book of the Bible until a late date.

2. Date and authorship.—The language of Esther points unmistakably to a late date; it shows signs, among other things, of an attempt to assimilate itself to classical Hebrew; the artificiality herein betrayed stamps the writer as one who was more familiar with Aramaic than with Hebrew. Further, the Persian empire is spoken of as belonging to a period of history long since past (cf. 'in those days,' 1²); the words, 'There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of thy kingdom' (3⁹), show that the 'Dispersion' had already for long been an accomplished fact. Moreover, the spirit of the book points to the time when great bitterness and hatred had been engendered between Jew and Gentile. The probability, therefore, is that Esther belongs to the earlier half of the 2nd cent. B.C. Of its authorship we know nothing further than that the writer was a Jew who must have been in some way connected with Persia; the book shows him to have been one whose racial prejudice was much stronger than his religious fervour; it is extraordinary that a book of the Bible should never once mention the sacred name of God; the secular spirit which is so characteristic of the book must have been the main reason of the disinclination to incorporate it into the Scriptures which has been already referred to.

3. Contents.—The book purports to give the history of how the Jewish feast of Purim ('Lots') first originated. Xerxes, king of the Medes and Persians, gives a great feast to the nobles and princes of the 127 provinces over which he rules; the description of the decorations in the palace garden on this occasion recalls the language of the Arabian Nights. Vashti, the queen, also gives a feast to her women. On the seventh day of the feast the king commands Vashti to appear before the princes in order that they may see her beauty. Upon her refusing to obey, the king is advised to divorce her. In her place, Esther, one of Vashti's maidens, becomes queen. Esther is the adopted daughter of a Jew named Mordecai, who had been the means of saving the king from the hands of assassins. But Mordecai falls out with the court favourite, Haman, on account of his refusing to bow down and do reverence to the latter. Haman resolves to avenge himself for this insult; he has lots cast in order to find out which is the most suitable day for presenting a petition to the king; the day being appointed, the petition is presented and granted, the promised payment of ten thousand talents of silver into the royal treasury (Est 3⁹) no doubt contributing towards this. The petition was that a royal decree should be put forth to the effect that all Jews were to be killed, and their belongings treated as spoil. On this becoming known, there is great grief among the Jews. Esther, instructed by Mordecai, undertakes to interpose for her people before the king. She invites both the king and Haman to a banquet, and repeats the invitation for the next day. Haman, believing himself to be in favour with the royal couple, determines to gratify his hatred for Mordecai in a special way, and prepares a gallows on which to hang him (5⁴). In the night after the first banquet, Ahasuerus, being unable to sleep, commands that the book of records of the chronicles be brought; in these he finds the account of Mordecai's former service, which has never been rewarded. Haman is sent for, and the king asks him what should be done to the man whom the king delights to honour; Haman thinking that it is he himself who is uppermost in the king's mind, describes how such a man should be honoured. The king thereupon directs that all that Haman has said is to be done to Mordecai. Haman returns in grief to his house. While taking counsel there with his friends, the king's chamberlains come to escort him to the queen's second banquet (6¹²). During this Esther makes her petition to the king on behalf of her people, as well as for her own life, which is threatened, for the royal decree is directed against all Jews and Jewesses within his domains; she also discloses Haman's plot against Mordecai. The king, as the result of this, orders Haman to be hanged on the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai, the latter receiving the honours which had before belonged to Haman (ch. 7). Esther then has letters sent in all directions in order to avert the threatened destruction of her people; but the attempt is yet made by the enemies of the Jews to carry out Haman's intentions. The Jews defend themselves with success, and a great feast is held on the 14th of Adar, on which the Jews 'rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.' Moreover, two days of feasting are appointed to be observed for all time; they are called Purim, because of the lot (pūr) which Haman cast for the destruction of the Jews (chs. 8, 9). The book concludes with a further reference to the power of Ahasuerus and the greatness of his favourite, Mordecai (ch. 10).

4. Historicity of the book.—There are very few modern scholars who are able to regard this book as containing history; at the most it may be said that it is a historical romance, i.e. that a few historical data have been utilized for constructing the tale. The main reasons for this conclusion are, that the book is full of improbabilities; that it is so transparently written for specific purposes, namely, the glorification of the Jewish nation, and as a means of expressing Jewish hatred of and contempt for Gentiles (see also § 5); that a 'strictly historical interpretation of the narrative is beset with difficulties'; that the facts it purports to record receive no substantiation from such books as Chron., Ezr., Neh., Dan., Sirach, or Philo (cf. Hastings' DB s.v.). Besides this, there is the artificial way in which the book is put together: the method of presenting the various scenes in the drama is in the style of the writer of fiction, not in that of the historian.

5. Purim.—The main purpose for which the book was written was ostensibly to explain the origin of, as well as to give the authority for, the continued observance of the Feast of Purim; though it must be confessed that the book does not really throw any light on the origin of this feast. Some scholars are in favour of a Persian origin, others, with perhaps greater justification, a Babylonian. The names of the chief characters in the book seem certainly to be corrupted forms of Babylonian and Elamite deities, namely, Haman = Hamman, Mordecai = Marduk, Esther = Ishtar; while Vashti is the name of an Elamite god or goddess (so Jensen). Thus we should have the Babylonian Marduk and Ishtar on the one hand, the Elamite Haman and Vashti, on the other. Purim may, in this case, have been, as Jensen suggests, a feast commemorating the victory of Babylonian over Elamite gods which was taken over and adapted by the Jews. In this case the origin of the name Purim would be sought in the Babylonian word puru, which means a 'small round stone,' i.e. a lot. But the connexion between the feast and its name is not clear; indeed, it must be confessed that the mystery attaching to the name Purim has not yet been unravelled.

ESYELUS.—1 Es 1⁸ = Jehiel (2 Ch 35⁸).

ETAM.—An altogether obscure place name, applied to a rock in a cleft of which Samson took refuge (Jg 15⁶), whence he was dislodged by the Judahites (v. 11), and therefore presumably in Judahite territory (cf. 1 Ch 4²). Also applied to a village in the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4²), and a town fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁵). Whether there are here one or two or three places, and where it or they were, are unanswered questions.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

ETHAM.—Ex 13²⁶, Nu 33⁸; the next station to Succoth in the Exodus. The name is not known in Egyptian. It lay 'in the edge of the wilderness,' evidently at the E. end of the Wady Tumilat, and probably northward of the 'Red Sea,' whether that means the Bitter Lakes or the Gulf of Suez. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ETHAN.—1. 'The Ezrahite' of 1 K 4² and Ps 89 (title). In the first of these passages he is mentioned along with other contemporaries (?) of Solomon, who were all surpassed in wisdom by the Jewish monarch. In 1 Ch 2² he is said to have been a Judæan of the family of Zerah, which is prob. another form of Ezrah (hence the patronymic Ezrahite). Instead of 'the Ezrahite' it has been proposed to render 'ezrahî of 1 K 4² 'the native,' i.e. the Israelite, in opposition to some of the other wise men named, who were foreigners. 2. An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6⁴). In v. 21 he is called Josh. 3. The eponymous ancestor of a guild of Temple-singers (1 Ch 6⁴ 15¹⁷, 19 etc.).

ETHANIM (1 K 8²).—See TIME.

ETHANUS.—One of the 'swift scribes' who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14²⁴).

ETHEBAAL ('with Baal,' i.e. enjoying his favour and protection).—King of the Sidonians, and father of Jezebel, wife of Ahab king of Israel (1 K 16³¹).

ETHER (Jos 15² 19⁷).—A town of Judah noticed with Libnah, apparently near the plain of Philistia, given to Simeon, and near Rimmon. The site is unknown.

ETHICS.—The present article will be confined to Biblical Ethics. As there is no systematic presentation of the subject, all that can be done is to gather from the Jewish and Christian writings the moral conceptions that were formed by historians, prophets, poets, apostles. The old history culminates in the story of the perfect One, the Lord Jesus Christ, from whom there issued a life of higher order and ampler range.

I. OT Ethics.—As the dates of many of the books are uncertain, special difficulty attends any endeavour to trace with precision the stages of moral development amongst the Hebrews. The existence of a moral order of the world is assumed; human beings are credited with the freedom, the intelligence, etc., which make morality possible. The term 'conscience' does not appear till NT times, and perhaps it was then borrowed from the Stoics; but the thing itself is conspicuous enough in the records of God's ancient people. In Gn 3⁹ we have the two categories 'good' and 'evil'; the former seems to signify in 1st 'answering to design' and in 2nd 'conducive to well-being'. These terms—applied sometimes to ends, sometimes to means—probably denote ultimates of consciousness, and so, like pain and pleasure, are not to be defined. Moral phenomena present themselves, of course, in the story of the patriarchs; men are described as mean or chivalrous, truthful or false, meritorious or blameworthy, long before legislation—Mosaic or other—takes shape.

1. In Hebrew literature the religious aspects of life are of vital moment, and therefore morals and worship are inextricably entangled. God is seen: there is desire to please Him; there is a shrinking from aught that would arouse His anger (Gn 20⁹ 39⁹). Hence the immoral is sinful. Allegiance is due—not to an impersonal law, but to a Holy Person, and duty to man is duty also to God. Morality is under Divine protection: are not the tables of the Law in the Ark that occupies the most sacred place in Jehovah's shrine (Ex 40²⁰, Dt 10¹, 1 K 8⁹, He 9⁴)? The commandments, instead of being arbitrary, are the outflowings of the character of God. He who enjoins righteousness and mercy calls men to possess attributes which He Himself prizes as His own peculiar glory (Ex 33¹⁸, 19 34⁶ 7). Hosea represents the Divine love as longing for the response of human love, and Amos demands righteousness in the name of the Righteous One. Man's goodness is the same in kind as the goodness of God, so that both may be characterized by the same terms; as appears from a comparison of Pss 111 and 112.

2. The OT outlook is national rather than individual. The elements of the community count for little, unless they contribute to the common good. A man is only a fractional part of an organism, and he may be slain with the group to which he belongs, if grievous sin can be brought home to any part of that group (Jos 7¹⁹⁻²⁶). It is Israel—the people as a whole—that is called God's son. Prayers, sacrifices, festivals, fasts, are national affairs. The highest form of excellence is willingness to perish if only Israel may be saved (Ex 32³¹, 2, Jg 5¹⁸⁻¹⁹). Frequently the laws are such as only a judge may administer: thus the claim of 'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth' (Dt 19²¹), being a maxim of fairness to be observed by a magistrate who has to decide between contending parties, is too harsh for guidance outside a court of law (Mt 5³⁸, 39). When Israel sinned, it was punished; when it obeyed God, it prospered. It was not till Hebrew national life was destroyed that individual experiences excited questions as to the equity of Providence (Job³⁷, Pss 37, 73) and in regard to personal immortality. In the later prophets, even when the soul of each man is deemed to be of immense interest (Ezk 18), national ideals have the ascendancy in thought. It is the nation that is to have a resurrection (Is 25⁸, Ezk 37¹⁻¹⁴, Hos 13¹⁴, Zec 8¹⁻⁶). This ardent devotion to corporate well-being—a noble protest against absorption in individual interests—is the golden thread on which the finest pearls of Hebrew history are strung.

3. The Covenant is always regarded as the standard by which conduct is to be judged. Deference to the Covenant is deference to God (Hos 6⁷ 8¹, Am 3¹⁻²). As God is always faithful, His people prosper so long as they observe the conditions to which their fathers gave solemn assent (Ex 24⁸, 7). The Decalogue, which is an outline of the demands made by the Covenant on Israel, requires in its early clauses faith, reverence, and service; then (Ex 20, Commandments 5 to 9) the duty of man to man is set forth as part of man's duty to Jehovah, for Moses and all the prophets declare that God is pleased or displeased by our behaviour to one another. The Tenth Commandment, penetrating as it does to the inward life, should be taken as a reminder that all commandments are to be read in the spirit and not in the letter alone (Lv 19¹⁷, 18, Dt 6⁶, Ps 139, Ro 7¹⁴). Human obligations—details of which are sometimes massed together as in Ex 20-23, Pss 15 and 24—include both moral and ceremonial requirements. Nothing is more common in the prophets than complaints of a disposition to neglect the former (Is 1¹¹, Jer 6²⁰ 7²¹, Hos 6⁶, Am 5²¹). The requirements embrace a great number of particulars, and every department of experience is recognized. Stress is laid upon kindness to the physically defective (Lv 19¹⁴), and to the poor and to strangers (Dt 10¹⁸, 19 15⁷⁻¹¹ 24¹⁷⁻¹⁸, Job 31¹⁶⁻²², Ps 41¹, Is 58⁶⁻⁷, Jer 7²², Zec 7⁹). Parents and aged persons are to be revered (Ex 20¹², Dt 5¹⁶, Lv 19³²). The education of children is enjoined (Ex 12²¹, 13⁸, 14, Dt 4⁹ 6⁷, 20-25 11¹⁹ 31¹², 15 32⁶, Ps 78⁵, 6). In Proverbs emphasis is laid upon industry (6⁶⁻¹¹), purity (7⁸ etc.), kindness to the needy (14²¹), truthfulness (17⁷ etc.), forethought (24⁷). The claims of animals are not omitted (Ex 23¹¹, Lv 25⁷, Dt 22⁶ 25⁴, Ps 104¹¹, 13 148¹⁰, Pr 12¹⁰, Jon 4¹¹). Occasionally there are charming pictures of special characters (the housewife, Pr 31; the king, 2 S 23³; the priest, Mai 2⁸, 6 7). God's rule over man is parallel with His rule over the universe, and men should feel that God embraces all interests in His thought, for He is so great that He can attend equally to the stars and to human sorrows (Ps 19, 33, 147³⁻⁴).

4. The sanctions of conduct are chiefly temporal (harvests, droughts, victories over enemies, etc.), yet, as they are national, self-regard is not obtrusive. Moreover, it would be a mistake to suppose that no Hebrew minds felt the intrinsic value of morality. The legal spirit was not universal. The prophets were glad to think that God was not limiting Himself to the letter of the Covenant, the very existence of which implied that Jehovah, in the greatness of His love, had chosen Israel to be His peculiar treasure. By grace and not by bare justice Divine action was guided. God was the compassionate Redeemer (Dt 7⁸, Hos 11¹ 14⁴). Even the people's disregard of the Law did not extinguish His forgiving love (Ps 25⁶⁻⁷, 103¹⁷, Is 63⁹, Jer 31² 31³ 33⁷, Mic 7¹⁸⁻¹⁹). In response to this manifested generosity, an unmercenary spirit was begotten in Israel, so that God was loved for His own sake, and His smile was regarded as wealth and light when poverty and darkness had to be endured. 'Whom have I in heaven but thee?' 'Oh, how I love thy law!' are expressions the like of which abound in the devotional literature of Israel, and they evince a disinterested devotion to God Himself and a genuine delight in duty. To the same purport is the remarkable appreciation of the beauty and splendour of wisdom recorded in Pr 8.

II. NT Ethics.—While admitting many novel elements (Mt 11¹¹ 13¹⁷, 35, 52, Mk 2²¹, 2, Jn 13³⁴, Eph 2¹⁰, He 10²⁰, Rev 21⁷ 31⁵), Christianity reaffirmed the best portions of OT teaching (Mt 5¹⁷, Ro 3³¹). Whatsoever things were valuable, Christ conserved, unified, and developed. The old doctrine acquired wings, and sang a nobler, sweeter song (Jn 11⁷). But the glad and noble life which Jesus came to produce could come only from close attention to man's actual condition.

1. Accordingly, Christian Ethics takes full account of sin. The guilty state of human nature, together with the presence of temptations from within, without, and beneath, presents a problem far different from any that can be seen when it is assumed that men are good or only unmoral. Is our need met by lessons in the art of advancing from good to better? Is not the human will defective and rebellious? The moral ravages in the individual and in society call for Divine redemptive activities and for human penitence and faith. Though the sense of sin has been most conspicuous since Christ dwelt among men, the Hebrew consciousness had its moral anguish. The vocabulary of the ancient revelation calls attention to many of the aspects of moral disorder. Sin is a ravenous beast, crouching ready to spring (Gn 47); a cause of wide-spreading misery (Gn 3¹⁶⁻¹⁹ 9²⁶ 20⁹, Ex 20⁹); is universal (Gn 6⁵ 8²¹, 1 K 8⁴⁶, Ps 130¹⁴³); is folly (Prov. passim); a missing of the mark, violence, transgression, rebellion, pollution (Ps 51). This grave view is shared by the NT. The Lord and His Apostles labour to produce contrition. It is one of the functions of the Holy Spirit to convict the world of sin (Jn 16⁸). It is not supposed that a good life can be lived unless moral evil is renounced by a penitent heart. The fountains of conduct are considered to have need of cleansing. It is always assumed that great difficulties beset the soul in its upward movements, because of its past corrupt state and its exposure to fierce and subtle temptations.

2. In harmony with the doctrine of depravity is the distinctness with which individuality is recognized. Sin is possible only to a person. Ability to sin is a mark of that high rank in nature denoted by 'personality.' Christianity has respect to a man's separateness. It sees a nature ringed round with barriers that other beings cannot pass, capacities for great and varied wickednesses and excellences, a world among other worlds, and not a mere wave upon the sea. A human being is in himself an end, and God loves us one by one. Jesus asserted the immense value of the individual. The Shepherd cares for the one lost sheep (Lk 15¹⁻⁷), and has names for all the members of the flock (Jn 10¹⁴). The Physician, who (it is conceivable) could have healed crowds by some general word, lays His beneficent hands upon each sufferer (Lk 4⁴⁰). Remove from the Gospels and the Acts the stories of private ministrations, and what gaps are made (Jn 1³⁸). 3. 4. Ac 8²²⁻²⁹ 16, etc.). Taking the individual as the unit, and working from him as a centre, the NT Ethic declines to consider his deeds alone (Mt 6, Ro 2^{28, 29}). Actions are looked at on their inner side (Mt 5^{21, 22, 27, 28} 6^{1, 4, 6, 16} 12^{34, 38} 23²⁷, Mk 7^{2-6, 18-23}, Lk 16¹⁸ 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴, Jn 4²¹). This is a prolongation of ideas present to the best minds prior to the Advent (1 S 16⁷, Ps 7⁹ 24^{2, 4} 51¹⁷ 139^{2, 22}, Jer 17¹⁰ 31²³).

3. The social aspects of experience are not overlooked. Everyone is to bear his own burden (Ro 14⁴, Gal 6²), and must answer for himself to the Judge of all men (2 Co 5¹⁰); but he is not isolated. Regard for others is imperative; for an unforgiving temper cannot find forgiveness (Mt 6^{14, 15} 18²³⁻²⁵), worship without brotherliness is rejected (Mt 5^{23, 24}), and Christian love is a sign of regeneration (1 Jn 5¹). The mere absence of malevolent deeds cannot shield one from condemnation; positive helpfulness is required (Mt 25¹⁻⁴⁸, Lk 10²⁵⁻²⁷ 18¹⁰⁻²¹, Eph 4^{28, 29}). This helpfulness is the new ritualism (He 13¹⁶, Ja 1²⁷). The family with its parents, children, and servants (Eph 5²⁻⁶, Col 3¹⁸⁻⁴¹); the Church with its various orders of character and gifts (Ro 14, 15, Gal 6^{1, 2, 3}, 1 Co 13, 14, 15); the State with its monarch and magistrates (Mk 12¹⁴⁻¹⁷, Ro 13¹⁻⁷, 1 Ti 2^{1, 2}), provide the spheres wherein the servant of Christ is to manifest his devotion to the Most High. 'Obedience, patience, benevolence, purity, humility, alienation from the world and the "flesh," are the chief novel or striking features which the Christian ideal of practice suggests' (Sidgwick), and they involve the conception that Christian Ethics is based on the recognition of sin, of individuality, of social demands, and of the need of heavenly assistance.

4. The Christian standard is the character of the Lord Jesus Christ, who lived perfectly for God and man. He overcame evil (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Jn 16²³), completed His life's task (Jn 17⁴), and sinned not (Jn 8⁴, 2 Co 5²¹, He 4¹⁵, 1 P 2²², 1 Jn 3⁵). His is the pattern life, inasmuch as it is completely (1) filial, and (2) fraternal. As to (1), we mark the upward look, His readiness to let the heat of His love burst into the flame of praise and prayer, His dutifulness and submissiveness: He lived 'in the bosom of the Father,' and wished to do only that which God desired. As to (2), His pity for men was unbounded, His sacrifice for human good knew no limits. 'Thou shalt love God'; thou shalt love man.' Between these two poles the perfect life revolved. He and His teachings are one. It is because the moral law is alive in Him that He must needs claim lordship over man's thoughts, feelings, actions. He is preached 'as Lord' (2 Co 4⁵), and the homage which neither man (Ac 10^{25, 26}) nor angel (Rev 22^{8, 9}) can receive He deems it proper to accept (Jn 13¹³). Could it be otherwise? The moral law must be supreme, and He is it. Hence alienation from Him has the fatal place which idolatry had under the Old Covenant, and for a similar reason, seeing that idolatry was a renunciation of Him who is the righteous and gracious One. Since Jesus by virtue of His filial and fraternal perfectness is Lord, to stand apart from Him is ruinous (Lk 10¹³⁻¹⁶, Jn 3¹⁸ 8²⁴ 15²²⁻²⁴ 16^{8, 9}, He 2⁶⁻⁸ 10²⁶). Wife or child or life itself must not be preferred to the claims of truth and righteousness, and therefore must not be preferred to Christ, who is truth and righteousness in personal form (Mt 10²⁷⁻³⁹, Lk 9^{59, 60} 14^{26, 27}). To call oneself the bond-servant of Jesus Christ (Ro 1¹, Ja 1¹, 2 P 1¹) was to assert at once the strongest affection for the wise and gracious One, and the utmost loyalty to God's holy will as embodied in His Son. The will of God becomes one's own by affectionate deference to Jesus Christ, to suffer for whom may become a veritable bliss (Mt 5¹⁰⁻¹², Ac 5⁴¹, 2 Co 4¹¹, Ph 1²⁹, 1 Th 2¹⁴, He 10²²⁻²⁴).

5. Christian Ethics is marked quite as much by promises of assistance as by loftiness of standard. The kindness of God, fully illustrated in the gift and sacrifice of His Son, is a great incentive to holiness. Men come into the sunshine of Divine favour. Heavenly sympathy is with them in their struggles. The virtues to be acquired (Mt 5¹⁻¹⁴, Gal 5^{22, 23}, Col 3¹²⁻¹⁷, 2 P 1^{5, 6, 7}, Tit 2¹²) and the vices to be shunned (Mk 7^{21, 22}, Gal 5^{19, 20, 21}, Col 3⁸⁻⁹) are viewed in connexion with the assurance of efficient aid. There is a wonderful love upon which the aspirant may depend (Jn 3¹⁶, Ro 5^{7, 8}, 2 Co 5¹⁴). The hearty acceptance of that love is faith, ranked as a virtue and as the parent of virtues (2 P 1⁵, Ro 5^{1, 2}, 1 Co 13, He 11). Faith, hope, love, transfigure and supplement the ancient virtues,—temperance, courage, wisdom, justice,—while around them grow many gentle excellences not recognized before Christ gave them their true rank; and yet it is not by its wealth of moral teaching so much as by its assurance of ability to resist temptation and to attain spiritual manhood that Christianity has gained pre-eminence. Christ's miracles are illustrations of His gospel of pardon, regeneration, and added faculties (Mt 9⁸⁻¹⁰). The life set before man was lived by Jesus, who regenerates men by His Spirit, and takes them into union with Himself (Jn 3^{2, 6}, 8³⁸ 15¹⁻¹⁰, Ro 8^{2, 3, 29}, 1 Co 1³⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁷, Gal 5^{22, 23}, Ph 2^{5, 12, 13}, Col 3¹⁻⁴, Ja 1¹⁸, 1 P 2²¹, 1 Jn 2⁶). The connexion between the Lord and the disciple is permanent (Mt 28²⁰, Jn 14¹⁹ 17²⁴, He 2¹¹⁻¹⁴, 1 Jn 3¹⁻³), and hence the aspiration to become sober, righteous, godly (relation to self, man, and God, Tit 2¹¹⁻¹⁴) receives ample support. Sanctity is not only within the reach of persons at one time despised as moral incapables (Mk 2^{16, 17}, Lk 7¹⁷ 15, 19^{8, 9} 23^{43, 44}

1 Co 6¹¹, Eph 2¹⁻⁷), but every Christian is supposed to be capable, sooner or later, of the most precious forms of goodness (Mt 5¹⁻¹⁰), for there is no caste (Col 1²⁸). Immortality is promised to the soul, and with it perpetual communion with the Saviour, whose image is to be repeated in every man He saves (Ro 8³⁷⁻³⁸, 1 Co 15⁴²⁻⁵², 2 Co 5⁸, Ph 3¹⁻¹¹, 1 Th 4¹⁷, 1 Jn 3², Rev 22⁴).

The objections which have been made to Biblical Ethics cannot be ignored, though the subject can be merely touched in this article. Some passages in the OT have been stigmatized as immoral; some in the NT are said to contain impracticable precepts, and certain important spheres of duty are declared to receive very inadequate treatment.

(i.) As to the OT, it is to be observed that we need not feel guilty of disrespect to inspiration when our moral sense is offended; for the Lord Jesus authorizes the belief that the Mosaic legislation was imperfect (Mt 5²⁰, Mk 10²⁻⁹), and both Jeremiah and Ezekiel comment adversely on doctrines which had been accepted on what seemed to be Divine authority (cf. Ex 20¹ with Jer 31²⁹⁻³⁰ and Ezk 18², 19, 20). It is reasonable to admit that if men were to be improved at all there must have been some accommodation to circumstances and states of mind very unlike our own; yet some of the laws are shocking. While such institutions as polygamy and slavery, which could not be at once abolished, were restricted in their range and stripped of some of their worst evils (Ex 21², Lv 25⁴²⁻⁴⁹, 1 Ch 2²⁸, Pr 17²), there remain many enactments and transactions which must have been always abhorrent to God though His sanction is claimed for them (Ex 22¹⁸⁻²⁰, 31¹⁴, 15, 35², Lv 20²⁷, Nu 15²⁷⁻³⁰, 31, Dt 13¹⁻¹⁰, 17¹⁻⁵, 18²⁰, 21¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 2 S 21¹⁻⁹). Had men always remembered these illustrations of the fact that passions and opinions utterly immoral may seem to be in harmony with God's will, the cruelties inflicted on heretics in the name of God would not have disgraced the Church's history; and, indeed, these frightful mistakes of OT days may have been recorded to teach us to be cautious, lest while doing wrong we imagine that God is served (Jn 16⁷). The limited area of the unworthy teaching would be noticed if care were taken to observe that (1) some of the wicked incidents are barely recorded, (2) some are reprobated in the context, (3) some are evidently left without comment because the historian assumes that they will be immediately condemned by the reader. In regard to the rest, it is certain that the Divine seal has been used contrary to the Divine will. It must be added that the very disapproval of the enormities has been made possible by the book which contains the objectionable passages, and that it is grossly unfair to overlook the high tone manifested generally throughout a great and noble literature, and the justice, mercy, and truth conjoined by Israel's poets, historians, and prophets, generation after generation.

(ii.) As to the NT, it is alleged that, even if the Sermon on the Mount could be obeyed, obedience would be ruinous. This, however, is directly in the teeth of Christ's own comment (Mt 7²⁸⁻²⁹), and is due in part to a supposition that every law is for every man. The disciples, having a special task, might be under special orders, just as the Lord Himself gave up all His wealth (2 Co 8⁹) and carried out literally most of the precepts included in His discourse. The paradoxical forms employed should be a sufficient guard against a bald construction of many of the sayings, and should compel us to meditate upon principles that ought to guide all lives. It is the voice of love that we hear, not the voice of legality. The Christian Ethic is supposed to be careless of social institutions, and Christianity is blamed for not preaching at once against slavery, etc. Probably more harm than good would have resulted from political and economic discourses delivered by men who were ostracized. But it is improbable that the Christian mind was sufficiently instructed to advance any new doctrine for the State. Moreover, the supposition that the world was near its close must have diverted attention from social schemes. The alienation from the world was an alienation from wickedness, not indifference to human pain and sorrow. The poverty of believers, the scorn felt for them by the great, the impossibility of attending public functions without countenancing idolatry, the lack of toleration by the State, all tended to keep the Christian distinct from his fellows. Mob and State and cultured class, by their hatred or contempt, compelled Christianity to move on its own lines. At first it was saved from contamination by various kinds of persecution, and the isolation has proved to be a blessing to mankind; for the new life was able to gather its forces and to acquire knowledge of its own powers and mission. The new ideal was protected by its very unpopularity. Meanwhile there was the attempt to live a life of love to God and man, and to treasure Gospels and Epistles that kept securely for a more promising season many sacred seeds destined to grow into trees bearing many kinds of fruit. The doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood implicitly condemns every social and political wrong, while it begets endeavours directed to the promotion of peace among nations, and to the uplifting of the poor and ignorant and deprived of every land into realms of material, intellectual, and moral blessing. There is no kind of good which is absent from the prayers: 'Thy kingdom come'; 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.'

ETHIOPIA is tr. of the Heb. Cush, which is derived from Kosh, the Egypt. name of Nubia (beginning at the First Cataract). The cultivable land in this region is very meagre. The scanty and barbarous population of the valley and the deserts on either side was divided in early times among different tribes, which were completely at the mercy of the Egyptians. Individually, however, the Sudanese were sturdy warriors, and were constantly employed by the Pharaohs as mercenary soldiers and police. In the time of the New Kingdom, Cush southward to Napata was a province of Egypt, dotted with Egyptian temples and governed by a viceroy. With the weakening of the Egyptian power Cush grew into a separate kingdom, with Napata as its capital. Its rulers were probably of Egyptian descent; they are represented as being entirely subservient to Ammon, i.e. to his priests, elected by him, acting only upon his oracles, and ready to abdicate or even to commit suicide at his command. We first hear of a king of Ethiopia about B.C. 730, when a certain Pankhi, reigning at Napata and already in possession of the Egyptian Thebaid, added most of Middle Egypt to his dominions and exacted homage from the princes of the Delta. A little later an Ethiopian dynasty (the XXVth) sat on the throne of the Pharaohs for nearly fifty years (B.C. 715-664). The last of these, Taharaku (Tirhakah [wh. see]), intrigued with the kinglets of Syria and Phœnicia against the Assyrians, but only to the ruin of himself and his dynasty. Taharaku and his successor Tandamane were driven into Ethiopia by the Assyrian invasions, and Egypt became independent under the powerful XXVth Dynasty. For the Persian period it is known that Ethiopia, or part of it, was included in one satrapy with Egypt under Darius. In the 3rd cent. B.C. king Ergamenes freed himself from the power of the priests of Ammon by a great slaughter of them. From about this time forward Meroë, the southern residence, was the capital of Ethiopia. The worship of Ammon, however, as the national god of 'Negroland,' as Ethiopia was then called, still continued. In B.C. 24 the Romans invaded Ethiopia in answer to an attack on Egypt by queen Candace, and destroyed Napata, but the kingdom continued to be independent. The Egyptian culture of Ethiopia had by that time fallen into a very barbarous state. Inscriptions exist written in a peculiar character and in the native language, as yet undeciphered; others are in a debased form of Egyptian hieroglyphic.

The name of Cush was familiar to the Hebrews through the part that its kings played in Egypt and Syria from B.C. 730-664, and recently discovered papyri prove that Jews were settled on the Ethiopian border at Syene in the 6th cent. B.C. See also CUSH.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.—According to Ac 8²⁷, an Ethiopian eunuch, minister of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, who was over all her treasure, was met shortly after the martyrdom of Stephen by the deacon Philip when returning from a religious journey to Jerusalem, and converted to Christianity. The confession of faith put into his mouth in v. 37 (AV) is now universally admitted to be an early interpolation. Assuming the Lukan authorship of the Acts, the source of the above narrative may have been personal information received from Philip (cf. Ac 21¹⁸). Like the baptism of Cornelius by St. Peter, the case of the Ethiopian eunuch marked an important stage in the question of the admission of the Gentiles to the Christian Church.

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN.—According to Nu 12¹ (JE), when the children of Israel were at Hazereth, Miriam and Aaron 'spake against' Moses on account of his marriage with an Ethiopian (RV 'Cushite') woman. As the 'Ethiopian woman' is mentioned nowhere else, and the death of Moses' wife Zipporah is not recorded, some of the early interpreters thought the two must be identical; and this view is favoured by the Jewish expositors. But it is more likely that a black slave-girl is meant, and that the fault found by Miriam and Aaron was with the indignity of such a union. It may perhaps be inferred from the context that the marriage was of recent occurrence.

ETH-KAZIN.—A town on the E. frontier of Zebulun, whose site has not been identified (Jos 19¹³).

ETHNAN.—A Judahite (1 Ch 47).

ETHNARCH is a Greek word translated by 'governor' in 2 Co 11²². It is used also of Simon the high priest (1 Mac 14¹⁷ 15^{1, 2}). Its exact meaning is uncertain, but it appears to indicate the ruler of a nation or tribe which is itself living with separate laws, etc., amidst an alien race. A. SOUTER.

ETHNI.—An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6¹, called in v. 21 Jeatherai).

EUBULUS.—A leading member of the Christian community at Rome, who sends greeting to Timothy through St. Paul at the time of the second imprisonment (2 Ti 4²¹). His name is Greek, but nothing further is known of him.

EUCHARIST.—This is the earliest title for the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. It is found in Ignatius and the Didache, and is based upon the eucharistia or giving of thanks with which our Lord set apart the bread and wine at the Last Supper as memorials of Himself (Mt 26²⁷, Lk 22^{17, 19}, 1 Co 11²⁴). The name Lord's Supper, though legitimately derived from 1 Co 11²⁰, is not there applied to the sacrament itself, but to the Love-feast or Agape, a meal commemorating the Last Supper, and not yet separated from the Eucharist when St. Paul wrote. The irregularities rebuked by the Apostle (11^{21, 29}) are such as could only have accompanied the wider celebration, and doubtless contributed to the speedy separation of the essential rite from the unnecessary accessories. The title Communion comes from 1 Co 10¹⁶, where, however, the word is a predicate not used technically. The breaking of (the) bread (Ac 2⁴² 46) probably refers to the Eucharist (cf. 20⁷, Lk 24^{30?}), but until modern times does not seem to have been adopted as a title.

1. The institution is recorded by each of the Synoptic Gospels, but not by St. John. A fourth account appears in 1 Corinthians.

Mt 14²²⁻²⁵.

²² As they were eating, he took bread, and when he had blessed, he brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take ye: this is my body. ²³ And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave to them; and they all drank of it. ²⁴ And he said unto them, This is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many. ²⁵ Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.

Lk 22¹⁴⁻²⁰.

¹⁴ When the hour was come, he sat down, and the apostles with him. ¹⁵ And he said unto them, With desire I have

Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁹.

²⁶ As they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it; and he gave to the disciples, and said, Take, eat: this is my body. ²⁷ And he took a cup, and gave thanks, and gave to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; ²⁸ for this is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins. ²⁹ But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.

1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵.

²³ I received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, how that the Lord Jesus in the night in which he was desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: ¹⁶ for I say unto you, I will not eat it, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. ¹⁷ And he received a cup, and when he had given thanks, he said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves: ¹⁸ for I say unto you, I will not drink from henceforth of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. ¹⁹ And he took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave to them, saying, This is my body [which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. ²⁰ And the cup in like manner after supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood, even that which is poured out for you].

A comparison shows variations of minor importance between Mark and Matthew. But the most remarkable differences are those of Luke, which mentions what is apparently a second cup. It seems scarcely credible that at a supreme moment, like that in which a sacred rite was being established, our Lord should have created the possibility of confusion by solemnly delivering two of the Paschal cups, dividing between them the words which, according to the other Synoptics, belong, as it would seem appropriately, to one. Nor, if He were about to hallow a succeeding cup as Eucharistic, is it likely that He would have spoken of the fulfilment of the Paschal wine in relation to another (v. 17). In spite, therefore, of the fact that the majority of MSS and Versions favour its inclusion, Westcott and Hort are probably right in regarding the passage inclosed in brackets above as an interpolation. With this omitted, the narrative is assimilated to the other Synoptics. The inversion of bread and cup, which now becomes apparent and which probably belongs not to Luke but to his source, is perhaps due to the fact that the writer, dwelling on the Lord's intention that the Passover should be fulfilled in a Messianic rite, records at the opening of his narrative a declaration similar to that which Matthew and Mark assign to a later stage, the delivery of the cup (Mt 26²⁹, Mk 14²³). These words, though referring more particularly to the Eucharistic bread, yet, as extending to the whole meal ('this pass-over'), require no mention of the action that would accompany them; whereas the companion statement concerning the fruit of the vine (Lk 22¹⁸) necessitates the mention of the cup (v. 17). The first half of v. 19 (the consecration of the bread), which, if the account were symmetrical, would appear (as arranged in Rushbrooke's Synopticon) before v. 18, is then added to complete the institution. A copyist, assuming a part of the narrative to be wanting, would then introduce, probably from a contemporary liturgical formula, the second half of v. 19 and v. 20, which bear a striking resemblance to the Pauline account, of which Luke is otherwise independent. A similar inversion is found in the sub-Apostolic Teaching of the Apostles.

2. From the Synoptic record the following inferences may be drawn: (1) The words of institution cannot themselves determine the meaning of the rite. Luke (unless v. 20 be genuine) omits 'This is my blood of the covenant.' [Notice also that the other traditional form varies the phrase—'the new covenant in my blood' (1 Co 11²⁵).] This may be due to the fact that Luke introduces the cup primarily in relation to our Lord's utterance concerning the fruit of the vine. But the sentence may be an interpretation of Christ's action, based on its correspondence with the hallowing of the bread. Matthew further amplifies by adding the words, 'unto remission of sins' (Mt 26²⁸). It is clear that, although formulas were probably already in use, the language was not yet stereotyped. We cannot, therefore, be certain of the precise form of words that our Lord adopted.

(2) The rite, like the gospel of which it is an ordinance, is Apostolic. The whole Twelve, but none other, are present with Jesus (Mk 14¹⁷||). Judas had not yet gone out (Lk 22²¹). The significant relation of the Apostles to the congregation of the spiritual Israel, prominent in Mark from the first (3¹⁴), is not only emphasized by their seclusion with Jesus in this supreme hour, but explicitly stated by Luke (22²¹⁻²⁴). Though, therefore, there is nothing beyond the form of the record itself to indicate the permanent and monumental character of the institution, yet the place which from the first the rite assumed as the bond of Christian fellowship, and for which Christians like Ignatius in the sub-Apostolic age claimed the authority of the Apostles, accords with and interprets the Synoptic narrative. To go behind the Apostolic Eucharist is no more possible for historic Christianity than to separate the actual Christ from the Apostolic witness.

(3) The Eucharist is Paschal in origin and idea.—It is unnecessary to determine whether the Last Supper was in fact the Passover, according to the impression of the Synoptists, or, as St. John seems to imply, anticipated by twelve hours the Jewish Feast. (See Sanday, in Hastings' DB, art. 'Jesus Christ,' II. E. ii.) No mention is made of the lamb, and the significant identification of the elements accessory to the feast, whether typically or effectually, with the sacrifice of Christ, suggests that its chief feature was absent. And this would seem to bind the rite thus instituted more closely than ever to that suffering before which He earnestly desired to celebrate it (Lk 22¹⁹), and wherein St. John contemplated the fulfilment of the Paschal type (Jn 19³⁶; cf. Ex. 12⁴⁶). The bread and wine, as eaten in fellowship by Christ and His disciples on the night of the betrayal, and distributed, as often as the rite is renewed, to those who believe on Jesus through the Apostolic word, is the Christian Passover celebrated beneath the Cross, where the very Paschal Lamb is offered for the life of the world. Its interpretation must, therefore, begin from the great Hebrew festival, in which it finds its origin, and which was regarded as a corporate communion of the Covenant People beneath the shelter of the sprinkled blood, an extension of that first sacred meal eaten when the destroying angel was passing over and working redemption for Israel (see Schultz, OT Theol., Eng. tr. vol. I. pp. 196, 197, 363-366).

3. St. Paul's account of the institution (see above) was written not later than A.D. 58, and is therefore older than the Synoptics. He claims to have received it as part of the inviolable deposit of the gospel (1 Co 11²³), which he must hand on unimpaired to those to whom he ministers the word. The phrase 'from the Lord' can hardly imply, as some have maintained, that a direct revelation was given to himself, extending to the form of words; but only that the record is part of that original message of which the Apostles were the guardians rather than the interpreters (1 Co 15³, Gal 1⁸⁻⁹). The form of tradition here reproduced brings out explicitly the fact that the Eucharist was regarded in the Apostolic Church as an ordinance to be observed in Christian congregations till the Lord's Coming ('as oft as ye drink,' with comment v.²⁹). It is St. Paul only that introduces the command, 'This do in remembrance of me' (v.²⁴), an expression fruitful in controversy. It has been urged that the word rendered 'do' means 'offer,' and that the Eucharist is, therefore, by its terms sacrificial. Not only is this an uncommon use of the Greek, unsuspected by the Greek commentators themselves, but the word 'this' (Gr. neuter) which follows can only be 'this action,' not 'this bread,' which would require the masculine form of the Gr. pronoun. Clearly, however, the phrase refers to the whole Eucharistic action, not to the particular acts of eating and drinking, the latter of which is differentiated from it in v.²⁸. It is further argued that the word used for 'remembrance' (anamnēsis, vv.^{24, 28}) implies a ritual memorial before God. The word, however, almost invariably used in the LXX with this signification is different (mnēmosynon, Lv 22⁷, v. 16 5¹², Nu 5²⁶; anam. is found in Lv 24⁷ and Nu 10¹⁰). And, though the form of words in which, according to the traditional ritual, the house-father recalled the redemption from Egypt is probably present to the Apostle's mind, it is uncertain whether this recital of Divine deliverance was directed towards God. As now used it would seem to be intended to carry out the injunction of the Law given in Ex 12^{26, 27} (see Haggadah for Passover). The same uncertainty attaches to St. Paul's explanatory statement—'ye proclaim the Lord's death'—though the natural interpretation of the Greek is in favour of the idea suggested by the RV, viz. announcement to men rather than commemoration before God (cf. 1 Co 9¹⁴). The evidential value, not the mystical significance, of the rite is here asserted.

4. The sacrificial character of the Eucharist is involved in the declaration that the bread broken is a communion of the body, the cup of blessing a communion of the blood, of Christ (1 Co 10¹⁶). The table of the Lord is contrasted with the table of demons (v.²¹) through the medium of the sacrificial system of the OT, of which it is a fundamental principle that to eat of the offerings is to have communion with the altar (v.¹⁸). The words 'Lord's table' and 'altar' are found as synonyms in Malachi (17¹²). The Levitical code includes many forms of oblation in which feeding on the sacrifice, if it ever existed, has disappeared; but provision is made for it in the case of the peace-offerings (Lv 7¹³⁻²¹). A closer study of the OT brings into greater prominence the connexion between sacrifice and feasting (Ex 32⁶⁵, Dt 12^{12, 12, 26} 10¹¹, 1 S 13⁹, 16^{2, 11}; see Schultz, OT Theol., Eng. tr. i. c. xii.). The end of sacrifice in Israel, as among other nations, is the union of the worshipper with the object of worship, through the covering which the priest supplies (W. R. Smith, RS² Lect. xi.). This is especially evident in the Passover, which is a sacrifice (Ex 12²⁷ 34²⁶, Nu 9⁷⁻¹³), and, as including a repast, should rank among the peace-offerings. The Eucharist, therefore, is a sacrifice, not as the commemoration of the death of Christ, but as the means of participation in the Paschal Lamb slain for us (1 Co 5⁷), in the offering of the body of Christ once made on the Cross (He 10¹⁰; cf. Jn 19³⁶, 1 Co 10¹⁷). The crucifixion of Christ's natural body results in the institution of that instrument of union, the sacramental body, in respect of which the unworthy partaker is guilty (1 Co 11²⁷, but see below), and through which the faithful have fellowship with Christ in His mystical body (10¹⁶⁻¹⁷). The transition from one application of the word 'body' to the others—'one bread, one body'—is very subtle, and they are no doubt so vitally connected in the mind of St. Paul as hardly to be capable of exact distinction. But it is unlikely that in a passage where the argument would have been satisfied by the use of one word—'body'—on the analogy of the common pagan identification of the god with the sacrifice, he should have used the longer phrase—'communion of the body'—if he had not felt that the single word would have failed to give the exact meaning. The sense of the whole passage depends upon the reality of the gift conveyed through the feast in which it is symbolically presented. St. Paul holds that there is a real communion in the sacrificial feasts of the heathen, though in this case with demons (v.²⁰), whose presence is incompatible with that of Christ (v.²¹).

5. The crucial words of the second passage (11¹⁷⁻³⁴) are 'if he discern not the body.' 'Lord's' is an interpolation of the TR, which the RV properly rejects (v.²⁹). The RV also brings out the fact that the verb tr. 'discern' (v.²⁹) is again used in v.³¹—'if we discerned ourselves'—thus showing that the word does not mean 'perceive' but 'discriminate.' 'Body' is left undefined, including, as it apparently does, the mystical body which the unworthy despise in the Church of God, the sacramental elements which they dishonour by profane use, and the sacrifice of Christ with which they reject communion, thereby becoming guilty in respect of each (vv. 21, 22, 26, 27).

6. Both passages express what is implicit in the division of the sacrament into two kinds. It is the body and blood as separated in death through which communion is attained. In 1 Co 10¹⁶, by placing the cup first, as in St. Luke's account of the institution, St. Paul emphasizes the sacrificial death of Christ as a necessary element in the Eucharistic feast. The Epistle to the Hebrews shows that access to the Holy Place is gained through the offered body and sprinkled blood (He 10¹⁹⁻²⁰); St. John, that union with Christ is found in that Living Bread which implies death because it is flesh and blood (Jn 6⁵²⁻⁵⁵). Commenting on the unique phrase 'drink his blood,' Westcott says that to Jewish ears the idea conveyed is the appropriation of 'life sacrificed' (see note on 6⁵² in Gospel acc. to St. John). There is nothing to warrant the medieval inference that the phrase 'flesh and blood' is equivalent to 'personality,' and that therefore 'the whole Christ' is sacramentally present in the Eucharistic elements. But it does imply vital union with Him who became dead and is alive for evermore (Rev 1⁸), a Lamb 'as though it had been slain' (5⁶), a Priest upon His throne (Zec 6¹³; cf. He 8¹), who through the one offering of Himself has perfected for ever (10¹⁴) those that come to God through Him.

7. In conclusion, however, it must be frankly admitted that, while one view of the sacrament may seem on the whole to express more fully than others the general tenor of NT teaching on the subject, none of the explanations which have divided Christendom since the 16th cent., not even the theory of transubstantiation when precisely defined, can be regarded as wholly inconsistent with the language of Scripture.

EUNUCH.—In the proper sense of the word a eunuch is an emasculated human being (Dt 23¹), but it is not absolutely certain that the Heb. sd̄ris always has this signification, and the uncertainty is reflected in our Eng. tr., where 'officer' and 'chamberlain' are frequently found. It is interesting to note that the group of scholars who rendered Jeremiah for the AV adhered to 'eunuch' throughout: unhappily the Revisers have spoiled the symmetry by conforming Jer 52²³ to 2 K 25¹⁹. The following reasons, none of which is decisive, have been advanced in favour of some such rendering of sd̄ris as 'officer' or 'chamberlain.' 1. That Potiphar (Gn 37³⁶) was married. But actual eunuchs were not precluded from this (see Ter. Eun. 4, 3, 24; Juv. vi. 366; Sir 20³ 30²⁰ etc.). And the words in Gn 39¹ which identify Joseph's first master with the husband of his temptress are an interpolation. 2. That in 2 K 25¹⁹ etc. 'eunuchs' hold military commands, whereas they are generally unwelcome (imbelles, Juv. l.c.). But there have been competent commanders amongst them. 3. That the strict meaning cannot be insisted on at Gn 40². Yet even here it is admissible.

The kings of Israel and Judah imitated their powerful neighbours in employing eunuchs (1) as guardians of the harem (2 K 9², Jer 41¹⁶); Est 1¹³ 4¹ are instances of Persian usage; (2) in military and other important posts (1 S 8¹⁵, 1 K 22², 2 K 8² 23¹ 24¹², 16 25¹⁹, 1 Ch 28¹, 2 Ch 18⁸, Jer 29² 34¹⁹ 38⁷; cf. Gn 37³⁶ 40² 7, Ac 8²⁷, Dn 1³ does not of necessity imply that the captives were made eunuchs). For the services rendered at court by persons of this class and the power which they often acquired, see Jos. Ant. xvi. viii. 1. But their acquisitions could not remove the sense of degradation and loss (2 K 20¹⁸, Is 39⁷). Dt 23¹ excluded them from public worship, partly because self-mutilation was often performed in honour of a heathen deity, and partly because a maimed creature was judged unfit for the service of Jahweh (Lv 21¹⁰ 22²⁴). That ban is, however, removed by Is 56³. Euseb. (HE vi. 8) relates how Origen misunderstood the figurative language of Mt 19¹²; Origen's own comment on the passage shows that he afterwards regretted having taken it literally and acted on it. EUPATOR.—See ANTIOCHUS V.

EUPHRATES, one of the rivers of Eden (Gn 2¹⁴), derives its name from the Assyrian Purat, which is itself taken from the Sumerian Pura, 'water,' or Pura-nun, 'the great water.' Purat became Urdtu in Persian, where the prosthetic vowel was supposed by the Greeks to be the word u, 'good.' In the OT the Euphrates is generally known as 'the river.' It rises in the Armenian mountains from two sources, the northern branch being called the Frat or Kara-su, and the southern and larger branch the Murad-su (the Arsanias of ancient geography). The present length of the river is 1780 miles, but in ancient times it fell into the sea many miles to the north of its existing outlet, and through a separate mouth from that of the Tigris. The salt marshes through which it passed before entering the sea were called Marratu (Merathaim in Jer 50²³), where the Aramaean Kaldæans lived. The alluvial plain between the Euphrates and the Tigris constituted Babylonia, the water of the annual inundation (which took place in May, and was caused by the melting of the snows in Armenia) being regulated by means of canals and barrages. The Hittite city of Carchemish stood at the point where the Euphrates touched Northern Syria, and commanded one of the chief fords over the river; south of it came the Belikh and Khabur, the last affluents of the Euphrates. The promise made to the Israelites that their territory should extend to 'the great river' (Gn 15¹⁸ etc.) was fulfilled through the conquests of David (2 S 8³ 10¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 1 K 4²⁴).

EURAKILO (Ac 27¹⁴ RV).—There is some doubt as to the reading. The Greek MSS which are esteemed to be the best read Eurakylon; so do the Bohairic Version, which was made in Egypt in the 6th or 7th cent. from a MS very like these, and the Sahidic Version made in the 3rd cent.; the Vulgate Latin revision, made towards the close of the 4th cent., reads Euroakilo, which points to a Greek original reading Euroakylon. Our later authorities, along with the Pesh. and Hark. Syriac, read Eurokydon (so AV). No doubt Eur(o)akylon is the correct name, and the other is an attempt to get a form capable of derivation. The word is, then, a sailor's word, and expresses an E.N.E. wind, by compounding two words, a Greek word (euros) meaning E. wind, and a Latin word (aquilo) meaning N.E. wind. This is exactly the kind of wind which frequently arises in Cretan waters at the present day, swooping down from the mountains in strong gusts and squalls. The euerguilo which drove St. Paul's ship before it was the cause of the shipwreck. A. SOUTER.

EUTYCHUS.—A young man who fell down from a third storey while sleeping during St. Paul's sermon at Troas, and was 'taken up dead' (Ac 20⁹). St. Paul fell on him and, embracing him, declared life to be in him. It is not actually said that Eutychus was dead, but that seems at least to have been the general belief. The incident is described in parallel terms with the raising of Dorcas and of Jairus' daughter. A. J. MACLEAN.

EVANGELIST ('one who proclaims good tidings' ['evangel,' 'gospel']).—The word occurs 3 times in NT (Ac 21⁴, Eph 4¹¹, 2 Ti 4⁵), and in each case with reference to the proclamation of the Christian gospel.

Ac 21⁸ gives what appears to be the primary Christian use of the word. Philip, one of the Seven (cf. Ac 61-6), is there called 'the evangelist.' And how he obtained this title is suggested when we find that immediately after Stephen's martyrdom he went forth from Jerusalem and 'preached the gospel' (literally evangelized) in Samaria, in the desert, and in all the cities of the coast-land between Azotus and Caesarea (Ac 84-6. 12. 26. 38. 40). In the first place, then, the evangelist was a travelling Christian missionary, one who preached the good news of Christ to those who had never heard it before.

In Eph 4¹¹ Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers are all named as gifts bestowed on the Church by the ascended Christ. It is impossible to distinguish these 5 terms as referring to so many fixed ecclesiastical offices. There is no ground, e.g., for thinking that there was an order of pastors and another of teachers in the early Church. St. Paul, again, while discharging the exceptional functions of the Apostolate, was himself the prince of evangelists and the greatest of Christian teachers. We conclude, therefore, that the evangelist as such was not an official, but one who, without having the higher powers of Apostleship or prophecy, or any special talent for teaching or pastoral work, had a gift for proclaiming the gospel as a message of saving love—a gift which was chiefly exercised, no doubt, by moving as Philip had done from place to place.

That 'evangelist' denotes function and not special office is confirmed by 2 Ti 4⁵. Timothy is exhorted to 'do the work of an evangelist,' but also to engage in tasks of moral supervision and patient doctrinal instruction (vv. 2-3) which suggest the settled pastor and stated teacher rather than the travelling missionary. In his earlier life, Timothy, as St. Paul's travel-companion (Ac 16¹⁶, 19²², 20⁴, Ro 16²³ etc.), had been an evangelist of the journeying type. But this passage seems to show that there is room for the evangelist at home as well as abroad, and that the faithful minister of Christ, in order to 'make full proof of his ministry,' will not only watch over the morals of his flock and attend to their up-building in sound doctrine, but seek to win outsiders to Christ by proclaiming the gospel of His grace.

The special use of 'evangelist' in the sense of an author of a written 'Gospel' or narrative of Christ's life, and specifically the author of one of the four canonical Gospels, is much later than the NT, no instance being found till the 3rd century. J. C. LAMBERT.

EVE (Heb. Ḥawwāh; the name probably denotes 'life': other proposed explanations are 'life-giving,' 'living,' 'kinship,' and some would connect it with an Arab. word for 'serpent').—1. Eve is little more, in Genesis, than a personification of human life which is perpetuated by woman. See ADAM. 2. In the NT Eve is mentioned in 2 Co 11³, 1 Ti 2¹³⁻¹⁵. The former is a reference to her deception by the serpent. The latter teaches that since Adam was first formed, then Eve, women must live in quiet subordination to their husbands. And a second reason seems to be added, i.e. that Adam was 'not deceived,' in the fundamental manner that Eve was, for 'the woman being completely deceived has come into [a state of] transgression.' Here

EVIL

St. Paul distinctly takes Eve to be a personification of all women. The personification continues in v. 16, which is obscure, and must be studied in the commentaries.

EVENING.—See TIME.

EVI.—One of the five kings of Midian slain (Nu 31⁴ Jos 13²¹).

EVIDENTLY.—Ac 10³ 'He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day'; Gal 3¹ 'before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth.' The meaning is clearly, or openly as in RV. Cf. Rob. Crusoe (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 250), 'He saw evidently what Stock of Corn and Rice I had laid up.'

EVIL is an older form of the word 'ill'; used, both as substantive and adjective, to tr. various synonyms and ranging in meaning from physical unfitness to moral wickedness. The former is archaic, but occurs in Gn 28⁸ (AVm), Ex 21⁸ (AVm), Jer 24³ (AV), and Mt 7¹⁸, though the two last passages are not without an ethical tinge. But the word almost invariably connotes what is either morally corrupt (see SIN) or injurious to life and happiness.

1. In the OT the two meanings are at first scarcely differentiated. Whatever comes to man from without is, to begin with, attributed simply to God (Am 3⁶, La 3³⁸, Ezk 14⁹, Is 45⁷). Destruction is wrought by His angels (Ex 12²³, 2 S 24¹⁶, Ps 78¹⁹). Moral temptations come from Him (2 S 24¹, 1 K 22²³), though there is a tendency to embody them in beings which, though belonging to the host of heaven, are spoken of as evil or lying spirits (1 S 16¹⁴, Jg 9²², 1 K 22²³). The serpent of the Fall narrative cannot be pressed to mean more than a symbol of temptation, though the form which the temptation takes suggests hostility to the will of God external to the spirit of the woman (2 Co 11³, cf. Gn 3¹⁻⁵). Then later we have the figure of the Adversary or Satan, who, though still dependent on the will of God, is nevertheless so identified with evil that he is represented as taking the initiative in seduction (Zec 3¹, 1 Ch 21¹, but cf. 2 S 24¹). This marks the growth of the sense of God's holiness (Dt 32⁴ etc.), the purity which cannot behold evil (Hab 1¹³); and correspondingly sharpens the problem. Heathen gods are now identified with demons opposed to the God of Israel (Dt 32¹⁷, Ps 106³⁷; cf. 1 Co 10²⁰). This tendency, increased perhaps by Persian influence, becomes dominant in apocryphal literature (2 P 2⁴ and Jude 6 are based on the Book of Enoch), where the fallen angels are a kingdom at war with the Kingdom of God.

2. In the NT moral evil is never ascribed to God (Ja 1¹³), being essentially hostile to His mind and will (Rc 11¹⁸⁻²¹, 51⁹, 1 Jn 1⁵⁻⁷, 2¹⁸, 3³⁻⁷); but to the Evil One (Mt 6¹³, 13¹⁹, 1 Jn 5¹⁹), an active and personal being identical with the Devil (Mt 13³⁹, Jn 8⁴⁴) or Satan (Mt 4¹⁰, Mk 4¹⁵, Lk 22³¹, Jn 13²⁷), who with his angels (Mt 25⁴¹) is cast down from heaven (Rev 12⁹, cf. Lk 10¹⁸), goes to and fro in the earth as the universal adversary (1 P 5⁸, Eph 4²⁷, 6¹¹, Ja 4⁷), and will be finally imprisoned with his ministering spirits (Rev 20²⁻¹⁰, cf. Mt 25⁴¹). Pain and suffering are ascribed sometimes to God (Rev 3¹⁹, 1 Th 3³, He 12¹¹), inasmuch as all things work together for good to those that love Him (Ro 8²⁸); sometimes to Satan (Lk 13¹⁶, 2 Co 12⁷) and the demons (Mt 8²⁸ etc.), who are suffered to hurt the earth for a season (Rev 9¹⁻¹¹, 12¹²).

The speculative question of the origin of evil is not resolved in Holy Scripture, being one of those things of which we are not competent judges (see Butler's Analogy, i. 7, cf. 1 Co 13²). Pain is justified by the redemption of the body (Ro 8¹⁻², 1 P 4¹³), punishment by the peaceable fruits of righteousness (He 12¹¹), and the permission of moral evil by the victory of the Cross (Jn 12⁴, Ro 8³⁷⁻³⁹, Col 2¹⁵, 1 Co 15⁵⁴⁻⁵⁹). Accept the facts and look to the end is the teaching of the Bible as a guide to practical religion (Ja 5¹¹). Beyond this we enter the region of that high theology which comprehensive thinkers like Aquinas or Calvin have not shrunk

/from formulating, but which, so far as it is dealt with in the NT, appears rather as a by-product of evangelical thought, than as the direct purpose of revelation (as, e.g., in Ro 9, where God's elective choice is stated only as the logical presupposition of grace). St. Paul is content to throw the responsibility for the moral facts of the universe upon God (Ro 9¹⁹⁻²⁴; cf. Job 33¹², Ec 5², Is 29¹⁶), who, however, is not defined as capricious and arbitrary power, but revealed as the Father, who loves the creatures of His hand, and has foreordained all things to a perfect consummation in Christ the Beloved (Eph 1³⁻¹⁴ etc.). J. G. SIMPSON.

EVIL-MERODACH, the Amel-Marduk of the Babylonians, son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar on the throne of Babylon (2 K 25²⁷⁻³⁰), promoted Jehoiachin in the 37th year of his captivity. He reigned b.c. 562-560. Berossus describes him as reigning lawlessly and without restraint, and he was put to death by his brother-in-law Neriglissar, who succeeded him. C. H. W. JOHNS.

EVIL SPEAKING in the Bible covers sins of untruthfulness as well as of malice. It includes abuse, thoughtless talebearing, imputing of bad motives, slander, and deliberate false witness. Warnings against it are frequent; it is forbidden in the legislation of the OT (Ninth Commandment; Dt 19¹⁶⁻¹⁹) and of the NT (Mt 5²² 12²² 15¹⁸). Christians must expect this form of persecution (Mt 5¹¹), but must be careful to give no handle to it (Ro 14¹⁶, Tit 2⁸, 1 P 2¹² 3¹⁶).

C. W. EMMET.

EVIL SPIRITS.—As a natural synonym for demons or devils, this phrase is used in the NT only by St. Luke (7²¹ 8², Ac 19¹² 13. 15. 16), and presents no difficulty. But in the OT, especially the historical books, reference is made to an evil spirit as coming from or sent by God; and the context invests this spirit with personality. The treachery of the men of Shechem is so explained (Jg 9²³), though in this case the spirit may not be personal but merely a temper or purpose of ill-will. Elsewhere there is not the same ground for doubt; 'an evil spirit from the Lord' is the alleged cause of Saul's moodiness (1 S 16¹⁴, where notice the antithetical 'the spirit of the Lord'), and of his raving against David (1 S 18¹⁰ 19¹). Similarly Micaiah speaks of 'a lying spirit' from God (1 K 22²¹⁻²⁴, 2 Ch 18²⁰⁻²²). It has been suggested that in all these cases the reference is to God Himself as exerting power, and effecting good or evil in men according to the character of each. The nearest approach to this is perhaps in Ex 12¹² 23, where Jehovah and the destroyer are apparently identified, though the language admits equally of the view that the destroyer is the agent of Jehovah's will (cf. 2 S 24⁶). But the theory is inconsistent with what is known to have been the current demonology of the day (see DEVIL), as well as with the natural suggestion of the phrases. These spirits are not represented as constituting the personal energy of God, but as under His control, which was direct and active according to some of the writers, but only permissive according to others. The fact of God's control is acknowledged by all, and is even a postulate of Scripture; and in using or permitting the activity of these spirits God is assumed or asserted to be punishing people for their sins. In this sense He has 'a band of angels of evil' (Ps 78⁴⁰), who may yet be called 'angels of the Lord' (2 K 19³⁵, Is 37³⁶), as carrying out His purposes. Micaiah evidently considered Zedekiah as used by God in order to entice Ahab to his merited doom. Ezekiel propounds a similar view (14⁹), that a prophet may be deceived by God, and so made the means of his own destruction and of that of his dupes, much as David was moved to number Israel through the anger of the Lord against the people (2 S 24¹). As the conception of God developed and was purified, the permitted action of some evil spirit is substituted for the Divine activity, whether direct or through the agency of messengers, considered as themselves ethically good but capable of employment on any kind of service. Accordingly the Chronicler represents Satan as the instigator of David (1 Ch 21¹).

Jeremiah denies the inspiration of lying prophets, and makes them entirely responsible for their own words and influence (23¹⁸ 21. 28¹); they are not used by God, and will be called to account. They speak out of their own heart, and are so far from executing God's justice or anger upon the wicked that He interposes to check them, and to protect men from being misled.

An evil spirit, therefore, wherever the phrase occurs in a personal sense in the earlier historical books of the OT, must be thought of simply as an angel or messenger of God, sent for the punishment of evil (cf. 1 S 19⁹ RVm). His coming to a man was a sign that God's patience with him was approaching exhaustion, and a prelude of doom. Gradually the phrase was diverted from this use to denote a personal spirit, the 'demon' of the NT margin, essentially evil and working against God, though powerless to withdraw entirely from His rule. R. W. MOSS.

EXCELLENCY EXCELLENT.—These English words are used for a great variety of Heb. and Gr. expressions, a complete list of which will be found in Driver's Daniel (Camb. Bible). The words (from Lat. excello, 'to rise up out of,' 'surpass') formerly had the meaning of pre-eminence and pre-eminent, and were thus good equivalents for the Heb. and Gr. expressions. But since 1611 they have become greatly weakened; and, as Driver says, 'it is to be regretted that they have been retained in RV in passages in which the real meaning is something so very different.' The force of 'excellency' may be clearly seen in the margin of AV at Gn 4⁷, where 'have the excellency' is suggested for 'be accepted' in the text; or the marg. at Ec 2¹³, where instead of 'wisdom excelleth folly' is suggested 'there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly.' In Dn 1²⁰ it is said that 'in all matters of wisdom and understanding, that the king inquired of them, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm'; and this is summed up in the heading of the chapter in the words, 'their excellency in wisdom.' The force of 'excellent,' again, may be seen from the table in Hamilton's Catechism, 'Of the pre-eminent and excellent dignity of the Paternoster'; or from Sir John Mandeville, Travels, p. 1, 'the Holy Land, . . . passing all other lands, is the most worthy land, most excellent, and lady and sovereign of all other lands.'

EXCHANGER.—See MONEY-CHANGER.

EXCOMMUNICATION.—In the OT the sentence against those who refused to part with their 'strange' wives (Ezr 10⁸)—'his substance shall be confiscated and he himself separated'—is the earliest instance of ecclesiastical excommunication. This was a milder form of the ancient Heb. chêrem, curse or ban, which in the case of man involved death (Lv 27²⁸), and devotion or destruction in the case of property. The horror of this curse or chêrem hangs over the OT (Mal 4⁶, Zec 14¹¹). Anathema, the LXX equivalent of chêrem (e.g. in Dt 7²⁶, Jos 6¹⁷, Nu 21²), appears in 1 Co 16²² 'If any love not the Lord, let him be anathema' (which refers, as does also Gal 1⁸, to a permanent exclusion from the Church and doubtless from heaven), and in 1 Co 12³ 'No one speaking in the Spirit of God says, Jesus is anathema, i.e. a chêrem or cursed thing under the ban of God. Here there may be a reference to a Jewish brocard which afterwards gave rise to the Jewish tradition that Jesus was excommunicated by the Jews. The forms said to be in vogue in His day were: (1) niddai, a short sentence of thirty days; (2) chêrem, which involved loss of all religious privileges for a considerable time; (3) shammatai, complete expulsion or aquae et ignis interdictio. This last form, however, lacks attestation.

References in the NT to some form of Jewish procedure are: Jn 9²² 12¹³ 16², Lk 6²², Mt 18¹⁷⁻¹⁸ may be a reference to some Jewish procedure that was taken over by the Church. It mentions admonition: (1) in private, (2) in the presence of two or three witnesses, (3) in the presence of the Church. The sentence 'let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican' involved loss of social and spiritual privileges (cf. Tit 3⁹). 1 Co 5⁴ shows a formal assembly met 'in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ' to deliver one guilty of incest unto Satan, for the destruction of the flesh. The purpose of the punishment, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord' (v. 5)—is remedial, and shows that the sentence is not a life one, as anathema seems to be (cf. 1 Ti 1²⁰, where Hymenæus and Alexander are delivered to Satan, that they may be taught not to blaspheme). The Gr. word exarate, 'remove,' used in 1 Co 5⁵, suggests ara, which means both 'curse' and 'prayer.' In this case, at all events, the curse was intended to lead to penitence and prayer. 2 Co 2¹¹ seems to refer to a different case. Here the censure or punishment was given by 'the majority' without Paul's intervention, as in 1 Co 5⁴; the purpose of his writing here is 'that your (v.l. 'our') care for us (v.l. 'you') might be made manifest in the sight of God'; but there he writes for the man's sake; here the sinner is discussed with leniency, there the case is stated with due severity. If the case be a new one, it shows a growing independence of the Christian communities, and also that the Corinthians had received a salutary lesson. The phrase 'lest an advantage should be gained over us by Satan' (2 Co 2¹⁴) refers to the term of excommunication which St. Paul wished to end, lest the punishment should defeat its end and lead to ruin instead of recovery, and so Satan should hold what was only, metaphorically speaking, lent to him to hurt. In 2 Th 3¹⁴ the Apostle orders an informal and less severe excommunication of those who obey not his word. Its purpose, too, is remedial: 'that he may be ashamed.' St. John (2 Jn 1⁹) orders a similar form, and 3 Jn 9¹⁰ describes the manner in which Diotrephes receives neither him nor the brethren, does not permit others to receive them, and casts them out of the Church—the first instance of one party in the Christian Church excommunicating another for difference of doctrine. The loss of social and spiritual intercourse was intended to lead, in such cases, to recantation of opinions, as in others to repentance for sin.

EXILE.—See ISRAEL, I. 23.

EXODUS.—The book relates the history of Israel from the death of Joseph to the erection of the Tabernacle in the second year of the Exodus. In its present form, however, it is a harmony of three separate accounts.

1. The narrative of P. which can be most surely distinguished, is given first.

Beginning with a list of the sons of Israel (1¹⁻⁵), it briefly relates the oppression (1⁷ 13¹ 22^{2b} 25), and describes the call of Moses, which takes place in Egypt, the revelation of the name Jahweh, and the appointment of Aaron (6-7¹³). The plagues (7¹⁹ 20^a 21^b 22 23⁷ 15¹⁻⁹ 18-12 19¹), which are wrought by Aaron, form a trial of strength with Pharaoh's magicians. The last plague introduces directions for the Passover, the feast of unleavened bread, the sanctification of the firstborn, and the annual Passover (12¹ 20 28 40-51 13¹). Hence emphasis is laid, not on the blood-sprinkling, but on the eating, which was the perpetual feature.

The route to the Red Sea (which gives occasion to a statement about the length of the sojourn, 12¹⁰) is represented as deliberately chosen in order that Israel and Egypt may witness Jahweh's power over Pharaoh (12⁷ 13¹⁰ 14¹⁻⁴). When Moses stretches out his hand, the waters are miraculously divided and restored (14¹⁵ 15^a 16^b 18 21^a 27¹ 28 27^a 28^a 15¹⁹).

Between the Red Sea and Sinai the names of some halting places are given (16¹⁻³ 17¹ 19^{2a}). Ch. 16 is also largely (vv. 1-12a 16 24 31-35) from P. But the mention of the Tabernacle in v. 14 proves the story to belong to a later date than the stay at Sinai, since the Tabernacle was not in existence before Sinai. Probably the narrative has been brought into its present position by the editor.

On the arrival at Sinai, Jahweh's glory appears in a fiery cloud on the mountain. As no priests have been consecrated, and the people must not draw near, Moses ascends alone to receive the tables of the testimony (24^{15b-18a}) written by Jahweh on both sides. He remains (probably for 40 days) to receive plans for a sanctuary, with Jahweh's promise to meet with Israel (in the Tent of Meeting) and to dwell with Israel (in the Tabernacle) (25¹⁻³¹ 32^{1b}). He returns (34²⁹⁻³⁵), deposits the testimony in an ark he has caused to be prepared, and constructs the Tabernacle (35-40). The differing order in the plans as ordered and as executed, and the condition of the text in the LXX, prove that these sections underwent alterations before reaching their present form.

This account was evidently written for men who were otherwise acquainted with the leading facts of the history. It is dominated by two leading interests: (1) to insist in its own way that everything which makes Israel a nation is due to Jahweh, so that the religion and the history are interwoven; (2) to give a history of the origins, especially of the ecclesiastical institutions, of Israel.

2. The narrative of JE.—The rest of the book is substantially from JE, but it is extremely difficult to distinguish J from E. For (1) with the revelation of the name of Jahweh, one of our criteria, the avoidance of this name by E disappears; (2) special care has been taken to weld the accounts of the law-giving together, and it is often difficult to decide how much is the work of the editor. We give the broad lines of the separation, but remark that in certain passages this must remain tentative.

A. Israel in Egypt.

According to J, the people are cattle-owners, living apart in Goshen, where they increase so rapidly as to alarm Pharaoh (1⁸ 4-12). Moses, after receiving his revelation and commission in Midian (21-22 32-34a 5 7¹ 15-20 41-16 19 20^a 24-26a 29-31), demands from Pharaoh liberty to depart three days' journey to sacrifice (5¹⁻²³). On Pharaoh's refusal, the plagues, which are natural calamities brought by Jahweh, and which are limited to Egypt, follow Moses' repeated announcement (7¹⁴ 16 17a 18 25a 26¹ 81-4 8-10a 22-27 13-15 10¹⁻¹¹ 12b 14b 15a 15c-19 20-22 23¹ 11¹⁻⁵). In connexion with the Passover (12²¹⁻²⁷), blood-sprinkling, not eating, is insisted on. The escape is hurried (12-14 27-49), and so a historical meaning is attached to the use of unleavened bread (13¹⁻¹⁶ [based on J]).

According to E, the people live among the Egyptians as royal pensioners and without cattle. Their numbers are so small that two midwives suffice for them (1^{15-16a} 21¹). Moses (21¹⁰), whose father-in-law is Jethro (31), receives his revelation (3¹ 9b-15 21¹) and commission (4¹⁷ 20-22 27¹). Obeying, he demands that Israel be freed (5¹ 4) in order to worship their God on this mountain—a greater distance than three days' journey. E's account of the plagues has survived merely in fragments, but from these it would appear that Moses speaks only once to Pharaoh, and that the plagues follow his mere gesture while the miraculous element is heightened (7¹⁵ 17b 20b 22 9²⁻⁵ 10¹² 13a 14a 15b 20-23 27). The Israelites, however, have no immunity except from the darkness. The Exodus is deliberate, since the people have time to borrow from their neighbours (11¹⁻⁴ 12³⁵).

B. The Exodus.

According to J, an unarmed host is guided by the pillar of fire and cloud (13²¹). Pharaoh pursues to recover his slaves (14¹), and when the people are dismayed, Moses encourages them (14¹⁰⁻¹⁴ 15b 20b). An east wind drives back the water, so that the Israelites are able to cross during the night (14^{21b} 24 25b 27b 28¹ 30¹), but the water returns to overwhelm the Egyptians. Israel offers thanks in a hymn of praise (15¹); but soon in the wilderness tempts Jahweh by murmuring for water (vv. 22-24 27 17² 28 7).

According to E, an armed body march out in so leisurely a fashion that they are able to bring Joseph's bones. For fear of the Philistines they avoid the route of the isthmus (13¹⁷⁻¹⁹). Pharaoh pursues (14^{1a} 10¹) but the people, protected by an angel, cross when Moses lifts his rod (vv. 15b 16a 19a 20a 25a 29). The women celebrate the escape (15^{21b} 20¹); and in the wilderness Jahweh tests Israel, whether they can live on a daily provision from Him (16¹ 15a 16a 16a 19b-21 25a). Water, for which they murmur, is brought by Moses striking the rock with his rod (17^{1b} 2a 4-6 7b). Jethro visits and advises Moses (ch. 18 [in the main from E]). The condition of the account of the journey between the Red Sea and Sinai, and the fact that events of a later date have certainly come into P's account, make it likely that JE had very little on this stage, the account of which was amplified with material from the wilderness journey after Sinai.

C. At Sinai (here the accounts are exceptionally difficult to disentangle, and the results correspondingly tentative). According to J Jahweh descends on Sinai in fire (19¹⁶⁻¹⁸), and commands the people to remain afar off, while the consecrated priests approach (vv. 11b, 15, 20-22, 24). Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and 70 elders ascend (24¹⁻²) and celebrate a covenant feast (vv. 3-11). Moses then goes up alone to receive the Ten Words on tables which he himself has hewn, and remaining 40 days and 40 nights receives also the Book of the Covenant (ch. 34) J's statement as to the 40 days has been omitted in favour of E's, but its presence in his account can be inferred from references in 34¹⁻⁴. Ch. 34 is also inserted at this point, because its present position is eminently unsuitable after the peremptory command in J and E to leave Sinai (32¹⁻², 33¹⁻³). Hearing from Jahweh of the rebellion (32¹⁻¹²), Moses intercedes for forgiveness, and descends to quell the revolt with help from the Levites (vv. 13-28). He further intercedes that Jahweh should still lead His people, and obtains a promise of the Divine presence (33¹⁻³, 12-23). This was probably followed by Nu 10²⁰⁻²⁵. The Law he deposits in an ark which must already have been prepared.

J's law (ch. 34) is the outcome of the earliest effort to embody the essential observances of the Jahweh religion. The feasts are agricultural festivals without the historical significance given them in Deuteronomy, and the observances are of a ceremonial character, for, according to J, it is the priests who are summoned to Sinai. Efforts have been frequently made (since Goethe suggested it) to prove that this is J's decalogue—a ceremonial decalogue. Any division into 10 laws, however, has always an artificial character.

According to E, Jahweh descends in a cloud before the whole people (19¹⁴⁻¹⁵), whom Moses therefore sanctifies (vv. 14-17). They hear Jahweh utter the Decalogue (v. 19, 20¹⁻¹⁷), but, as they are afraid (20¹⁸⁻²¹), the further revelation with its covenant is delivered to Moses alone (20²²⁻²³ in part). The people, however, assent to its terms (24¹⁻⁸). Moses ascends the Mount with Joshua to receive the stone tables, on which Jahweh has inscribed the Decalogue (24^{12-14a}), and remains 40 days (v. 18b) to receive further commands. He returns with the tables (31^{18b}), to discover and deal with the outbreak of idolatry (32¹⁻⁴, 16-24). On his intercession he receives a promise of angelic guidance (vv. 30-36). From verses in ch. 33 (vv. 4, 6-11) which belong to E and from Dt 10¹⁻⁵ (based on E), this account related the making of an ark and Tent of Meeting, the latter adorned with the people's discarded ornaments. When JE was combined with P, this narrative, being superfluous alongside 25 ff., was omitted.

E's account thus contains three of the four collections of laws found in Exodus, for 21-23 consists of two codes, a civil (21¹⁻²²) and a ceremonial (22¹⁻²³ roughly). Probably the ceremonial section was originally E's counterpart to ch. 34 in J, while the civil section may have stood in connexion with ch. 18. As it now stands, E is the prophetic version of the law-giving. The basis of the Jahweh religion is the Decalogue with its clearly marked moral and spiritual character. (Cf. art. DEUTERONOMY.) This is delivered not to the priests (like ch. 34 in J), but to the whole people. When, however, the people shrink back, Moses, the prophetic intermediary, receives the further law from Jahweh. Yet the ceremonial and civil codes have a secondary place, and are parallel. The Decalogue, a common possession of the whole nation, with its appeal to the people's moral and religious sense, is fundamental. On it all the national institutions, whether civil or ceremonial, are based. Civil and ceremonial law have equal authority and equal value. As yet, however, the principles which inform the Decalogue are not brought into conscious connexion with the codes which control and guide the national life. The Book of Deuteronomy proves how at a later date the effort was made to penetrate the entire legislation with the spirit of the Decalogue, and to make this a means by which the national life was guided by the national faith.

The following view of the history of the codes is deserving of notice. E before its union with J contained three of these codes: the Decalogue as the basis of the Covenant; the Book of the Covenant, leading up to the renewal of the Covenant; and the Book of Judgments, which formed part of Moses' parting address on the plains of Moab. The editor who combined J and E, wishing to retain J's version of the Covenant, used it for the account of the renewal of the Covenant, and united E's Book of the Covenant, thus displaced, with the Decalogue as the basis of the first Covenant. The editor who combined JE with D, displaced E's Book of Judgments in favour of Deuteronomy, which he made Moses' parting address; and combined the displaced Book of Judgments with the Book of the Covenant. The view represented in the article, however, explains the phenomena adequately, is much simpler, and requires fewer hypotheses. A. C. WELCH.

EXORCISM.—The word may be defined as denoting the action of expelling an evil spirit by the performance of certain rites, including almost always the invocation of a reputedly holy name. An anticipation of the later methods occurs in David's attempt to expel Saul's melancholia by means of music (1 S 16¹⁶, 23); and in the perception of the benefit of music may possibly be found the origin of the incantations that became a marked feature of the process. A more complicated method is prescribed by the angel Raphael (To 6¹⁶⁻⁸²). In NT times the art had developed; professional exorcists had become numerous (Ac 19¹³⁻¹⁹), whilst other persons were adepts, and practised as occasion needed (Mt 12²⁷, Lk 11¹⁹). An old division of the Babylonian religious literature (cf. Cuneif. Texts from Tablets in Brit. Mus., pts. xvi., xvii.) contains many specimens of incantations; and the connexion of the Jews with that country, especially during the Exile, is an obvious explanation of the great extension both of the conception of the influence of demons and of the means adopted for their treatment. Exorcism was a recognized occupation and need in the Jewish life of the first century, as it became afterwards in certain sections of the Christian Church.

In the procedure and formulæ of exorcism, differences are traceable in the practice of the Jews, of Christ, and of His disciples. An illustration of the Jewish method may be found in Josephus (Ant. viii. ii. 5), who claims Solomon for its author, and describes a case that he had himself witnessed. Other instances occur in the papyri (e.g. Dieterich, Abraxas, 138ff.), and in the Talmud (e.g. Berakhoth, 51a; Pesachim, 112b). The vital part of the procedure was the invocation of a name (or a series of names, of a deity or an angel, at the mention of which the evil spirit was supposed to recognize the presence of a superior power and to decline a combat, as though a spell had been put upon him. Christ, on the other hand, uses no spell, but in virtue of His own authority bids the evil spirits retire, and they render His slightest word unquestioning obedience. Sometimes He describes Himself as acting 'by the finger of God' (Lk 11²⁰) or 'by the Spirit of God' (Mt 12²⁸), and sometimes His will is indicated even without speech (Lk 13¹⁴⁻¹⁶); but the general method is a stern or peremptory command (Mt 8¹⁶, Mk 1³⁴, Lk 8²⁹). He does not require any previous preparation on the part of the sufferer, though occasionally (Mk 9²¹) He uses the incident to excite faith on the part of the relatives. His own personality, His mere presence on the scene, are enough to alarm the evil spirits and to put an end to their mischief. In the case of His disciples, the power to exorcise was given both before and after the resurrection (Mt 10¹⁻⁸, Mk 3¹⁴, Lk 9¹), and was successfully exercised by them (Mk 6¹³, Lk 10¹⁷, Ac 5¹⁶, 8⁷, 10³⁸); but the authority was derived, and on that ground, if not by explicit command (cf. 'in my name,' Mk 16¹⁷), the invocation of the name of Jesus was probably substituted for His direct command. That was clearly the course adopted by St. Paul (Ac 16¹⁸, 19¹³⁻¹⁶), as by St. Peter and the Apostles generally in other miracles (Ac 3⁴⁻¹⁰, Ja 5¹⁴). The name of Jesus was not recited as a spell, but appealed to as the source of all spiritual power, as not only the badge of discipleship but the name of the ever-present Lord of spirits and Saviour of men (Mt 28¹⁹, Jn 14¹⁹). R. W. MOSS.

EXPECT.—'From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool' (He 10¹³), that is, waiting. In the Douai Bible the comment on Sir 11¹⁸ is: 'Expect the end of another man's speech before you begin to answer. Expect also if anle that is elder, or better able, will answer first.'

EXPERIENCE.—This word, which plays so large a part in modern philosophy and religion, occurs 4 times (including 'experiment') in EV. Of these instances only one survives in RV, viz., Ec 1⁶, where 'hath had great experience of' = 'hath seen much of (wisdom),' etc. In Gn 30²⁷ 'I have learnt by experience' (= 'experiment') becomes 'I have divined,' the Heb. vb. being the same as in Gn 44¹⁵, Dt 18¹⁰. In Ro 5¹ (RV 'probation') 'experience,' and in 2 Co 9¹³ (RV 'proving') 'experiment,' was the rendering of a Gr. word borrowed from the assaying of metal, which signified the testing, or test, of personal worth; the same noun appears in AV as 'trial' (RV 'proof') in 2 Co 2⁹ 8⁷, and 'proof' in 2 Co 13¹ and Ph 2²⁴. 'Christian experience,' in modern phraseology, covers what is spoken of in Scripture as the knowledge of God, of Christ, etc., and as 'the seal' or 'witness (testimony) of the Holy Spirit,' 'of our conscience,' etc., or as peace, assurance, salvation, and the like. Cf. next article. G. G. FINDLAY.

EXPERIMENT.—In 2 Co 9¹³ 'experiment' means proof: 'by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God.' It is proof arising out of experience, as in Hall, Works, iii. 467: 'We have known, indeed, some holy souls, which out of the general precepts of piety, and their own happy experiments of God's mercy, have, through the grace of God, grown to a great measure of perfection this way, which yet might have been much expedited and compleated, by those helps which the greater illumination and experience of others might have afforded them.' Cf. preced. article.

EYE.—The eye was supposed to be the organ or window by which light had access to the whole body (Mt 6²²). For beauty of eyes cf. 1 S 16¹² (RVm), Ca 1¹⁶ 5¹², and the name Dorcas in Ac 9³⁶; in Gn 29¹⁷ the reference seems to be to Leah's weak eyes (so Driver, ad loc.). The wanton or alluring eyes of women are referred to in Pr 6²⁵, Is 3¹⁶. Their beauty was intensified by painting, antimony being used for darkening the eyelashes (2 K 9³⁰, Jer 4³⁰, Ezk 23⁴⁰ [all RV]). Keren-happuch (Job 42¹⁴) means 'horn of eyepaint.' Pr 23²⁹ speaks of the drunkard's redness of eye. In Dt 6⁸ 14¹ 'between the eyes' means 'on the forehead.' Shaving the eyebrows was part of the purification of the leper (Lv 14⁷).

'Eye' is used in many figurative phrases: as the avenue of temptation (Gn 3⁶, Job 31¹); of spiritual knowledge and blindness, as indicating feelings—pride (2 K 19²²), favour [especially God's providence (Ps 33¹⁸)], hostility (Ps 10⁸). An evil eye implies envy (Mk 7²; cf. 1 S 18⁹), the only use of the verb in this sense in English) or niggardliness (Dt 15⁹, Pr 28²², and probably Mt 6², where the 'single eye' may mean 'liberality'; cf. Pr 22⁹). In Gn 20¹⁶ 'covering of the eyes' means 'forgetfulness of what has happened.' In Rev 3¹⁸ eye-salve or collyrium is a Phrygian powder mentioned by Galen, for which the medical school at Laodicea seems to have been famous. (See Ramsay, Seven Churches.) The reference is to the restoring of spiritual vision. C. W. EMMET.

EZBAI.—The father of Naarai, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11²⁷).

EZBON.—1. Eponym of a Gadite family (Gn 46¹⁶), called in Nu 26¹⁶ Ozmi. 2. A grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 7⁷).

EZEKIAS.—1. (AV Ezechias) 1 Es 9¹⁴—Jahseiah.

Ezr 10¹⁸. 2. (AV Ezechias 1 Es 9¹⁴, called Hilkiah in Neh 8⁴).

EZEKIEL (—'Jahweh strengthens'). I. THE MAN. —Ezekiel was the son of Buzi, a priest of the family of Zadok, and was carried into exile with Jehoiachin, B.C. 597 (2 K 24²⁰). Josephus (Ant. x. vi. 3) states that he was a boy at the time; but this is doubtful, for in the fifth year from then he was old enough to be called to the prophetic office (1²), and could speak of his youth as long past (4¹⁴); in the ninth year his wife dies (24¹⁸); his acquaintance with the Temple is best explained by supposing that he had officiated there, and the predictions in ch. 38f. read as though he remembered the inroad of B.C. 626. He and his fellow-exiles formed an organized community, presided over by elders, at Tel-Abib, on the banks of the canal Chebar (3¹⁰). Ezekiel lived in a house of his own (3²⁴), and, for at least 22 years (1² 29¹⁷), endeavoured to serve his people. His call was prefaced by an impressive vision of the Divine glory, and the expression, 'the hand of J^h was upon me' (1³ 8¹ 37¹ 40¹), indicates that the revelations which he received came to him in a state of trance or ecstasy; cf. also 3¹⁴ 22 with 24²⁷. His message met at first with contemptuous rejection (3⁷), and the standing title, 'a rebellious house,' shows that he never achieved the result which he desired. Yet there was something in his speech which pleased the ears of the captives, and brought them to his house for counsel (8¹ 14¹ 20¹ 33³⁰⁻³²). No doubt his character also commanded attention. His moral courage was impressive (3⁹); he ever acted as 'a man under authority,' accepting an unpleasant commission and adhering to it in spite of speedy (3¹⁴) and constant suffering (3¹⁵ 33⁷); even when he sighs it is at God's bidding (21¹ 7), and when his beloved wife dies he restrains his tears and resumes his teaching (24¹⁸⁻¹⁹). Part of his message was given in writing, but the spoken word is in evidence too (3¹⁰ 11² 20² 24¹⁸ 33³⁰⁻³²). It has been said that he was 'pastor rather than prophet,' and this would not be far from the truth if it ran, 'pastor as well as prophet,' for he both watched over individual souls and claimed the ear of the people. Again, he has been called 'a priest in prophet's garb,' for the thoughts and principles of the priesthood controlled his conduct (4¹⁴), come out amidst the vigorous ethical teaching of chapter 33, and give its distinctive colouring to the programme unfolded at the close of the book. We know nothing of his later life. Clem. Alex. refers to the legend that he met Pythagoras and gave him instruction. Pseudo-Epiphanius and others assert that he was martyred by a Hebrew whom he had rebuked for idolatry. His reputed grave, a few days' journey from Bagdad, was a pilgrimage resort of the mediæval Jews.

II. THE BOOK. 1. Division and Contents.—Two halves are sharply differentiated from each other in matter and tone. The change synchronized with the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (24¹ 1). Chs. 1-24 contain denunciations of sin and predictions of judgment; 25-48 are occupied with the hopes of the future. In the first division we distinguish: 1. The Introduction (1-3¹). 2. The first series of prophecies in act and word (3²-7). 3. The abominations practised in Jerusalem (8-11). 4. Sins, reasonings, stern threats (12-19). 5. The same subject, and the beginning of the end (20-24). In the second division: 1. The removal of hostile neighbours (25-32). 2. The moral requirements now to be met; the destruction of the last enemy (33-39). 3. A sketch of the community of the future (40-48). In both parts there is a scrupulous exactness of dating, unexampled in any earlier prophet (1¹ 2 8¹ 20¹ 24¹ 26¹ 29¹ 17 30¹ 31¹ 32¹ 17 33¹ 40¹).

Ezekiel's verdict on the national history is of unminged severity. From their starting-point in Egypt the people had behaved ill (cf. 20¹⁻¹³ with Jer 2³). Jerusalem—to him almost synonymous with the nation—was pagan in origin and character (16). The root of their wickedness was an inveterate love of idolatry (passim). Even Ezekiel's own contemporaries longed to be heathens: their God could hold them back only by extreme violence (20²²⁻²⁸). The exiles were somewhat less guilty than their brethren in Jerusalem (14^{22f.}). But, on the whole, princes, priests, and people were an abandoned race. They loved the worship of the high places, which, according to Ezekiel, had always been idolatrous and illegitimate. They ate flesh with the blood in it, disregarded the Sabbath, polluted the Temple with ceremonial and moral defilements, committed adultery and other sexual abominations, were guilty of murder, oppression, the exaction of usury, harshness to debtors. The list can be paralleled from other Prophetic writings, but the stress is here laid on offences against God. And this is in accordance with the strong light in which Ezekiel always sees the Divine claims. The vision with which the whole opens points to His transcendent majesty. The title, 'son of man,' by which the prophet is addressed 116 times, marks the gulf between the creature and his Maker. The most regrettable result of Israel's calamities is that they seem to suggest impotence on Jahweh's part to protect His own. The motive which has induced Him to spare them hitherto, and will, hereafter, ensure their restoration, is the desire to vindicate His own glory. In the ideal future the prince's palace shall be built at a proper distance from Jahweh's, and not even the prince shall ever pass through the gate which has been hallowed by the returning glory of the Lord. Hence it is natural that the reformation and restoration of Israel are God's work. He will sprinkle clean water on them, give them a new heart, produce in them humility and self-loathing. He will destroy their foes and bless their land with supernatural fertility. It was He who had sought amongst them in vain for one who might be their Saviour. It was He who in His wrath had caused them to immolate their children in sacrifice. God is all in all. Yet the people have their part to play. Ezekiel protests against the traditional notion that the present generation were suffering for their ancestors' faults: to acquiesce in that is to deaden the sense of responsibility and destroy the springs of action. Here he joins hands with Jer. (Jer 31^{29f.}), both alike coming to close quarters with the individual conscience. He pushes almost too far the truth that a change of conduct brings a change of fortune (33¹¹⁻¹⁶). But there is immense practical value in his insistence on appropriate action, his appeal to the individual, and the tenderness of the appeal (18²³. ^a 33¹¹). Nowhere is Jahweh's longing for the deliverance of His people more pathetically expressed. And, notwithstanding their continual wrongdoing, the bond of union is so close that He resents as a personal wrong the spitefulness of their neighbours (25-32. 35). The heathen, as such, have no future, although individual heathen settlers will share the common privileges (47^{22f.}).

The concluding chapters, 40-48, 'the weightiest in the book,' are a carefully elaborated sketch of the polity of repatriated Israel—Israel, i.e. not as a nation, but as an ecclesiastical organization. In the foreground is the Temple and its services. Its position, surroundings, size, arrangements, are minutely detailed; even the place and number of the tables on which the victims must be slain are settled. The ordinances respecting the priesthood are precise; none but the Zadokites may officiate; priests who had ministered outside Jerusalem are reduced to the menial duties of the sanctuary (cf. Dt 18⁸). Adequate provision is made for the maintenance of the legitimate priests. Rules are laid down to ensure their ceremonial purity. The office of high priest is not recognized. And there is no real king. In ch. 37 the ruler, of David's line, seems to count for something; not so here. True, he is warned against oppressing his subjects (45⁹ 46¹⁰⁻¹¹), but he has no political rôle. A domain is set apart to provide him a revenue, and his chief function is to supply the sacrifices for the festivals. The country is divided into equal portions, one for each tribe, all of whom are brought back to the Holy Land. No land is to be permanently alienated from the family to which it was assigned. God's glory returns to the remodelled and rebuilt sanctuary, and Ezekiel's prophecy reaches its climax in the concluding words, 'The name of the city from that day shall be, Jahweh is there.' It would be difficult to exaggerate the effect which this Utopia has produced. Some details, such as the equal division of the land, the arrangements respecting the position and revenue of the prince, the relation of the tribes to the city, were impracticable. But the limitation of the priesthood to a particular class, the introduction of a much more scrupulous avoidance of ceremonial defilement, the eradication of pagan elements of worship, the exclusion of all rival objects of worship, went a long way towards creating Judaism. And whilst this has been the practical result, the chapters in question, together with Ezekiel's visions of the chariot and cherubim, have had no little influence in the symbolism and imaginative presentment of Jewish apocalyptic literature and Christian views of the unseen world.

2. Style.—Notwithstanding the favourable opinion of Schiller, who wished to learn Heb. in order to read Ezekiel, it is impossible to regard this prophet as one of the greatest masters of style. His prolixity has been adduced as a proof of advanced age. Repetitions abound. Certain words and formulas recur with wearisome frequency: 'I, Jahweh, have spoken,' 'They shall know that I am Jahweh' (56 times), 'Time of the iniquity of the end,' 'A desolation and an astonishment'; Ezekiel's favourite word for 'idols' is used no fewer than 38 times. The book abounds in imagery, but this suffers from the juxtaposition of incongruous elements (17²⁻⁶ 32²), a mixture of the figurative and the literal (31^{17f.}), inaptness (11³ 15¹⁻³): that in chs. 16 and 23 is offensive to Western but probably not to Eastern taste; that of the Introductory Vision was partly suggested by the composite forms seen in the temples and palaces of Babylonia, and is difficult to conceive of as a harmonious whole. But as a rule Ezekiel sees very distinctly the things he is dealing with, and therefore describes them clearly. Nothing could be more forcible than his language concerning the sins that prevailed. The figures of 29³¹. 34¹⁻¹⁹ 37¹⁻¹⁴ are very telling. There is genuine lyric force in 27²⁶⁻³² 32¹⁷⁻²², and other dirges; there is a charming idyllic picture in 34²⁵⁻³¹. The abundant use of symbolic actions claims notice. Ezekiel's ministry opens with a rough drawing on a tile, and no other prophet resorted so often to like methods of instruction.

3. Text, integrity, and canonicity.—Ezekiel shares with Samuel the unenviable distinction of having the most corrupt text in the OT. Happily the LXX. and in a minor degree the Targum and the Pesh., enable us to make many indisputable corrections. Parallel texts, internal probability, and conjecture have also contributed to the necessary reconstruction, but there remain no small number of passages where it is impossible to be certain. The integrity of the book admits of no serious question. Here and there an interpolation may be recognized, as at 24²¹. 27¹⁵⁻²⁵. One brief section was inserted by the prophet out of its chronological order (29¹⁷⁻²⁰). But the work as a whole is Ezekiel's own arrangement of the memoranda which had accumulated year after year. Although the Rabbis never doubted this, Ezekiel narrowly escaped exclusion from the Canon. Chag., 13a, informs us that but for a certain Hananiah it 'would have been withdrawn from public use, because the prophet's words contradict those of the Law.' Mistrust was also aroused by the opening which the Vision of the Chariot afforded for theosophical speculation; no one might discuss it aloud in the presence of a single hearer (Chag., 11 b).

EZEL.—The spot where Jonathan arranged to meet David before the latter's final departure from the court of Saul (1 S 20¹⁹). The place is not mentioned elsewhere, and it is now generally admitted that the Heb. text of this passage is corrupt. The true reading seems to have been preserved by the LXX, according to which we should read in v.¹⁹ 'yonder cairn,' and in v.⁴¹ 'from beside the cairn.'

EZEM (1 Ch 4²⁹).—See AZMON.

EZER.—1. A Horite 'duke' (Gn 36²¹, 1 Ch 1²⁸). 2. A son of Ephraim who, according to 1 Ch 7²¹, was slain by the men of Gath. 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁴). 4. A Gadite chief who joined David (1 Ch 12⁹). 5. A son of Jeshua who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3¹⁹). 6. A priest who officiated at the dedication of the walls (Neh 12⁴²).

EZION-GEBER, later called Berenice (Jos. Ant. VIII. vi. 4).—A port on the Red Sea (on the Gulf of Akabah) used by Solomon for his commerce (1 K 9²⁶). Here also the Israelites encamped (Nu 33³⁵, Dt 2⁸).

EZORA.—The sons of Ezora, in 1 Es 9³¹, take the place of the strange name Machnadebai (or Mabnadebai, AVm) in Ezr 10⁴⁰, where there is no indication of a fresh family.

EZRA (perhaps an abbreviation of Azariah = 'Jahweh helps'), 1.—A Jewish exile in Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus (B.C. 464–424), who played, as is well known, a prominent part in Jerusalem during the critical period of reform associated with the governorship of Nehemiah. Our sources of information regarding him are (1) the autobiographical narratives embodied in Ezr 7–10, and Neh 8–10; and (2) later tradition as embodied in the narrative of the compiler of Ezr.-Neh., and the accounts in the apocryphal books.

According to Ezr 7¹⁻⁴, Ezra was of priestly descent, and in fact a member of the high-priestly family (a Zadokite). But the Seraiah there mentioned cannot be his father, as this Seraiah had been executed by Nebuchadnezzar in B.C. 586 (132 years before Ezra's appearance). The genealogy may only intend to assert that Ezra belonged to the high-priestly family (cf. also 1 Es 4⁴⁰⁻⁴⁹). But his priestly descent has been called in question. His work and achievements rather suggest the character of the 'scribe' (sōphēr) par excellence.* In the apocalyptic work known as 2 (4) Esdras he is represented as a 'prophet' (2 Es 1³).

In order to form a just estimate of Ezra's work and aims, we must picture him as a diligent student of the Law. He doubtless stood at the head—or, at any rate, was a leading figure—of a new order which had grown up in the Exile among the Jews of the 'Golah' or captivity in Babylonia. Among these exiles great literary activity apparently prevailed during the later years of the Exile and onwards. The so-called 'Priestly Code'—which must be regarded as the work of a whole school of writers—was formed, or at least the principal part of it, probably between the closing years of the Exile and the arrival of Ezra in Jerusalem (B.C. 536–458), and was doubtless the 'law of God' which Ezra brought with him to Jerusalem. The centre of Jewish culture, wealth, and leisure was at this time—and for some time continued to be—Babylonia, where external circumstances had become (since the Persian supremacy) comparatively favourable for the Jews. In this respect the position of the Jerusalem community, during these years, afforded a painful contrast. The tiny community in Judæa had to wage as a whole a long and sordid struggle against poverty and adverse surroundings. Its religious condition was much inferior to that of the 'Golah.' Moved by religious zeal, and also, it would seem, with the statesman-like view of making Jerusalem once more the real spiritual metropolis of Judaism, Ezra conceived the idea of infusing new life and new ideals into the Judæan community, by leading a fresh band of zealously religious exiles from Babylonia back to Judæa on a mission of reform. With the aid, possibly, of Jews at court, he enlisted the goodwill of Artaxerxes, and secured an Imperial firman investing him with all the authority necessary for his purpose. This edict has been preserved in an essentially trustworthy form in Ezr. 7¹²⁻²⁶. All Jews who so wished could depart from Babylon; offerings were to be carried to the Temple in Jerusalem, and the Law of God was to be enforced. In the 7th year of Artaxerxes (B.C. 458) Ezra collected a band of 1496 men (Ezr 8¹⁻¹⁴; in 1 Es 8²⁸⁻⁴¹ the number is given as 1690), besides women and children, and started on his journey across the desert. In four months they reached their destination.

* He is described as 'Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven,' in Ezr 7¹¹⁻²¹; as 'Ezra the priest, the scribe,' in Neh 8¹⁻²; and as 'the priest' alone in Ezr 10¹⁰⁻¹⁶, Neh 8¹. In all these places 'the priest' may easily be due to a redactor's hand.

Here, after the sacred gifts had been offered in the Temple, Ezra soon learned of the lax state of affairs that prevailed in the holy city, and among the Judæan villages. The 'holy seed' (including even priests and Levites) had 'mingled themselves with the peoples of the lands,' and 'the hand of the princes and deputies' had 'been first in this trespass' (Ezr 9²). Ezra's consequent prayer and confession, in the presence of a large assemblage of the people, led to drastic measures of reform. A general congregation of the community authorizes the establishment of a divorce court, presided over by Ezra, which finishes its labours after three months' work; 'and they made an end with the whole business' (10¹⁷ [corrected text]), many innocent women and children being made to suffer in the process.

In the present form of the narrative Ezra does not emerge again till after an interval of 13 years, after Nehemiah had arrived in Jerusalem and re-erected and dedicated the city walls. Shortly after these events (according to the usual chronology, in B.C. 444) the Book of the Law was read by Ezra before the people in solemn assembly, who pledged themselves to obey it. Within the same month (i.e. Tishri, the seventh month) the first of its injunctions to be carried out was the due celebration of the Feast of Booths (Neh 8¹³⁻¹⁸).

The sequence of events as described above is not without difficulties. How is the long interval between Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem (B.C. 458) and the promulgation of the Law (B.C. 444) to be explained? It may be, as Stade has suggested, that the compulsory divorce proceedings alienated a considerable body of the people, and that the opportune moment for introducing the code was in consequence postponed. Or—and there is some probability in this view—the chronology may have become dislocated in the present composite narrative, and Ezra may really have accomplished the bulk of his work before Nehemiah's arrival. Perhaps with even greater plausibility a case may be made out for placing Ezra's work subsequent to Nehemiah's governorship. Cheyne (JRL p. 54 f.) places it between the two visits (445 and 432). See, further, NEHEMIAH [BOOK OF], § 3. It is certainly remarkable that in their respective memoirs Ezra and Nehemiah mention each other but once.

Ezra's is an austere and commanding figure, which has left a lasting impress upon the religious life of the Jewish people. Ezra is the true founder of Judaism. By investing the Law with a sanctity and influence that it had never before possessed, and making it the possession of the entire community, he endowed the Jewish people with a cohesive power which was proof against all attacks from without.

EZRA, BOOK OF.—Our present Book of Ezra, which consists of 10 chapters, is really part of a composite work, Ezra-Nehemiah, which, again, is the continuation of Chronicles. The entire work—Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah—is a compilation made by the Chronicler. See, further, NEHEMIAH [BOOK OF], § 1.

1. Analysis of the book.—The Book of Ezra falls into two main divisions: (a) chs. 1-6; (b) chs. 7-10.

(a) Chs. 1-6 give an account of the Return and the re-building of the Temple. Ch. 1 tells how Cyrus, after the capture of Babylon in B.C. 538, issued an edict permitting the exiles to return; of the latter about 40,000 availed themselves of the opportunity and returned to Judaea under Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel, a member of the royal Davidic family, who was appointed governor (pechah) by Cyrus (B.C. 538-537). Ch. 2 contains a list of those who returned and their offerings for the building of the Temple. Ch. 3 describes how in October 537 the altar of burnt-offering was re-erected on its ancient site, the foundation-stone of the Temple laid (May 536), and the work of re-building begun. Ch. 4 tells that, owing to the unfriendly action of neighbouring populations, the building of the Temple was suspended during the rest of the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses. It contains the correspondence between Rehûm, Shimshai, and their companions, and king Artaxerxes. In 5th-12 we are informed that, as a consequence of the earnest exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, the building of the Temple was energetically resumed in the second year of Darius I. (B.C. 520). In 5th-6th we have the correspondence between the satrap Tattenai and Darius. We read in 6th-22 of how the Temple was successfully completed on the 3rd March 515 B.C. [An interval of silence, lasting nearly sixty years, ensues, of which there seems to be little or no record elsewhere.]

(b) Chs. 7-10 deal with Ezra's personal work. In ch. 7 the silence of nearly sixty years is broken in the year B.C. 458, when Ezra, the teacher of the Law, at the head of a fresh band of exiles, leaves Babylonia bearing a commission from Artaxerxes I. to bring about a settlement in the religious condition of the Judæan community. Ch. 8 gives a list of the heads of families who journeyed with him, and tells of their arrival in Jerusalem. Ch. 9 describes the proceedings against the foreign wives, and contains Ezra's penitential prayer. In ch. 10 we read that an assembly of the whole people, in December 458, appointed a commission to deal with the mixed marriages. The narrative abruptly breaks off with an enumeration of the men who had married strange women.
